The expressions for the proof are: "There remaineth no more sacrifice for sins"—"impossible to renew them again to repentance"—"sorer punishment"—"devour"—"end is to be burned." Let us see if these terms as used by Paul cannot be proved by the Bible as only meaning earthly judgments of different degrees, or temporal death.

And, in the first place, remember that this epistle is addressed especially to the Hebrews, who relied only on the law of Moses and the prophets as a guide. Secondly, Paul is making a comparison between punishments under the law and gospel, or greater light. Thirdly, the law, as is generally admitted, threatened no punishments beyond this life, or a resurrection. The sins and punishments spoken of in these two chapters are doubtless the same, and only repeated to add some new ideas. Paul here tells us that punishment for sins under the gospel will be "sorer" than under the law; and the great mistake in explaining these chapters generally begins by assuming, without proof, that there can be no severer or "sorer" punishments, unless they are endless—either endless torment or endless death. It is also assumed there cannot be great degrees in earthly punishments, so as to call them "sorer" as Paul does. Here most churches err greatly, and it is time the error was rooted up.

Let us next see what may be meant by there "remaineth no more sacrifice for sins" (mark it is plural), chapter x: 26. In verse 28 Paul at once refers to the law of Moses, and says: "He that despised Moses' law died without mercy." We see that despising the law was a capital crime, for which no sacrifice could save from the threatened penalty, and so no mercy could be shown, but the punishment must come. Mark, it was only temporal death, and a resurrection will save from that. But we know there were other sins for which a sacrifice could be made, and so the punishment be omitted—"mercy" could be shown. This is seen by the "yearly sacrifice," when the sins of the people were confessed and carried by the scapegoat into the wilderness so as to be forgotten. Now mark, Paul knew the last sacrifice had been made by Christ, and so now no sacrifice can be made to save from the threatened punishment, whatever that punishment may be. What, then, is to be the punishment of the apostates Paul describes? is the important question to settle. In Heb. ii: 2 we read that under law "every transgression received a just recompense of reward," and asks, "How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?" meaning, how escape punishment. Paul being a Jew, and writing to Jews as a nation, asks, "how can we escape?" Surely the Jews, as a nation, neglected and yet neglect this "great salvation." We think it is evident Paul refers to the Jews as a nation. This is seen by his using words used by the prophets when speaking of earthly judgments on the Jewish nation. See Zeph. i: 18 and iii: 8; and Isa. v: 6; and Gen. xxii: 6, and xlv: 22, and many other passages I might quote if room permitted. Also the sins named here in Hebrews were committed by the Jews as a nation. They, and they only, "trod under foot the Son of God." They of all nations were "enlightened" and "tasted the good word of God"—were comforted by it. They "sinned willfully," and fell, as Rom. xi. teaches us. They, since the death of Christ, have had, and yet have, "fearful looking for of judgments," and "fiery" (fierce) indignation, and have been devoured as a nation. I need say but little to show that they, as a nation, have had "sorer" punishments since rejecting Christ than for sins under the law. They have had over 1,800 years of a worse captivity than the 70 years in Babylon, and were "nigh unto cursing" when Paul wrote.

To see what "impossible to renew them to repentance" means, turn to Matthew xix: 23-26. Here we see Jesus says, "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven," and adds: "With man this is impossible; but with God all things are possible." Thus, He showed the "amazed" disciples that rich men might be saved. A few Jews have been "renewed to repentance," but we yet see it is hard for man to do it, but God can do it, and will in His good time, as is shown in Rom. xi. One proof that Paul meant apostate Jews as a nation is, that he turns to believing Jews and says (Heb. vi: 9 and x: 39), "We are persuaded better things of you," "We are not of those who draw back unto perdition, but of them that believe to the saving of the soul." This shows that real believers do not "fall away," so as to incur the punishments Paul is threatening. They may, and do fall, as did David and Peter. Is not Paul describing the same class of persons spoken of in 2 Peter ii: 18-22? The "sow" being "washed" from external "corruptions" does not make sheep of her. 2 Cor. v: 17 says: "If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature." The "sow" becomes a sheep, and they do not love to "wallow in the mire." I know that a part of Christians think Paul means real converted men as thus sinning "willfully"; but does Christ do as the unwise man who begins to "build a tower and is not able to finish it"?—Luke xiv: 28. Paul nor Peter calls them "believers." They "taste" it, but taste is in the tongue, and we may taste of good food, but if we do not eat it we are not benefited. We now often say men are convicted by the Spirit, but not converted. But I need not dwell on this point.

If Paul has reference to individual Jew and Gentile apostates, where is the proof that he means anything more than Christ did in saying that "he who knows his Master's will and does it not shall be beaten with many stripes"? Have any of the punishments threatened anything more than earthly judgments, or "sorer" ones in this or in the ages to come? The terms he uses do not prove they do. "Devour" is one, and that is often used in the Bible in regard to earthly woes or temporal evils that they cannot be proof to the annihilation of mankind. I refer to one out of many—Zeph. iii: 8, 9.

As to "end is to be burned," see, out of scores of similar texts, Rev. xvii: 16, "Eat her flesh and burn her with fire." Let us not go to dictionaries, as many do, to learn how God uses words in the Bible. Many are deceived in this way. But my health forbids me making my views as plain as I wish; and I must close by remarking that it is not my design in this article to prove that none of our race will lose existence, but to show that Hebrews vi. and x. do not, in my opinion, plainly prove that they will; and especially to show that our old Advent brethren have no proof from these chapters that the mass of sinners will lose eternal life; a doctrine which I must abhor the same as I do endless torment; for it awfully slanders our Maker, and spreads gloom over Christendom.

ELDER JACOB BLAIN, Buffalo, N. Y., writes: "Have been badly injured by being knocked down by a horse and sleigh, so that I could not answer letters as I wished to do. I came near being killed, but am slowly recovering, and hope soon to be able to answer correspondents and write for our beloved EXAMINER. Though eighty-six years old, my strength and faculties have not quenched my zeal and love for God's truth. I am much comforted, as I trust you all are, by seeing our God is removing the "veil" (blindness and stupidity) from many torment teachers. See Isa. xxv: 6-9. Let us bless our Saviour for encouragement to labor on. I feel richly rewarded for bearing twenty-eight years persecution. But I fear the 'veil' will not be removed from our 'world-burning' brethren till Christ comes. They ward off further light by saying they 'do not hold to endless torment.' But we may be thankful for the belief that 'the ages to come' will teach them that our heavenly Father has not made the mass of our race, knowing when He made them He would finally blot them out of existence.

WHICH WILL BE HEAVEN?

The late Rev. Dr. Storrs, of Braintree, Mass., father of Dr. Storrs of Brooklyn, New York, in an anniversary discourse before the American Home Missionary Society, some years since, is reported to have said: "Make up your minds and take hold of this enterprise with stronger hands and larger hearts. Heaven and earth shall unite in urging you onward. Millions of the heavenly hosts stretch out their hands to you, and millions of the lost raise up their voices, exhorting you to do that which shall save millions from coming to the place of torments in which they are!"

Dr. Jonathan Edwards said: "The saints will not be sorry for the damned; it will cause no uneasiness or dissatisfaction to them; but, on the contrary, when they see the sight, it will occasion rejoicing and excite them to joyful praises."

So, on the authority of learned orthodox divines, we are to believe that the lost in hell are influenced by the most generous, humane and divine (for what can be more divine than such imitation of Him who came to save sinners?) emotions; while the saints in heaven rejoice and are happy in the possession and manifestation of feelings of unapproachable inhumanity and fiendishness.

Good brother! which place will be heaven, and which hell?

Such teaching as that in the foregoing extracts is well calculated to beget abhorrence of a religion that is supposed to sustain it. Nor can we wonder that men are made infidels when such blasphemous sentiments as that of Edwards is made to pass for Christian.

But where is the root of such blasphemies? It lies in the great father lie—"Ye shall not surely die." Jehovah has solemnly declared, "The wages of sin is death"; and expostulates with men, saying, "Why will ye die?" But self-styled "orthodoxy" affirms death is not death, but merely, in the first place, a change of state from this life to another; and in the second place, a change from happiness to misery. Thus it virtually charges the God of truth with deception and falsehood—with saying one thing but meaning another and very different thing; and the root of this slander of God is in the doctrine that man has an immortal soul—a soul that cannot die, and no opportunity will be given to be saved from sin and be reconciled to God in any of the ages to come. For such doctrine there is not one text in the Bible. The Bible teaches man is mortal, corruptible, dying; and that life eternal can only be secured as a gift of God—which gift is to be bestowed on all those who come to Christ, Heaven's appointed LIFE-GIVER; and by a conformity to the will of God, without which endless life would be a curse. Such a curse God has guarded against by making the wages of sin to be death—cessation of life. Life everlasting is to be placed in the reach of all men, and an opportunity granted to all, with the necessary means to obtain it secured to all, in this life or in a future one; and which can only fail by a willful rejection of Christ the Redeemer, after He has been made known to them, and the knowledge of "the only true God" has been clearly manifested to their minds.

"WHAT IS TRUTH?"

BY G. B. STACY.

The above has been at all times to the human family the most important question to prosecute to solution, since their alienation from the life of God, or since the gross darkness which, as a consequence, has covered their hearts and understandings as a veil. Hence, the Saviour prayed for His Disciples, "Sanctify them through Thy truth—Thy word is truth." "In the beginning was the word"—"And the word was made flesh." Again He said, "I am the way, the truth, and the life." In other words, our blessed Redeemer is the embodiment of truth, so that truth in relation to all things concenters in Him; and therefore all truth leads back to Him; no matter what it relates to, or how it has been exhumed or elaborated; it concenters in one living Head, and necessarily leads up to and into Him. It is, therefore, the sheerest folly to be afraid of truth. Truth, simple truth, is the only mental idea that is valuable; and that for the reasons above stated. Its unity is universal, and so it constitutes a concentric circle, and we should pursue it with all our energies in whatever phase it presents itself to us.

It is, however, very difficult for poor humanity to rise out of and shake itself free from the overshadowing power of the darkness which, as "a veil," has been cast over fallen humanity. No matter that God's children are the workmanship of the Christ Jesus, "created unto good works"—"in righteousness and true holiness," and though they have "passed from death into life"—become new creatures—and though they have thereby "put the old man to death, crucified him with his affections and lusts," yet they are burdened with him as a hindrance and a clog to put their faith to the test and prove their fidelity; and, therefore, it is a common thing for them to be influenced to a greater or less degree by their fleshly passions and relations, so that the Apostle said of the Corinthians, "And I, brethren, could not speak unto you as unto spiritual, but as unto carnal, even as unto babes in the Christ. I have fed you with milk and not with meat; for hitherto ye were not able to bear it, neither yet now are ye able. For ye are yet carnal: for, whereas, there is among you envyings and divisions, are ye not carnal, and walk as men?"

How frequently the best and most lofty of God's children in this, our day, ignore the fact that they have come up out of Babylon, and are necessarily tainted with the mystic darkness He has consolidated to a substance that may be felt, and so arrogate their own logical deductions as the standard of truth, and become intolerant of any failure to reach or deviation from their standard. And yet, if anything is manifest, it is that our Father has broken the truth and import of His revelations and purposes so gradually and progressively to His children that it is only as they look back over the past that they can discover the wonderful progress that has been made. And, oh! what a history has that progress been! What weaknesses, missteps and positive antagonisms on the part of His beloved ones, owing to the dominion of their passions! And have we personally been guiltless in this matter?

seems to be almost universal. We forget how we have been driven from previous positions which we were as confident of as we are of our present ones, and this self-poised assurance of present truth causeth us to act uncharitably towards those we differ from. This we do frequently without being conscious of it. Our zeal to defend what we cherish in our own hearts as truth frequently leads us to caricature our brother's views, and then expose our own picture of them as though our theories were of the utmost value. We forget that our business is not to theorize, but to act, to "shine as lights"; in other words, our Father simply requires of us to manifest or exhibit to our fellows the operative power of the revealed truth we have personally comprehended in our every-day lives and actions.

We forget that we ourselves were unable to comprehend many things we now hold dearest in times that are past. But our Father has led us by paths we knew not, by which our hearts have been opened to let in the light of His truth, and our experience teaches us that it is a condition of heart, not of intellect, through which we have been advanced in knowledge; and thus we learn that only that amount of truth that can operate upon our life actions is valuable to us at any stage of our onward progress; any beyond this is superfluous, and not supplied by our Father. But it is difficult, nevertheless, to refrain from endeavoring to correct theoretical errors. If, however, we attempt the task, let us endeavor to do it honestly. In other words, let us always quote the fullest, clearest and most forcible expression of the grounds of our brother's conclusions, or give him all the advantage his position is entitled to, whether he has appropriated it or no, and then fairly present the grounds of our own conclusions, leaving the reader with all the advantages we can present to arrive at his own conclusions.

Now, while I think some of our advent brethren have erred in the conclusion that the presence of the Lord is now due, I think Brother Bishop's method of treating the question is unfair to them, and unfair to all who have not arrived at conclusions in the premises.

These brethren look for as full, as perfect and universal appearing or manifestation of the personal coming of the Lord as he does. For instance, they make a strong point in urging that, whether men know it or no, the whole creation now and in all the past have "groaned and travailed together in pain," cherishing the earnest expectation while they wait for the manifestation of the sons of God; which manifestation is dependent upon the manifestation of the King in His glory. They are simply like Brother Bishop and the readers of THE EXAMINER generally: they justly recognize a great distinction between the Parvasia and the Epiphania, or Apokalupsis of the Lord. They look for His presence some time before His appearing; and while present they expect Him to take His brethren to Himself to be forever with Him. I am much mistaken if we are not all in perfect accord on this subject and if so, then it is not just to represent that the sense in which they claim His presence due is in fulfilment of the Scriptures Brother Bishop quotes. I again say, if I can understand them, they look for as literal a fulfilment of the Scriptures quoted as Brother Bishop himself.

But if they are in error, let Brother Bishop show that they construe 2 Cor. v: 16 erroneously. "Wherefore henceforth know we no man after the flesh; yea, though we have known the Christ after the flesh, yet now henceforth know we Him no more."

Brother Dunn has taught us that we have frequently mistaken the teaching of Scripture by our dogmatic persistence in the verbal meaning of some of its phraseology, without comparing Scripture with Scripture; and that it sometimes happens that great truths are clearly taught for which we can find no positive, clear and dogmatic statement. Not that I mean to say these brethren are dependent upon this form of argument, but I do say these considerations should make us wary how we pronounce upon the conclusions of brethren whose works claim for them as good a standing as ourselves. Besides, if we believe that the Mission of the Holy Spirit is in part, at least, to "guide us into all truth," surely we may rest contented to leave our brethren, whose works declare them to be such, to His gracious guidance. If these brethren err theoretically, our Father is not without the means of counting their errors, and when He needs our services for that purpose He will not leave us ignorant of the fact. Our Father knows the best times, the best opportunities and the best instrumentalities for the accomplishment of this work, and we may rely confidently on His Fatherly solicitude that each "Man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished into all good works."

It is not ours to imply or leave the impression that "our Lord delayeth His coming," but to endeavor to keep our own "lamps trimmed and burning with oil in our vessels," and to encourage all and every member of the household of faith to do the same, and stand constantly in an expectant attitude. I think these brethren err in their chronology, and that I could show that there is no such concurrence of fulfilled times and events at this time as they claim; but so short a space remains that it is not worth the effort to prove theoretically what will soon be manifest, and therefore I wait with patience. If it should turn out that they are mistaken as to chronological terminations, I may afterwards give the data and the conclusions I have arrived at.

THE "FOUNTAIN" TO BE "OPENED."

AN INQUIRY.

"Has Zech. xiii:1 been fulfilled? Does not the prophecy begin with chapter xii, 'The burden of the world of the Lord for Israel'? Has that day come to pass when 'Jerusalem' was made a 'cup of trembling'; and a burdensome stone for all people; and all that burdened themselves with it shall be cut in pieces? And, in that day the Lord will seek to destroy all nations that come against Jerusalem. In that day there shall be great mourning in Jerusalem,' etc. Then chapter xiii:1, 'In that day there shall be a fountain opened to the house of David and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem for sin and for uncleanness.' Have chapters xii and xiii had a fulfilment? If so, when and where?

"Does not that prophecy relate to the people for whom the burden of the world of the Lord is? And does it not relate to a day that is still future, as much so as Micah iv? Will you please give your views relative to the prophecy, and oblige a seeker after truth." B.

RESPONSE BY THE EDITOR.

It is not so easy a matter to answer all inquiries that may arise on particular texts or portions of Scripture. That Zech. xii and xiii relate to literal Israel and Judah I see no ground for doubt. That the fulfilment of those prophetic declarations are mainly in the future seems a self-evident truth. I say, "mainly," because a thing may be in existence before it is discovered. A fountain of water may be in existence, but not discovered till there has been a clearing away of that which hid it from view. So the fountain for sin and uncleanness may have been in existence for thousands of years, and yet not be opened to individuals or communities because not yet discovered; something has hidden it from view. The past unbelief or unavoidable ignorance of multitudes of Israel and Judah, to whom "blindness in part has happened" (Rom. xi:25), may have and has prevented their perceiving the "fountain for sin and uncleanness"; but when that blindness is removed (as it will be) then shall they see the "the fountain opened," which will be to them its first actual appearance, and so be said to be "opened in that day"; for "There shall come out of Sion the Deliverer and turn away ungodliness from Jacob." — Rom. xi:26. When that takes place it will be the time of mourning spoken of Zech. xii, and the fountain will be opened to their view for the first time (Zech. xiii:1), of which they will then avail themselves, as did Saul of Tarsus after three days of blindness at Damascus. — Acts ix:8-18. Paul said of himself, after his conversion, that he was the "chief" of sinners, a "blasphemer and a persecutor," but that he "obtained mercy" because he did these things "ignorantly in unbelief," and that "Jesus Christ might show forth all long-suffering for a pattern to them which should hereafter believe on Him to life everlasting" — 1 Tim. i:16; referring, as I think, to the prophecy in Zech. xii, of the looking on Him whom the nation had pierced and mourning, etc. Paul was not a "pattern" to any man converted since his day; for he was led to mourn and seek mercy by seeing Jesus whom he "persecuted." So are the Israelites in Zech. xii led to mourning by "looking on Him whom they" had "pierced," and then was opened to their vision the fountain for uncleanness, and by it their sins were washed away.

In our days professedly Christian men shrink from independent investigation, chiefly because they think it inexpedient. Certain forms of thought, right or wrong, have, it is said, for generations been regarded as "worthy of all acceptance"; under these forms men have lived well and died happily. Why unsettle such landmarks?

So long as a man is only half convinced, so long as he is simply yielding to the views of others, he can easily evade the consequences of his admissions; and if they involve anything very self-denying or disagreeable, easily put off his obedience to a more convenient season. But if, after long and anxious investigation, he has arrived at the conclusion that what he professes to have received as Divine is absolutely and eternally true, he has no choice between submission and suffering; for if truth, thus received, be not a sovereign good to man, its possession must be a source of wretchedness.

A MEDITATION.

"Abide in Me—apart from Me ye can do nothing." How true the declaration! How needful the charge! How loving the permission! Ah! Saviour, whither should we go? Where else can strength, or peace, or any rest be found in this troubled world? Where but in Thee can a sinner hide or a saint be safe? Hold me, then, ever by Thy hand. Keep me "under the shadow of Thy wing." "As one whom his mother comforteth," so let me, like the favored disciple, lean on Thy bosom and be at peace.

Strange is it that a world so empty as this, so unsatisfying, so wearisome even in its pleasures, should yet take such firm hold on creatures destined for higher satisfactions. Strange is it that a soul, conscious of its "high calling," lonely amid crowds, solitary when most surrounded, sad at heart even in the midst of excited seekers after joy, should yet so often lose hold of the great object of its love, and need to have continually reiterated in its ears the counsel that rises into command—"Abide in Me."

Alas, how prone we are to think we can stand alone! How prone to forget that all that we have is derived from another! How unconscious oftentimes that if we abide not in the vine, we but wither and die! "We fade as doth a leaf, and our iniquities, like the wind, do carry us away." How slow are we to learn our first lesson in the school of the Redeemer, that out of Christ we can do nothing; nothing great, nothing good, nothing able to bear Divine inspection, nothing likely to secure the Divine approval!

Oh, foolish heart, how long wilt thou trifle with thy best Friend? How long wilt thou fail to perceive thy true interests? How long wilt thou go on living a dead life, like a branch painfully seeking to be independent of the root from which all its nourishment is derived? Soul, cease thy folly. Much loved, much forgiven, stay with thy Saviour. Stay with Him in all offices of prayer and praise. Stay with Him in the exercise of an open-handed and open-hearted charity. Freely thou hast received, freely give. Stay with Him, above all, in a watchful life and in a chastened spirit. Stay with Him till, coming in the clouds of heaven, He will stay with thee, and thou shalt abide with Him forevermore.—Henry Dunn.

In what was the life of our blessed Lord consumed, but in continual labor to make the multitude doubt the distinctive principles which the highest authorities in their Church had brought them up in?

COMPOSITION ON LAW.

WRITTEN FOR A HIGH SCHOOL IN THE WINTER OF 1859.

By POLLY G. PITTS.

In the silence of night I went forth, in imagination, to gaze on the wonders that presented themselves to my view. My imaginary site was the highest pinnacle of the glorious North Star—the star that has seemed the eye of God to the fugitive, drawing and directing him to the land of freedom from slavery's galling chains. After taking so high a position, my imagination was almost jaded, but lifting my wondering eyes to the south (for it was all south) I soon forgot my weariness. The spacious chambers of the south opened before me, with all their shining hosts. There was the Pleiades, the Hicades, the glorious Orion and Arcturus, with unnumbered constellations and stars of the first magnitude. How was my sight drawn out, my vision strengthened, to behold the entire circle of the gorgeous Milky Way, the comet with its fiery trail, its mighty velocity traveling in the greatness of its strength! No wonder the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy in the day that all the hosts of heaven were created. Gentle reader, could you have sat with me and viewed the glorious order of all their mighty host, how would you have admired law, holy and immutable law! But feeling that great height was hazardous to my weak head, and that, like the bird that rises to heaven and chants her morning song, must turn and stoop to earth. But oh! how changed the prospect. Though the earth performs her daily and annual revolutions, and in this obeys the law of the universe, yet the universal neglect of God's law has transformed this beautiful earth into the wilderness that it is. Oh, how wretched has the infraction of law made man everywhere! How earth sighs, from her deepest recesses, over the wrongs that have resulted therefrom, and wherewith humanity is weighed down and crushed! Whenever man causes a sigh to arise from any heart, that sigh is wrung from the bosom by the violation of God's law. No wonder the firmest footing of all the mighty of the earth has failed, and down they have dropped into the grave like a disabled pitcher of no use. No wonder the earth groans for deliverance, and, as the prophet says, is moved out of her place and does not stand upright.

But, oh, were there not a brighter prospect, how wretched should we be! But we believe that God will set the earth upright. Then there will be no chilling blasts, no frozen ocean, no perpetual snow, no darkness at the poles, but one eternal summer, bless the earth, and day and night be of a length. "For behold a king shall reign in righteousness and princes rule in judgment." Then God's kingdom will have come, and His will or law be done on the earth as it is done in heaven. Then will the morning stars sing together again and all the sons of God shout for joy. Then will be heard, as it were, the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, as the voice of mighty thunderings, saying, Alleluia; for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth. Hearers, will you all be there?

A REQUEST.

"I wish you would give me your view on Luke ii: 34, 35. The 35th verse is very hard for me to understand." N.

To understand verse 35, observe the first part of it is a parenthesis, and is to be understood as relating to the mother of Jesus only. Then look at John xix: 25, and see that mother standing at the cross and beholding that Son dying in agony, and ask yourself if "a sword" is not piercing her soul? Then read the 34th verse in connection with what follows the parenthesis in verse 35, and you will understand both verses, I judge.

SECOND REQUEST.

"Will you tell us what is the meaning of Zech. xiii: 4-6?"

In verses four and five Zechariah is speaking of the false prophets who acted for the idol worshippers; the previous verses show who are brought to shame in that day in which Christ is manifested to Israel, and they are "mourning, every family apart," etc., and false prophets are put to death (see verse 3). "In that day" those prophets will be "ashamed" and deny that they are prophets. Here the subject of the false prophets ends; and the subject, commenced chapter xii: 10, when "they shall look upon me whom they have pierced and mourn," etc., is resumed in verse 6, chapter xiii. "And one shall say unto Him" (whom they had pierced at His first advent), "What are these wounds in thy hands?" and the Christ answers.

THIRD REQUEST.

"Will you give an exposition of what is taught by assertion and implication in our Saviour's conversation with Martha, John xi: 25, 26?"

The text reads, "Jesus said unto her, I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die."

Martha had said to Jesus, concerning her brother, "I know he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day." She seems not to have fully realized the power of Jesus, or not to have thought that He could raise the dead now. Jesus dispels the idea. He tells her, "I am the resurrection;" all that work is in my hands: the resurrection power is here now—the same power that will awake the dead at the last day: "he that believeth in me, even if dead, yet he shall live;" and such as live from the dead, and "believe in me, shall never die," or shall not die forever. Two different views may be taken of this text. It may mean that the believer when raised from the dead shall never die any more, which is true (see Luke. xx: 36); or it may mean that he who has died, not a believer, when he "liveth," from the dead, by a resurrection, "and believeth in" Jesus, "shall never die" again.

Both views are true; but the last seems most likely to be what our Lord intended to teach. In other words, He taught the possibility of an endless life being secured by faith in Him after the resurrection; for He is both the "resurrection and the life."

EDITOR.

FROM T. H. AND A. T. FORD.

BRO. STORRS:—The EXAMINER still comes to us laden with precious things—truths which commend themselves to the judgment and understanding, and also tell us of our Father's love—His great love to the world of mankind. We have been exceedingly blessed and comforted in finding, after years of suspense, that He has made such ample provision in Jesus Christ "for all who will come unto God by Him," and that condemnation can only be experienced by those who, after having been made acquainted with Christ's finished work of atonement, shall reject Him, "seeing no beauty in Him that they should desire Him." Amid all the ambitions and vanities which make up the history of the present hour we are watching closely the movements of the nations, believing the strife which has begun in the East will culminate in the "time of trouble such as never was." Distress of nations with perplexity is upon us. Our daily papers are teeming with accounts of human suffering unprecedented. "Earth, what a sorrow lies before thee! None like it in the shadowy past." But the dark cloud of woe which is slowly, but surely, settling over our land and world has a silver lining to those who "have fled for refuge to lay hold of the hope set before them in the Gospel." There is no safety only in Jesus; nothing but His imparted righteousness will enable us to stand unmoved, with peace and assurance in our hearts. May the readers of the EXAMINER, with our dear editor, be accounted "worthy to escape all these things which are coming on the earth, and stand before the Son of Man" and hear from His gracious lips the sweet words, "Come ye blessed," etc. As ever yours.

Concord, N. H., February, 1878.

FROM POLLY G. PITTS.

BRO. STORRS:—It is with an aching head and feeble mind that I take my pen to write a few lines to let you know the cause of my not writing for the EXAMINER before now. My health was poor all the fall, and I have not been able to write as usual; but since Christmas I have been quite sick; my head has been badly affected; inflammation settled in one eye, entirely destroyed the sight, and badly affected the other, so that I can neither read much nor write. I cannot look on paper but a few minutes at a time, but must write a few words now. My hope is in God, and is like an anchor to my soul, and reaches into that within the veil—to Jesus, my sure foundation, on which my feet were set by sovereign grace.

February 11th.—Feeble to-day, but still revived and comforted. Have confidence in God that all He doeth to me is done in love, and is just right. May God give you health and strength to labor on for His glory till He shall say, "Lay down thine armor, take thy crown." Oh, I should be glad to send a word of love to all the dear ones that have in love spoken of me in the EXAMINER, and those that have written to me that I have not answered, and those that I have answered. My love to Brother Rockwell; I have not forgotten him. I have received a long and interesting letter from Brother and Sister Willard of Haddonfield, N. J., but cannot answer it. My son read it to me. I must stop; I cannot think for pain. My unfailing love to you, my Brother. May God keep you as the apple of His eye till Jesus comes. I may fall asleep before He comes, and I may not; but if He does not come, as some have set the time, I shall not give it up, but wait with patience His own good time and pleasure. I should like to write to Brother Bishop, but cannot. I still remain your Sister in the Lord, waiting. Pray for me, my Brother.

Fredericksburg, Ia., Feb. 8 and 11, 1878.

The mere acceptance, on authority, of any doctrine, true or false, is not equivalent to faith in that doctrine, but quite the reverse; it is a different thing. Faith is not the mere assent to truth, but something much higher. It is the reception of it for a reason, and a reason powerful enough to command submission; it supposes a conviction of truth so deep and profound that the persuasion of it becomes, in extreme cases, the ground and justification of martyrdom.

"OUR REST."—In the notice of this periodical last month, "No. 1 Arcade Court, Chicago, Ill." was given as its address. It has since been changed to "No. 188 East Monroe Street."

"THE BIBLE BANNER."—This periodical has heretofore been issued at Vineland, N. J., as a Monthly. It is now issued in Philadelphia, Pa., as a Weekly, at No. 15 North Ninth Street. Terms, $2.00 per year, in advance. It is a quarto of large size, and well printed.

Theologically the BIBLE EXAMINER differs entirely from the Banner in relation to the character of prophecy; it making much of it conditional. The EXAMINER rejects such a construction. On "The ages to come" the Banner is not at all in harmony with the EXAMINER. It contains much matter of interest, and so far is worthy of support. A. A. PHELPS, A. M., is Editor.

EDITORIAL NOTICES.

LIGHT PAPER.—The paper used on the EXAMINER last month was of less weight than usual. I bought and paid for paper of the usual weight; but by some oversight in its delivery to my printer it was of a considerable lighter quality than it should have been; but I did not discover the mistake till after it was all printed.

The Bible Examiner is a Monthly Magazine. Terms, $2.00 per year, in advance. Subscribers' Names should be written very plain. Do not neglect this. It is utterly impossible sometimes to decipher names, and mistakes must occur in consequence. As to their Address, give simply the name of the Post-office and State.

Let all Correspondents be careful to address me as follows:

GEO. STORRS,
72 Hicks Street,
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

All "Postal Money Orders" sent me should be drawn on Brooklyn, N. Y.

To Clubs the BIBLE EXAMINER will be supplied on the followings terms:

Two copies, to one address,	$3.00
Four " " "	5.00
Ten " " "	10.00

The ten may be divided and sent to the address of two persons, if desired. The prices fixed above are expected to be paid in advance and the money sent at the risk of the subscribers.

BIBLE EXAMINERS, bound plain, will be furnished for $2.00 per volume. Volumes 18, 19, 20 and 21 can still be supplied. Also in plain morocco, with gilt edges, for $3.25.

A YOUTHS' PAPER PROPOSED.

CHICAGO, MARCH 5, 1878.

ELDER STORRS: I feel deeply impressed with the idea that the young as well as the aged should be taught the right ways of the Lord. The teaching of the Holy Scriptures is, that if a child is taught in his youth, when he is old he will not depart from it. Timothy was taught the Holy Scriptures from his youth.

As a means to this end I have had it in my mind to start a child's paper, entitled "The Young Student," designed not only to teach them moral lessons, but in a simple way the glorious doctrines that attach to the age or ages to come. The size would be about that which children's papers usually are. Price fifty cents per year, monthly. Now, if you would like to see such a paper issued, please be kind enough to call attention to it in the EXAMINER. Those who would like to have it, send in their names, but NO MONEY. I do not wish any money until I find whether there will be sufficient subscribers to warrant its issue.

RESPONSE BY THE EDITOR.

I have endeavored to keep clear of the various speculations on which some periodicals have wasted their time and labor to keep up a useless excitement on the "Eastern Question." Yet I have spoken my mind in three articles, which can be found in the BIBLE EXAMINER, volume xxi., pages 35, 133 and 355. That volume I can still furnish to any who have it not; I will do so, in sheets, on the receipt of 75 cents; or, for $2, bound. I have nothing different to say now on the subject. I believe I embodied the truth in those three articles relating to the subject, and shall wait for further developments before saying more. If those who are in a hurry to "burn the world" and destroy everybody but themselves can afford to waste their time in attempting to prove "conditional prophecy" is God's method in instructing us, I cannot. Every prophecy in God's Book will be literally fulfilled, whether men can wait for it or not.

As to, "Who are the kings of the East?" I think all of us will have to wait till they are manifested. I have never yet seen any satisfactory answer to that question; and am content to let others speculate upon it if they will.

"THE ANCIENT OF DAYS."

AN INQUIRY.

"WHAT do you understand the 'Ancient of Days' to be in Dan. vii. 9, 13, 22? Or, what is meant by the 'Ancient of Days'?"
W.

RESPONSE BY THE EDITOR.

The question presented is to me a new one. I had quietly supposed it had reference to God the Father. Now, being confronted with the above inquiry, I turned to "Pick's Hebrew and English Concordance," and find the word in those verses is the Chaldee Ateek, and defined by him as meaning "removable." If that is correct, I am driven to search out a different view of those verses to what has seemed to be their meaning. Shall I venture on such a work? If it must be done, I dare do little else than to suggest. Something is "removable," and the time has come for it to be done, even the "SET" time to remove something that has stood in the way of the establishment of the kingdom of God on the earth.

The word "ateek," here translated "ancient," occurs but in one other text in the Bible, viz.: in 1 Chron. iv. 22, where it is also translated ancient, and evidently signifies "removable"—persons not permanently settled in their work, but liable to be removed at the pleasure of their employers.

The context in Dan. vii. shows what is to be "removed," viz.: the rulers, or ruling powers which have "trodden down the whole earth," their "thrones" are to be "cast down," and another established by the "Son of man" and his associate rulers, unto which "all people, nations and languages" are to yield submission, or "serve and obey" that ruling power. (Please read the whole chapter.)

The transactions that bring about this "removal" of mere human governments and the establishment of that of the "Son of man" over all the earth is symbolically represented by a solemn judgment, in which all the parties concerned are presented to view under their appropriate insignia—the earthly rulers, civil and ecclesiastical, as wild and destructive beasts, with their horns carrying on the work of destruction till the set time for their "removal" comes; then their "thrones are cast down"; or, their rule comes to an end. In this work "ten thousand times ten thousand," or multitudes, were employed. The work of destroying the wild beasts' governments is not accomplished in a sudden manner, but by a "prolonged" process which results in their utter ruin; then the reign of the Son of man is fully developed, and "Wars are made to cease to the ends of the earth," and the Lord Jesus reigns as the "Prince of Peace."

THE HOPE OF THE GOSPEL.

LET us look at Paul's language relating to gospel hope. Acts xxiii. 6, "Of the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question." Then truly he preached the resurrection of the dead as the gospel hope; unless he was called in question for something he did not preach. But let us see. In Acts xxvi. 6-8, he says: "Now I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our Fathers: unto which our twelve tribes, instantly serving, day and night, hope to come. For which hope's sake, King Agrippa, I am accused of the Jews. Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead?" Here again is seen the burden and hope of Apostolic preaching. It is a future life, by a resurrection from the dead. He adds, verses 22 and 23: "Having obtained help of God, I continue unto this day witnessing to both small and great, saying none other things than those which the prophets and Moses did say should come; that Christ should suffer, and that he should be the first that should rise from the dead," etc. Not only is the resurrection the Apostolic burden and hope, but he affirms the same things were the theme of the prophets and Moses: the hope is one. Not an intimation thus far of the notion of entering the holy of holies—heaven—at death, or at all; it is the hope of the resurrection. He has shown us that was "the hope of Israel," as well as the hope of the gospel; and in chap. xxviii. 20, in his bondage at Rome, he saith, "For the hope of Israel I am bound with this chain."

But we will now see whether Paul does not with equal clearness state the hope of the gospel in his Epistles. 1 Cor. xv. 12-19, "Now if Christ be preached that he rose from the dead, how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead? But if there is no resurrection of the dead; then is Christ not risen . . . then is your faith vain . . . then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished"—there is no hope for them; for "if in this life only we have hope in Christ we are of all men most miserable." That the apostle has reference to the hope of a future life by a resurrection is clear from what he says in verse 32. "If after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus [exposing my life], what advantageth it me if the dead rise not?" Plainly affirming he had no hope of going to heaven at death, and that he had acted a foolish part in hazarding his life at Ephesus if there is no resurrection. Such a course would be folly indeed; rather "Let us eat and drink," if there is no resurrection, "for to-morrow we die," and there is no hope beyond that. Such is the apostle's conclusion if there is to be no resurrection of the dead. But this reasoning is both absurd and false, if he could or would go to heaven at death.

But again, Paul says, Rom. viii. 23, after speaking of the groaning creation, "And not only it, but ourselves also, which have the first fruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting [to go to heaven at death? No, but] for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body;" not its dissolution at death. He adds, "For we are saved by hope; but hope that is seen is not hope: for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for? But if we hope for that we see not then do we with patience wait for it." And what does the apostle affirm he and the Christians of his time were "waiting for"? Answer: "The redemption of our body;" that is, for the coming of Christ from heaven and the resurrection. This will be clearly seen by comparing what he says here with Phil. iii. 20, 21: "Our conversation is in heaven; from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body," etc. Here is no ground for mistake or doubt. Paul was not expecting to go to heaven at death, nor at all; but he was looking for Christ to come from heaven—not when his vile body should go to corruption, but when the time should arrive for it to be fashioned like to Christ's glorious body; which is not till the resurrection. This is further confirmed by his language in the same chapter, where he tells us how he labored and suffered, "If by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead," verse 11. How unlike all this is the common idea of an entrance into heaven at death!

The hope of Paul is thus distinctly stated; and it is the gospel hope, and demonstrates that modern Christians are as ignorant of what that hope is as the pagans themselves. In fact, the theology of these days has substituted an immortal soul for, or instead of, Christ; and hence a hope of going to heaven at death instead of a future life by a resurrection from the dead at the last day, as Christ has promised. A fatal mistake this, by which Christ is robbed and dishonored; while death is crowned "Prince of Peace," and as the door into heaven! Christ, however, declares himself to be the door, and affirms that those who climb up any other way are thieves and robbers. He is "the resurrection and the life;" without him, and without that resurrection which he has promised, there is no gospel hope of a future life or immortality. Let men beware how they attempt to approach the holy place into which Jesus our High Priest has entered. That is no part of the work of a Christian even to attempt an entrance into heaven at death, or any other period. ED.

A QUESTION ON HEBREWS VI. AND X.

Does the language of these chapters admit of any other rational exposition than that of the possibility, if not the danger, of persons who are now believers in Christ so apostatizing as finally to utterly perish? Or, in other words, was the language addressed to the Hebrew nation, as such, or only to believers of that nation; but applicable to believers of all nations and in all times, during their probationary state, as a caution and warning against apostasy?

It seems to me the language was addressed, first, to Hebrew Christians, and is applicable to all believers of every age and nation. This appears clear from many expressions in the Epistle. The apostle says: "Wherefore, holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling, consider the Apostle and High Priest of our profession, Christ Jesus; . . . whose house are we, if we hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end; . . . for we are made partakers of Christ if we hold the beginning of our confidence steadfast unto the end."—Chap. iii. 1, 6, 14. Such language cannot be applied to Hebrews "as a nation." It shows the apostle was addressing believers in Christ of that nation. Again he says: "For we which have believed do enter into rest; . . . seeing, then, that we have a great high priest, that is passed into the heavens, Jesus, the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession."—Chap. iv. 3, 14. The addressed persons were believers in Jesus, which could not be said of the "nation."

The apostle urges these believers, many of whom were weak, in the following language: "Therefore, leaving the [first] principles of the doctrine of Christ, let us go on to perfection. . . . For it is impossible for those who were once enlightened and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and have tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come, if they shall fall away," etc.—Chap. vi. 1, 2, 3. This language embraces only persons who are true believers in Jesus, and can by no means be applied to Hebrews who have not accepted the Son of God. The apostle then commends these believers for what they had done, and expresses the persuasion or hope that they would persevere and not "fall away"; for, he adds, "We desire that every one of you do show the same diligence to the full assurance of hope unto the end."—Verse 11. The apostle gives no countenance to the idea that these believers could not "fall away," and so make it "impossible to renew them again unto repentance." Such an idea is irreconcilable with his exhortations and cautions. The apostle shows the weakness of the law to do anything for salvation, and the power of the Gospel, with its great High Priest, "to save unto the uttermost all that come unto God by him." After finishing this contrast between the two systems, he adds: "Let us hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering; for he is faithful that promised; and let us consider one another to provoke (or stir-up) unto love and good works, . . . exhorting one another, and so much the more as ye see the day approaching: for, if we (believers) sin willfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more (or no other) sacrifice for sins," etc.—Heb. x. 23-26. If the only sacrifice for sins is willfully rejected "after we have received the knowledge of the truth," the case of that individual is hopeless; and this language is addressed to those whom the apostle calls "holy brethren," etc. The language forbids the idea of its being spoken to unbelievers, or to Hebrews "as a nation," who were then almost wholly unbelievers. When they become believers the warning will be to them also, and to all other believers.

The apostle next shows what faith is, and enumerates a large class who exercised it; and ends that by saying: "And these all, having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promise; God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect."—Heb. xi. 39, 40. Here it is individual believers, and not the Hebrews "as a nation," that is spoken of. The twelfth and thirteenth chapters also show that the epistle was written to caution, stimulate and encourage individual believers; and has no appearance of being designed for the "nation as such." It illustrates several points by reference to the law, and shows the superiority of the Gospel dispensation over the law, and that sinning against the Gospel willfully, after having been made a "partaker of the heavenly gift," makes the individual's case a hopeless one, because they had "done despite unto the Spirit" and "trodden under foot the Son of God"; thus "crucifying him afresh," sealing their own doom as hopeless—having committed the sin that "shall never be forgiven"; that is, have "blasphemed against the Holy Ghost," which "shall not be forgiven, neither in this world, neither in the world to come," . . . "but is in danger of eternal damnation."—Matt. xii. 32 and Mark iii. 29. Such is the testimony of Jesus; and who shall strive to make it appear otherwise? thus inviting men to think they are in no danger of a final rejection from a part in an endless life.

To say, "Paul did not say" the apostates "shall be annihilated," is no proof that they will not be; for Peter said: "It shall come to pass that every soul which will not hear (obey) that prophet (Christ) shall be (Exolothreuthesetai) utterly exterminated from among the people."—Acts iii. 23. Dr. Bloomfield, in his "Critical Notes" on this text, says, the original word, "found only in the Septuagint and later writers, signifies to utterly exterminate." How much less is that than annihilation? In the prophetic utterances the original word, translated destroy and destroyed, etc., is tsomath, and is found eight or ten times; and the only meaning of that term is "to annihilate," according to Prof. Pick, in his "Hebrew Concordance," and that in texts relating to the action of Christ and God. Take the following examples: "Thou has also given me the necks of mine enemies; that I might (tsomath) annihilate them that hate me."

—Ps. xviii. 40. "And he (God) shall bring upon them their own iniquity, and shall (tsomath) annihilate them in their own wickedness; yea, the LORD our God shall (tsomath) annihilate them."—Ps. xciv. 23.

To attempt to prove that none will be annihilated for their wickedness and willful rejection of the Redeemer and doing "despite to the spirit of grace," it seems to me is labor lost, if nothing worse. For myself, I must see something far more convincing than I have ever yet seen to admit that the apostle does not teach, in Heb. vi. and x., the possibility of some who have been "made partakers of the Holy Ghost," falling away so as to bring on themselves tsomath—"annihilation."

It seems to me sufficient, for all purposes of Christian love, to show that God has provided the means and will give to every one of the human family an opportunity, in this life or a future one, with all necessary aid to enable men, as moral and accountable creatures, to secure an endless life; leaving the subject as to the final acceptance or rejection of the blessing, by every individual, among those things which no human wisdom can positively determine; nor does it seem to me profitable or in any way important to attempt to prove that all men will inevitably improve their opportunity to secure an endless life. Having shown the purpose of our Creator and Redeemer to place the whole race of men, "in due time," in a position where they may and can secure the blessing offered, and can only fail by a "willful" refusal to accept Christ as their Lord and Redeemer after having received the knowledge of "the only true God and Jesus Christ," I do not feel called to take, what seems to me, a useless if not dangerous position by asserting that no man can be finally "utterly exterminated." ED.

THE HARVEST GREAT: THE LABORERS FEW.

"Jesus went about all the cities and villages, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and healing every sickness and disease among the people. But when he saw the multitudes, he was moved with compassion on them, because they fainted, and were scattered abroad as sheep having no shepherd. Then saith he unto his disciples, The harvest truly is plenteous, but the laborers are few. Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that he will send forth laborers into his harvest."—Matt. ix. 35-38.

THE reading of this portion of Scripture has filled my mind with wonder, love and praise. There is a fullness in it not seen till the scales of tradition and man-worship, or will-worship, have fallen from our eyes. In the first place, it shows what is true preaching: it is "Preaching the good news of the kingdom of God." When this is left out, however good or important may be the matter proclaimed, it is not the preaching of Christ and his apostles: it is "another gospel;" the kingdom of God has been lost sight of, and the traditions and inventions of men have taken its place. This has caused strife and divisions, till most professed Christians are like Israel in the wilderness, in labor and sorrow, having refused to go into the promised land after having arrived at the borders of it. Having departed from the gospel preaching, the inventions of men have bewildered them, and all Christendom this day are dreaming of some imaginary result, they know not where hence are in the wilderness.

But it is not design now to dwell on this particular point. The text teaches us that the heart of Jesus was full of "compassion on the multitudes," and "he is the same yesterday, to-day and forever."—Heb. xiii. 8. "This being true, he will never have any less "compassion" on them" than he had eighteen hundred years ago. If then he was concerned for them, and counted them "the harvest" to be gathered, we may be assured "the multitudes" will not be left to be devoured by the wild beasts, but "in due time" (1 Tim. ii. 6) be gathered into the garner of "the Lord of the harvest;" that "Lord" of it will not leave "the multitudes" of which it consists to rot in his field, nor to be burned up there.

In the next place we learn from the text who the "few" are who "enter in at the strait gate"—Matt. vii. 13: they are those who are to be employed as "Laborers" in gathering the harvest. These are the providing of "the Lord of the harvest." Men have tried to manufacture them by various processes; but in all cases they have produced only counterfeit ones, such as understood not the work to be done, nor the time of doing it. "The Lord of the harvest" knows "the times and seasons," and has "kept them in his own power"—Acts i. 7; but he is now preparing laborers, and bringing them through "the strait gate," and on in "the narrow way," which shall fit them for the work they have yet to do in "the ages to come," in gathering in the "multitudes, which no man could number"—Rev. vii. 9. These certainly are not the "few" that came in by "the strait gate," nor "the little flock" to whom it is the "Father's good pleasure to give the kingdom" (Luke xii. 32), but entirely another company, which is so multitudinous that no finite mind "can number them." Here we see "the harvest"—"the multitudes" have been harvested by the "few" whom "the Lord of the harvest" raised up through "fiery trials," after they had entered "at the strait gate," and walked "the narrow way," following the chief Shepherd, who did not refuse to drink the most bitter cup of sorrow and suffering his Father gave him; and being "made perfect through suffering," he became one that could be touched by the feelings of those he came to save. God is not training the "few" in the same school; so that "If we suffer with him, we shall also reign with him"—(2 Tim. ii. 12); "if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together."—Rom. viii. 17.

Thus is "the Lord of the harvest" preparing his "laborers," who, when glorified, made immortal, so that they "cannot die any more" (Luke. xx. 36), will go forth to their work; and then will that be fulfilled which Jesus spake, "He that believeth on me, the works that I do, shall he do also; and greater works than these shall he do"—John xiv. 12. The text tells us some of the works he did in the cities and villages where he preached "the gospel of the kingdom." Such works and greater will the "few," who are the laborers, do when settled in that kingdom of God which is to "become a great mountain and fill the whole earth."—Dan. ii. 34.

The laborers, prepared by "the Lord of the harvest," made Christ-like by the endurance of fiery trials, and perfected in submission to the will of God in all things by the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, are those who become "the sons of God;" and, of course, are "heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ," to the kingdom of God, which is to be "set up," and which "shall never be destroyed"—Dan. ii. 44; and the joint-heirship with Christ gives them "dominion from sea to sea, and from the river [Euphrates] to the ends of the earth"—Psa. lxxii. 8; "and men shall be blessed in him: all nations shall call him blessed," verse 17. Then will "the gospel of the kingdom" (actually set up and established) be promulgated by the "laborers," "the Lord of the harvest" will "send forth into harvest," with a power and demonstration by signs and miracles "greater" than Christ performed while here in his humiliation; and "the multitudes" who "were scattered abroad as sheep having no shepherd," will be gathered into the fold of God, and "He will set up shepherds over them which shall feed them"—Jer. xxiii. 4; yes, "God will give them pastors according to his heart, which shall feed them with knowledge and understanding"—Jer. iii. 15; yea, "Thy watchmen shall lift up the voice; with the voice together shall they sing: for they shall see eye to eye, when the Lord shall bring again Zion."—Isa. lii. 8. Then shall "all the ends of the world remember and turn unto the Lord; and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before thee: for the kingdom is the Lord's; and he is the Governor among the nations.

A seed shall serve him: it shall be accounted to the Lord: for a generation: they shall come and declare his righteousness unto a people that shall be born, that he hath done this."—Psa. xxii. 27-31.

Thus will "the multitudes," the sight of whom moved the "compassion of Jesus," be gathered, as the final and great harvest, so numerous that no man can number them.

FRIGHTENED BY NAMES.

It is said by some, "That is just the way Universalists reason." Such a statement frightens timid souls. Why? Because they have been taught that Universalism is all that is awful. The denial of the doctrine of "eternal torments" was one of the main features of that system. When I first came out, in 1840-1, with a denial of inherent immortality, I was accused of having gone "half-way to Universalists," because such view proved the possibility that "eternal torments" was not true, and that the sinner might be literally destroyed.

Multitudes who were frightened at my position then have since embraced the same views, notwithstanding the cry of, "Worse than Universalism." But now that it hath pleased God to give me further light on his word, the same persons who have rejected the monstrous heresies of inherent immortality and eternal torture raise the cry, "You reason like Universalists;" forgetting they have done the same thing in rejecting the doctrine of endless misery.

Be this as it may, I ask, as I asked thirty-six years ago, "Have the Universalists no truth because they have some errors?" Truth in the Bible lies scattered under various forms of expression, and in detached places; it must be gathered, brought together and examined in the light of God's perfections and the principles of his government clearly revealed. Only by this process shall we ever arrive at a clear perception of what is truth and what is error.

So we should, in our investigations as to the truth or error existing among any professing Christians, not single out one sect, party or denomination, and condemn or accept in wholesale; saying, "This is true or this is error because such or such denominations hold it." Such a course shows a bigot or a sectarian, but not a candid inquirer after truth.

Search for truth among all places and among all parties, and do not be guilty of rejecting it because found among those whom you have been in the habit of regarding as heretics. Unless this principle is adhered to no progress can ever be made, and the man may live and die almost as ignorant of truth as when he was born.

A terrible place to look for honey is the carcass of a lion: yet Samson found it there. So, dead and worthless as the theological sects may be, honey—truth—may be found among them all; and when collected, analyzed, and the errors mixed with it carefully expunged, we may find truth more rich and valuable than we had ever dreamed of seeing.

THE TRUTH TO BE MADE KNOWN.

THAT the truth shall be made known to all men is affirmed in the most positive manner by the apostle Paul thus: "God our LIFE-GIVER who would have all men live (Syriac); and to come to the knowledge of the truth,"—1 Tim. ii. 3, 4. What "truth"? Let Paul continue: "For there is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus; who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time."—1 Tim. ii. 5, 6.

Here is the truth which God wills all men shall come to the knowledge of. He "will" have all men "live" and receive this knowledge; for upon the reception or rejection of this "one Mediator" turns the final state of all for whom he "gave himself a ransom." On verse 5 Dr. Bloomfield says: "This seems to have reference to what immediately precedes; q. d. 'God our Saviour will have all men to be saved and come to a knowledge of the truth; for he is the God alike of all; and the Man Christ Jesus is the Mediator between God and men, who gave himself a ransom for all. Here it is implied that it is alone by a recognition of the truth, as regards God and the Mediator between God and men, that we can be saved."

The "recognition" can only be made from having the knowledge of "the truth" to be recognized; and God "will have all men to come to the knowledge of the truth." Who shall say, He cannot or will not do it, because it has never yet been done? Is death an insurmountable obstacle in the way of God's will, or too mighty for almighty power? Must his will be thwarted because we cannot comprehend the greatness of his power? Are our theories too mighty for God's promise and oath?

On the expression, "and come to the knowledge of the truth," Dr. Adam Clarke says: "The truth, the Gospel of Christ, should be proclaimed to them . . . and when it is made known, then it is the duty of those who hear it to acknowledge and receive it: this is the proper import of the original word, that they may come to the acknowledgment of the truth."

Dr. Clarke, on the expression, "to be testified in due time," quotes from Rosenmuller as follows: "This is the doctrine which is reserved for its own time: the doctrine which in its own time shall be delivered to all the inhabitants of the earth."

So much for the testimony of the learned commentators. They probably hardly comprehended the fulness of their own statement; but the fulness is in the text, and thereby it is made certain that all for whom Christ gave himself a ransom will, some time or other, "come to the knowledge of the truth;" and, if they accept it, will be saved, or have an endless life. But if they reject it, they will die for their own sins, and "be as though they had not been."

"LORD'S SUPPER," OR "PASSEVER."

"CHRIST our passover is sacrificed for us."—1 Cor. v. 7.

The "Lord's Supper," as it is called, was instituted at the Passover, and took the place of that feast. It was the blood of the paschal lamb, sprinkled on the door-posts of the Israelites in Egypt, that secured them against the destroying angel that slew all the first-born in Egypt; and that blood pointed to the efficacy of the blood of "The Lamb of God." The type found its antitype in the Lord Jesus Christ. It is now the sacrifice of his life, or "blood," that we commemorate at the anniversary of his death. Therefore, a yearly and evening feast or remembrance, and "showing forth his death."

The time for its observance this year falls on Wednesday evening, April 17. The Lord permitting, myself and family will celebrate the event at my house, 72 Hicks Street, Brooklyn, that evening at eight o'clock. Friends of our REDEEMER, who find it desirable, will be welcome to unite with us on the occasion.

GEO. STORRS.

"ON MODERN THOUGHT."

At the close of Henry Dunn's "Destiny of the Human Race," he has a chapter on the above subject which meets my most hearty approval, and should be read and pondered well by ministers and all others who would know "the way of the Lord more perfectly," and honor the truth by its open defense. I give the chapter entire. Do not fail to read it carefully. It is as follows:

In all that has been advanced relative to the bearing of the work of Christ on the world at large, it will be observed that I have carefully confined myself to one question—"What saith the Scriptures?" I have done so advisedly, because I am satisfied that, on the answer given by the divine oracle to that question, the reception or rejection of the doctrine of an extended future restoration must and ought ultimately to depend. I should be sorry, however, for it to be supposed that, because I have abstained from those more general considerations which belong to the province of reason and conscience, I deliberately set aside all such testimony as worthless. This is not the case.

I am far indeed from disputing the authority, either in morals or religion, of the reason with which God has endowed us, or of the conscience—that "candle of the Lord"—which shines within us. Scripture itself teaches us a different lesson; for it tells us most distinctly that the same God who has revealed himself in the Bible reveals himself also in nature, in providence and in the heart of man. No mistake can be much greater than that which leads certain devout persons to imagine they exalt Scripture by abasing reason, and magnify the light that comes to us from without by denying or attempting to extinguish the light that is within. No course can be more perilous than one which brings the facts of the world into collision with the facts of Scripture, or admits for an instant that conscience and reason—the moral sense, properly so termed—can ever be really and truly in opposition to the Bible, if only conscience be living and healthy and Scripture be properly understood. To suppose that God has given us faculties which are utterly untrustworthy is to make him precisely what Christ says he is not—a Father who, when asked for "bread," gives a "stone"; or, solicited for "a fish," presents "a serpent."

The New Testament abounds with instances in which reason is both appealed to and counted trustworthy. The Pharisees taught that external ceremonies purified the soul before God. But our Lord rebuked his disciples sternly for not at once contradicting and disbelieving the doctrines of these, their appointed teachers. And on what ground? On the ground of the clear utterance of their understandings—"Are ye also without understanding, and perceive not that this cannot be?"—Matt. xv. 1-20; Mark vii. 1-23.

When the Baptist preached, all the people, by the light of conscience—for it could be nothing else—"counted John as a prophet." St. Paul prevails, not by contradicting the inner sense, but "by manifestation of the truth commending himself to every man's conscience, in the sight of God."—2 Cor. iv. 2. When our Lord says, in relation to false prophets, "By their fruits shall ye know them," what can he be supposed to mean but that the true was to be discerned by that inward sense of right and wrong, of good and evil, given us by our Creator as our light and guide in such matters? And if these things be true in relation to man, regarded in his natural condition, how much more true must they be in relation to those of whom it is said, "Ye have an unction from the Holy One, and know all things." That we are charged to cultivate childlike submission is indisputable; but in connection therewith it can assuredly do us no harm to remember another charge—"Be not children in understanding: howbeit in malice be ye children, but in understanding be men."—1 Cor. xiv. 20.

It is in the light of these considerations that I am disposed to give just that amount of weight, and no more, to the moral argument against the ruin of the race, which, whether we will or not, perpetually forces itself upon our notice. For true as it undoubtedly is, that in searching the Bible the proper question for us to put is not, "What thinkest thou?" but "How readest thou?" and true also as it may be, that the meaning of Scripture is to be ascertained, not by sentiment, but by grammar, it is neither wise nor right to carry this principle so far as to disregard or exclude altogether that divine instinct which God has himself implanted in the renewed heart.

"There is a reasonable and Scriptural faith," says Mr. Goldwin Smith, "which reposes on the wisdom and goodness of God, trusts him entirely, and believes that everything in the ways of his providence which is now dark will, in the end, be made clear."

"But there is also an ecclesiastical faith, neither reasonable nor Scriptural, which consists in willfully shutting the eye of the mind; in putting force upon the conscience; in receiving insufficient evidence and pretending that it is sufficient; in embracing things unworthy of deity, and pretending that they are divine. Those who practice this ecclesiastical faith and think it meritorious tacitly assume that the need of evidence is in an inverse ratio to the importance of the subject; and that while they would be bound to demand full proof before believing that anything of a questionable character came from a good man, they perform an act of piety in believing, without full proof, and sometimes with no proof at all, that things of a questionable character come from God."

The result of handling divine truth in this way is already beginning to manifest itself in a manner that will one day make the most thoughtless reflect.

It is seen in that sense of uncertainty which has come over us in relation to so many of our religious convictions, and which contrasts so painfully with that perfect conviction which the first Christians had "of the certainty of that BODY OF FACTS which constituted, and in which consisted, their religious belief." It is seen in the absence of that high sense of the virtue and duty of truthfulness in our convictions which even heathens honored; in the rarity of that spectacle said to have been dear to the pagan gods, "where a brave man is seen struggling with facts which are too strong for him, his honesty exposed to temptations to shirk or evade them, yet his honesty conspicuous and invariably triumphant."

It is seen, perhaps, most of all, among ourselves, in the preference which is now so widely shown by religious persons for that which is vague and indefinite in statement rather than for words that are clear and explicit. Preachers (some, at least) speak thus cloudily, not because they are unable to express themselves clearly, but because they think it most advisable to be vague on what are termed disputed subjects. They wish, if it be possible, to be regarded as, in the main, "sound," and therefore shrink from committing themselves to views the promulgation of which, on various accounts, they deem it expedient to avoid. Hearers like to have it so. And for obvious reasons. So long as a man is allowed to suppose that it is much the same thing whether he believes a given truth, or something like it, he is in little danger of being disturbed. Clearly defined statements bring men to the test. The positive obligation to accept or reject will often occasion doubt, and doubt is to most persons irksome; it compels inquiry and occasions trouble. So the conclusion is a popular one, that to be indefinite is to be safe; that in a teacher vagueness is at least a proof of modesty and humility; while clear and definite assertion (unless indeed it be in support of some recognized opinion of a school or party—in which case the teacher can never be too dogmatic for the disciple) is, however, well sustained by Scripture, to be shunned as dangerous, chiefly because it is so unsettling.

Week after week books issue from the press on "heaven," and hell, and the world to come in which the supposed social, intellectual, and even physical life of the departed is set forth in glowing colors, drawn, for the most part, simply from the imagination of the writers, and often without even the affectation of deriving support either from reason, analogy, or any statement of Scripture. All these productions, however numerous or however shallow, are greedily received in quarters where anything like a thoughtful inquiry into the teachings of revelation would be regarded as distasteful, if not perilous. Even so able and sober a writer as Dr. Norman McLeod is not free from this tendency to speculate on subjects which ask only for research. What can be more unsatisfactory from such a man, than to be told almost in the same breath that while neither Christ nor the Apostles have "given us by one word the slightest ground for hoping that any man who leaves this world an enemy to God will ever repent and become a friend of God in the next," yet "we may hope that the number of the lost may be to those who are saved fewer far than the number of those in penal settlements and prisons are to the inhabitants of a well-ordered and Christian kingdom"? And if we ask for the ground, scriptural or otherwise, on which such hope is to be based, we are simply told (Laura Bridgman's case being regarded as an illustration) that "the living God, who alone knows each man, may be dealing, in ways beyond our comprehension, with the most lonely savage, whose inmost spirit he even sees, and who is of more awful value in his sight than all the stars of the sky." Dr. McLeod's imagination is that, in some mysterious way, "God can teach that spirit without the Gospel or ordinary means of grace, so as to bring it under law to God."* * "Parish Papers," pp. 152-153. Dr. Guthrie all but avows similar views in Good Words (Jan. 1863, p. 3). He thinks it monstrous to suppose that half the world will be lost, exclaiming, "If at the close of the war Satan retains half his kingdom, his head is not crushed." And yet both of these eminent men profess to accept "the Assembly's Larger Catechism," and through it teach as truth that the heathen "cannot be saved," and that God has "fore-ordained" all but the elect to eternal ruin (see Questions 13 and 60, with the answers and proofs). It is surely high time that men knew what divines really believe, as distinguished from that which they profess to believe.

I am aware it may be said, how can a man teach definitely anything on which his own mind is not quite made up, or be distinct and positive on matters which he believes to be but dimly and partially revealed?

To this objection there is but one answer. The uncertainty in question is morbid; it is the disease of the day, and it has become chronic. Indefiniteness is not a characteristic of divine revelation. Certainty may, on almost all subjects, be reached, if we have but entire confidence in the divine record, and will take pains enough to search minutely and fearlessly for all that it says. But how can we do so if we are embarrassed at every step by the traditions of centuries and by the fear of man?

Is it needful to add that vagueness is always accompanied by a disposition to cling with a sort of dogged pertinacity to any view which has long been received and honored among men, rather than to favor calm and serious inquiry into its precise truthfulness? Feeble convictions are commonly accompanied by adhesive tendencies in relation to all that is traditional, just as obstinacy is the ordinary characteristic of a mind unable to reason, or distrustful of its ability to come to any satisfactory conclusion. The great Apostle of the Gentiles teaches that believers receive wisdom that they may know and comprehend the things that are freely given to them of God, and he denounces the sincerest fervor of spirit as defective where it does not likewise bring forth fruits in the UNDERSTANDING.

"To the modern mind, explain it as we may, there has come to belong an awful capacity of feeling, and a liability to intensities, both of suffering and of enjoyment (the one as well as the other intellectual, not sensuous), of which the bright, gay, surface-loving mind of antiquity seems to have known little or nothing. Then along with this power of feeling, striking, as it does, into the roots of the soul, there are perceptions and instinctive judgments, of which it must be said that they are altogether modern developments of humanity: they are true elements of our nature; but they have newly been brought from the subsoil. It is to the slow working of Christianity upon human nature that I attribute nearly the whole of this deeper vitality of the modern mind." ("Restoration of Belief," pp. 254 and 228.)

Professor Goldwin Smith has expressed similar convictions to those of Mr. Taylor.

"The condition of mankind," he says, "presses severely upon us in the present day, chiefly because of the extension of our sympathies beyond the pale of Christendom to the whole human race; and there arises to countervail the healing conviction that the community of mankind is a community indeed, and that which is given to one member of it is, though as yet we know not how, given to all.

"Why should we think that the way to a solution of divine mysteries is inexorably closed, or that our efforts to solve them, if made in the sincerity of our hearts, are offences against God? If the relation between God and man is one of affection, it is quite natural (according to all we know or can imagine of such relations) that our knowledge of the Divine goodness should not be given to us at once, without exertion on our part, or without the interposition of difficulties and contrary appearances at the outset which we may be permitted, in some measure at least, ultimately to pierce through. For it is under these, and not under the opposite conditions, that affection, as we experience it, is best formed, and becomes intense and deep." ("Rational Religion," by Goldwin Smith.)

Facts of the most mournful kind confront us at every turn, and refuse to be hidden from our eyes. A vast and overwhelming majority of the human race, we all well know, are not, and never have been, believers, either in God or in the Gospel. Myriads have never heard the name of the Redeemer. Myriads more live and die, the victims of the grossest superstitions. Even in our own land, and amid the most favored portions of the community, few, very few comparatively, can, in any intelligible sense, be spoken of as having been "born again," or as having become "new creatures in Christ Jesus."

And amid a strangely confused teaching relative to the future condition of such persons a generation is rising around us, "earnest and devout in a sense their fathers never were, who, however hopeful they may be as to their own safety or that of their immediate relatives, can find no peace so long as they are forbidden to cherish hope in relation to the future condition of the human family." It is among these that a revived Romanism, carrying with it something like confidence in the saving efficacy of ritual observances, and a sort of half belief in the purifying character of purgatorial flames, carries off many a choice spirit; while thousands more, bewildered by theories of universal salvation, are rapidly embracing one or more of those modern forms of skeptical thought which, unlike the infidelity of former days, arise, not so much out of practical ungodliness, as from the pressure of sincere and heartfelt difficulties in relation to the supposed teachings of Divine revelation. Viewing the Gospel as an embodiment of the loving character of their heavenly Father, they cannot hear, without a shock, of God "passing by" the majority of his creatures, and (notwithstanding the redeeming work of Christ) abandoning them to eternal ruin. And if, under the influence of this horror, such persons sometimes madly attack revelation itself as false or delusive, we can only say that, in such cases, theology wings the shaft that quivers in the heart of Christianity.

MAN IN DEATH.

CONSCIOUS OR UNCONSCIOUS.

FIFTH ARTICLE.

TEACHING OF THE NEW TESTAMENT—
CONTINUED.

I TRUST it has been made plain that the teaching of Christ and his apostles does not harmonize with the modern theology relating to man's state in death. They taught the resurrection, or a translation, as the hope for a future life. They never speak of an "immortal" or "undying soul"; nor of "going to heaven at death." Not one such utterance did they ever make, in the unmistakable language employed by the advocates of that theory. "This world," and "that world, even the resurrection from the dead," is the testimony of Jesus. Two worlds, or living states for man, is all our Lord speaks of for the encouragement of his followers; and it is all that his apostles ever proclaimed to encourage hope, and comfort the living "concerning" the dead, or those "which are asleep." This total absence, by Christ and his apostles, of such language as is in constant use in modern theology is demonstration that such theology on the state of the dead, is a corruption of primitive Christianity; an unwarrantable adding to the inspired testimony. These additions, however, never would have occurred had not theologians grafted the fable of an immortal soul on Christianity without the least authority from inspiration. It is this foundation corruption of the truth of God that has led to all the others. Had it not been for this assumption of an immortal soul no one would ever have thought of death as anything but death—cessation of life; and, of course, of all consciousness. But with the assumed immortality of an inward entity that cannot die, anything, however indefinite, that seems to intimate a state of consciousness in death is laid hold of to support that theory; and the plain and positive testimony of the contrary fact is made to give way to mere inferences.

I shall not stop here to disprove man's inherent immortality; that has been done in "Storrs' Six Sermons," and in his "Review of Prof. Post" on that question; to which the reader is requested to refer. I only say now, there is not one text in all the Bible that saith man is immortal, or that he hath an immortal soul. That fact is settled, and as undeniable as any truth in the universe. Hence, I come to the examination of the texts relied on for proof of a conscious survival in death, with the assurance that whatever those texts mean, they do not mean that dead men are alive, or are in living consciousness. A future life only results from resurrection, or translation, "that he should not see death." Thus, "by faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death," Heb. xi. 5. But how or what did Enoch gain if he would have been just as surely carried directly "to heaven at death?" Wherein is it so great and peculiar a favor to be translated, and "not see death," if, after all, he would have been alive and in the presence of God just as really as though he had died?

PAUL'S WRITINGS EXAMINED.

Why did Paul "desire to depart, and to be with Christ" by a translation, if he could just as well have been with him by dying? Phil. i. 23. I am aware I have touched a tender spot in the theology of my opponents by this reference to Paul's desire. They construe Paul's language into a desire to die, that his soul might be with Christ. But such a construction is without a shadow of proof; for, first, Paul saith not a word about "his soul," nor any other man's soul or spirit, in the entire epistle. Second, he speaks of death in the next chapter as a calamity, and says, "Epaphroditus was sick nigh unto death; but God had mercy on him," and restored him to health. Had Paul believed Epaphroditus, had he died, would have been "with Christ, which is far better" than being here, how could he say, "God had mercy on him" in keeping him from dying when he was "nigh unto death"? Did Paul think it would be "far better" for himself to die than to live, and just the reverse for Epaphroditus? Strange logic that! Paul's "desire to depart" was manifestly a desire for a translation, after the example of Enoch, so as "not to see death." It was a "desire" perfectly innocent in itself, but which he knew would not be likely to be granted him, as the whole connection shows; for in the third chapter he points the Philippians to his death and resurrection, saying, "Being made conformable unto his (Christ's) death; if by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead," verses 10, 11. Thus it is manifes that he did expect to die; and hence, though he desired a translation, he did not expect one; nor did he expect to be with Christ till "the resurrection of the dead"; for he saith in the same chapter—"Our conversation is in heaven; ~~FROM~~ whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ: who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body." No hint of expecting Christ to "come at death," when the "vile body" goes to corruption.

Thus we see that though Paul desired a translation—which would be "far better" than either "to live in the flesh" or "to die"—yet he did understand that he would die; and he labored and suffered, "if by any means" he "might attain unto the resurrection of the dead," which he taught would be when Christ shall come from heaven; for, saith he to the Thessalonians, "The Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ SHALL RISE," etc.

Such language is not to be misunderstood, mistaken, nor perverted to accommodate the theology of an immortal soul, that is never named in all the Bible, and concerning which the apostle never utters a word. The common construction put upon the apostle's language, of "desire to depart and be with Christ," is a simple perversion of it, and is contradicted by the entire epistle, as well as by all his teaching concerning the resurrection, which we have previously considered.

Thus I have disposed of the first text of my opponents, from which they infer the consciousness of the dead, and find it avails them nothing; but when taken with the context and entire argument of Paul, is strongly confirmatory that the only hope of a future life is by resurrection or translation.

If it still be urged that Paul said, "to die is gain," I reply, to die might be gain to one who had "five times received forty stripes save one," who had been "beaten with rods, stoned, thrice suffered shipwreck, in journeyings often, in perils of water, in perils of robbers, in perils by his own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren; in weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness," besides numberless other trials, "to die" might be "gain" to such an one, even though an undisturbed "sleep" in unconsciousness till the resurrection. A minister in these days, with "$5,000 salary," a comfortable home, and called of men Rabbi, or "Doctor of Divinity," might not see how it would be gain to die unless he was going at once to heaven; and it may be doubted if he would think even that gain enough to make him in a "strait" to die—as any physician might testify who attends him when ill; but Paul's "salary" was a very different matter, and he might think it gain to die and rest till the resurrection, though he might "desire," by a translation, "to depart and be with Christ, which would be far better" than either "to live" or "die." Such might have been his view of the matter.

To take the common view of Paul's discourse here is to make him say, in one breath, that he knew not what to "choose"—to live or to die—and in the next to declare he was in a great strait to die: i. e., he did very much choose rather to die than live! Can any rational man suppose Paul would talk in such a contradictory strain? Between life and death, as a means of "gain" to Christ and his cause, Paul said, "What I shall choose I know not;" but there was another thing he did greatly desire and choose, if it were consistent for his Master to grant it, viz. by a translation "to depart and be with Christ," so that he would neither live here, in this mortal "flesh," nor "die." This Paul did choose; at the same time he declares that he was aware that he should "abide and continue" as he was, in this present state, for the benefit of the church.

The view I have taken is further confirmed by Paul's language to the Corinthians, where he says: "We which live are always delivered unto death for Jesus' sake, that THE LIFE of Jesus might be made manifest in our MORTAL FLESH—knowing that He which RAISED UP the Lord Jesus shall RAISE UP US ALSO by Jesus," 2 Cor. iv. 11, 14. It is the change of mortality to immortality that Paul everywhere speaks of and looks for, to take place either by resurrection or translation, and not a soul, disembodied, in bliss, anywhere.

The next text which is resorted to to sustain a disembodied consciousness is Paul's language in 2 Cor. v. 1-8: "Therefore we are always confident, knowing that whilst we are at home in the body we are absent from the Lord. We are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body and present with the Lord." It is readily allowed that this passage seems to teach the doctrine of the soul's separate state, and immediate felicity in that state. But this apparent instruction is to be attributed to the fact that such doctrines are so generally taught and accredited. Holding the traditional belief that the soul of man is his personality, and is capable of existing independently of the body, it is natural to put such a construction upon this text as that which commonly obtains. But I cannot think that the believers in Corinth, who had read and understood the apostle's first epistle, could have so interpreted his meaning. Such an interpretation would have been in direct contradiction to the very clear and cogent reasoning contained in chapter xv. of their first epistle. Let the text under consideration be taken, not as is generally the practice apart from, but in connection with its context. The chapter contains, in its first half, a profession of the believer's faith in his survivance of his mortality. The imagery—for the language is obviously figurative—is that of an "earthly house of this tabernacle," which is condemned to be "dissolved," and which was the apostle's appropriate image to describe the mortality of the creature man. Man, the one compound being, is compared to an "earthly house" or "tabernacle," which will be "dissolved." Nothing is here said or implied about an immortal and essentially permanent part of man, which, in its own nature, is independent of this general and complete dissolution; which is most unaccountable, as on the popular supposition this immortal part is the human personality. The believer is here taught that he himself, in his one totality—not a part of himself—must be "dissolved." But he knows that if, like an "earthly house," he must crumble in dissolution, he will be restored again in the beauty and durability of a "building of God, a house not made with hands," and which is not impressed with mortality, but one that is "eternal in the heavens." Here the two states of the believer's existence are described by an "earthly house" or "tabernacle," which must dissolve, and "a building of God, a house eternal in the heavens." Paul is undoubtedly speaking of the two bodies to which he alludes in chapter xv. of his first epistle—"there is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body," and hence he says, in the second verse, "for in this we groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house, which is from heaven. For we that are in this tabernacle"—[dwelling as mortal creatures]—"to groan, being burdened, not for that we would be unclothed"—[we desire not to die]—"but clothed upon"—[with our eternal house from heaven]—"that mortality may be swallowed up of life." "Therefore, we are always confident;" for we know that if, on the one hand, as mortal beings we must dissolve in death, on the other hand, as beings upon whom God has conferred for Christ's sake, and through him, the gift of immortality, we shall, when we are raised from the dead and receive our spiritual natures, live again as immortal beings "eternal in the heavens." "We are always confident" of this, and know "that whilst we are at home in the body"—whilst, that is, we are existing as earthly tabernacles, mortal and perishable, "we are absent from the Lord," with whom we cannot be until we have put off our mortality and assume our immortality; which will be when we are raised from the dead in our "spiritual body"—our "building of God"—our "house" which is "eternal in the heavens." "We are confident," I say, of so glorious a re-creation in Christ Jesus awaiting us; and are, therefore, "willing rather to be absent from the body," that is, from our "natural body"—our present mortal and corruptible nature, which separates us from the Lord—and to be possessed of our "spiritual body," our new, incorruptible nature, in order "that we may be present with the Lord," which cannot be until the resurrection, when "mortality shall be swallowed up of life."

The apostle desired to "be" present with the Lord, not as a disembodied soul, for he says, "not for that we would be unclothed;" and hence, in harmony with this desire, he says, "in this we groan earnestly, desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven;" and, therefore, since this "clothing upon," or re-creation of the human nature, cannot take place until the resurrection, "when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality," his desire to "be absent from the body and to be present with the Lord" cannot be gratified, and he evidently did not expect it, from his reasoning, until the dead in Christ shall rise.

So far, then, from inculcating the doctrine that at death the soul of the believer is present with the Lord, this text forms part of an important passage in the apostle's writings, in which he exhibits an utter disregard of such a doctrine, and declares that his own earnest longing was for the day of resurrection; when, being "absent from the body"—having parted forever with his mortality—he should possess his new, immortal nature, in which he should behold and be forever "present with the Lord."

I leave, then, the teacher of the popular doctrine to explain this remarkable fact, that here, as in the two places which I have previously considered, the Apostle Paul says nothing of the blissful interval between death and resurrection—expresses no desire in reference to this interval; but, as if impatient of it, he groans and earnestly desires to be "clothed upon" with his "house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." The conclusion is unavoidable, that the Apostle Paul knew of no such state of intermediate blessedness for the soul; the consummation of his wishes is thus expressed—"if by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead." Philipians. iii. 11.

Some, in their determination not to yield this, the citadel of their favorite dogma, endeavor to make something plausible of it by what is termed riding a metaphor to death. The figurative expressions, "clothed upon," and "at home in," and "absent from the body," it is alleged, "must signify something distinct from the clothing and the body. That which is 'clothed upon,' and which is 'at home in or absent from the body,' is the immortal soul." Now, this looks very specious; but admit it, for the sake of argument, and it is obvious what a strange and unmeaning confusion of language the whole of this part of the chapter exhibits. Paul sets out with expressing the strong confidence which he and believers generally had in their triumph over mortality when they should receive their "building of God"—their "spiritual body," which he had shown, in his first epistle, will be bestowed at the resurrection. Groaning under the burden of a present mortality, he earnestly desires that the time may soon arrive when, possessed of his "spiritual body," "mortality shall be swallowed up of life." Until this clothing upon—that is, until the resurrection—it is obvious that mortality reigns—it is not "swallowed up of life." But how does this instruction of Paul's agree with the popular belief that the immortal soul at death escapes from its prison-house of clay, and that at this moment—

"There is a land of pure delight,
Where saints immortal reign?"

The apostle is evidently at variance with the modern theology on this point when he teaches that not until we are "created in Christ Jesus"—invested with our "spiritual body"—"clothed upon" by our "building of God"—the grand result is accomplished, mortality is swallowed up of life.

Besides, on the supposition that the being "absent from the body" and "present with the Lord" refers to the immortal soul leaving its corporeal abode and ascending to God, how, I ask, does this statement follow as an inference from what the apostle had been previously discoursing upon? Why does he preface it by a term which shows that it stands connected with the foregoing observations as a consequence, and say—"Therefore, we are always confident," etc.? The substance of Paul's statement is, that he earnestly desired the arrival of resurrection, that he might be possessed of his spiritual and immortal nature. What logical connection is there between this emphatic desire, and the statement that, when he died, his disembodied soul would ascend to the presence of God? According to the exposition given above, the connection is obvious and natural; but such an exposition of the passage, the only possible one, as it appears to me, gives a most decided contradiction to the doctrine which is so fondly and furtively reared upon it.

But, further, if we are to understand that apparent something which is to be clothed upon to be the spiritual nature, or soul, then the apostle plainly avows that he had no desire for this intermediate state; for he says, "Not for that we would be unclothed." Even with this gloss, his longing is for the "redemption of the body" at resurrection. Let it be noted that, according to this exposition, Paul does not pass over in silence the popular notion of an intermediate state of bliss, as in the true exposition of the passage, as given above, he is made to affirm that he would rather not participate in it: he does not desire disembodied bliss—"Not that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life."

Once more, if it be affirmed that the imagery of being "clothed upon," represents the popular notion of the soul as something within, which is "clothed upon" with its "earthly house," or "building of God," then consistency demands that the doctrine of the soul's incorruptibility and immortality be forthwith discarded from the orthodox belief; for it is written—"This corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality."—1 Cor. xv. This something within, the soul, must put on incorruption and immortality, and is itself called "this corruptible and this mortal." "So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written—Death is swallowed up in victory."

The attempt to evade the proper meaning of the apostle's language, does but involve the disconcerted polemic in greater perplexities, and, in the end, lead to his being entangled and taken in his own net. Candor must compel the acknowledgment that the very prevalent custom of quoting this text of Paul's for the purpose of teaching that he expected to be with Christ immediately at death is most unwarrantable—a very gross and mischievous perversion of his meaning.

That the New Testament does not clearly teach a conscious state for what is theologically called "the soul"—or a disembodied living state for man—in death, is, to my mind, a fact which cannot be denied: not one positive text can be produced in support of such a theory. Nor can it with truth be pretended that such doctrine is anywhere taught in the Bible in the plain language used in teaching other important doctrines, such as Christ died for our sins, the resurrection of the dead, the new birth, repentance, faith, etc. If the theory of a conscious living existence in death be true, we have a right to look that it shall be distinctly and explicitly taught in the New Testament, and not be left to inference. It should be exhibited more distinctly than either of the other doctrines I have named, because the Old Testament is explicit that "there is no knowledge in sheol," etc. Where is the testimony of Christ or his apostles that plainly contravenes the inspired testimony of the previous dispensation? I answer, it cannot be produced—it is nowhere written that man's soul goes to heaven at death, or to any other place in living consciousness. Till such testimony can be produced I reject the theory as subversive of the truth and the whole gospel economy of life—after death—only by a resurrection, or being made alive from the dead, "at the last day."

I have, however, not only proved the dead are unconscious, and that there is not one positive text opposing this view, but have undertaken to show that those texts relied on to prove their consciousness are capable of an interpretation in harmony with the positive testimony I have adduced in support of their unconsciousness. I have already examined Phil. i. 23 and 2 Cor. v. 1-10, and shall go on with other texts from which inferences are drawn to favor the common theory.

2 Cor. xii. 2-5 is urged as proof of a soul that does consciously survive when man is dead, or that can live when the body is dead. Now, not one word is said in the passage about "a soul" at all. Paul saith—"I knew a man . . . whether in the body, or out of the body, I cannot tell . . . such a man . . . was caught up into paradise . . . the third heaven," etc. Not a word does he utter about a soul thus caught up; and if this description of Paul is proof that a man may be conscious when dead, then it equally proves that a man when dead does not know whether he is dead or alive; for this man did not know whether he was in the body or out. Did Paul mean to be understood that this man of whom he speaks did not know whether he was dead or alive! Can a man be dead and not know it, if he is conscious? Paul does here assert that if this man was out of the body he did not know it; so that if a man is conscious when dead he will not know he is dead, so far as this text proves anything in that direction: then what becomes of the notion that "dead men know more than all the world?" for any person living can tell that a man is dead when he sees him in death; but the dead man, if conscious, is so ignorant he cannot tell whether he is dead or alive! at least, he will not know that his body is dead, for Paul did not know this man was out of the body, if he was: "I cannot tell," said he. If Paul had said he did not know whether the man was dead or alive, it might have given some plausibility to the theory that dead men are alive; yet, even then, it would show dead men were very ignorant; but he simply says, some man was "caught up," he could not tell how; but he knew that that man was alive; yet whether he was caught up bodily or only mentally was a point he could not determine. That he did not contradict his own statement in his previous epistle to the same church we may rest assured; and there, as we have already seen, he predicates future life on the fact of a resurrection, without which they that have fallen asleep in Christ even "are perished." See again my remarks on 1 Cor. xv. 17, 18, 32.

I pass to Heb. xii. 18-24, "The spirits of just men made perfect," etc. We certainly have no right to make an inspired apostle contradict himself. But the construction put on this language makes Paul to contradict his previous teaching in the same epistle as well as known facts. He had said, in the previous chapter, that the ancient worthies "died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off;" and he concludes the chapter by saying, "These all, having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promises: God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should NOT BE MADE PERFECT." Does he tell us, in the next chapter, that these dead ones are already "made perfect," and that, "without us"? The advocates of the common theory, to keep up the appearance of the importance of resurrection, say that the saints will be more glorious and happy after the soul re-enters the resurrection body. If so, then the spirits of just men are not yet made perfect; and, of course, Paul was not speaking of the present condition of these just men.

It is evident that the apostle's object was to impress the mind with the mighty difference that exists between the dispensation by Moses and that by Jesus Christ, and the contrast is clear and perfect—"For ye are not" [to] "come unto the mount that might be touched, and that burned with fire," etc., "but ye are" [to] "come unto Mount Zion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to the spirits of just men made perfect," etc. When is this "coming to Mount Zion," etc., to take place? Not till God shall "set his king upon his holy hill of Zion;" Psa. ii. 6; for that was David's throne, which he hath sworn to give unto David's son—Jesus, the Messiah. Not till then will the spirits of just men be made perfect; which will be "at the last trump," when "this mortal shall put on immortality," and "death shall be swallowed up in victory." See 1 Cor. xv. 52-55. To this blessed state believers in Jesus are coming, or are "to come": this is specially their high calling under the gospel; hence, go not back to Mount Sinai, for we are coming to Mount Zion—to that perfect state which God hath promised, when "the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdom of our Lord and his Christ;" when "the law shall go forth from Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem." See Rev. xi. 15 and Micah iv. 2. As yet the promise of coming to Mount Zion is future; but faith anticipates it—as if present—to fire her zeal and stimulate to a course of action worthy of those who are soon to inherit the promises. For this purpose did the apostle draw the contrast between the two dispensations, and not for the purpose of teaching anything of the present state of the dead just ones. As a fact, the living saints had not come to the spirits of just men made perfect, nor to Mount Zion, nor to the heavenly Jerusalem; but they were coming, or to come to that glorious condition. "Wherefore," he adds, "we receiving a kingdom which cannot be moved, let us have grace, whereby we may serve God acceptably with reverence and godly fear."

Thus, I think, I have given—very briefly, it is true—the true sense of the apostle on this interesting subject; and find no ground whatever of support to the common theory of a perfection of disembodied spirits: the subject looks directly to the passing away of the present order of things, and the shaking to a removal of whatever can be, that the "things which cannot be shaken may remain" in that perfected state immediately to follow the overthrow of hades and death; being the release of the universal Church of Christ from death's dominion and power, when "the general assembly" of believers are forever perfected. Glorious hour—blessed hope! Let it stimulate us to a patient endurance of whatever of trial attends our present state, as pilgrims looking for the restitution at the return of our Lord to reign on Mount Zion.

Acts xxiii. 6-8 is urged as proof that Paul believed in the conscious existence of dead men. The eighth verse says, "The Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, neither angel, nor spirit; but the Pharisees confess both."

It is said by those who believe the dead are in a state of consciousness that Paul believed in the conscious existence of the "spirits" of dead men, because he declared, verse 6th, "I am a Pharisee." But if that declaration is to be taken in an unlimited sense, Paul must have been one of the most wicked and heretical of men; for the Pharisees are denounced by our Lord as "hypocrites"—as compassing sea and land to make proselytes, and when made, they were children of hell: yea, our Lord denounced them as "fools and blind"—as "full of hypocrisy and iniquity," etc. See Matt. xxiii. He also warned his followers to beware of the leaven of the Pharisees as well as of the Sadducees; and defined that leaven to be their "doctrine." The Pharisees believed in the transmigration of souls, and among other parts of their "leaven" was their belief in the conscious state of dead men, in the face of their own Scriptures, which declare "there is no knowledge in sheol"—in the state of the dead.

With these facts before us, shall we assume that Paul believed in the conscious existence of spirits of dead men because the Pharisees did? even if we admit Acts xxiii. 8 teaches that to be the belief of the Pharisees—which may be doubted. Paul states a fact, verse 6th; it is this: "I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee." This fact relates to his birth and education. He then states another fact, which is this—that he was still in agreement with them as to the fact of a "resurrection"—nothing more. He gives not one hint that he intended to be understood as indorsing any of their other views, whatever they might be; nor did he adopt their notions of the manner of the resurrection; which was by transmigration; and, in fact, was not dissimilar to the notions of Davis, Swedenborg, Bush and others of that school. Paul says, it is "of the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question." This was the question, and not about "angels nor spirits." In the previous chapter Paul had declared his conversion, and how he heard Jesus speaking unto him, with a "voice"; and that afterward, at Jerusalem, he "saw him," and was told by him to "Depart" from that place. When Paul saw the violence to which he was exposed by the malice of his enemies, and perceived that they were divided into two sects, Pharisees and Sadducees, he exclaimed, "I am a Pharisee," etc. This had the desired effect: it set his enemies at war with themselves; and the strife was their own and not his. Paul had not said a word of any belief in "spirits" of dead men—he confined his expression of faith to the "resurrection"; but the Pharisees, instead of admitting that it was Jesus, raised from the dead, that had spoken to Paul, as Paul had affirmed, immediately used their false doctrine, of belief in such spirits, to say, verse 9, "If a spirit or an angel hath spoken to him," etc.; thus, by their tradition, doing despite to the doctrine Paul had taught, that it was one raised from the dead who had spoken to him. Here again we see the evil fruits of the Pharisaic doctrine of the conscious state of dead men: it led them to reject the grand doctrines of the Gospel, "Christ raised from the dead"; and "no future life except by a resurrection." Such is the legitimate fruit of the doctrine that dead men have conscious spirits.

It is asked, "Did not Stephen believe in consciousness after death when he called upon the Lord Jesus to receive his spirit?"—Acts vii. 59.

I can see no necessary connection between Stephen's request and a belief of consciousness when dead. If I were dying I could utter the same language most fervently, fully believing that all my future life depends upon our Lord Jesus, who has promised to raise up his followers "at the last day." Till then, and in the confidence that Jesus will fulfil his word, to whom should we commit ourselves but unto him whom God hath appointed as the head of the Church—the members of Christ's body. But it may be remarked that the original word here translated receive is dexai, and signifies also accept. The phrase "my spirit" is only a strong expression for me or myself. Thus Mary says, "My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God, my Saviour." The plain sense of which is, I myself, Mary in person, do these things. So the sense of Stephen's language is clearly this, "Lord Jesus, receive or accept me." As though he had said—"Lord Jesus, I suffer, I die for thy name, for thy truth—here I am, an offering unto death upon the altar for thy cause—accept me—receive this sacrifice of myself." It is then recorded—"When he had said this he fell asleep": and he will doubtless sleep till the Lord Jesus who did "receive" Stephen's offering of himself, shall call him from "the dust of the earth," where he now rests. ED.

THE WORLD-BURNING THEORY.

BY ELDER S. W. BISHOP.

THERE seems to me to be a great deal of anxiety in some minds as to how the great catastrophe for which they are looking will be brought about.* One of the special contributors of a religious paper, in a late issue, has finally concluded that it is to be accomplished through the agency of a vast comet. He says, "I do not say it will be so," still he leaves the impression on the minds of his readers that some fiery comet, a great many times hotter than melted iron, is, some day in the future, destined to run into the sun, and heat that great centre of our solar system so hot that it will set the world on fire, and thus will come the long-looked-for universal conflagration of all sublunary things. I do not question the power of that Infinite Being who spake this earth into being at the first to dispose of it in the manner indicated above, if he chooses thus to do. But the question arises, Will he do it? If he does, this earth is not the only planet that will share in the great calamity. Precisely the same result will come to every other planet in our solar system. All the planets in our system would meet the same fate with our earth, for they sustain the same relation to the sun as does the earth. It is a philosophical fact that if this earth is burned up, it must, to a great extent, affect the entire solar system—destroy our solar system with its sun, and, to that extent at least, chaos sits in murky nothingness in the universe that came into being by the creative power of the great First and Last. Who can tell how much farther the effect will be felt? Philosophy teaches that every step we take on our earth sends its vibratory motion throughout the universe. It is a conclusion that no wise man will dispute, that there is a systematic connection of each individual portion of the universe with all other parts of it. It is a great compound, complicated set of machinery, builded and set in motion by an Infinite hand. You might as well suppose that a clock would continue to perform the work contemplated by its maker after you had destroyed a portion of its machinery as to imagine that this earth may be destroyed, by no matter what means, and not disturb the entire system of worlds that God has made ; for it is, though made up of parts, one grand, incomprehensibly sublime system, from the great centre out through eternal space to the outermost walls of the universe.

To suppose that God has exercised creative power in constructing this stupendously grand universe, to toy with it for a few thousand years and then amuse himself by tumbling its almost endless systems into one vast pile of chaotic nothingness, is sublimely absurd. If, however, he designed to do so, he could accomplish the work of destruction through the agency of a fiery comet as easily as by any other means ; but I have too great faith in his infinite wisdom to believe that he will ever burn up the universe, or any part of it, by any means, or through any agency whatever.

I am told that the Bible teaches such a burning. My answer is, the plain language of Scripture refutes the notion that the earth will ever be burned.

After the Noatic flood, God said to Noah : "I will not again curse the ground any more for man's sake ; neither will I smite any more every living thing as I have done. While the earth remaineth, seed time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease."—Gen. viii. 21, 22. How long will the earth remain ? "One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh, but the earth abideth forever."—Ecc. i. 4.

Once more : "Who laid the foundations of the earth, that it (the earth) should not be removed FOREVER."—Ps. civ. 5.

These texts not only show in unmistakably plain language that the earth will never be burned up, but they declare just as plainly that it will never be burned over, or "melted."

There is other testimony right to the point. God promised to Abraham and his seed "all the land of Canaan, from the river of Egypt, unto the great river, the river Euphrates," for an everlasting possession. See Gen. xii. 1-5 ; ch. xiii. 14, 15, 16 ; ch. xvii. 8. Ex. vi. 3-8. Josh. xxi. 43. Gen. xv. 18. Stephen declared that God did not give Abraham a single foot of that land during his lifetime (see Acts vii. 1-5), "yet he promised that he would give it (the land of Canaan) to him (Abraham) for a possession," even this same land, "from the river of Egypt, to the great river, the river Euphrates." This fixes the fact that Abraham must inherit the land of Canaan jointly with his seed after the resurrection of the just, or not at all. If not at all, then God falsifies his word. Thank God, I do not doubt the fulfillment of this promise to Abraham. If, however, the earth is burned up, burned over, or melted into one fiery mass at the second advent of Christ, God will burn up his own landmarks and destroy his promise to Abraham, by a fire of his own kindling. This same land is promised to Christ. The angel said to Mary, "The Lord God shall give unto him (Jesus), the throne of his father David." The throne or dominion of David was the land of Canaan, and nothing else.

The prophet Ezekiel prophesied of the overthrow of the kingdom of David, and that when overthrown it should never be restored till Christ shall take possession of it as his rightful inheritance. See Ezek. xxi. 25-27. When Christ takes the throne—dominion—of David, "He shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom THERE SHALL BE NO END." Thus, on the veracity of the angel Gabriel rests the conclusion that no devastating fire will ever blot out the boundary lines of the Abrahamic kingdom—"all the land of Canaan."

David says : "The righteous shall inherit the land, and dwell therein forever."—Ps. xxxvii. 29. "But the meek shall inherit the earth, and delight themselves in the abundance of peace."—V. 11. At last, when God's plan of love and mercy shall be consummated, "the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him."—Dan. vii. 27. Before the light of the Scriptures of truth the world-burning theory is driven away into the outer darkness of ecclesiastical speculative absurdities. To those who ask, "When is the world coming to an end?" the only scriptural answer is, the world will never come to an end, it "abideth forever." This ionion—age—will end ; but our earth will at last be redeemed from the last imperfection brought upon her by the transgression of man, be reinstated in all its primeval perfections of beauty, loveliness and blessing, and thus, through the cycles of eternal years, her rich effulgence of immortal beauty will bless the sight, and her unnumbered fruitions will gladden the hearts of the ransomed of the Lord, as they shall "return and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads." How more like God is this than to imagine that after planning—creating such a glorious universe, having arranged the symmetrical order of its parts, ordered the perfection of all its infinite workings, and with the key of almighty power wound up the grand machine and sent it on its perpetual course—he should at last get tired of the unbroken harmony of “nature’s anthem,” and hurl the entire system into the yawning chasm of confusion and annihilation. The world-burning theory seems to be a segment of that sulphuric gospel (?) that for centuries has darkened the ecclesiastical sky like the smoke from the symbolic pit of the apocalyptic vision. The clear light is now shining, and will shine more and more as we near the opening scenes of the future ages, in spite of all the ecclesiastical gags, thumbscrews and cast-iron bedsteads that can be invented. Sectarianism may, like Bunyan’s hoary-headed giant, sit at the mouth of its doleful cavern and growl and gnash its teeth, but it will not stop the onward march of truth. God, from his throne in the heavens, has spoken and said, “Let there be light,” and the light will shine; yea, continue to shine, until this entire planet is robed in a rich mantle of light throughout its vast extent, and angels and men redeemed shall walk in its light and rejoice in its glory through endless years.

’Tis the glad day so long foretold;
’Tis the bright morn of Zion’s glory Prophets foresaw in times of old.”

THE “PROPHECY OF LUKE XXI. 25-28.”

BY P. ALLING.

THE above is the heading of an editorial in the January number of this magazine, containing many thoughts of interest, the reading of which has suggested some additional thoughts which I wish to throw out for the consideration of the lovers of truth. The following is an extract from the article of yours:

“The expression in verse 24, ‘until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled,’ cannot be made to mean that the treading under foot was never to cease, but the reverse, viz.: that the time would come when that desolation would terminate, and Jerusalem be no longer trodden under foot. To say otherwise is to contradict some of the plainest prophecies of the Bible.”

These statements I fully believe, but the thoughts prominently before my mind are these: 1. Are these Gentile times and this treading under foot limited by prophetic measurements? 2. If they are, where is that testimony to be found?*

3. What are the of Th testimony is found most clearly in the book Daniel.

events that mark the beginning and the ending of those times and events?

The beginning of this work, as also the time, is manifestly marked by the ending of the seventy weeks of Daniel ix. 24, at the overthrow of Jerusalem, in our A. D. 70, at which time the 490 years cut off of the 2300 days (or years) of Daniel viii. 14 was fulfilled. If this is correct, of course 1810 full years from that time will finish up both Gentile times and of the treading under foot. By a careful reading of verses 26 and 27, it will be seen that the people of the (Roman) prince that was “to come” were “to destroy the city and sanctuary,” which were to remain desolate until that, “that is determined shall be poured upon the desolator” (margin), “and the end thereof shall be with a flood.”

Thus saith the word of the Lord (which word I have taken the liberty of transposing a little, but the sense is not perverted). In this condensed view, these points or questions are all answered quite satisfactory to my mind. But the main question is this, Are we to be governed in the dating of the ending of these seventy weeks by Gentile time or from the actual birth of Christ? Here is is a difference, as is almost universally admitted, of four years. Shall these four years be deducted from A. D. 70, or shall they not? This is now the question. Let us turn to the law and the testimony and abide the answer.

In Daniel ix. 25 we find this language: “Know therefore and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment to restore and rebuild Jerusalem unto the Messiah the Prince shall be seven weeks, and three-score and two weeks.” Here arises two questions. 1. When and by whom did this commandment go forth? 2. To what event in Christ’s life do these weeks reach?

I will answer the last question first, negatively. Certainly, the sixty-nine weeks could not have ended at his crucifixion as assumed by Mr. Miller; because we read in v. 26, “And after three-score and two weeks shall Messiah be cut off”; which was fulfilled at the cross; therefore the sixty-nine weeks could not have had a common beginning or a common ending with this shorter period. By turning to Ezra vi. 14, 15, this record will be found, which throws light upon the first question: “And the elders of the Jews builded, and they prospered through the prophesying of Haggai the prophet and Zechariah the son of Iddo; and they builded, and finished it, according to the commandment of the God of Israel, and according to the commandment of Cyrus and Darius and Artaxerxes, king of Persia. And this house was finished on the third day of Adar, which was in the sixth year of the reign of Darius, king of Persia." This testimony establishes the following facts: 1. That the decree went forth in the first year of Cyrus; consequently, the sixty-nine weeks must have there began and ended at the birth of Christ. 2. That in the fulfilment of that decree or commandment the Persian kingdom was a unit, and all of the five decrees of the different kings recorded in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah are included in the one decree of the God of heaven. When the work of restoration was completed by Nehemiah in the thirty-second year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, there the sixty-two weeks began, and ended (as above shown) at the crucifixion.

Here I will remark, according to the light I enjoy from this and other testimony, that the weeks of chapter ix. each begin with and measure different events and have no common ending; otherwise, all is confusion. The seventy weeks, I believe, began when the Persian kingdom was in its zenith, under the reign of Xerxes, who "stirred up all against the realm of Grecia," being the fourth king after Cyrus (chapter xi. 2). [See note at the end.]

But to come back to the point that the actual birth of Christ is to govern in prophetic events connected therewith, is attested not only by the Bible, but also by the acts of the Roman world, by the substitution of B.C. and A.D. into the calendar of the events of earth's history. 1. This is testimony not easily impeached. The error made of four years by the arrangers of that confession cannot in any wise alter the fact. Now, if we begin our reckoning of the remaining 1810 years of the vision, allotted "to the Gentile times of treading down Jerusalem," we are carried down to the close of the Jewish year 1876, and then what? Why, the commencement of the present war of Russia upon the desolator of Jerusalem for more than a thousand years past, and every indication goes to show that it is about to end in its overthrow and utter destruction!

Question: Is it unreasonable to suppose that, with this event, the whole period of the 2,300 days may have ended? If they did not then end, are we not to look for a similar war to occur at some future time when they do expire, and do over the very work that is now in progress? Let the wise answer and act accordingly.

NOTE.—These three intervening kings are named in their order in Ezra iv., as follows:

1, Ahasuerus; 2, Artaxerxes; and 3, Darius. With this testimony before us it is passingly strange that such writers as Dr. Prideaux and others should assume that Artaxerxes Longimanus is the veritable Ahasuerus of the book of Esther. And still more strange that any should fix upon the decree Haman obtained from Ahasuerus in the twelfth year of his reign for the slaughter of the Jews throughout his empire as the one named in Dan. ix. 25. Surely that decree for their destruction cannot be tortured into the idea of their restoration or of the beginning of the seventy weeks of verse 24; but it sustains a theory, and so it must pass. Chapter vii. 1 reads thus: "Now, after these things, in the reign of Artaxerxes," v. 6, "Ezra went up from Babylon," which was in the seventh year of that king. Question: How long was this after the finishing of the house in the sixth year of Darius? Prideaux makes Darius reign thereafter thirty years and Xerxes twenty-one years; and if we add twelve years to the decree of Ahasuerus, the full number of 62-3 years intervened between the two events. These facts of themselves are fatal to all such applications.

PERFECTION OF JESUS THE CHRIST.

BY ELDER N. H. PALMER.

To an intelligent comprehension of the plan of human redemption we deem the matters concluded in our head-title to be of surpassing importance. We are well apprised that we should be modest, and proceed with religious reverence in our attempts to look into divine things, and to explore the mysteries of godliness.

But "virtue by the holy seal of God
Accredited and stamped, immortal all,
And all invulnerable, fears no hurt."

When, therefore, we are told "it became him . . . to make the Captain of salvation perfect," and that he, "being made perfect, became the author of eternal salvation," and when we hear Jesus saying, "the third day I shall be perfected," we feel justified in trying to understand such questions as, What is the character of his perfection? By what means was it acquired? and, What is the design, or use, of its revelation?

The perfection of our glorious Redeemer presents itself to our apprehension under two principle aspects, closely allied, but clearly distinguishable: his moral perfection, and his mediatorial perfection. We shall consider them separately.

First, the moral perfection of Jesus. "Whe

the fullness of time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law."—Gal. iv. 4. Two important facts are here enunciated: 1. Jesus was a man, and was under the law as other men. 2. He was a moral agent, or one whose life was to be regulated by law. These truths are also established by his declaration on coming to John for baptism. "John forbade him, saying, I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?" "Jesus . . . said . . . suffer it to be so now; for thus it becometh us to fulfill all righteousness."—Matt. iii. 14, 15. Let us now note the following facts: 1. John's baptism was of divine ordination, and was enjoined on all men, that is, all Jews. 2. John was the divinely appointed minister of this institution. 3. Jesus, though greater in nature and mission than John, was yet subject, in all moral and religious obedience, to God's law, and God's minister. 4. As a man—a moral agent—Jesus was bound to observe this and all other divine institutions given to man, for thus it becometh us—is enjoined on men as moral agents—to observe all divine ordinances, or to fulfill all righteousness. 5. Righteousness is a loving obedience to the divine law. This law is the prescribed rule of all human action, "commanding what is right, and prohibiting what is wrong." It is, therefore, the measure and the test of moral rectitude; and by the conduct of the subject as it is related to the law, either as an act or as the habitude, his moral character is determined. 6. Jesus' nature was holy, and in this regard he did not need the benefit of sealing ordinances. But as he was a man under law, it became him to establish a good moral character under the law, and, like his brethren—men in the same relation—to attain a state of virtue, or moral holiness.

We have so far only spoken of what appertains to the person and character of Jesus as a man, but the subject is intimately related to his mission and work as a Saviour. We submit the following as incontestable facts: 1. Either the transgression of a divine law by a moral agent or a refusal to render obedience to its requirements makes him a sinner; and if Jesus had refused to obey it, he had sinned. 2. Man is placed under probation, subjected to tests under divine law; and God demands an obedience springing from such a hearty love for himself and his law as shall support the will and choice in obedience to it under any condition or degree of natural evil or sensitive suffering that may or can arise. 3. But as this had never been perfectly attained by any man, it might have been claimed that such attainment is both impracticable and impossible. But Jesus, by his life and sufferings, has removed this objection and has made the divine law honorable by rendering perfect obedience to it as a man under the highest possible pressure of both natural and moral evils.

It is said: "Before Pontius Pilate he witnessed a good confession" in the very culmination of his witnessing and suffering. To this effect he answered the persecuting Pharisees: "Behold, I cast out devils, and do cures to-day and to-morrow, and the third day I shall be perfected," and intimated his suffering at Jerusalem as connected with his perfection.—Luke xiii. 32. His last utterance on the cross was, "It is finished." He had now perfectly kept the law while he drank the cup which his Father had given him—the shame and agony of the cross. In his faithfulness to God and his law under the severest sufferings he had secured a perfect moral character as a man; he achieved a divine virtue—true moral holiness—and "set us an example that we should follow in his steps." So now, having encompassed in himself a natural, a moral and a divine rectitude and purity of person and character, he is both morally and spiritually perfect. His official or mediatorial perfection is closely allied to his moral perfection, but falls under a different line of proofs and serves other ends. When told that his perfection is in order to his becoming "the Author" and "the Captain" of our salvation and "the High Priest" of our confession, it seems there is a perfection affirmed that is rather official than moral. It is our purpose to elucidate this in another paper.

Dalton, Ga., March, 1878.

THE EARTH THE HOME OF THE SAINTS.

I EXPRESSED my views on this subject some time since. Recently, in looking over some scraps of papers, I came across an "Address of Prof. Lummis," of the Methodist Episcopal Church, "before the Methodist Preachers' Meeting in Boston," from which I give the following extracts on the subject:

The earth is not to be abandoned, it is not to become an unsightly cinder. Christ is to win a perfect victory. This earth is to be brought in to the service of Christ, and to bring joy to man. It is to become as grand a monument of the victory of grace as it has been a sad memorial of the insurrection of sin. The tempter ruined man in Paradise. Will the Conqueror of death and hades allow Eden to be an unrecovered Waterloo? Will he not rather rebuild the razed fortress and quarter there a garrison so clad in panoply of proof, so loyal in every heart-throb, that every alien will shun the peril of approach, let alone that of attack? Will there not, over the white battlements, float forever the banner of the cross, the triumphant symbol of Eden regained?

"Alas!" cries one, "I wish my home in a better place than this miserable earth." Was it not once declared by God himself to be very good? It is reserved for renovation by fire. Professor Robinson, in his New Testament Lexicon, referring to 2 Pet. iii. 13, and to Rev. xxi. 1, renders kainos in these passages "renewed," "made new," and therefore superior, more splendid. We should read them, "We look for renewed heavens and a renewed earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." "I saw a renewed heaven and a renewed earth." This is also Paul's use of the word in 2 Cor. v. 17, "If any man be in Christ he is a new creature," and in Gal. vi. 15, "For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature."

We shall have the earth, then, not merely as good as it was in primeval days, but better, grander, more glorious.

Imagine Adam and Eve grumbling over the charming garden of Eden, prepared by God with everything to please the eye, with everything to attract the taste! Would not the angels, if they could have heard such grumbling, have deemed the garden too good for such occupants? But Eden, with all its beauty, with all its glory, is not to be compared with Paradise restored. These trials will be over. All will be over. All will be tested, all approved, all bear the palm of victory, all wear the crown of glory. Not a single couple, but "a great multitude that no man can number," the meek, the pure in heart, the elect children of God. Which is better—such a home, or a distant, ethereal, invisible, intangible and hardly half-imaginable world?

This is my native land; I love it.

"Lives there a man with soul so dead," etc., who does not prefer, other things being equal, his fatherland to every other? The hardy Greenlander, the Muscovite, the Swiss, the Swede, each prefers his native land.

"Well, but all will not be in their native land, perhaps."

If I were in Europe, or Asia, or Africa, I should call America my native land. If I were on Jupiter or Saturn, I should call earth my native land. The earth is the natal soil of every one who dwells upon it. Abraham desired a better native country, not a different one. That would be absurd. That would be as if Jacob desired a first-born son after Reuben, as if Isaac sought a handsomer first wife than Rebekah. Abraham desired a better native land (patris)—Heb. vi. 14—the old, the sin-cursed one renewed, the curse lifted, sickness banished, death annulled. "But," says one, "when a man is born from above, heaven becomes his native land." If men are born from above in heaven, then heaven is this earth. We have no record of any one being born from above except on this earth. Hence, both by nature and by grace, this earth is our patris.

"Well," says another, "I should like this world very well, but it is too small; such a potato-ball planet would never accommodate the millions on millions that have lived."

The objection is entitled to consideration.

Prof. Lummis then makes an estimate of the numbers that may have lived in six thousand years since Adam, and sums up "Ninety-five billions, four hundred millions," and proceeds as follows:

Every man, woman and child would have ample standing-room (six square feet) on the island of Ceylon, or even on the peninsula of Nova Scotia. Every one of them could be buried in the State of New York. Take the peninsula of Arabia, lay it out in streets and parks so that half of it shall be thus taken up, and in the remaining half of it there will be room enough to build up a magnificent city of buildings such as have gone up on the burnt district of Boston, that shall give grand accommodations to every human being that has lived from Adam, and that shall live until A.D. 2,000, and be less crowded than the average of several wards in the city of New York.

OUR LORD'S RETURN.

No event can so interest the real lover of Jesus as that of his return from heaven. This, however, depends much on the faith possessed in regard to a future life. If the person expects to go to heaven at death, that person cannot feel the importance of Christ's return as the lover of Jesus who looks only to the resurrection for a future life.

In Dr. Macduff's sweet Memories of Olivet there is a chapter on "the joyful return of the disciples across the Mount to Jerusalem," after the angels had assured them that this same Jesus whom they had seen ascend would so return. The following are the words of comfort and warning in the closing paragraphs :

"Church of God ! drawing ever nearer to this solemn event, 'why stand ye gazing, why stand ye lingering? Christian, why loiter on the mountain top? Tarry not—squander not your precious moments. Who can tell how soon again the heavenly gates may be opened for the descent of your enthroned Lord? Go, go ! trim your lamps ! put oil into your vessels, 'He cometh—He cometh to judge the earth !' 'That same Jesus shall so come !' The apostles, when they heard this, folded not their arms in indifference and sloth. They went forthwith with stout, bold hearts, to do their work manfully in the Church and the world. They would long, doubtless, for that blessed moment of reunion, when they could exclaim, 'Lo ! this is our God, we have waited for him.' But they knew that the best waiting for him was working for him—waiting by patient suffering, or working by active duty. 'Who,' asks the Psalmist in that beautiful ascension psalm, where the gates are summoned to lift up their heads that the King of Glory may enter in—'who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord, or who shall stand in his holy place?' He answers, 'He that hath clean hands and a pure heart ; who hath not lifted up his soul unto vanity nor sworn deceitfully,' 'If ye then be risen with Christ seek those things that are above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God.' Be assured there is nothing that will so raise you above the world as the elevating consciousness that you are partakers of the endless life of your living Redeemer ; that your lives are now hid with Christ in God, and that where Christ, who is your life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory. Seek often to climb, by faith, these steepes of Olivet, and remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, 'A little while and ye shall not see me, and again a little while and ye shall see me.' That first 'little while' will soon be over—the little while of the Church's widowhood, mourning her absent Lord. But the great while when 'we shall see Him,' is every day drawing nearer. Every hour is giving fresh emphasis to the words, 'Yet a little while and He that shall come, will come, and will not tarry.' Remember it is 'to them also that look for him He shall appear the second time, without sin unto salvation.' The assembled Jewish worshippers looked for the re-appearance of their High Priest, when he was ministering in the Holy of Holies. They waited anxiously in the outer porch to see the veiling curtain drawn and the Intercessor of the nation come forth, to pour upon the multitude, with outstretched hands, the old benediction, 'The Lord bless thee and keep thee : the Lord make his face shine upon thee and be gracious unto thee : the Lord lift up his countenance upon thee and give thee peace.'—Num. vi. 24-26. Not till then were the imposing services of that high day of Hebrew festival completed. Do we (of this gospel day) see through the type? Are we on the outlook for our re-appearing High Priest, coming forth from the heavenly Presence to stand (who knows but it may be literally again) on the height of Olivet, and with the same outstretched hands of love, to say to the myriads of His expectant Church, 'Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world?' 'Are we thus looking for that blessed hope?' It was a gladdening sound to the Jewish multitudes in their temple area, when they heard the sound of the silver bells on the hem of their High Priest's garment, giving intimation of his approach :—'Blessed are they who know the joyful sound.' 'Blessed are those servants who, when their Lord cometh, shall be found watching !'—Pp. 342-4.

COMMUNION WITH CHRIST.

I THINK you will acknowledge that it is easier to serve than it is to commune. You will have observed that Joshua never grew weary when he was fighting with the Amalekites. It was hard work, but he did not get his arm weakened at it. But when Moses was on the top of the mountain in prayer he had to have two others to hold his hands up. So it is with us. The more spiritual the exercise, the sooner the soul tires of it. We could keep on preaching better than we could keep on praying, and it is easier to pray in public than it is to pray in secret ; and let me say, that even in secret, it is easier to pray aloud than it is to sit still in your communion with Christ in the solemn silence of the soul. The choicest fruits are generally the hardest to rear, and the most spiritual engagements are the most difficult for us to manage. Beloved, we ought to have an eye to this, we ought to take care that we do not neglect these merely external things, which are good enough in themselves, these outward attending to ordinances, and sermons, and so on ; but we ought also to take care that while we remember these in their proper places, we do not let these things crowd out better things, but see to it that we get to Christ, and do enjoy living, personal fellowship with him.

Communion with Christ is the most precious thing, and once lost, I do not care what you did in the time when you ought to have been communing with Christ, you may have won coppers, but you have lost sovereigns; for many have earned pence, but they have lost diamonds. For your own sake, and for the sake of those whom you would bless, you must see to it that sitting at the Saviour's feet is not neglected, even though it be under the specious pretext of waiting upon him. The first thing for our soul's health, the first thing for his glory, and the first thing for our own usefulness, is to keep ourselves in perpetual communion with the Lord Jesus, and to see that the vital spirituality of our religion is maintained, over and above everything else in the world.—Spurgeon.

THE CLEANSING BLOOD.

A VISITOR among the poor was one day climbing the broken staircase which led to a garret in one of the worst parts of London, when his attention was arrested by a man of peculiarly ferocious and repulsive countenance, who stood upon the landing-place, leaning with folded arms against the wall. There was something about the man's appearance which made the visitor shudder, and his first impulse was to go back. He made an effort, however, to get into conversation with him, and told him that he came there with the desire to do him good and see him happy, and the book he held in his hand contained the secret of all happiness. The ruffian shook him off as if he had been a viper, and bade him begone with his nonsense, or he would kick him down stairs. While the visitor was endeavoring with gentleness and patience to argue the point with him, he was startled by hearing a feeble voice, which appeared to come from behind one of the broken doors opening upon the landing, saying: "Does your book tell of the blood which cleanseth from all sin?" For the moment the visitor was too absorbed in the case of the hardened sinner before him to answer the inquiry, and it was repeated in urgent and thrilling tones: "Tell me, oh! tell me, does your book tell of the blood which cleanseth from all sin?"

The visitor pushed open the door and entered the room. It was a wretched place, wholly destitute of furniture except a three-legged stool, and a bundle of straw in a corner, upon which were stretched the wasted limbs of an aged woman. When the visitor entered, she raised herself upon one elbow, fixed her eyes eagerly upon him and repeated her former question: "Does your book tell of the blood which cleanseth from all sin?" He sat down upon the stool beside her, and inquired: "My poor friend, what do you want to know of the blood that cleanseth from all sin?" There was something fearful in the energy of her voice and manner as she replied: "What do I want to know of it! Man, I am dying; I am going to stand naked before God. I have been a wicked woman, a very wicked woman, all my life. I shall have to answer for everything I have done;" and she groaned bitterly as the thought of a lifetime's iniquity seemed to cross her soul. "But once," she continued, "once, years ago, I came by the door of a church, and I went in, I don't know what for; I was soon out again; but one word I heard there I can never forget. It was something about blood which cleanseth from all sin. Oh! if I could hear of it now! Tell me, tell me, if there is anything about that blood in your book." The visitor answered by opening his Bible and reading the first chapter of the First Epistle of St. John. The poor creature seemed to devour the words, and when he paused she exclaimed: "Read more, read more." He read the second chapter—a slight noise made him look round; the savage ruffian had followed him into his mother's room; and, though his face was partly turned away, the visitor could perceive tears rolling down his cheeks. The visitor read the third, fourth and fifth chapters before he could get his poor listener to consent that he should stop, and then she would not let him go till he promised to come again the next day. He never from that time missed a day reading to her until she died six weeks afterwards; and very blessed was it to see how, almost from the first, she seemed to find peace by believing in Jesus. Every day the son followed the visitor into his mother's room, and listened in silence, but not in indifference. On the day of her funeral, he beckoned him to one side, as they were filing up the grave, and said: "Sir, I have been thinking that there is nothing I should so much like as to spend the rest of my life in telling others of the blood which cleanseth from all sin."

Thus the great truth of free pardon through the blood of Christ breaks the heart of stone, which nothing else could touch, and turns the abandoned persecutor into the zealous teacher of Christianity.—Selected.

TRANSITIONAL PERIODS.

"THE kingdom of heaven," said our Lord to the multitudes of Judea, "suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force." Not always, but at that particular time; the remark being prefaced by the limitation, "from the days of John the Baptist until now."

We naturally inquire what is meant by this declaration. Wherein did the time that elapsed between the preaching of John and the general promulgation of Christianity differ from other periods? The answer is obvious. It was a period of transition. It was a time for the removal of that which had long been established, in order to make way for better things that were to come.

Now it was, emphatically, that entrance into the kingdom of the Lord could be gained only by force—by that force of conviction and of character which, developing a new and hitherto unfelt sense of individual responsibility in relation to truth, would necessarily leap to a course of action sure to be stigmatized by the rulers as lawless and violent.

It is not a very easy matter for us to fully realize the change that was at that time wrought on the Jewish mind. Submission to an authority so unquestionably established by God himself as that of the Jewish hierarchy, was at once the habit and duty of every devout child of Abraham. To oppose the ecclesiastical rulers of the theocracy had been long and rightly regarded as treason against God; such a man was said to have set at defiance all legal authority, and he justly became, in consequence of his act, an outcast from the commonwealth of Israel.

Yet to this lawlessness the men of that day were now called. Christ, indeed, came not to destroy, but to fulfill; but the effect of His coming, owing to the obstinate rejection of his claims by the scribes and Pharisees, was to place those who accepted his teachings in direct antagonism with their divinely-appointed spiritual guides. Their first duty as believers was, in the strength of an individualism created and sustained by the Holy Spirit, resolutely to set aside alike the commandments of the Sanhedrim and the traditions of the elders.

Until John came this would not have been a right course, for "all the prophets and the law prophesied until John," and until then constituted authority had a right to demand absolute obedience. The appearance of the Baptist in the spirit and power of Elias changed all this; it placed men under a higher law than that of "the ruler," and is justified obedience even to an authority which had originally been established by God himself. In this sense it was that from the days of John the kingdom of heaven suffered violence, and the violent took it by force.

Nor is such a fact without a lesson. Periods like those to which our Lord refers not unfrequently occur in the history of the church and the world; periods when, so to speak, old things pass away, and all things become new; not merely with regard to God, in the sense of that revolution in taste, judgment, habit and allegiance, which takes place when a man first turns from darkness to light, but in relation to men, and especially to human authority in religion.

As in political affairs, so in spiritual, there is a time to be silent, and a time to speak; a time to bear, and a time to resist; a time to be passive under a wrong, and a time for active opposition to its encroachments. We can lay down no rules for a man's guidance in the discernment of such periods. In this matter, as in all others, "if the eye be single, the whole body will be full of light," and "wisdom is justified of her children."

But we must not fail to recognize the fact that there are times when God himself sanctions contempt for what was once a rightful object of honor. Such a period was that when Hezekiah brake in pieces the brazen serpent that Moses had made, calling it Nehushtan—a mere piece of brass. Such a period was that of our Lord's first advent; such a period was the reform from Popery; and such a period will come again, when it shall appear that existing institutions have lost their power; that their vitality has departed; that accumulated and permitted unrealities have superseded the living and the true.

How near we may be to such a period it is not easy to say. In the opinion of many, the time draws nigh when once again Christians will be thrown almost exclusively upon their Bibles and upon their God; when the closet and the family will be almost the only resource of those who call upon his name. Things will certainly arrive at this point in religious matters if churches become corrupt or worldly—if ecclesiastical authority or sectarian "interests"—if pride, property or status, in whatever form, be allowed to override the commands of God, or to stand in the way of that spiritual purification and separation of the precious from the vile which must take place before "that great and terrible day of the Lord," and which, whatever may be our mistakes either as to its nature or nearness, cannot in all human probability be very far off. "Let him that readeth understand."

LIVE BY THE DAY.

THERE is a laburnum tree before me while I write, which gladdened the eye a short time ago by its lovely shower of golden blossoms, but which now shows nothing but pale green leaves and withering seed-pods. When it was in bloom, I thought more than once, Ah, thou lovely short-lived thing, I shall miss thee when thou art gone! But now that its glory is departed, I will tell you how I feel. Between me and the laburnum is a flower-bed, which looked brown and bare when the other was gay with blossoms; now it is glowing in the sunshine with a bright mass of mingled hues, so varied and so beautiful, that the laburnum is scarcely missed or regretted!

And is it not thus with all the temporal mercies of God! And when temporal mercies, which roll in like successive waves or tides, when these ebb, and pass away, are they not thus replaced to the believer by brighter and better mercies—even eternal ones?

Let this teach us to live by the day. Was I troubled yesterday, anticipating the loss of something to-day? Ah, foolish child! to-day has brought me blessings of which I knew nothing yesterday. Shall I be troubled to-day about the events of to-morrow? No; God, whose child I am, forbids it! "To-morrow shall take care for the things of itself;" for "our Father knoweth what things we have need of." No; I will take no anxious thought for the morrow: I will live by the day!

And, on reflection, how many of the memorable word of God teach the same lesson. Let some of their blessed voices be heard! Here is one: "His mercies are new every morning." This passage stands in the midst of a tale of sorrow, in the midst of the lamentations of Jeremiah; and does it not bid the afflicted to live by the day? Beloved sufferer, the dew on the flowers is new every morning! The cheering light of day rises on a dark world new every morning! And so the dew of Christ, and so the light of Christ, on thy soul. Cheer up then, and be of good courage; "light is sown for the righteous," sown by the hand of infinite power and love; light which "shall arise in darkness," arise in each successive hour of need, turning thy midnight to noonday! Believe it, and bless the name of the Lord.

Here is another: "Give us this day our daily bread." Does this catch the eye of some anxious saint, troubled about the meat which perisheth? Dear anxious brother, God has not filled thy barns, lest thou shouldst say, "Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years, take thine ease;" nor has he suffered thy cup to run dry, and given thee nothing for to-day; but he has given thee rather (and thou mayest thank him for this) a barrel and a cruse, which, though they never contain much, yet shall never be empty; and he has given this, and this only, that thine eye and thy voice may be daily uplifted to him, saying, "Give us this day our daily bread." God loves to hear thy voice in daily prayer; not the whining voice of thankless unbelief, but the humble, cheerful, earnest voice of love and hope and gratitude. Night by night he would have thee lie down in perfect peacefulness, intending to seek his face on the morrow for the morrow's needs; as one of old who said, "My voice shalt Thou hear in the morning;" "When I awake I am still with Thee." And like all God's pilgrim people, thou shalt find that, though to-day's manna be but enough for to day, to-morrow shall bring fresh showers of food from heaven, and so each day to the wilderness end! "Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought for the morrow, for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself."

But some will say, "This is not my case; I fear not for the wants of the body, but for the joy and strength and progress of the soul; I fear I may one day 'perish by the hand of Saul.'" Beloved! the Lord has not given thee thy present strength to meet future evils! Thy present strength is only to meet thy present need; future strength shall be given for future wants. "Thy shoes shall be iron and brass"—(they shall never wear out)—"and as thy day, thy strength shall be." The little child shall have strength to believe in Jesus; and when the days of happy childhood are gone, the young man shall have strength to overcome the world. When youth is past, the ripening pilgrim shall have strength to toil on through the burden and heat of the day; and when noon is passed, the aged saint (such a one as Paul the aged!) shall find faith's eye undimmed and the spirit's force unabated, shall run without weariness and walk without fainting—yea, and mount up with wings as eagles, "to show that the Lord is upright; He is our rock, and there is no unrighteousness in Him." He changeth not, fainteth not, neither is weary, but moveth onward, in undiminished and everlasting might; and they that wait on him "shall renew their strength." How often? Annually? No! but, blessed be his name, daily. For it is written, "Our inward man is renewed day by day."

Does this meet the eye of some Christian who has ceased striving to accomplish the work God has given him to do, who has ceased to pull in the race, who is lying upon his oars, and waiting for some fresh favorable breeze to waft him onward again? Oh, my brother, God has appointed the work for to-day—daily labor, as well as daily bread. “Son, go work to-day in my vineyard,” wait not idly for to-morrow; to-day was never given thee for naught. As one now gone to his heavenly rest well said, “God, who is just, measures the time to the work, and the work to the time; He never gives us a good action to perform for which the time is lacking. NOR A MOMENT IN OUR EXISTENCE IN WHICH WE HAVE NOT SOMETHING GOOD TO DO.” Our language should ever be, “Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?” and when we have done one thing, “Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do now?” and so on, without a single interval not filled up with the obedience due to God. No one can estimate the good that might enter into the life of any one regulated by such a disposition. Let these words sink down into thine ears; ponder this thought in thine heart; look at the Lord’s example in this respect. Day by day he did just the work his Father marked out for him and called him to do; not laying great plans, but accepting all that came in his way, steadily keeping in view God’s good pleasure. “I do always those things that please him.” He says to us, “Follow Me” in this. The work of to-day may seem humble or little, but if it is the work God has called you to, it is really great; and by doing it to him you make it doubly great. We are “created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before prepared that we should walk in them.”

Simply walk, then, day by day, in the path that he has marked out for you, as you DAILY discover it. God has hid your future work, but it lies in your path all the way along. If your eye be watchful, you will discover fresh portions of it every day; and in the consciousness of this, “whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might,” and God in all things shall be glorified through Christ.

Finally, each saint may say, “I shall not want,” either in things temporal or things spiritual. I am not rich in either, it may be, to-day; but I have enough for to-day.

“Day by day the manna fell; oh, to learn the lesson well!

Still by daily bounty fed—daily food for daily need.”

Therefore “I will fear no evil,” for “Thou art with me” “ALWAYS, even unto the end,” in all Thy fullness of wisdom, power and love; and, therefore, “surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life,” and “I will bless Thee every day,” and praise Thy name for ever and ever.—Selected.

STRAY THOUGHTS.

By ELDER S. W. BISHOP.

THIS earth’s so dear;
And all along its toilsome way
Are tears, and sighs, and rankling thorn,
Corroding fear,
Our hearts are burden’d all the day,
Bleeding and sad, wretched and torn.

One thought alone
Can consolation bring, and cheer
Our aching hearts by woe oppress’d;
And hush the moan
Of sorrow deep, and drive all fear
From souls desponding and distress’d:

Our “God is love ;”
And across each threatening cloud
The bow of promise throws its light;
Our Shiloh speaks in accents loud—
Trust me; I all thy battles fight.

I am thy Sun,
Thy buckler, helmet, spear, and shield;
Yea, all thy help is on me laid;
All will be won
At last, for every foe must yield
When Shiloh wields his shining blade,
‘Twill not be long
Ere those who mourn, and groan, and sigh
Shall in triumphant rapture sing
The victor’s song.
The day of exaltation’s nigh,
The crowning of earth’s rightful King.

When he shall come,
And on his throne in justice sway
His sceptre mild o’er tribes of earth,
Then hasting home
The sons of Jacob; far away
They’ll hear the songs of sacred mirth,
And, hand in hand,
Shall come to Zion’s holy mount,
And pay their humble tribute there,
With that vast band—
The multitude no man can count—
Who homage yield to David’s heir.

Yea, ev’ry king,
From west to east, from south to north,
Shall come at last with all their bands;
And they shall bring
Their glories and their honors forth To Israel’s King from distant lands.

‘Twill be a day
Of gladness over all the earth,
When restitution’s work is done—
Sin passed away—
Creation’s travail given birth
To endless years of peace begun.
May we be there,
When morning stars again shall sing,
When hymns of praise all tongues employ;
His reign to share—
Jerusalem’s immortal King;
Then hearts shall thrill with endless joy.

LETTERS AND EXTRACTS.

FROM MRS. ANNA E. IREDALE.

BRO. STORRS: Every month we get a letter from you, for we get the BIBLE EXAMINER, which is next to the Bible. We love the EXAMINER. Praise the Lord that he loves us, and that Jesus is mighty to save; and that when he went to the Father he sent another Comforter, the Holy Spirit; and God is more willing to give us the Spirit than earthly parents are to give good gifts to their children. The promise is, seek, and ye shall find; ask, and ye shall receive; knock, and it shall be opened; and as Abraham sent his servant to get a wife for Isaac, and as Rebekah consented and went to meet her Lord, whom she had never seen, so the Holy Spirit is sent to get a "bride" for Christ; and, praise the Lord, she listens and consents to go; for Christ will soon appear; then the holy Spirit will take us to meet him, to be forever with him that loved us; and as David sent for Jonathan's son, who was lame in both feet, and took him to be his son, and made him to sit at the king's table on account of the great love that David had to Jonathan, so God bids us come with our lame feet, and be as sons on account of the love he has for Jesus; then our beloved Lord will wash our feet and wipe them with the towel around his loins.

God is good and very kind to us in California. BRO. BROWN, a Baptist preacher for ten years, now an Evangelist for ten years, is in this city holding services at the Baptist Temple, opposite the "Branch Mint." A converted Jew gave $100,000 to build this temple. It will seat 2,500 people—seats free. BRO. BROWN gives Bible readings in the afternoon and preaches in the evening to full rooms. He shows the people that Christ is soon coming, and he is as strong as you are on "the ages to come." Ministers of all denominations attend, and he shows them from their Bible how the promise of God to Abraham has yet to be fulfilled, no matter how hard it seems.

The place is filled with our best citizens with their Bibles in their hands to hear for themselves. BRO. BROWN has a chart that he intends putting up in a few days to read Revelation with. He says God has made him a teacher and a gleaner, and that it took him years to unlearn what he learned in his youth about God's Word.

Your sister in the blessed hope.
San Francisco, Cal., March, 1878.

BRO. BISHOP writes: I have received several donations which have been very timely, and for which I am thankful. My wife remains about the same. At least, she is no worse, and we hope she is slowly mending, but is not able as yet to do anything about the house. It is a great trial to me to be shut up and not allowed to preach; but it must be for the best. I am in a severe trial concerning my wife, but try to cast all upon the Lord. I know that all He does is right.

NORMAN McRAE, Galveston, Texas, writes: The BIBLE EXAMINER gives me much pleasure and delight. It is with sorrow I learn the trials of our beloved Bro. Bishop; but I am confident the Lord is with him, and will not try him nor any of us about what we are able to bear, for he does not afflict willingly; but his tender mercies are over all his works. Still he will chastise us in love; let us, brethren, put forth our hands in these days of trial and assist as God has bestowed good things on us; remembering the words of Jesus, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto Me."

GEO. P. ELLIS, Springfield, Iowa, writes: I have been reading your works for four years. When I commenced it was with my old prejudices, taught me in my childhood; but as I continued to read and study, I came to the conclusion that the way at present practised of teaching as Gospel to the rising generation is wrong, and is doing more to alienate persons from the true principles of the Gospel than all the infidel lectures and writings ever delivered or published. I wish every thinking person could have access to your writings. They show a Creator who is not one that would rejoice in the torment of his creatures. How different from the representations given us by those claiming to be "orthodox"!

MRS. I. G. MALTBY, Bristol, Conn., writes: After I received the EXAMINER for February, an Advent preacher called on me and the subject of the kingdom came up. I told him you had an article on that subject that corresponded with my faith better than I could express it in words; so I handed it to him. After reading it he wished to keep the magazine. I hesitated to part with it, but finally did so, thinking it might benefit him and enable him to see further into the mysteries of the kingdom and ages to come. There is so much said about a "second chance." I told him I did not see the subject in that light, but that all would have a chance to know Christ, either here or in the ages to come. I prize the BIBLE EX-AMINER, and would be glad to send more help for it in its good work.

GEO. E. WHIPPLE, Fort Edward, N. Y. writes:—Oh, how much we have to be thankful for when we consider how much light has been given us through the EXAMINER; and the more we compare it with the best light of those around us, the more we may appreciate its superior excellence, and rejoice that the character of our loving God and Father is so clearly proved to be just, pure, good and lovely altogether; and those gross misrepresentations of his character are exposed so clearly and yet so kindly. I love the spirit manifested in the BIBLE EXAMINER. I believe it is perfectly in the natural order of things that those who worship a God who is revengeful and unrelenting and delights in torture should manifest the same character and disposition toward those in their power. If their highest idea of God is that he is a great warrior, then they will be warlike. But if they believe him to be kind and forgiving, loving his creatures notwithstanding all their imperfections and weaknesses, and that He has in wisdom so arranged that all the evils to which they are exposed shall finally enable us to appreciate more fully the worth of redemption and all other blessings to which we shall be exalted, as we shall contrast those blood-bought privileges with what we have experienced here, then we will manifest the same in kind, although in an inferior degree. The more we have of his Spirit, the more we shall conform to his likeness, and the better we shall understand those things which are revealed by the Spirit in his word. May the Lord fill us with his Spirit, and lead us to understand the deep things of God which are designed for our edification and growth, that we may attain to the full stature of men and women in Christ, that "in the dispensation of the fullness of times" we may render him effectual service in the gathering all things mentioned in Ephesians i: 10.

MILES BUZZELL, Concord, N. H., writes:—I have long been a reader of your most excellent BIBLE EXAMINER, and am a firm believer in the truth taught in it. If I had of this world's goods I would gladly help your good work; but, as it is, you have my prayers and influence in your behalf. I saw you once, some years since, and talked with you some, but not having seen or known these precious truths as I now see them, I did not appreciate the interview as I now should. There are many questions I would like to ask you.

But in all probability I never shall meet you again in this life. I am seventy-one years old, and only regret that I have found these truths so late in life. I receive my periodicals through Mrs. A. T. Ford, and lend them after I read them. It is astonishing to see how many people there are, all in ignorance of these truths, and willingly, too. They close their ears that they may not hear, and good brethren and sisters, too. May the time speedily come when God's truths shall be taught in all purity and knowingly. Yours, waiting for more light.

FROM ELDER N. H. PALMER.

BRO. STORRS:—The wintry weather is trying to my invalid condition, suffering constant pain from rheumatic and other nervous disorders. But affliction has its mitigations, and by the mercy of the Heavenly Father there are many compensations for a confinement that were otherwise irksome. Divine light sometimes flashes into the soul in reading God's word; needed strength and encouragement arise from communion with God's people in the pages of the EXAMINER; the light is sweet, and the hope of life everlasting is inspiring. I thank you heartily for your article, "The Kingdom of God," etc., in the EXAMINER for February. It is the clearest and the fullest presentment of that important and much mystified subject I have ever seen. I very much wish it could have a more extended circulation. I think it would certainly tend to beget more sober and scriptural views, and to drive away the fogs and mists generated by a dogmatizing mysticism that gather around the religion of the present times.

I should love, if able, to write more, and on many points. But I live ten miles from a post office, have little time or ability, and, in fact, cannot provide for the little expense.

May the God of all grace enable you to continue writing and publishing till all the leading features of the system you advocate are fully ventilated, and their relation and congruity exhibited. Yours, in the bonds of real Christian fraternity.

Dalton, Ga., March, 1878.

ELDER H. ROCKWELL writes from Winsted, Conn.:—I can see but little in the future, but when I look back and view the past, I can only exclaim, Oh, how good the Lord is! How wonderful that since I first heard you preach, in 1843, your "Six Sermons" in Winsted, I have been constrained to cull out the old weeds of bigotry and the traditions of sectarian theology, and lop off the dead branches marring of God's truth. It cost me the loss of many kind friends, and I began to ask myself if I belonged to that class which, the Bible says, "shall be driven from light into darkness and chased out of the world?" It appears to me I cannot go much further to get out of the world; but at every step the light shines brighter; and now and then a cluster of grapes I find in the names of those who have been of note in the church. It rejoices my sorrow-stricken heart to know that there are some, and those least expected, who have moral courage enough when they see the truth to embrace it and proclaim it in the face of scoffs and frowns. God bless and prosper Bro. Bishop in this great work. The world does move. My health is poor, and my life is ebbing out.

IN MEMORIAM.

BRO. STORRS:—One of your subscribers will read the EXAMINER no more—SIMON W. ROGERS, who died in Rochester, N. Y., November 6th, 1877, aged 62. His disease was paralysis. He was sick a long time. He was with you in belief (as you probably know) in most part, if not entirely, and recommended the EXAMINER to me as the best publication of the day, so far as he knew. I believe that he lived and died a Christian, that he "fought the good fight and kept the faith," and that he was, as he claimed to be, a son of God. I have talked with him (at his house) many times on these great subjects and truths that we love so well, and always to my own instruction and profit. Bro. Rogers used to belong to the Church, but they did not want to hear him talk of the coming King and kingdom, nor of "the ages to come"; that was worse yet. He did not die in the Church, but doubtless he did die in the Lord; and that, in my humble opinion, is a far better state of affairs.

Bro. Rogers sleeps in Jesus, and in his lowly bed is waiting the coming of that "hour in which he will hear the voice of the Son of God and will live"; waiting till the Mighty Conqueror, "He who liveth and was dead, but is now alive forever more, and holds the keys of hades and of death," shall unlock his prison doors and bid him come forth to life and immortality. Surely this is a glorious heritage and worth striving to gain—to be free from evil, forever free from sin and all its direful consequences—"To be equal unto the angels—to die no more—to be the children of God, being the children of the resurrection."

This grand and glorious destiny may we be accounted worthy to attain is the prayer of your sister.

"Looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life."

MARY E. BENHAM.

DEATH STILL AT WORK.

THOMAS W. READ, author of the well-known and widely read work, "Bible vs. Tradition," died at Nyack, N. Y., February 18th last. His residence for several years past has been at Catskill, N. Y. About a year since he came to live with his married daughter at Nyack. His age I do not know, but think it was about my own. His request was for me to attend and officiate at his funeral, but owing to the inclemency of the weather his desire was not realized. His wife survives him.

LEONARD C. THORNE, formerly a merchant of New York City, and well known to many of our readers, died at Granville, N. Y., March 3d, of pneumonia, aged forty-four. He has left a wife and three children. He left business in the city several years since and removed to Granville. He engaged actively in the Temperance cause there, and was very successful in that work. He was highly esteemed in Granville and his death much lamented.

MRS. SARAH A., wife of ELD. S. S. BREWER, died at Seabrook, N. H., March 4th, of paralysis of the brain, aged sixty-nine years. She was indeed a "help-meet" to her husband in his ministerial work; always ready to enliven the assembly with her singing.

Thus death sweeps on, and will till the Redeemer returns, who has the "keys of death and hades." He only can destroy the monster which has reigned for six thousand years. "Come, Lord Jesus." Amen. EDITOR.

CREATION THE WORK OF LOVE.

FOR what purpose was the universe formed? Our chief authorities on those high subjects have severally held that it was for the divine glory; or for the delight of exerting divine energies in production; or, for the display of the Divine power. Some have subordinately united with these objects benevolence; but the theory most compatible with the divine nature is that which pronounces the great leading purpose to be benevolence. Glory, or power, as primary motives, cannot be divested in the human mind of a tinge of selfishness, a passion inconceivable in the Deity. But to the fullest activity of beneficence in the divine nature, no limit is to be assigned. The mere delight of calling intelligence into being, of communicating happiness, of filling the void of space with ardent existence, of raising millions of millions of bright and rejoicing creatures into consciousness, would be a motive worthy of the supreme source of virtue. That other motives, born of this impulse, might join in the recompense of this great act of Heaven; that the author of an universe, pausing from his work, and pronouncing it to be the full realization of his own holy beneficent idea, might additionally feel the joy of a parent, the power of a sovereign, and the still loftier and more incommunicable glory of a Creator, is perfectly consistent with supreme perfection. But such feelings must be the result, not the origin of action. The only word in which God ever defined his nature was "LOVE."—Rev. George Croly, LL.D., Rector of Bondleigh, England.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.

The work from which I have taken the above extract was published in London in 1834; a work of 625 pages, octavo, on "Divine Providence; or the Three Cycles of Revelation." The extract is from the first chapter, on "The Existence of God." It is thirty years since I read the work; and on taking it from among my books, laid away many years ago, the foregoing item came before me as if it had been an inspiration in my own heart. It expresses the idea that has pervaded my soul for several years, but especially no ten years past. "God is Love:" and from no other motive did He ever give life or being to one of the human race; and no other controlling motive ever did nor ever can direct his action towards the creatures he has made. Any religious theory which denies this or implies a denial, is defective somewhere, and is not to be accepted as from God, however learned or pious its authors may be. Let men look at "The only word which God ever defined his nature," viz., "Love," till their whole being is transformed into that likeness; and then most religious glories, now in existence, would seem like blasphemies against the character and government of the Creator. Christian men would become as much astonished at their own past blindness as they are now at those who anciently worshiped Moloch. May God soon be honored as his name of "Love" demands.

WORKS RECEIVED.

TWENTY REASONS FOR BELIEVING THAT THE SECOND COMING OF THE LORD IS NEAR." A pamphlet of 34 pages, published by F. H. Revell, 148 and 150 Madison Street, Chicago, Ill. Price, 15 cents.

This is an interesting and profitable work; well arranged, condensing much in little space. Let it be read by all. I wish for it a wide circulation.—Ed.

"THE SCIENTIFIC AND RELIGIOUS DISCOVERIES IN THE GREAT PYRAMID, recently made by Professor Piazzzi Smyth and other scholars." Compiled by William H. Wilson. A pamphlet of 64 pages, published by F. H. Revell, 148 and 150 Madison Street, Chicago, Ill. Price 25 cents.

This is a work of deep interest, and practically answers all the purposes, especially to common readers, of the large and expensive works that are published on the subject. I recommend it to every one who cares to get a "Rock" foundation as to the time in which we are living. Let us "watch and pray" and keep clear of the idolatry of the world, and church conformity to the world and its pleasure-seeking customs and practices. The end of this age is impending, and all opportunity to be of the number of Christ's bride and share in his glory will end soon and suddenly. Let us see to it that we "are not of the world," but of Christ.—Ed.

TO DELINQUENT SUBSCRIBERS.

AT the middle of this volume, i. e., in March, I gave notice that "over one hundred" who had received the first half of this volume of the EXAMINER had, up to that time, made no remittance. I regret to say, now, that two-thirds of the volume has been sent to them, there are over eighty of that number who have made no response. Shall I not hear from such immediately? The BIBLE EXAMINER will be seriously embarrassed, if not compelled to suspend, if this deficiency is not soon remedied. I thank those who have responded, and hope the remainder will do so without delay. If this is not done, or a reasonable excuse sent me before the next issue of the EXAMINER, you must not think it strange if it does not come to you again. I regret to say this; but no apology and no pay implies the Magazine is of no value in your estimation. Ed.

The Bible Examiner is a Monthly Magazine. Terms, $2.00 per year, in advance.

Subscribers' Names should be written very plain. Do not neglect this. It is utterly impossible sometimes to decipher names, and mistakes must occur in consequence. As to their Address, give simply the name of the Post-office and State.

Let all Correspondents be careful to address me as follows:

GEO. STORRS,
72 Hicks Street,
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

All "Postal Money Orders" sent me should be drawn on Brooklyn, N. Y.

To Clubs the BIBLE EXAMINER will be supplied on the followings terms:

Two copies, to one address,	$3.00
Four " " "	5.00
Ten " " "	10.00

The ten may be divided and sent to the address of two persons, if desired. The prices fixed above are expected to be paid in advance and the money sent at the risk of the subscribers.

BIBLE EXAMINERS, bound plain, will be furnished for $2.00 per volume. Volumes 18, 19, 20 and 21 can still be supplied. Also in plain morocco, with gilt edges, for $3.25.

"FOLLOWING AFTER TRUTH": Part Fourth.
—Messrs. J. & W. Rider, Bartholomew Close,

London, will accept my thanks for a copy of the above-named work received. Ed.

THE PROTEST AGAINST PAPAL INFALLIBILITY, by one of the Bishops of that Church, in the Œcumenical Council of 1870, which is found in this number of the BIBLE EXAMINER, will be read with interest, notwithstanding its length. I am not aware that it has appeared before in this country. A conflict is evidently going on in that Church. The Jesuits are laboring for mastery. The present Pope is a Jesuit, although his purpose at first is to show a peaceable face, or "lamb"-like disposition, and perhaps disclaim infallibility; yet no such professions are to be trusted when it is known the Jesuits elected him, and they are too cunning not to know their man and what he will do when the favorable time comes. If he now "speaks as a lamb," be it remembered he may yet "speak as a dragon"; then woe to the men who dare oppose his mandates, backed by the infallible Jesuits. Ed.

THE PASSOVER, OR LORD'S SUPPER, was celebrated at the Editor's house the 17th ult. It was a season of interest. There were representatives present from Pennsylvania, Massachusetts and Connecticut, as well as New York. All seemed edified and comforted. Among those present were Samuel Norris and wife. Brother Norris is an old Methodist preacher, who, in 1836, with myself, was censured for attending an anti-slavery prayer-meeting in Cincinnati by the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which we were members. The censure has been removed since slavery came to an end, and we received copies of the action of the General Conference in rescinding the resolution of the Conference of 1836. Brother Norris is still a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church; but our brotherly affection has never ceased, and it gave me great pleasure to meet him and his wife at our annual celebration of "showing forth the Lord's death till he come." Brother Norris is 78 years old, and has lately lost his only son, who was also his only child; truly, a sad bereavement. He sustains a superannuated relation to his Conference as a minister by reason of deafness. Himself and wife are in great affliction, but keep alive their confidence in the Lord. May they find the grace of our covenant God to be sufficient for them! Let us remember them at a throne of grace.

BIBLE EXAMINER.

"One Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time."—1 TIM. II: 4-6.

VOL. XXII.

NEW YORK, MAY, 1878.

No. 8.

THE GODHEAD.

"In him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily."—Col. ii. 9.

It is doubtless well known that the editor of this magazine has refused, for near twenty years past, to enter into any controversy carried on under the names of Trinitarian, Arian, Unitarian and Socinian, because he had become satisfied that none of them had any Scriptural ground for the positive and uncharitable positions they assumed, and because the Saviour has plainly declared that "No man knoweth who the Son is, but the Father."—Luke x. 22 and Matt. xi. 27.

The editor has not been without views on this subject, but has hitherto refused to give them to the public, because he would not consent to be drawn into controversy on an inquiry where certainly was impossible. He now presents the view that has occupied his own mind for about twenty years past; he does it simply by way of suggestions that may possibly relieve some sincere minds that have been perplexed by the various dogmatical statements of the above-named sects.

The editor will not consent to go into a controversy with any one on the subject; he will leave every one perfectly free to accept or reject his suggestions, which have given his own mind perfect peace on a disturbing controversy that has made much strife among professed Christians, and continually kept up unseemly divisions among those bearing the name of the CHRIST.

That the names of FATHER, SON and HOLY SPIRIT are Scriptural no one will deny. It is the relation in which they stand to each other that is the subject of inquiry.

1. "THE FATHER," as such, is invisible and incomprehensible. "No man hath seen, nor can see." He is "dwelling in light, which no man can approach unto."—1 Tim. vi. 15, 16.

2. "THE SON, as such, is the outgoing of the Father, or the visible manifestation of the Father—"God was manifest in the flesh"; thus showing the heart and sympathy of God to dying men."—1 Tim. iii. 15, 16. Jesus Christ says, "I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world."—John xvi. 28.

3. "THE HOLY SPIRIT," as such, is the invisible or internal manifestation of God through the Christ, as the producing cause of man's renewal or recreation; which invisible manifestation first produces "conviction of sin," then "helpeth our infirmities" by leading us to "God manifest in the flesh"; through which manifestation hope is inspired, faith brought out into action, and a vital union formed with "God manifest in the flesh"—sins are forgiven, a spiritual nature produced in man, and he has the Holy Spirit as "THE COMFORTER" and ever-present help. Man is thus made a "partaker of the divine nature."—2 Peter i. 4.

4. "JESUS CHRIST," the Son of God, died; all is dark and apparently hopeless; the manifestation ceases. Awful suspense! But Christ arises from the dead and ascends into heaven, where in human nature he is glorified and has "all power in heaven and earth" in his hands. From his exaltation he sheds forth the Holy Spirit on all men, but especially on true believers. He had said, "I came forth from the Father and came into the world": again, "I leave the world and go to my Father."—John xvi. 28. This is now all a reality, and "the glory he had with the Father before the world was" is restored to him and greater glory also.—John xvii. 5.

Thus the GODHEAD, though a unit, presents different aspects, each of which has its appropriate work or office, and neither can be removed or withdrawn without ruin to man and a destruction of all Scriptural hope of future and eternal life. Hence it is true "the Father is God, the Son is God, and the Holy Spirit is God"; yet there are not "three gods," nor "three persons" in God, but ONE GODHEAD, manifesting itself visibly through the flesh, and INVISIBLY by the regeneration of men to constitute them a new creation.

All attempts to explain the how, or to satisfy an unsanctified curiosity as to the manner of the existence of the GODHEAD in its unity and manifestations, are peurile, bewildering, pernicious and, if pressed with tenacity, ruinous to peace of mind, to faith and to the hope of life eternal.

These different aspects of the GODHEAD are not matters for speculation, but enter into the experience of every regenerate man from the day the work of his regeneration begins by a union with the Christ. Disputation on the subject is as absurd as to be disputing about the eternity and self-existence of God. No man can explain either or demonstrate how these things can be. The facts are there, and that is all which it is necessary for us to know in our present state. If men will spend their time and talents in disputing about these matters, they must "suffer loss" in the end, though "they themselves may be saved, yet so as by fire."—1 Cor. iii. 11-15.

Suggestions on the subject may be harmless and possibly profitable; but when they degenerate into disputes and a positive spirit, dividing Christians into hostile sects and parties, it presents a sad spectacle of a degenerate system of religion and a departure from primitive Christianity, the sum of which is, "GOD IS LOVE."
GEORGE STORRS.

THE PRAYER OF JESUS—JOHN XVII.

THERE are many things in that wonderful prayer for our reflection. One point, however, will occupy attention at this time, that is, verse 21: "That they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us; that the world may believe that thou hast sent me."

Two things here call for special notice, viz.
1. That believers in Jesus all "may be one"; and, 2. The end to be accomplished by that union.

1. That "all may be one" who believe in Jesus. Has this prayer been answered in the present age or dispensation? It certainly seems that it has not; indeed, may it not truly be said, there is no evidence of such a union of the nominal church? at least since the days of the apostles, and then only for a short time; for there were serious divisions even in their days. What must we then conclude? Shall we say, that prayer will never be answered? Nay, verily; for Jesus said to his Father, "I knew that thou heardest me always."—John xi. 42. His prayer, therefore, for the oneness of believers of this and the past ages must and will be answered. Is there any probability that it will be in the present dispensation? All appearances are against it; indeed, it might truly be said, it is impossible without there first being a resurrection of all believers who have fallen asleep. Till then, how can Jesus' prayer, that all believers in him shall be one as he and his Father are one, be answered?

My conclusion is, the prayer will only be answered when all true believers are raised from the dead and the living ones changed to immortality; then will they all "see eye to eye" (Isa. lii. 8), and "the body of Christ" be perfected, and no more divisions ever be known, but they all will "be one, as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee," and "they also be one in us;" a unity which can, seemingly, only be completed when the saints are glorified; and this view is confirmed by the language of Christ following, viz., "Father, I will that they also, whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am, that they may behold my glory, which thou hast given me."—Verse 24.

The answer to the petition for all believers to be one, as Christ and his Father are one, it seems evident can only be realized when and at the time they are all with Christ and behold his glory; which is not in this age, but in those to come. Then, and not till then, can such a glorious result as the oneness prayed for be realized. This leads us to the inquiry relating to the result of such oneness, viz.:

"That the world may believe that thou hast sent me." This corresponds with Paul's statement in Eph. ii. 7, concerning God's purpose in raising up believers in this age, "that in the ages to come he might show the exceeding riches of his grace in his kindness toward us through Christ Jesus." Thus will the prayer of Jesus (John xvii.) find a full and perfect answer. By the manifestation of a people, once "dead in trespasses and sins," now made one, as Christ and his Father are one, redeemed from sin and death by Christ, and then with him in glory, "The world" (the mass of men) will "believe that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world."—1 John iv. 14. In those "ages to come" we shall see the Saviour's prayer (John xvii.) was not that unmeaning thing which many now seem to think. We now may see why, at verse 9, he said, "I pray not for the world, but for them which thou hast given me". . . "out of the world"—verse 6. The perfecting by discipline now, and oneness in glorification with himself, was the first object of his prayer. Till that was accomplished the ultimate object, viz., "That the world may believe that thou hast sent me," could not be accomplished, according to the order the Father established, viz., to bless the race—the mass—by a seed, of which Christ was to be the first and Head; all of whom were first to be tried as in a fire and then glorified together; being all made one in Christ and his Father, "I in them, and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one." The Head and body, all united, made immortal, together manifesting the wondrous grace of God in raising up, from even the "chief of sinners" (1 Tim. i. 15), a glorious "first-fruits of his creatures" (James i. 18); thus "in the ages to come" showing "the exceeding riches of his grace in his kindness toward us through Christ Jesus," and leading the world (the masses) to believe in Jesus as a real "Saviour of the world," deep as they have been steeped in sin. Then will "the unsearchable riches of Christ" be so unfolded that we shall understand what Paul meant when he said, "Unto him (God) be glory in the church by Christ Jesus throughout the endless succession of ages" (Eph. iii. 21)—MacKnight's translation: or, "unto all generations of the age of the ages," is the literal translation of the Greek; which is, "Eis pasas tas geneas tou aionos ton aionon." Thus the fact is established by apostolic authority that there are to be generations in the future; and to them will be manifested the "glory of God in the church," showing "the exceeding riches of God's grace in his kindness toward us" (who have been gathered "through Christ Jesus" in the previous ages), to "the ages to come."—Eph. iii. 7.

We have had enough, and more than enough, of the narrow, contracted views of "the riches of God's grace," and his glorious designs in relation to his work of the redemption of the human race. Let the blasphemy of his character and government over the creatures he has made cease: and I add the apostolic "Amen."—Eph. iii. 21. For the Lord is good: his mercy is everlasting; and his truth endureth to all generations."—Psa. c. 5. "With my mouth will I make known thy faithfulness to all generations"—lxxxix. 1. Again I say, Amen and Amen.

AN APOLOGY.

"WHO are the kings of the East?" In reply to this question last month I said: "All of us will have to wait till they are manifested," etc. I might have expressed an opinion; but that would probably have been of little value to any one. On reflection I have thought I would venture to express it. It seems to turn on the force of the term "East." The Greek term, there used, is anatolon. The first definition of the term is, "day-spring, dawn"; next is, "sun-rising." These indicate the coming of day. The text, then, may be read, "The kings of the morning," or "coming day." Then the inquiry might arise, What day? The answer might be, The day of the Lord. "The Sun of righteousness shall arise."—Malachi iv. 2. That opens the day of the Lord. The kings of that day are the Lord Jesus Christ and his saints. But the way is to be "prepared" by the "drying up" of the power that has so long trodden under foot Jerusalem and David's throne, which was on Mount Zion, where God says he will set up his king.—Psa. ii. 6. From there "the law shall go forth, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem."—Micah iv. 2. That land, then, is to be cleared of whatever power may have it in possession at the time the day of the Lord dawns and "the kings of the sun-rising," or morning of that day, are about to reign with "the Lord of hosts in Mount Zion and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously."—Isa. xxiv. 23.

If the drying up of the waters of the Euphrates signifies the destruction of the power which has so long trodden down Jerusalem, then the Ottoman or Turkish rule there is to come to an end for the purpose of having the way of the kings of the day of the Lord to enter upon the rule of the kingdoms of this world, and to send the law of universal government from Jerusalem to all nations and people, so that they "shall serve and obey" the kings of the "sun-rising": the kings of God's appointment, with Jesus Christ at their head as "Lord of all."

If these thoughts are of any service to those looking for "the kingdoms of this world" to "become the kingdom of our Lord and his Christ," they are at your service; but I shall not dispute the point with any one. Ed.

DEATH'S DOINGS.

ONE of the brightest and best of men of this age has fallen: Our beloved Henry Dunn, of England, has "gone the way of all flesh." This intelligence is brought by The Rainbow for April, and noticed by its editor in the following manner:

"DEATH OF HENRY DUNN, Esq.—The readers of this magazine have often had the privilege of perusing papers written by Mr. Henry Dunn—one of the clearest-headed men we ever knew, and a pioneer in the great doctrinal reformation which is at present engaging the thoughts of Christians everywhere. This devout and very thoughtful man fell asleep on the 16th of March, in his 78th year. For many years Secretary to the British and Foreign School Society, and the animating spirit of that great institution, the cause of popular education owes him much. His ecclesiastical and biblical works are remarkable for independent thought and careful examination of Scripture. He was in no sense of the word a party man, but he recognized and loved individual Christians wherever he found them. His generous hand was ever open to do good, but he looked with high-minded contempt on that charity which must have its gifts proclaimed in newspapers. A great and good man has gone to sleep until the Lord comes. Another of our friends has left us. We commend his excellent widow in her grief to the loving care of our Father in heaven."

REMARKS BY EDITOR OF "BIBLE EXAMINER."

These words of Dr. Leask put to shame the attempts of some Americans to defame Mr. Dunn and his views. Though I arrived at my present theological views without any aid from him or any thought of him, I have been greatly helped and strengthened by his writings since that time; and though I have differed with him on several points, and still differ from his views on some things, yet there are but few I so highly esteemed and admired for his Christian spirit and charity. The last letter I received from him (near a year since) he sent $25 to help the EXAMINER and $75 to help Bro. Blain, but strictly forbade our giving any publicity to his generous donation; but now that he sleeps I feel at liberty to mention it, to show the kindness of his heart. I sincerely thank Dr. Leask for his testimony concerning our departed brother.

THE CONTRAST OF THE AGES.

EVERY attentive reader of the Bible must have noticed that the characteristics of the present age are wholly different from those of the age to come. It would be a pleasure to write at length on this inviting subject, but it is not necessary. The mere mention of the fact will spur the reader's memory in search of many a passage where the "now" and "then" of mankind are set in vivid contrast by the inspired writers. And we may preface the few remarks that follow with an argument which should have weight with intelligent men. It is simply this:—If the writers of the Bible have described the present æon so exactly, dwelling upon its painful experiences with a graphic minuteness which every one feels to be correct, surely the descriptions they give of the æon after the return of Christ deserve our grateful confidence. If they have spoken to our hearts and minds about the time that now is with perfect correctness, as every one must admit, let us gladly accept their glowing pictures of the time that is to be as evidence of our Father's determination that his children shall not always be in storm and darkness, but that calm and sunshine await them at the coming of their Lord.

For, be it remembered as essential to the validity of this argument, the writers under notice do not merely admit the fact of painful experiences; it requires no inspiration to do that; but they give the divine reason why men are subjected to these trials, a thing they could not have done without the authority of God. It follows, therefore, that their revelations of the future are absolutely true. The scenes they describe will be seen in all their exquisite beauty by eyes that will never become dull with headache or dim with age. The promises they make, under divine inspiration, will all be realized as facts in the actual experience of the sons of God in the life incorruptible. And their predictions of the hallowed joys of the royal family of heaven—the brethren and sisters of the Lord Jesus—will be fulfilled both as a necessity of the Father's faithfulness and as a fruit of his love.

It is simply impossible that the present dispensation closes the dealings of God with the world. Our profound regard for his character, even if we had no clear revelation on the subject, makes the contrary supposition an offence to the intellect and a burden to the heart. There must be an "age to come"—not in some fancy world of ghosts, concerning which the pulpit has talked nonsense for centuries, but—in this world, man's—Christ's—God's world, the material centre of the universe, upon and in relation to which the legislative and gracious acts of the supreme Ruler have all taken place. We must no longer be sent among "the infinities" to find a foothold, where foothold there is none, for the solution of theological perplexities; but must gladly accept the blessed fact that the future "habitable world" is here, beneath the sun that to-day passes over us in his circuit, and not "above the skies"; here, where our Lord was born, lived, taught, suffered, died; here, where his followers have borne their heavy burdens, and their brave testimony for his name's sake. The locality of the nobleman's kingdom is not in a far country, but in the land of his birth; and the righteous are to "inherit the earth," and to have "rest" when the Lord Jesus is revealed from heaven. Tears and tribulation, sorrow and affliction are things with which God's chosen ones are familiar; but the time comes when this glorious vision shall become a fact:

"And I saw the holy city, New Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband. And I heard a great voice out of the throne, saying, Behold the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, their God, and shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain; for the former things are passed away."

But there is an intermediate age between the present and that to which this apocalyptic scene belongs—an intermediate age, the beginning of which is probably very near; and it may help to shade our eyes from the brilliance of John's scenic paragraph if we look to that of Isaiah:

"And there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a branch shall grow out of his roots. And the Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the Lord; and shall make him of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord; and he shall not judge after the sight of his eyes, neither reprove after the hearing of his ears. But with righteousness shall he judge the poor, and reprove with equity for the meek of the earth. And he shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked; and righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins. The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them. And the cow and the bear shall feed; their young ones shall lie down together; and the lion shall eat straw like the ox; and the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice' den: they shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain; for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea."

The wondrous beauty of this passage has arrested the attention even of the most prosaic reader, and to those who can appreciate the lofty flight of inspired song it is a gem of rarest lustre. The prophet-bard was on eagle wing when he dared thus to speak of things which, so far as time is concerned, were many centuries in the distance, and which, so far as the facts are concerned, are contrary to all human experience. But we have to do here with the supernatural, and that is a sufficient answer to every argument drawn from the natural habits of the wolf, the leopard, the lion, and the asp. When God interferences, difficulties vanish; and every one must at least admit the splendor of the conception that when the disloyalty of man to God comes to an end; the disloyalty of beast and reptile to man shall also cease. But this is precisely what our poet sings. When the earth is full of the knowledge of the Lord, the shepherd need not fold his flock for fear of the wolf, and the mother need not apprehend danger to her child, though it put its little hand into an adder's nest. Beautiful prophecy! Happy times when it shall be fulfilled!

But stop! We must look straight in the face of a thought that visits us here. Have we not all made a mistake regarding the men who shall live in those happy, peaceful, prosperous millennial days? Our troubles in this age annoy us greatly; we are no sooner out of one grief than we are plunged headlong into another; and each succeeding affliction has peculiarities which make it look worse than all its predecessors. And so we think that the dwellers beneath the light of the New Jerusalem—the star of the King, of which the star seen by the orient sages was the type—must be highly privileged persons. And so indeed they will be—privileged almost beyond what our imaginations can realize; men with hardly anything to trouble them, enjoying a perpetual holiday under the blessed government of the ever blessed King. No war, pestilence, or famine; no destructive tempests, earthquakes, "tidal waves," furious elemental battles mingling earth and sky, and caring no more for human life than a whirlwind does for a straw. A fruitful earth, a smiling heaven, a healthy, long-lived people—all the wretched features of our present fight with poverty, filth, disease, vice, crime, death and the devil seeming to the men of those halcyon years an incredible myth of the olden time, or, at least, an exaggerated account of the mismanagement and misgovernment of their very stupid ancestors.

Yes, you say, would that our lot had been cast in the millennium, and not in this age of distressing conflict with every kind of evil! We die daily, and life is often a burden almost too heavy to bear. Our faith is so severely tested at times that we are driven to the verge of despair, and tempted to think that we cannot be Christians at all, and that God does not really care for us.

Well, now, had our birth—yours and mine, brother—been postponed until the millennium, it would have been a very comfortable thing for us, certainly! But are you quite sure that your wish is a wise one? May there not be an unsuspected current of selfishness running through it, which blinds you to the privileges of the present age? Recollect that God is making his heroes now; that the battle-field is the school in which he is training his mighty men of the future; that tribulation is the avenue to the kingdom; and that fidelity to the absent King will get the prize when he returns. The grandest promises of reward and honor are to him who overcometh; but what will the men of the millennial world have to overcome? That they will be good and loyal and righteous we have no doubt; but we really do not see that they deserve very fervent thanks for these virtues when everything goes smoothly with them, and when the devil, shut up in prison, will not have it in his power to tempt them. But loyalty amidst fierce opposition, godliness in the midst of the ungodly, and unwavering confidence in God, while the fell assaults of the malignant adversary are beating against the heart of the believer, are very different things. It is the men who come out of great tribulation whose white robes attract the attention of the universe. It is the victors who fought the battles of the Lord in his absence who are to shine as the sun in the kingdom of their Father.

The contrast of the ages is a text for a volume. We merely suggest it for the meditation and consolation of the true followers of Christ. The old serpent is full of malice against them, because of their friendship with his destined Destroyer, and they must not be taken by surprise if he sometimes plunges them into deep grief. His time is coming, and so is theirs—his for everlasting destruction, theirs for eternal joy!—DR. LEASK, Editor of the Rainbow.

FROM ELDER JACOB BLAIN.

BROTHER STORRS: As some friends write to inquire if I am living, I wish to say, through the EXAMINER, that the Lord in mercy has preserved me through the past winter, the season so trying to aged persons. I have recovered from the injury I received by being knocked down by a horse in the winter; and though my strength gradually declines, my general health being tolerably good, I yet hope to see some good days before I "sleep." Though signs of our Lord's return continue to appear, I can hardly hope to live to see it till the "trump of God sounds" to awake me. But thanks to his name for faith to say, cheerfully, "Thy will be done." The main-spring of my comfort is still in learning what Christ is to do when he comes, and not the time of his coming. He is sure to come, and eternity will be long enough for the glory Paul hoped for. I may not be able to write much more for our Magazine, but can answer letters, and hope old and loved brethren will not forget me. I am cheered by seeing some of their letters and articles in the EXAMINER.

I am more and more cheered by the hard battle lately waged against "endless misery"; but am sorry to see all the writers in a mist, or see "men as trees walking," on some points. For instance: no one, as I have seen, says a word about the devil—What is to be done with him? As they leave him, as it were, out in the dark, perhaps they begin to doubt his very existence. Another quite important matter seems to be left dark, viz., Where are the unconverted, to be chastised, or "receive according to the deeds done in the body"—after the resurrection? They tell of no "purgatory," and rightly reject the theological hell; and I suppose they do not believe in "Milton's War" being in our real heaven. Prov. xi. 31. may yet give them more light on this subject: "Behold, the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth; much more the wicked and the sinner." But as we all have had to change our views of truth by a step at a time, let us wait patiently for greater developments, and bless God for moving so many of late to take so long a step in "growing in knowledge" in a right direction.

A PRAYER.

OUR Father, let thy kingdom come,
Let the whole earth thy glory see,
When all the saints are gathered home,
And clothed with immortality;

When all, of every grade and name,
Who lived and died in ages past,
And never heard of Jesus' name,
Shall hear that blessed truth at last;

When Christ and His perfected Bride
Shall rule the earth from shore to shore,
Darkness and error shall subside,
Sorrow and weeping be no more.

Soon will be changed this mortal form,
Soon we shall our Redeemer see;
All who by faith have overcome
Will be from bonds of flesh set free.

Then, with his preserver ever blest,
We'll sing in loud, exalted strains
(When we have gained the promised rest),
O'er all the earth King Jesus reigns.

Elyria, O.

AVIS—

ESCHATOLOGY.

PRELIMINARY.

IT is no uncommon thing in the present day to hear from experienced Christians, and even from ministers of the Gospel of the highest standing, that they have never given much attention to the eschatological element in the Bible—that which relates to "the last things." The avowal is sometimes followed by the expression of an intention before long to consider the whole subject very carefully; but it is not unfrequently accompanied by an obvious distrust as to the possibility of arriving at any satisfactory result.

Two reasons for the prevalence of this state of mind, and of a consequent unwillingness to study what is written regarding the future, may be named. The first is that a feeling of something like disgust has been occasioned by the weakness and absurdity that has so often been manifested by good men when attempting to expound unfulfilled prophecy. The second is the growth in modern days of skepticism in regard to almost everything in Scripture that is commonly assumed to be predictive. Hence, many hold that the Apocalypse refers chiefly, if not exclusively, to events that found their fulfillment in the ruin of Jerusalem and the dispersion of the Israelitish people; while not a few thoughtful students of Scripture maintain that the Hebrew prophets ought rather to be regarded as preachers of righteousness than as seers privileged to tell us what shall be in the latter day.

As predicters, it is said they are not of much value, at least to us. What refers to the coming of Messiah, however obscure it may be, is still received and regarded as all-important, especially in controversy with the Jew; but what is written regarding the future restoration of nations and the glories of the latter day has come to be considered as too dark to be of much practical service. These portions are therefore commonly interpreted in a vague and general way, as pointing to the triumphs of truth under the Christian dispensation.

It is obvious enough that so long as this doubt exists, confidence as to what is recorded in Scripture relating to the future, whether near or distant, is out of the question. So long as it continues some will, as heretofore, deny the value of all prediction in the Bible; while others, recognizing a kind of inspiration in the sacred writers, will say that their views regarding things to come, while honestly entertained, were bounded by their subjectivity and circumstances; that the forms of conflict with evil to which they refer are only such as recur from time to time in the history of the world and of the Church; that those who seek to gather from the prophets anything like a clue to what may be expected in our own or in coming days "have wholly mistaken the science of exegesis, and have yet to learn its first and constituent elements." Against all such notions the author of the following remarks most earnestly protests.—Editor of the "Following after Truth."

THE LAST DAYS.

"In the last days," says the Apostle Peter, shall come "scoffers walking after their own lusts, and saying, Where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation." St. Paul, speaking of the same period, says, "Perilous times shall come"—times in which a chief characteristic of the day will be lawlessness, lust of money and pleasure, boastfulness and untruthfulness; men generally "having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof."

The first question which arises in one's mind after reading these things is, "What are we to understand by the last days?" In his First Epistle to the Thessalonians, St. Paul certainly writes as if he expected the immediate return of the Lord and the closing of the dispensation. Not, indeed, that he even then professed to know anything by inspiration as to the period of the Second Advent, for he immediately adds, "But of the times and the seasons, brethren, ye have no need that I write unto you, for you yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night."

Peter, who in his first epistle had written, "The end of all things is at hand," in a second letter warns those whom he had addressed that before the final day "scoffers" would arise, denying the return of the Lord altogether; bids them remember that one day was with the Lord "as a thousand years," and that whenever the event took place it would be unlooked for. It seems plain, then, that neither Paul nor Peter intended what they had written regarding "the last days" to apply to a time then passing, but rather to the end of the dispensation, let that end come when it might.

A second question then presents itself, which is this: "Have we any, and if any, what reason to suppose that the generation now entering upon existence is likely to live in, or, at all events, approach very near that period which is denominated in Scripture "the last days?" Is there, or is there not, anything so peculiar in the character of our own times—anything so distinct from other periods of the world's history, as to warrant the expectation that in the day now passing, or in that which is about to approach, we shall discern features corresponding to those which have been depicted beforehand for our warning in the apostolic epistles?

The most discernible of these are, first, the denial of a Second Advent at all—by which is meant the denial that Christ will ever again come to earth in human form; the denial, in short, that the great laws by which God governs the world are, under any circumstances, ever interfered with by him who ordained them. The second is, that all the different forms of wickedness described designate the habitual conduct of men who have, nevertheless, "a form of godliness," and a third may, perhaps, be found in that all-prevailing restlessness which characterizes our time.

That the present is a "day of preparation," a prelude to some great change in the history of the world, seems now to be universally admitted. Every one who thinks at all looks forward to something like a revolution in the aspect of affairs before long, which will affect our modes of thought as well as our course of action. But the expectations of men in relation thereto differ widely.

"The silent juncture of eras," it has been truly said, "is a conjunction which necessarily calls forth hope on the one hand and dejection on the other." Reasons for either state of mind may easily be found, for the crisis is one which no man is competent to direct, and the termination of which no man is able to predict.

What, then, should be our attitude of mind? Not one of despondency, certainly, for "the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth," and all things shall eventually be subjected to his Christ. Change may be perilous, and must be uncertain; but slumber is infinitely more dangerous. Let us then trust and ponder. The enemy of God and goodness may, to human eyes, be gathering fresh strength, but if it be so, it will only be the sure forerunner of that great manifestation of the Head of the Church which, long promised, is destined to issue in the overthrow of all evil.—Sunday Morning.

THE RESURRECTION.

Of the nature of the resurrection little is revealed; of its results much. Two or three passages may be noted.

(1) Luke xiv. 14—"Thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just"—for feeding "the poor, the maimed, the lame and the blind."

Here future reward for kindness shown to the needy on earth is distinctly recognized. The promise, be it observed, is made, not to the disciples, but to one of the Pharisees that bade Jesus to a feast. May it not, then, fairly be asked whether such a passage does not seem naturally to refer to a dispensation of rewards and punishments to be entered upon at the resurrection, differing, both in kind and in degree, from the blessedness which awaits the elect?

(2) John v. 28, 29—"The hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice and shall come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of condemnation."

Here the retributive character of the world (or age) to come is again clearly stated, although in this case it is rather with reference to the general course and character of the life than to any particular act.

(3) Matt. xii. 32—"It shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, neither in the world to come."

This text is properly regarded as, in itself conclusive against universalism. Be it so; but is it not then equally conclusive in favor of the supposition that some sins, not forgiven in this world, will be forgiven in the world to come? Dean Alford says: "No sure inference can be drawn from these words with regard to forgiveness of sins in a future state." We admit this, for all inferences deduced from Scripture, however necessary they may seem to us, introduce a human element, and should therefore never be placed side by side with a Divine statement. Olshausen understands the passage (as many others have done) to imply forgiveness on repentance in the imperfect state of the dead before the judgment.

(4) Matt. xix. 28-30 (compared with Luke xxii. 28-30.)—"Ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel."

This text is commonly expounded as referring to "a renewing work of grace." The apostles, it is said, "entered, while on earth, upon the royalty referred to in their own persons, and continue it in their writings." If this be not rationalistic interpretation, it is hard to say what is.

After the actual resurrection of the Redeemer this great event is always regarded as inseparable from the work of the Lord Jesus. The vexation of the Jews at the apostles is not that the mere fact of the resurrection is taught, but that they preached through Jesus the resurrection from the dead. "With great power," we are told, "gave the apostles witness of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus: and great grace was upon them all."

This topic, it is evident, occupied a very prominent place in the ministrations of St. Paul. To the heathen his message seems to have been very much summed up in this: "He preached unto them Jesus and the resurrection." It was when they heard "of the resurrection of the dead" that "some mocked," and others pondered.

In relation to the Jews we imagine that the apostles' teaching often took a similar shape. On any other supposition it seems difficult to see how Paul could say, when before the council, "Of the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question"; for he was certainly not accused of preaching the resurrection as any other Pharisee would have done.

Before Agrippa he puts the matter somewhat differently, but still involving the same thought: "I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers: unto which promise our twelve tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come. For which hope's sake, king Agrippa, I am accused of the Jews. Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead?"

The resurrection from the dead, and the happy consummation of the hopes and prayers of the twelve tribes, day and night, are here regarded as one event. The triumphs of Messiah, the fulfillment of all the promises to Abraham and the glorious prospects held out in the prophets are one and all linked to the resurrection from the dead.

In later days difficulties of another class presented themselves. They are embodied in the skeptical inquiry of the Corinthians relative to the possibility of such an event.

"With what body do they come?" What is this but the question so often put now in forms like these—How is it possible so to unite the present world and the next as to consider the latter in any sense the complement of the former? The body will have dissolved in the grave. With it will have disappeared all the countless influences it exercised over the spirit. How is it possible so to bridge the great gulf which separates time from eternity, that anything corresponding to this life can be carried on in another world? With what body do they come? Discipline, and therefore probation, must terminate on earth, for the natural body and the spiritual body can have little or nothing in common."

To all which Paul replies, "Thou fool, didst thou never sow wheat and reap wheat? Is the wheat thou didst reap so different from the wheat thou didst sow? Is it not rather, in spite of the primal decay, though not the same, yet the very same wheat? So will it be at the resurrection."

To the inquiry, "With what body do they come?" St. Paul gives an answer, a portion of which seems, to a great extent, hitherto to have escaped notice. He says, in fact, that at the resurrection bodies will differ—"to every seed his own body." As "all flesh is not the same flesh," so all bodies in the future world will not be alike. Just as the sun, moon and stars differ in glory, and one star differeth from another, so in that world will it be at the resurrection from the dead. We shall all die or be "changed." But the dead in Christ will be raised incorruptible, and the mortal put on immortality; for of their bodies only can it be said, they are "sown in dishonor," but "raised in glory."—"The Destiny of the Race."

THE HOPE OF ISRAEL.

The prophet Ezekiel, describing the time when the Lord will make with his people (the Jews) "a covenant of peace"; when "the earth shall yield her increase"; and when "none shall make them afraid," says: Then shall "my servant David feed them"; be "their shepherd," and be "a prince among them"—prophecies which must certainly have seemed to the people to whom they were delivered to imply another dispensation; for David at this time had been numbered among the dead for upward of four hundred years.

The prophecy is repeated in a later chapter, where David, then slumbering in the grave, is again spoken of as "king over them," "their prince forever"; and this "when they shall be no more divided into two kingdoms," but shall dwell "in the land wherein their fathers dwelt"—the land "given unto Jacob." The interpreter who regards the "David" of this promise as Christ can scarcely fail of being open to the imputation of reducing the universal government of Messiah to that of a Jewish prince—a dilemma from which he only escapes by understanding the Jews to be put for "the faithful in Christ; by asserting that the territory there spoken of is no longer Canaan, but the whole earth"; and that only when the world becomes the Redeemer's actual possession can the prophecies respecting him as the New Testament David reach their destined accomplishment.

Fairbairn and others distinctly assert that in the Old Testament David is frequently put for Christ, but it is not the fact. All the passages they quote in support of so strange a statement obviously refer to David himself reigning, after the resurrection, over the Jewish people.

The prophets, one and all, in speaking of the fulfillment of the promises made to Israel, say, "My servant David" shall "feed" them; while Christ is as invariably spoken of in the New Testament as "the Son" of David—of "the seed" of David—of "the root" of David, and as having "the key" of David. Nowhere, either in the Old or New Testament, is the name of David put for Christ.

The vision of the dry bones in the thirty-seventh chapter next presents itself. The question put to the prophet is, "Can these dry bones live?" He is instructed that they can, for the valley now stirs with new life; bones come together, "bone to his bone"; the "sinews and the flesh" gather around them; the "skin covers them above"; they live and "stand up upon their feet an exceeding great army." These bones, the prophet is distinctly informed, are "the whole house of Israel"; and he is commanded to say to the people, "Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, O my people, I will open your graves, and cause you to come up out of your graves, and bring you into the land of Israel. And ye shall know that I am the Lord when I have opened your graves, O my people, and brought you up out of your graves, and shall put my spirit in you, and ye shall live, and I shall place you in your own land: then shall ye know that I, the Lord, have spoken it and performed it, saith the Lord."

This portion of Scripture is, we believe, usually expounded as referring primarily to the return of the Jews from Babylon; but in its widest sense to the latter days of this dispensation, when the Spirit of God shall give moral and spiritual life to dead sinners. On this method of interpretation we only wish to say that it is certainly not one which commends itself to common sense. A Bible thus interpreted ceases to be a revelation; it is transformed into an enigma.

But if the vision was intended to teach that generation (as we believe it was) that, in spite of all apparent discouragement, the word and promise of God would be kept unbroken—that the scenes then passing before the eyes of the Jewish people were not the termination of God's dealings with them—that there would be a resurrection of the dead, and that then the promises made to Abraham should be perfectly fulfilled—all is plain. Faith would hopefully look forward to the "continuing city," and trust would remain unshaken, however cloudy or dark might be the day of their trial.

Nor is this promise of restoration at the resurrection, as we have already seen, confined to the Jew. Egypt and Assyria, Moab and Edom, even "Sodom and her daughters," spoken of as less guilty than Jerusalem, are to "return to their former estate"—whatever that may mean. And this, too, is to take place at the time when God shall establish with Israel "an everlasting covenant;" when she shall remember her ways and be ashamed; when Sodom shall be given her for a daughter, but not by covenant; and when the Lord shall be "pacified" toward her "for all that she hath done."

Beyond accepting the general impression left by this difficult passage, that a time is to come when Sodom will hear the tidings of redeeming love, we do not venture to interpret. But it is impossible to avoid connecting it with the striking words of the Lord Jesus, recorded by Matthew—"It shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom in the day of judgment than for thee [Capernaum]; for if the mighty works which have been done in thee had been done in Sodom, it would have remained until this day."

Daniel, like the other prophets, clearly connects the deliverance of Israel with the resurrection; for he identifies it with the production of the "books," and with the time when "many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt;" adding, "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever;" while Hosea represents God as exclaiming, by his mouth, "O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself; but in Me is thine help. I will ransom thee from the power of the grave; I will redeem thee from death: O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave I will be thy destruction: repentance shall be hid from my eyes"—i. e., the promise shall be made good.

Amos, also, has a passage which, taken in connection with the exposition given of it by James, would seem to point to the resurrection as the time of "restoration." The prophet speaks of the day when God will "raise up the tabernacle of David that is fallen, and close up the breaches thereof;" when Israel shall "possess the remnant of Edom, and of all the heathen among whom the name of the Lord is called; when they shall be planted again in their own land, and shall no more be pulled up out of their land which God hath given them"; and James expounds it thus: God will first visit the Gentiles to take out of them a people for his name (an elect church), and after this will return and accomplish the promise, "that the residue of men may seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles, upon whom his name is called. Known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world."

It was the recollection of this hope, and of the promise made to Abraham, "that he should be the heir of the world," that sustained the apostle Paul when he reflected on the deplorable condition of his countrymen. It was the assurance that God had "not cast away his people," but that, after "the fulness of the Gentiles" was come in, "all Israel should be saved," that forced him to exclaim, "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!" And yet his salvation is not unconditional, without further probation, or without possibility of failure; for God will "graft them in again" only "if they abide not in unbelief."

That the nation regarded as such will, both during the millennium and after the resurrection, obtain preëminence over the other "saved nations," is probable, first, because Israel is the only nation that has ever been taken into covenant with God—a peculiarity which was not temporary, but permanent; and secondly, because the Jews are the only people that, as a nation, have ever recognised the earthly sovereignty of Messiah.

All truly Christian men hold, of course, that Christ is their King; that his claim to reign over them is a real and rightful claim; and that while the kingdoms of the world are already Christ's in fact, to the extent that individual believers are multiplied, they are so by right, in the largest and most comprehensive sense. But not a single Christian nation has retained the belief that it is the will of God ultimately to give "a human, perfect, universal monarch to direct and head the world in that contest against evil which they all know and own to be going on."

But it is otherwise with the Jews. They could not exist as a state without the clearest and most distinct recognition of a heavenly Ruler. The Messiah they wait for—amid whatever carnality and skepticism—is an earthly as well as a heavenly king, acting directly under the authority and sustained by the wisdom and strength of God. Hence they never expect the revival of their national life apart from their national supremacy.

The veil is indeed over their eyes, both as to the person and character of Messiah, the time of his appearance and the nature of his rule; but the root idea is a true one, viz., that he will be a perfect ruler on earth, and over men who will be submitted to his government.

It is, perhaps, not too much to affirm that if the God-man, Jesus of Nazareth, were now to be manifested as the Ruler of the world, the Jews would be more ready to receive him than any Christian people. And this simply because they are the only nation that as such has not lost the idea of a Divine-human King. For these reasons it is by no means improbable that they will be the first people nationally to turn to Christ.—Ibid.

THE PAPAL PRETENSIONS EXPOSED; OR, AN APPEAL TO SCRIPTURE, HISTORY AND FACTS.

By Bishop Strossmayer, of the Catholic Church, in the Vatican Council, at Rome, in 1870, when the proposition was under discussion to declare the "Papal Infallibility."

THIS speech is a translation of an Italian version of it, published at Florence under the title of "The Pope and the Gospel." Let it be read carefully. Such an exposé by an eminent bishop of their own Church, in the presence of the Pope and the gathering of the high dignitaries of the Roman Catholic Church, from all parts of the world, ought to be heeded by all men.

I am indebted to my friend, H. Brittain, of Birmingham, England, for a copy of it.—Ed.

THE PAPACY EXPOSED.

"VENERABLE FATHERS AND BRETHREN: It is not without trembling, yet with a conscience free and tranquil before God, who lives and sees me, that I open my mouth in the midst of you in this august assembly. From the time that I have been sitting here with you I have followed with attention the speeches that have been made in the hall, hoping, with great desire, that a ray of light, descending from on high, might enlighten the eyes of my understanding, and permit me to vote the canons of this Holy Œcumenical Council with perfect knowledge of the case. Penetrated with the feelings of responsibility, of which God will demand of me an account, I have set myself to study with the most serious attention the writings of the Old and New Testament, and I have asked these venerable monuments of truth to make known to me if the Holy Pontiff who presides here is truly the successor of St. Peter, Vicar of Jesus Christ, and the infallible Doctor of the Church. To resolve this grave question I have been obliged to ignore the present state of things, and to transport myself in mind, with the evangelical torch in my hand, to the days when there was neither Ultramontaniam nor Gallicanism, and in which the Church had for doctors St. Paul, St. Peter, St. James and St. John—doctors to whom no one can deny the divine authority without putting in doubt that which the Holy Bible, which is here before me, teaches us, and which the Council of Trent has proclaimed as the rule of faith and of morals. I have, then, opened these sacred pages. Well—shall I dare to say it? I have found nothing either near or far which sanctions the opinion of the Ultramontanes. And still more, to my very great surprise, I find no question in the apostolic days of a Pope, successor to St. Peter and Vicar of Jesus Christ, no more than of Mahomet, who did not then exist. You, Monsignor Manning, will say that I blaspheme; you, Monsignor Fie, that I am mad. No, Monsignor, I do not blaspheme, and I am not mad. Now, having read the whole New Testament, I declare before God, with my hand raised to that great crucifix, that I have found no trace of the Papacy as it exists at this moment.

“Do not refuse me your attention, my venerable brethren, and with your murmuring and interruptions do not justify those who say, like Father Hyacinthe, that this council is nothing, but that our votes have been from the beginning orderly (in precedenza imposti). If such were the case, this august assembly, on which the eyes of the whole world are turned, would fall into the most shameful discredit. If we wish to make it great, we must be free. I thank his Excellency, Monsignor Dupanloup, for the sign of approbation which he makes with his head; that gives me courage, and I go on.

“Reading, then, the sacred books with that attention with which the Lord has made me capable, I do not find one single chapter, or one little verse, in which Jesus Christ gives to St. Peter the mastery over the apostles, his fellow-workers. If Simon, son of Jonas, had been what we believe, his Holiness Pius IX. to be to-day, it is wonderful that he had not said to him, ‘When I have ascended to my Father, you should all obey Simon Peter as you obey me. I establish him my vicar upon earth.’

“Not only is Christ silent on this point, but so little does he think of giving a head to the Church that when he promises to his apostles, to rule the twelve tribes of Israel (Matt. xix. 28), he promises them twelve thrones, one for each, without saying that among these one shall be higher than the others—which shall belong to Peter. Certainly, if he had wished that it should be so, he would have said it. What do we conclude from this sentence? Logic tells us that Christ did not wish to make St. Peter the head of the apostolic college. When Christ sent the apostles to conquer the world, to all he gave the promise of the Holy Spirit. Permit me to repeat it. If he had wished to constitute Peter his Vicar he would have given him the chief command over his spiritual army. Christ—so says the Holy Scripture—forbade Peter and his colleagues to reign or to exercise lordship, or to have authority over the faithful like the kings of the Gentiles (St. Luke xxii. 25). If St. Peter had been elected Pope, Jesus would not have spoken thus, because, according to our tradition, the Papacy holds in its hands two swords, symbols of spiritual and temporal power. One thing had surprised me very much. Turning it over in my mind, I said to myself, if Peter had been elected Pope, would his colleagues have been permitted to send him with St. John to Samaria to announce the Gospel of the Son of God? What do you think, venerable brethren, if at this moment we permitted ourselves to send his Holiness Pius IX. and his Excellency Monsignor Plantier to the Patriarch of Constantinople to pledge him to put an end to the Eastern schism?

“But here is another still important fact? An Œcumenical Council is assembled at Jerusalem to decide on the questions which divide the faithful. Who would have called together this Council if St. Peter had been Pope? St. Peter. Who would have presided at it? St. Peter, or his legates. Who would have formed or promulgated the canons? St. Peter. Well! nothing of this occurred. The apostle assisted at the Council, as all the others did, and it was not he who summed up, but St. James; and when the decrees were promulgated it was in the name of the apostles, the elders and the brethren (Acts xv). Is it thus that we do in our Church?

The more I examine, O venerable brethren, the more I am convinced that in the Scriptures the son of Jonas does not appear to be first. Now, while we teach that the Church is built upon St. Peter, St. Paul, whose authority cannot be doubted, says in his Epistle to the Ephesians (ii. 20), it is built on the foundation of the apostles and prophets. Jesus Christ himself being the chief cornerstone. And the same apostle believes so little in the supremacy of St. Peter that he openly blames those who would say, We are of Paul, we are of Apollos (1 Corinthians i. 12), as those who say we are of Peter. If, therefore, this last apostle had been the Vicar of Christ, St. Paul would have taken great care not to censure so violently those who belonged to his own colleagues.

"The same apostle, counting up the offices of the Church, mentions apostles, prophets, evangelists, doctors and pastors. Is it to be believed, my venerable brethren, that St. Paul, the great apostle of the Gentiles, would have forgotten the first of these offices, the Papacy, if the Papacy had been of divine institution? The forgetfulness appeared to me to be as impossible as if an historian of this Council were not to mention one word of his Holiness Pius IX. [Several voices—Silence, heretic, silence!] Calm yourselves, my brethren, I have not yet finished. Forbidding me to go on, you show yourselves to the world to do wrong, and to shut the mouth of the smallest member of this assembly. I continue. The Apostle Paul makes no mention in any of his letters directed to the various Churches of the Papacy of Peter. If this Papacy had existed—if, in one word, the Church had in its body a supreme head, infallible in teaching, would the great apostle of the Gentiles have forgotten to mention it? What do I say? He would have written a long letter on this all-important subject. Then, when, as he has actually done, and the edifice of the Christian doctrine is erected, would the foundation, the key of the arch be forgotten? Now, unless you hold that the Church of the apostles was heretical, which none of us would either desire or dare to say, we are obliged to confess that the Church has never been more beautiful, more pure or more holy than in the days when there was no Pope. [Cries of 'It is not true, it is not true.'] Let not Monsignor di Laval say 'No.' Since, if any of you, my venerable brethren, should dare to think that the Church which has to-day a Pope for its head is more in the faith, more pure in its morals than the Apostolic Church, let him say it openly in the face of the universe, since this enclosure is the centre from which our words fly from pole to pole.

"I go on. Neither in the writings of St. Paul, St. John nor St. James have I found a trace or germ of the Papal power. St. Luke, the historian of the missionary labors of the apostles, is silent on this all-important point. The silence of these holy men, whose writings make part of the canon of the divinely-inspired Scriptures, has appeared to me burdensome and impossible if Peter had been Pope, and as unjustifiable as if Thiers, writing the history of Napoleon Bonaparte, had omitted the title of Emperor. I see here before me a member of the Assembly, who says, pointing at me with his finger, 'There is a schismatic bishop who has got among us under false colors.' No, no, my venerable brethren; I have not entered this august assembly as a thief, by the window, but by the door like yourselves. My title of bishop gave me the right to it, as my Christian conscience forces me to speak and to say that which I believe to be true.

"That which has surprised me most, and which, moreover, is capable of demonstration, is the silence of St. Peter. If the apostle had been what we proclaim him to be—that is, the Vicar of Jesus Christ on earth—he surely would have known it; if he had known it, how is it that not once did he act as Pope? He might have done it on the day of Pentecost, when he pronounced his first sermon, and did not do it; neither in the two letters directed to the Church. Can you imagine such a Pope, my venerable brethren, if St. Peter had been a Pope? If you wish to maintain that he was the Pope, the natural consequence arises that you must maintain that he was ignorant of the fact. Now, I ask whoever has a head to think and a mind to reflect, are these two suppositions possible?

"To return. I say, while the apostles lived, the Church never thought that there could be a Pope; to maintain the contrary, all the sacred writings must have been thrown to the flames or entirely ignored. But I hear it said on all sides, Was not St. Peter at Rome? Was he not crucified with his head down? Are the seats on which he taught, and the altars at which he said the Mass, not in this eternal city? St. Peter having been at Rome, my venerable brethren, rests only on tradition; but, if he had been Bishop of Rome, how can you from that Episcopacy prove his supremacy? Scaligero, one of the most learned of men, has not hesitated to say that St. Peter's Episcopate and residence at Rome ought to be classed with ridiculous legends. [Repeated cries, 'Shut his mouth, shut his mouth; make him come down from the pulpit.']

"Venerable brethren, I am ready to be silent; but is it not better, in an assembly like ours, to prove all things, as the apostle commands, and to believe what is good? But, my venerable friends, we have a Dictator, before whom we must prostrate ourselves and be silent—even his Holiness Pius IX.—and bow our heads; that Dictator is history. This is not like a legend, which can be made as the potter makes his clay, but like a diamond which cuts on the glass, which cannot be cancelled. Till now I have only leant on her; and if I found no trace of the Papacy in the apostolic days, the fault is hers, not mine. Do you wish to put me in the position of one accused of falsehood? You may do it, if you can. I hear from the right these words—'Thou art Peter, and on this rock I will build My Church' (Matt. xxi). I will answer this objection presently, my venerable brethren; but, before doing so, I wish to present you with the result of my historical researches.

"Finding no trace of the Papacy in the days of the apostles, I said to myself, I shall find what I am in search of in the annals of the Church. Well, I say it frankly—I have sought for a Pope in the first four centuries, and I have not found him. None of you, I hope, will doubt the great authority of the holy Bishop of Hippo, the great and blessed St. Augustine. This pious doctor, the honor and glory of the Catholic Church, was secretary in the Council of Melvie. In the decrees of this venerable assembly are to be found these significant words—'Whoever wills to appeal to those beyond the sea shall not be received by any one in Africa to the Communion.' The Bishops of Africa acknowledged the Bishop of Rome so little that they smote with excommunication those who would have recourse to an appeal. These same bishops in the Sixth Council of Carthage, held under Aurelius, Bishop of that city, wrote to Celustinus, Bishop of Rome, to warn him not to receive appeals from the bishops, priests or clerics of Africa; and that he should send no more legates or commissaries; and that he should not introduce human pride into the Church.

"That the Patriarch of Rome had, from the earliest times, tried to draw to himself all the authority, is an evident fact; but it is an equally evident fact that he had not the supremacy which the Ultramontanes attribute to him. Had he possessed it, would the Bishops of Africa—St. Augustine first among them—have dared to prohibit the appeals of their decrees to his supreme tribunal? I confess, without difficulty, that the Patriarch of Rome held the first place. One of Justinian's laws says—'Let us order, after the definition of the Four Councils, that the holy Pope of ancient Rome shall be the first of the Bishops, and that the Most High Archbishop of Constantinople, which is the new Rome, shall be the second.' 'Bow down then to the supremacy of the Pope,' you will say to me. Do not run so fast to this conclusion, my venerable brethren, inasmuch as the law of Justinian has written on the face of it, 'Of the order of the Patriarchal Sees.' Precedence is one thing—the power of jurisdiction is another. For example, supposing that in Florence there was an assembly of all the Bishops of the kingdom, the precedence would be given to the Primate of Florence, as among the Easterns it would be accorded to the Patriarch of Constantinople, and in England to the Archbishop of Canterbury. But neither the first, nor the second, nor the third could deduce from the position assigned to him a jurisdiction over his colleagues. The importance of the Bishops of Rome proceeded not from a divine power, but from the importance of the city in which they had their seat. Monsignor Darboy is not superior in dignity to the Archbishop of Avignon; but, in spite of that, Paris gives him a consideration which he would not have if, instead of having his palace on the banks of the Seine, he had it on that of the Rhone. That which is true in the religious order is the same in civil and political matters: the Prefect of Rome is not more a Prefect than he of Pisa; but civilly and politically he has a greater importance.

"I have said that from the very first centuries the Patriarch of Rome aspired to the universal government of the Church. Unfortunately, he very nearly reached it; but he had not succeeded assuredly in his pretensions, for the Emperor Theodosius II. made a law by which he established that the Patriarch of Constantinople should have the same authority as he of Rome.—(Leg. cod. de sacr., &c.)

"The Fathers of the Council of Chalcedon put the Bishops of the new and the old Rome in the same order on all things, even ecclesiastical—(Can. 28). The sixth Council of Carthage forbade all the Bishops to take the title of Prince of the Bishops or Sovereign Bishop. As for this title of Universal Bishop, which the Popes took later, St. Gregory I., believing that his successors would never think of adorning themselves with it, wrote these remarkable words: 'None of my predecessors have consented to take this profane name; for when a Patriarch gives himself the name of Universal the title of Patriarch suffers discredit. Far be it, then, from Christians to desire to give themselves a title which brings discredit on their brethren.' The words of St. Gregory are directed to his colleagues of Constantinople, who pretended to the Primacy of the Church. Pope Pelagio II. calls John, Bishop of Constantinople, who aspired to the High Priesthood, 'impious and profane.' 'Do not care,' he said, 'for the title of Universal, which John has usurped illegally; let none of the Patriarchs take this profane name; for what misfortunes may we not expect if among the priests such elements arise? They would get what has been foretold for them—He is the King of the sons of pride.'—(Pelagio II., Lett. 13).

"These authorities, and I might add a hundred more of equal value, do they not prove, with a clearness equal to the splendor of the sun at mid-day, that the first Bishops of Rome were not till much later recognized as universal Bishops and heads of the Church? And, on the other hand, who does not know that, from the year 325, in which the First Council of Nice was held, down to 580, the year of the Second Ecumenical Council of Constantinople, among more than 1,109 Bishops who assisted at the Six First General Councils there were not more than nineteen Western Bishops? Who does not know that the Councils were convoked by the Emperors without informing, and sometimes against the wish of, the Bishop of Rome?—that Hosius, Bishop of Cordova, presided at the First Council of Nice, and edited the canons of it? The same Hosius presided afterward at the Council of Sardica, excluding the legates of Julius, Bishop of Rome.

"I say no more, my venerable brethren, and I come now to speak of the great argument which you mentioned before—to establish the Primacy of the Bishop of Rome by the rock (petra). If this were true, the dispute would be at an end; but our forefathers—and they certainly knew something—did not think of it as we do. St. Cyril, in his fourth book of the Trinity, says: 'I believe that by the rock you must understand the unshaken faith of the apostles.' St. Hilary, Bishop of Poitiers, in his second book on the Trinity, says: 'The rock (petra) is the blessed and only rock of the faith confessed by the mouth of St. Peter'; and in the sixth book of the Trinity, he says: 'It is on this rock of the confession of faith that the Church is built.' 'God,' says St. Jerome, in the sixth book of St. Matthew, 'has founded his Church on this rock, and it is from this rock that the apostle Peter has been named.' After him, St. Chrysostom says, in his fifty-third homily on St. Matthew: 'On this rock I will build my Church—that is, on the faith of the confession.' Now, what was the confession of the apostle? Here it is: 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God.' Ambrose, the holy Archbishop of Milan (on the second chapter of the Ephesians), St. Basil, of Seleucia, and the Fathers of the Council of Chalcedon, teach exactly the same thing. Of all the doctors of Christian antiquity St. Augustine occupies one of the first places for knowledge and holiness. Listen, then, to what he writes in his second treatise on the first Epistle of St. John: 'What do the words mean—I will build my Church on this rock? On this faith, on that which said, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God.' In his 124th treatise on St. John, we find this most significant phrase: 'On this rock which thou hast confessed I will build my Church, since Christ was the rock.' The great Bishop believed so little that the Church was built on St. Peter that he said to his people, in his thirteenth sermon: 'Thou art Peter, and on this rock (petra) which thou hast confessed, on this rock which thou hast known, saying, Thou art Christ, the Son of the living God, I will build my Church above myself, who am the Son of the living God: I will build it on me, and not me on thee.' That which St. Augustine thought upon this celebrated passage was the opinion of all Christendom in his time.

"Therefore, to resume, I establish—1. That Jesus has given to his apostles the same power that he gave to St. Peter. 2. That the apostles never recognized in St. Peter the Vicar of Jesus Christ and the infallible doctor of the Church. 3. That St. Peter never thought of being Pope, and never acted as if he were Pope. 4. That the Councils of the first four centuries, while they recognized the high position which the Bishop of Rome occupied in the Church on account of Rome, only accorded to him a preëminence of honor—never of power or of jurisdiction. 5. That the holy fathers, in the famous passage, 'Thou art Peter, and on this rock I will build my Church,' never understood that the Church was built on Peter (super Petrum), but on the rock (super petram), that is, on the confession of the faith of the apostle. I conclude victoriously with history, with reason, with logic, with good sense, and with a Christian conscience, that Jesus Christ did not confer any supremacy on St. Peter, and that the Bishops of Rome did not become sovereigns of the Church, but only by confiscating, one by one, all the rights of the Episcopate. [Voices—'Silence, impudent Protestant! silence!']

"No, I am not an impudent Protestant! History is neither Catholic, nor Anglican, nor Calvinistic, nor Lutheran, nor Arminian, nor schismatic Greek, nor Ultramontane. She is what she is—that is, something stronger than all confessions of faith of the canons of the Œcumenical Councils. Write against it, if you dare! but you cannot destroy it, no more than taking a brick out of the Coliseum would make it fall. If I have said anything which history proves to be false, show it to me by history, and, without a moment's hesitation, I will make an honorable apology; but be patient, and you will see that I have not said all that I would or could; and even were the funeral pile waiting for me in the Place of St. Peter's I would not be silent, and I am obliged to go on. Monsignor Dupanloup, in his celebrated Observations on this Council of the Vatican, has said, and with reason, that if we declare Pius IX. infallible, we must necessarily, and from natural logic, be obliged to hold that all his predecessors were also infallible.

Well, then, venerable brethren, here history raises its voice with authority to assure us that some Popes have erred. You may protest against it or deny it, as you please, but I will prove it! Pope Victor first approved of Montanism, and then condemned it. Marcellinus was an idolater. He entered into the temple of Vesta and offered incense to the goddess. You will say that it was an act of weakness. I answer, a Vicar of Jesus Christ dies, but does not become an apostate. Liberius (358) consented to the condemnation of Athanasius, and made a profession of Arianism, that he might be recalled from his exile and reinstated in his see. Honorius (625) adhered to Monotheletism; Father Gratry has proved it to demonstration. Gregory I. (578-90) calls any one antichrist who takes the name of Universal Bishop, and contrariwise, Boniface III. (607-8) made the parricide Emperor Phocas confer that title upon him. Pascal II. (1088-99) and Eugenius III. (1145-53) authorized duelling; Julius II. (1509) and Pius IV. (1559) forbade it. Eugenius IV. (1431-39) approved of the Council of Basle and the restitution of the chalice to the Church of Bohemia. Pius II. (1458) revoked the concession. Hadrian II. (867-872) declared civil marriages to be valid; Pius VII. (1800-23) condemned them. Sixtus V. (1585-90) purchased an edition of the Bible, and by a Bull recommended it to be read. Pius VII. condemned the reading of it. Clement XIV. (1700-21) abolished the order of the Jesuits, permitted by Paul III., and Pius VII. re-established it.

"But why look for such remote proofs? Has not our Holy Father here present, in his Bull which gave the rules for this Council, in the event of his dying while it was sitting, revoked all that in past times may be contrary to it, even when that proceeds from the decisions of his predecessors? And certainly if Pius IX. has spoken ex cathedra, it is not when, from the depths of his sepulchre, he imposes his will on the sovereigns of the Church.

"I should never finish, my venerable brethren, if I were to put before your eyes the contradictions of the Popes in their teaching. If, then, you proclaim the infallibility of the actual Pope, you must either prove that which is impossible, that the Popes never contradicted each other, or else you must declare that the Holy Spirit has revealed to you that the infallibility of the Papacy only dates from 1870. Are you bold enough to do that? Perhaps the people may be indifferent, and pass by theological questions which they do not understand, and of which they do not see the importance; but though they are indifferent to principles, they are not so to facts. Now, do not deceive yourselves. If you decree the dogma of Papal infallibility, the Protestants, our adversaries, will mount in the breach, the more bold that they have history on their side, while we have only our own denial against them. What can we say to them when they show up all the Bishops of Rome from the days of Luke to his Holiness Pius IX.? Ah! if they had all been like Pius IX., we should triumph on the whole line—but, alas! it is not so. (Cries of 'Silence, silence; enough, enough.') Do not cry out, Monsignori! To fear history is to own yourself conquered; and, moreover, if you made the whole waters of the Tiber pass over it, you would not cancel a single page. Let me speak, and I will be as short as it is possible on this most important subject. Pope Vigilus (538) purchased the Papacy from Belisarius, Lieutenant of the Emperor Justinian. It is true that he broke his promise, and never paid for it. Is this a canonical mode of binding on the tiara? The second Council of Chalcedon had formally condemned it. In one of its canons you read 'that the Bishop who obtains his Episcopate by money shall lose it and be degraded.' Pope Eugenius III. (IV. in original) (1145) imitated Vigilus. St. Bernard, the bright star of his age, re-proves the Pope, saying to him, 'Can you show me in this great city of Rome any one who would receive you as Pope if they had not received gold or silver for it?'

"My venerable brethren, will a Pope who establishes a bank at the gates of the Temple be inspired by the Holy Spirit? Will he have any right to teach the Church infallibly? You know the history of Formosus too well for me to add to it. Pope Stephen XI. made his body be exhumed, dressed in his Pontifical robes; he made the fingers which he used for giving the benediction be cut off, and then, he had him thrown into the Tiber, declaring him to be a perjurer and illegitimate. He was then imprisoned by the people, poisoned and strangled. Look how matters were readjusted. Pope Romanus, successor of Stephen, and after him John X., rehabilitated the memory of Formosus. But you will tell me these are fables, not history. Fables! Go, Monsignori, to the Vatican Library and read Platina, the historian of the Papacy, and the annals of Baronius (A.D. 827). These are facts which, for the honor of the Holy See, we should wish to ignore; but when it is to define a dogma which may provoke a great schism in our midst, that love which we bear to our venerable mother Church, Catholic, Apostolic and Roman, ought it to impose silence on us?

"I go on. The learned Cardinal Baronius, speaking of the Papal Court, says (give attention, my venerable brethren, to these words): 'What did the Roman Church appear in those days—how infamous! only all-powerful courtesans governing in Rome? It was they who gave, exchanged and took bishoprics; and, horrible to relate, they got their lovers, the false Popes, put on the throne of St. Peter.'—(Baronius A.D. 912.) You will answer—these were false Popes, not true ones; let it be so; but in that case, if for fifty years the See of Rome was occupied by anti-Popes, how will you pick up again the thread of Pontifical succession? Has the Church been able, at least for a century and a half, to go on without a head, and find itself acephalous? Look now! The greatest number of these anti-Popes appear in the genealogical tree of the Papacy, and this absurdity it must have been that Baronius described; because Genebrardo, the great flatterer of the Popes, had dared to say in his Chronicles (A.D. 901), 'this century is unfortunate, as for nearly 150 years the Popes have fallen from all the virtues of their predecessors, and have become apostates rather than apostles.' I can understand how the illustrious Baronius must have blushed when he narrated the acts of these Roman Bishops. Speaking of John XI. (931), natural son of Pope Sergius and Marozia, he wrote these words in his annals: 'The holy Church, that is, the Roman, has been vilely trampled on by such a monster.' John XII. (956), elected Pope at the age of eighteen, through the influence of courtesans, was not one whit better than his predecessor. I grieve, my venerable brethren, to stir up so much filth. I am silent on Alexander VI., father and lover of Lucretia; I turn away from John XXII. (1319), who denied the immortality of the soul, and was deposed by the holy Œcumenical Council of Constance. Some will maintain that this Council was only a private one; let it be so; but if you refuse any authority to it, as a logical sequence you must hold the nomination of Martin V. (1417) to be illegal. What, then, will become of the Papal succession? Can you find the thread of it?

"I do not speak of the schisms which have dishonored the Church. In those unfortunate days the See of Rome was occupied by two, and sometimes even by three competitors. Which of those was the true Pope? Resuming once more; again I say, if you decree the infallibility of the present Bishop of Rome, you must establish the infallibility of all the preceding ones, without excluding any; but can you do that when history is there establishing, with a clearness equal to that of the sun, that the Popes have erred in their teaching? Could you do it and maintain that avaricious, incestuous, murdering, simoniacal Popes have been Vicars of Jesus Christ? Oh! venerable brethren, to maintain such an enormity would be to betray Christ worse than Judas; it would be to throw dirt in his face. [Cries, 'Down from the pulpit, quick; shut the mouth of the heretic!']

"My venerable brethren, you cry out; but would it not be more dignified to weigh my reasons and my proofs in the balance of the sanctuary? Believe me, history cannot be made over again; it is there, and will remain to all eternity, to protest energetically against the dogma of Papal Infallibility. You may proclaim it unanimously; but one vote will be wanting, and that is mine! The true faithful, Monsignori, have their eyes on us, expecting from us a remedy for the innumerable evils which dishonor the Church; will you deceive them in their hopes? What will not our responsibility before God be if we let this solemn occasion pass which God has given us to heal the true faith? Let us seize it, my brethren; let us arm ourselves with a holy courage; let us make a violent and generous effort; let us turn to the teaching of the apostles, since without that we have only errors, darkness and false traditions. Let us avail ourselves of our reason and of our intelligence to take the apostles and prophets as our only infallible masters with reference to the question of questions—'What must I do to be saved?' When we have decided that, we shall have laid the foundation of our dogmatic system, firm and immovable on the rock, lasting and incorruptible, of the divinely inspired Holy Scriptures. Full of confidence, we will go before the world, and, like the apostle Paul, in presence of the freethinkers, we will 'know none other than Jesus Christ, and him crucified.' We will conquer through the preaching of 'the folly of the Cross,' as Paul conquered the learned men of Greece and Rome; and the Roman Church will have its glorious 89. (Clamorous cries—'Get down! Out with the Protestant, the Calvinist, the traitor of the Church!') Your cries, Monsignori, do not frighten me. If my words are hot, my head is cool. I am neither of Luther, nor of Calvin, nor of Paul, nor of Apollos, but of Christ. (Renewed cries—'Anathema, anathema, to the apostate.') Anathema, Monsignori, anathema! You know well that you are not protesting against me, but against the holy apostles, under whose protection I should wish this Council to place the Church. Ah! if covered with their winding-sheets they came out of their tombs, would they speak a language different from mine? What would you say to them when by their writings they tell you that the Papacy has deviated from the Gospel of the Son of God, which they have preached and confirmed in so generous a manner by their blood? Would you dare say to them—We prefer the teaching of our own Popes, our Bellarmine, our Ignatius Loyola, to yours? No, no; a thousand times no; unless you have shut your ears that you may not hear, closed your eyes that you may not see, blunted your mind that you may not understand. Ah! if he who reigns above wishes to punish us, make his hand fall heavy on us, as he did to Pharaoh; he has no need to permit Garibaldi's soldiers to drive us away from the eternal city. He has only to let them make Pius IX. a god, as we have made a goddess of the blessed Virgin. Stop, stop, venerable brethren, on the odious and ridiculous incline on which you have placed yourselves; save the Church from the shipwreck which threatens her, asking from the Holy Scriptures alone for the rule of faith which we ought to believe and to profess. I have spoken: may God help me!"

NOTE.—These last words were received with the signs of disapprobation like those in the pit of a theatre. All the Fathers rose—many left the hall. A good many Italians, Americans, Germans, and a little sprinkling of French and English, surrounded the courageous speaker, and, with a brotherly grasp of the hand, showed that they agreed in his way of thinking. This discourse, which in the sixteenth century would have procured for the courageous Bishop the glory of dying at the stake, in this present century provoked the contempt of Pius IX., and of all those who desire to abuse the ignorance of the peoples. Poor blinded ones, they will fall themselves into the pit which they have made for others.

THE RICH MAN AND LAZARUS.

THE case of the Rich Man and Lazarus, Luke xvi., is urged as proof of a soul-survival, in consciousness, when men are dead. Some contending that this Scripture is a real history, while others admit it to be a parable; but they say, "parables are taken from something that has been or may be." Before having done with it, however, I shall show that such is not always the case.

Those who maintain that it is a literal relation have no less difficulty in explaining it than their opponents; they cannot explain it all literally, and yet they are bound to do so to be consistent. Let them make the attempt. Lazarus, covered with sores, died, and was carried into Abraham's bosom. Will they pretend that is literal? Oh, no, they say, "it was Lazarus' soul!" But our Lord says Lazarus was carried into Abraham's bosom. Our opponents have to say: "Not so, Lord—it was his soul." thus they contradict our Lord to establish their "own traditions." Let us see whether they succeed any better with their real history of the rich man. He died. What became of him? He "was buried;" the rich man was buried, remember. What next? "In" [hades, the grave, of course, where he was buried; improperly translated] "hell" he lifted up his eyes, being in torments, and seeth Abraham afar off and Lazarus in his bosom," etc. The rich man did this. They say: "It was his soul!" but our Lord says it was the rich man. Thus again they make void the words of Christ to establish their traditions, if our Lord did really give a "literal history." But for the sake of showing the folly of their tradition about the soul, I will suppose that it was Lazarus' and the rich man's souls or spirits, disembodied, that are in hades. I now ask: Are their disembodied souls or spirits material or immaterial? That is, are they matter or not matter? We are answered: "They are immaterial." If so, they have no substance! Can that which has no substance be seen or touched? If not, the "literal history" advocates have an immaterial rich man, with immaterial eyes, looking afar off and seeing immaterial Lazarus, or no-substance Lazarus! Truly, these immaterial souls must have sharp eyes to see nothing! and an equally sharp understanding to know that it is Lazarus! But that is not all. The immaterial rich man desires that immaterial Lazarus should dip his immaterial finger in literal water, and cool his immaterial tongue! And all this is "literal history"! I have not placed the subject in this absurd light with any other view than merely to show the "literal history" advocates that they are, at least, as much involved in difficulty in explaining this scripture as those who believe it to be a parable, and that it has no reference to man's state in a future life.

That it is a parable, the context shows. It is in a group of them, viz.: the lost piece of silver, the lost sheep, the prodigal son and the wasteful or "unjust steward," with an admonition against serving mammon, or riches. The Pharisees, who were covetous, heard all these things and they derided him. Our Lord then proceeds in his discourse with special reference to the change about to take place in the dispensations. He says: "The law and the prophets were [preached] until John; since that time the kingdom of God is preached," etc.

Dr. Adam Clarke remarks on Matt. v. 26: "Let it be remembered that by the general consent of all (except the basely interested) no metaphor is ever to be produced in proof of a doctrine. In the things that concern our eternal salvation we need the most pointed and express evidence on which to establish the faith of our souls."

Bishop Lowth says: "Parable is that kind of allegory which consists of a continued narration of fictitious or accommodated events, applied to the illustration of some important truth."

I state it then as a principle, that no parable is to be used as teaching doctrine not elsewhere explicitly revealed. Parables are used only to illustrate some truth already known, or partially so, or to prepare the way to present a truth not yet fully developed, but about to be, either by facts or explicit instruction. The scope or design of the parable is what we are to seek, and not to pervert the truth of God by the assumption that the parable is a reality that "has been or may be;" nor yet that every item in it was ever designed to have an application to the subject it was intended to illustrate. By such assumptions discredit has been thrown on revelation, the truth of God has been converted into food for the most fanatical, and men have turned to "cunningly devised fables." If any doubt whether parables are not sometimes purely fictitious, let them read the parable of the eagle's cropping the cedar, Ezk. xvii. 1-10; the parable of the "ewe lamb," 2 Sam. xii. 1-7; and the parable of the trees choosing a king, Judges ix. 7-15.

If it be replied that "Jesus would not use fictitious characters and circumstances in his parables," I answer that Jehovah, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, has done it, and why not his Son? See the parable just referred to, Ezk. xvii. "The word of the Lord came unto me, saying, Son of man, put forth a riddle, and speaking a parable unto the house of Israel; and say, Thus saith the Lord God: A great eagle . . . came unto Lebanon, and took the highest branch of the cedar . . . and carried it to a land of traffic; he set it in a city of merchants:" [say, for example, in the city of New York! Think you the eagle would be likely to prosper in such a literal work? But proceed.] "He"—the eagle—"took of the seed of the land and planted it in a fruitful field; he placed it by great waters, and set it as a willow tree: and it grew, and became a spreading vine of low stature, whose branches turned toward him" [the eagle. These branches must have had "souls," doubtless, that were intelligent thinkers, to turn toward the eagle that planted the seed! Let us see.] "There was also another great eagle . . . and behold, this vine did bend her root toward him, and shot forth her branches toward him," etc. Thus the same vine works for both eagles with all the intelligence of a most intellectual being. Does any one believe this is a literal history of the action of two eagles and a vine? or that such a thing "has literally been, or may be"? No one can doubt but that it is purely fictitious. If Jehovah thus instructs men, shall I affirm his Son does not? Of like character I regard the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, because the positive testimony of Scripture is, "there is no knowledge in sheol," the state of the dead; and that "in death there is no remembrance of God." See Eccl. ix. 10 and Ps. vi. 5.

It is said the rich man must be conscious, for he sees, feels and talks. I reply: It was common among the Hebrews to represent things without life as knowing, feeling and conversing: see Gen. iv. 10; Hab. ii. 11; Isa. xiv. 8; Ps. xciii. 3; Prov. viii. 1-3; Prov. ix. 1-5, etc. Our Lord, then, was in no danger of being understood in this parable as teaching the consciousness of dead men, and especially, as the Hebrew scriptures expressly taught, "the dead praise not the Lord"—that "their thoughts perish in the very day" they die—that "the dead know not anything"—and that "there is no knowledge in sheol," where dead men go: and further, inasmuch as Jesus uses the expression in Greek, to show the state of the rich man after death, that exactly corresponds with the Hebrew sheol, viz., hadès, he could be understood in no other way than as using a fabulous discourse—like that to which I have previously referred in the Old Testament—to illustrate an unpalatable subject to his deriding hearers.

The key to a parable is either in itself or in the discourse connected with it. In the case before us it is in the context. The scope, or design of the parable was to teach the effect to follow upon two classes of men by a change from the Mosaic, or Law dispensation, to the Christian, or Gospel dispensation; which new dispensation was "the mystery, which in other ages" [or dispensations] "was not made known unto the sons of men," but being now about to be "revealed unto holy apostles," would change the condition of both Jews and Gentiles. This fact is clearly set forth in the 16th verse, which is the key to the parable, and unlocks it perfectly. That verse reads thus—"The law and the prophets were "[preached] "until John: since that time the kingdom of God is preached." That is, a new dispensation of God's favor is now opened; no longer to be confined to the Jews, or one nation, but to embrace "all nations" in its offered benefits. This change would affect very differently two different classes of men—viz., the Jews, who were under the law, and the Gentiles, who are to be embraced under the Gospel, or to be made partakers of those peculiar blessings which had been hitherto so exclusively confined to the sons of Abraham. The effects of this change are illustrated by the parable under consideration. Let the reader note how our Lord introduces it.

After having spoken of the law and the prophets being preached until John, and that since that time the kingdom of God was preached, he intimates that the law was about to have its last and perfect accomplishment—that the last "title" of it was about to be "finished:" that then the Jews would be like the wife whose husband was dead, the law not binding them any longer; and that God, who had dealt with them under the title of husband, would be at full liberty to select a new bride out of all nations. Thus Paul reasons, Rom. vii. 1-4: "Know ye not, brethren (for I speak to them that know the law), how that the law hath dominion over a man as long as he liveth? For the woman which hath an husband is bound by the law to her husband so long as he liveth; but if the husband be dead, she is loosed from the law of her husband. So then, if while her husband liveth she be married to another man, she shall be called an adulteress: but if her husband be dead, she is free from that law; so that she is no adulteress, though she be married to another man. Wherefore, my brethren, ye also are become dead to the law by the body of Christ; that ye should be married to another, even to him who is raised from the dead, that we should bring forth fruit unto God."

Now read the verse with which the parable of the rich man is introduced, Luke xvi. 18: "Whosoever putteth away his wife, and marrieth another, committeth adultery: and whosoever marrieth her that is put away from her husband, committeth adultery." So long as the law given by Moses continued, the Jews were chargeable with adultery if they lacked in fidelity to that law as unto God their husband; but nationally they had often been wanting in fidelity, and the law was no longer to be the marriage contract; a new covenant, ratified by the blood of Christ, and not by the blood of bulls or goats, was to form the ground by which the new bride was to hold her relationship to God, and through which she was to receive the blessings promised. The law being dead "by the body," or death, "of Christ," still to cleave to that law, as the Jew did, was to commit adultery, and bring upon themselves all its curses: they died unto Christ, by rejecting him and putting him to death, and "were broken off" from Abraham's bosom, or from all spiritual connection with him, and have been in "torments" unto this day in consequence; while the believing soul, who received Christ, even though he had been a polluted Gentile, "full of sores, died" unto the law [see Rom. vii. 4], and was grafted into the good "olive tree," or was translated through the instrumentality of angels [messengers, or ministers of Christ,] "into Abraham's bosom," became a child of Abraham, and an heir, according to the promise, to the kingdom of God.

The parties concerned and to be affected are distinctly marked. The items relating to the rich man clearly mark him as the representative of the Jews as a people. Let us note his case first. His dress. He was "clothed in purple and fine linen." Now turn to "the law" that was "until John," and see what was the clothing of the priests under that law. See Exodus xxviii., where Moses was commanded to make for Aaron and the other priests "garments for glory and beauty." Verses 5, 6, 8 and 15—"and they shall take gold, and blue, and purple, and scarlet and fine linen. And they shall make the ephod of gold, blue, and purple, scarlet, and fine twined linen. . . . of purple . . . and fine twined linen." Such were the peculiarities of the dress, or clothing of these representatives of the law and the Mosaic dispensation, or Jewish system. These peculiarities our Lord commences with in his description of the rich man; and they are sufficiently striking to satisfy the unprejudiced inquirer after truth that the Jews, nationally, were to be represented by the rich man in the parable. The Jews were rich in those abundant communications of truth, knowledge and peculiar privileges which God had endowed them with by direct communications, or through the prophets whom he had raised up to instruct them from time to time, till at length he spake unto them "by his Son." Rich were they, indeed, in these high and exalted advantages over all other nations and people. It were easy to enlarge here, but I forbear. The period of their exclusive enjoyment of those peculiarities was their "life-time;" but the time came that those peculiarities were to pass away, and that period is represented as a death. It was the death of their whole ecclesiastical polity—it was now to be superseded by a more spiritual and universal system, embracing other people: the "life-time" of their peculiarities is ended—the change has come over them, symbolized by a death and burial. Where next is this once rich man found? Is it in the theological hell? No: it is not even in gehenna; but in hades. I have spoken so often and fully on hades elsewhere that it is not necessary to say anything more here than simply to state it is the Greek word corresponding to sheol of the Hebrew, and signifies the covered state, or state of death; in which, the Old Testament positively affirms, "there is no knowledge." See Eccl. ix. 10; Psa. vi. 5, with remarks on these and similar texts in previous articles.

The rich man is alive after his ecclesiastical death; but is stripped of all his peculiarities and reduced to a state of wretchedness and torment. And does not the history of the Jews, as a people, from the overthrow of their temple, city, and sacrifices there, unto this day, or the present century, fully justify the parabolical description given by our Lord of the misery to which they would be subjected under the new dispensation which was to follow theirs? No one can doubt this who has any knowledge of their history for the last eighteen hundred years; and if we have not understanding of their history, read the prophecies of the judgments threatened them, Lev. xxvi. and Deut. xxviii., and "be no longer faithless but believing." "Wrath has come upon them to the uttermost."—1 Thess. ii. 16. And Jesus said, relative to the overthrow of their city and the tribulation to attend and follow that event—"These be the days of vengeance, that ALL THINGS which are written may be fulfilled."—Luke xxi. 22.

Since the ecclesiastical and national death of the Jews—the rich man—there has been a claim maintained among them that "Abraham is their 'father' but no relief has come to them from that quarter."

The desire expressed by the rich man, that further light or information should be given to convince the nation or people of Jews by a resurrection of one from the dead, is met in the parable by showing that no further information would avail with those who had rejected all the previous light God had given them: and the answer—"neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead"—was shown to be true by the conduct of "the chief priests and Pharisees," when Jesus actually raised a "Lazarus" from the dead [John xi.]; they called a "council," and "from that day forth took counsel together for to put Jesus to death." How true that they would not "be persuaded though one rose from the dead;" and after they had accomplished their bloody purpose, and put Christ to death, and he also had been raised from the dead, under such circumstances that there was no chance to doubt the fact, the same obstinate unbelief remained; and they gave large sums of money to the soldiers to tell the most silly and improbable lie that ever was invented—viz., that the disciples of Jesus came by night and stole Jesus away while they slept!

The Jews, as a nation, had their "good things" in their "life-time," or while they held the relation of bride to their Maker; but now being dead, nationally, in reference to that relation, they are tormented, grievously and sorely tormented; and all their appeals as to their relation to Abraham have proved unavailing; and it has added not a little to their torment and sorrow to see the Gentiles enjoying rich blessings from which they find themselves shut out. I speak, of course, particularly of social, civil and political blessing, in which they possessed "much" advantage "every way" in the days of their national prosperity. But an impassable gulf has existed between them and the Gentiles for many centuries; but even that is nowhere said to be eternal. It will indeed continue till the Redeemer returns to Zion. Till that time there will be no national repentance; but then will be fulfilled the prophecy of Zech. xii. 10-14.

The Jews, as a nation, hitherto have professed that their rejection of Jesus as the promised Messiah was want of evidence; like the rich man in the parable, they have constantly cried, from the days of Jesus, for more evidence. "Let him come down from the cross and we will believe." But when he "rose from the dead," as the rich man is represented as desiring one to do, to convince the unrepenting Jews, instead of repentance being produced in them, as a nation, they put to death the witnesses of that glorious event. Who can contemplate the untold sufferings of that nation, from the time Jerusalem was compassed about with armies and their city destroyed to the present century, and not discover the propriety of the parable our Lord employed to illustrate those torments and their hopeless state?

Thus the parable, so far as the rich man is concerned, has a fair and full application, and illustrates the obstinate unbelief and consequent misery and torment of that people after their final refusal to receive Jesus as the Messiah. Well did Jesus say to the Jews—"Had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed me; for he wrote of me: but if ye believe not his writings, how shall ye believe my words?" John v. 46, 47. These words illustrate what is said in the parable—"They have Moses and the prophets, let them hear them;" and "if they hear not" them, "neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead."

It only remains now briefly to consider that part of the parable relating to the poor man, or Lazarus. Prior to the change in the dispensations, from the Mosaic to the Christian, the Gentiles were poor indeed in religious knowledge, and excluded from the peculiar privileges of the Jews—the rich man. They could only approach the "outer court"—or "gate"—of the Temple service: where some of them sought the "crumbs" of knowledge which might better their condition. Still their general condition in regard to divine "things" was "evil." The time at length arrives when they are no longer to remain in this condition, and that change—to keep up the harmony of the parable—is represented by a death. They pass out of their previous state and find themselves in "Abraham's bosom"—partakers in that covenant God made with Abraham; for, "If ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise."—Gal. iii. 29. To this honor they are brought through the ministration of angels—aggellon—messengers. Christ gave his messengers commission to "go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." Under this commission they brought many Gentiles into the Abrahamic covenant; for, "The Scriptures foreseeing that God would justify the heathen" [the Gentiles], "through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed."—Gal. iii. 8. And the apostle adds—"So then they which be of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham:" they are in "Abraham's bosom:" a phrase which imports a partaker of his blessings and being in the same covenant relation to God. In this condition are all believing Gentiles, and are now "comforted," while the obstinate unbelieving Jew from the time of Christ, or from the introduction of the Christian dispensation, has been "tormented;" and the "gulf" between the two dispensations is "impassable"—they cannot be joined in one: to come into the blessings of the Christian dispensation is impossible to any one still cleaving to the Mosaic for justification; and to return from the Christian to the Mosaic is to "fall from grace," and to be swallowed up in the gulf.

I might greatly enlarge the proof that the foregoing is the true scope and design of the parable; but enough has been said to satisfy the candid inquirer after truth, and I have no expectation that obstinate bigotry will be removed, even though another Lazarus should arise from the dead and affirm the truth of the exposition here given.

A QUESTION.

"As it is appointed unto men once to die," how can a single one be brought up [from the dead] that will fail?"

N.

I suppose the inquirer wishes to know how they can die a second time? My reply is, all men do not actually die, notwithstanding the appointment; for some have already been translated that they "should not see death;"

others will be at the coming of Christ. Men were made subject to vanity, or death, "not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope." The death to which all men are "appointed" is not "the wages" of their personal sins; and from that death all men are delivered without regard to their personal character; for, "As by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation" [to death], "even so, by the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life."—Rom. v. 18. By this justification all men are restored from the death to which they were "appointed once to die." But that restoration does not secure them from the condemnation that follows personal unbelief, or rejection of their Deliverer when he is made known to them.

"The second death" is "the wages of sin," personally committed by a refusal to accept life from God's appointed Redeemer; or is the result of sin against the Holy Spirit in its action on their hearts to draw them unto Christ. In order to commit this sin they must be first "enlightened" in regard to Christ and God's love to them in the gift of his Son; and this can only be fully done by the gift of the Holy Spirit accompanying the word of truth concerning the Redeemer; for, "No man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost."—1 Cor. xii. 3. The sin against that truth, sealed by the Spirit on the mind of the person, constitutes the sin that "never hath forgiveness." That sin may be committed in this life; but with regard to the great multitude of the race it is impossible for it to be; and they cannot be held in death unless it has been done.

Those, therefore, who have not committed the sin against the Holy Spirit will live again; but they may "fail" of securing an endless life, or immortality, because their probation for that can only take place after they are "enlightened," as above stated; and when they have been "made partakers of the Holy Ghost" (Heb. vi. 4), "if they fall away," by rejecting Christ, "they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh," and their "end is to be burned" (verses 6, 8), which "is the second death." This death is not "appointed unto men" like the previous one, which was not for personal sins; but they bring it on themselves by a willful rejection of the Life-Giver.

With respect to those who have committed the sin which "hath never forgiveness" (Mark iii. 29), if they have done it in this life, it seems to me they die not only the "appointed" death of all men, but also the death that is

"the wages of sin"; or are condemned to "be holden with the cords of his sins" (Prov. v. 22.); so that they are "twice dead, plucked up by the roots."—Jude 12. They die not the "once" only, but "the second death" also. This last death is the consequence of personal sins, willfully committed against the Holy Spirit and a rejection of Christ, as stated above.

It might be further remarked, that as some men do not die, notwithstanding the appointment "once to die," so some men may die twice, though the appointment is but once; and it is manifest that a "second death" will be inflicted on some men, whatever may be the meaning of the expression; for the Saviour recognizes that fact when he says, "He that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death" (Rev. ii. 11); and again, "Blessed and holy is he who hath part in the first resurrection: on such the second death hath no power."—Rev. xx. 6. This certainly implies that "the rest of the dead," when they "live again," after the "thousand years are finished" (ver. 5), are liable to "the second death;" and I see not how it can be otherwise, if life and death are suspended on faith and unbelief, and man is an accountable creature. #### THE RESURRECTION QUESTION.

THE late Prof. C. F. Hudson, author of a work on the immortality question, called "Debt and Grace," wrote an article on "The Resurrection of Condemnation," which was published in the BIBLE EXAMINER in 1857, pp. 122-125. He advocated "the resurrection of the unjust," though he was not quite sure that the resurrection is absolutely universal: "he thought 'the Bible' gave 'some indication that it is not.'" He had not, however, broken through the human tradition that this life ends the probation of all men, irrespective of their unavoidable ignorance of God and Christ. If he had been clear of that unscriptural theory, which has not a single "Thus saith the Lord" for its support, how appropriate his language would have been in the following extracts:

"I will offer what I regard as the true view of the resurrection of the unjust, and, taking the doctrine out of its old theological connection, will try to give it a new setting, in which it may even reflect the divine goodness and love. . . .

"Respecting the resurrection of the unjust, then, I can heartily say that, if they are raised up for the sake of being punished, then I know not how to vindicate the goodness of God. He might be just, but he would not appear great or magnanimous. . . .

"The wicked dead are raised, then, not for the sake of their punishment . . . . The Bible never speaks of the wicked as being raised up in order that they may be punished, or that God may collect his dues in their sufferings, or for any other need of justice. The justice of the Infinite, or of the Universe, is not so poor as this."

Thus he seems to reject entirely the idea held by all, or nearly all, future torment theorists, that the wicked dead are raised in order to or for the sake of inflicting torment on them as punishment. If this point is accepted as truth, a very natural inquiry is, For what then are they recalled from death, when once dead? He responds as follows:

"The resurrection of the wicked is rather, in common with that of the righteous, the effect and the token of man's deliverance from the power of death. It comes as the natural sequel of man's rescue from that doom—of his release from that bondage—of his redemption from that condemnation—of a proclaimed remission of the sins that are past, and a respite granted, so that personal faith and union to Christ alone are now wanting, that the new life-power may be a life possession, an inheritance of immortality. The prison doors are opened, and the convict is let out to see the light of day. He is told that the sentence of the law is annulled, so far as God is concerned—he has only to accept the Deliverer as his Lord, and death hath no more power over him."

Who could ask for a clearer statement of facts than the foregoing? Surely here is truth presented clearly and truthfully. Prof. Hudson was puzzled with his own statement, not seeing that the sentiment of the last sentence expressed the real truth, but assumed that it was a "figure" in which "time for the sinner's choice" was "dated after the limit God has fixed." Had he known that God has not limited the "time for the sinner's choice" to this life nor to any other definite period, how very forcible would have been his words, and how it would have relieved his mind on the subject of the resurrection of dead ones only to die again. With that thought his mind was oppressed, and he might have adopted the language of the late Albert Barnes, who, on the subject of the eternal torment theory and the government of God in relation to it, wrote as follows:

"These and a hundred difficulties meet the mind when we think on this great subject; and they meet us when we endeavor to urge our fellow-sinners to be reconciled to God and to put confidence in him. I confess, for one, that I feel these, and I feel them more sensibly and powerfully the more I look at them and the longer I live. I do not know that I have a ray of light on this subject which I had not when the subject first flashed across my soul. I have read to some extent what wise and good men have written. I have looked at their theories and explanations. I have endeavored to weigh their arguments, for my whole soul pants for light and relief on these questions. But I get neither; and in the distress and anguish of my own spirit I confess that I see no light whatever. I see not one ray to disclose to me the reason why sin came into the world, why the earth is strewn with the dying and the dead, and why man must suffer to all eternity."—Practical Sermons, p. 123.

Such was the confession of one of the most thinking men of this age; such, or a similar confession must be made by every thinking, impartial and unprejudiced mind who holds the doctrine of the revival into life of all unregenerate dead only to inflict on them a second death; and the equally irreconcilable idea that the millions on millions of earth's inhabitants who have died or may die unregenerated through ignorance of God and Christ, having never had the means of knowing them, are to utterly perish in death, no provision having been made to remove that ignorance by the Author of their being.

If the authors or promulgators of either of the two last-named theories really had their eyes opened to see in what light they set the government of God over the creatures of his power, they would be shocked at its blasphemy and abandon such horrible ideas, and accept the consoling truth that God's "tender mercies are over all his works," and that "every creature" for whom Christ died, and for whom "He gave himself a ransom," shall in this life or a life to come have "life and death" clearly set before them, and such means and opportunity to improve them as will secure their "living forever," or leave them without excuse if the second death is their final doom.

God's ways will yet be vindicated in the face of all men; and such unscriptural doctrines as eternal torments, raising men from the dead only to die a second time, or that of leaving all the unregenerate in a hopeless or eternal death, without regard to their past unavoidable ignorance, will all be looked upon as the result of the great apostacy and the natural growth from that "abomination of desolation," and will be rejected as only coming from the mouth of the blasphemous beast. May the Lord hasten the blessed day. It will come "in due time;" blessed be the God and Father of our Lord and Life-giver, Jesus the Christ. The truth of God's love for "the world" will yet be made known to every soul of Adam's race who have not heard of that manifestation by God's dear Son. Ed.

"GOING TO HEAVEN AT DEATH."

THE Louisville Journal, some years since, gave the following account of a transaction which occurred ten miles from that city. The lad spoken of was thirteen years old. His name was Henry Merriman. The Journal says:

"This is one of the most mysterious as well as one of the most extraordinary cases of suicide ever committed in this country. Henry was a devout Christian. He had lost a little sister who belonged to the Church. This sister had given him a prayer-book on her death-bed and desired him to use it. He had become so interested in the book, and on the subject of meeting with a dear sister, that it was a source of daily conversation and prayer with him. He appeared desirous to be with her. His mother had told him that he would meet his sister in heaven after death. He prayed nightly and daily to see her, and in his fit of religious insanity he, upon his knees, cut his throat from ear to ear, severing both jugular veins. This was truly a sorry sight to look upon. A heart-broken mother, afflicted father and distressed relatives—this was a scene to dissolve a heart of stone. Every one present was in tears; every man became, as it were, a child. The verdict of the jury was that the child came to his death from the influence of the above facts, causing religious insanity."

REMARKS BY EDITOR OF EXAMINER.

The child was, no doubt, "insane"; but his desire to be with his sister in heaven—where his "mother told him he would meet her after death"—was perfectly natural from the love he had for her; and no wonder, with such instruction as he had from the common theology, he should be anxious to go to her loved society; and as "insanity" can be pleaded for the suicidal act, why stands his mother there "heart-broken," and his father "afflicted?" Had not Henry and his sister met in that glorious heaven where his mother had told him they would meet after death? Why, then, is she heart-broken? Tell us, ye philosophers, ye divines! Summon all the priests of natural immortality, and of going to heaven at death, and before the resurrection at the last day, and see if you can all solve the mystery that a mother, full in your views, stands heart-broken that her two loved and loving ones were now enjoying their happy meeting in heaven!

Seriously, had such a case of suicide occurred, which could as distinctly have been traced to the influence of the doctrine of no eternal life except through Jesus Christ, and by a resurrection at the last day, would not our theological opponents have shouted—"Behold the fruit of your doctrine!—that's just what might have been expected!" However, I judge not the tendency of the common theory by an isolated case like that before me. I believe the notion of going to heaven at death is clearly subversive of the whole gospel scheme of redemption, is a practical denial of the resurrection of the dead, and the return of the Son of God "from heaven;" and is just as truly a fable as the Roman purgatory, and quite as pernicious in its effects. Said Paul—"Ye turned to God from idols, to serve the living and true God; and to wait for his Son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead," etc.—1 Thess. i. 9, 10. The true Christian is here characterized, not as waiting to "go to heaven," but waiting for Christ to come from heaven, when the "Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, and with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God;" then "the dead in Christ shall rise."—1 Thess. iv. 16, 17.

The Bible hope—the Gospel hope—is entirely a different matter from the fancy hope so pathetically urged upon our attention by the advocates of "going to heaven at death." Let these things be pondered well; and let us all see that our hope has for its foundation the words of God and not the words of men.

MEDIATORIAL PERFECTION OF CHRIST.

BY ELDER N. H. PALMER.

JESUS CHRIST was the son of the Virgin Mary. According to the flesh he was a man possessing all the attributes of human nature. He was a perfect man, consequently he was under the law of humanity as that law appertained to man in his creation.

He participated with all men in flesh and blood, for "He took not on him the nature of angels; but he took on him the seed of Abraham." "In all things it behooved him to be made like unto his brethren." "Both he that sanctifieth and they who are sanctified are all of one"—one nature, one law, one moral character and co-heirs of one inheritance—"for which cause he is not ashamed to call them brethren."—Heb. ii. 11, 16, 17.

This is the human side: let us now view the divine side of his person.

Previous to the conception of Jesus the angel Gabriel said to Mary, "The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the highest shall overshadow thee; therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God." "Thou shalt bring forth a son, and shall call his name Jesus. He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest."—Luke i. 31, 32, 35.

At the baptism also of Jesus the Father gave a manifest testimony that he is the son of God.—Matt. iii. 16, 17. And Jesus also testified himself that God is his Father.

According, then, to all these documents Jesus Christ is possessed in his person of two whole, distinct and perfect natures—the human and divine; and the appellations, "Son of man" and "Son of God," are applied to him with equal truth and propriety, and so applied by himself with, perhaps, this difference: in respect to all the offices and relations that pertain to man's natural and moral necessities, he is called "the Son of man," while in all that relate to man's responsibility to the divine throne—to atonement and expiation for sin and to man's religious nature—he is called "the Son of God." We cannot think this distinction was made without a difference.

But when we come to consider the infinite disparity existing between the human and divine natures in the person of Jesus, does it not, to reason's eye, look like an anomaly—a paradox? And in order that it may become an admissible fact, does it not seem to demand a reconciliation—an at-one-ment?

When our reason entertains the conception of a nature that is infinite and adorable as being joined in an inseparable union, in one person, with another so vastly lower, while at the same time there appears between them no sympathy—nothing in common, and from which union the higher nature cannot escape nor free itself—will not such a union appear to the sensibilities as an intolerable oppression—as both unnatural and monstrous?

In order, then, that such a union should exist, and be seen as existing in perfect sympathy, harmony and bliss, there seems to be demanded a positive and reasonable reconciliation, in the contemplation of which our whole nature finds a repose. This demand of our reason is amply met in the character and person of Jesus the Christ.

The crucial test of his humiliation and suffering forms the basis and means of this at-one-ment. "It became him for whom are all things, and by whom are all things, in bringing many sons to glory to make the captain of their salvation perfect through suffering."—Heb. ii. 10. "Though he were a son, yet learned he obedience by the things which he suffered" as a man, as "the seed of Abraham," "in the days of his flesh, when he had offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears, unto him that was able to save him from death, and was heard in" (that special test which) "that he feared."—Heb. vs. 7, 8.

Again: In contemplating the union of two natures in Jesus it seems that the divine, in the person of the Son of God, took the human nature into union with itself in such manner and degree as that it shall be merged, become inseparably blended, and absolutely one.

The principle here involved and the method of its accomplishment are illustrated and exemplified by its being set forth in Scripture as the great model of the union of the natural and spiritual in all things which shall ultimately be secured.

Paul teaches (Eph. i. 9, 10) that God has made known to us the mystery of his will—an eternal purpose springing from his good pleasure—that in the dispensation of the fullness of times he will gather together in one all things in Christ, that he will unify the natural and the spiritual, even in him. The unification here revealed will be secured by the same means by which Jesus the Christ was perfected, and is exemplified in Eph. ii. 14–16. As we quote to exemplify, we will insert such words as will apply it to the subject in hand.

"He is our peace who hath made both" (the divine and human natures) "one, and hath broken down the middle wall of partition between us"—(the disparity between the two natures)—"having abolished in his flesh" (humanity) "the enmity, even the law of commandments" (the antipathy developed by the law) "which was against us, which was contrary to us" (to the carnal nature, it not being "subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be"), "and took it out of the way, nailing it to his cross."—Col. ii. 14.

This he did "for to make in himself of twain" (two natures) "one new man" (the Christ), "so making peace"; "and" (this he did) "that he might reconcile both" (natures thus united) "unto God in one body" (his flesh) "by the cross, having slain the enmity" (the carnality) "thereby."

This reconciliation constitutes the mediatorial perfection secured by the sufferings of the Son of God. In order, then, to consummate the character of the Mediator, it appears necessary that a corporate union was to be formed between the natural and the divine life, and that these should be reconciled in one person. But the difficulty of forming this union lay in subjecting the natural or animal mind—the predicate of humanity—to the law of a spiritual life in the Son of God; and this result was only secured by the sufferings of his flesh, or the crucifixion of the carnal nature, culminating in death—that is, in its complete abnegation.

Thus did Jesus Christ suffer in the flesh, was dead and buried, to effect the at-one-ment; and becoming thus a new man, a perfect Mediator, he entered into his glory.

He is now exalted above every creature; and this transcendent exaltation is in consideration of his having taken away the enmity (the impracticability) of the natural with the spiritual in himself; and having thus become the at-one-ment, or the medium of union, through the death and resurrection of his manhood, all things will be reconciled to God in the ages to come through him. The exaltation of the animal and lower nature in all creatures into union and sympathy with the spiritual or divine in himself, in the ages to come, will constitute his fulness.

But the process of moral and spiritual perfection in the creature must regard both time and order, for God's law is a declaration of order and relationship. Jesus could not be perfected till he had finished his work. Till his time had come his death could not be anticipated by one day. His work of reconciliation in his own person was finished on the cross. His personal sufferings are complete, but not his relative. He still suffers in his body. The church and the full measure of these relative sufferings must be attained before his people can also enter into glory. They "must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God." The cross is the antecedent of the crown. "They that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with the passions and lusts," and have "put on the new man," and are "new creatures." God's people are predestinated to be conformed to the moral and spiritual image of his Son, that he may be the first-born [Head] among many brethren.

We need elaborate this subject no further. The specific application of the atonement here made need alarm no one unless he could affirm a harmony of view among them that hold the doctrine. Among the contestants some must be in more or less error and confusion; and, as vain man will attempt to limit the Almighty, it may be deemed possible none are perfectly scriptural. He that is perfect has "received the atonement." In him the carnal mind has been crucified, and he has come under the law of a spiritual life, as Christ did, who has expiated or removed his sins, and who saves all his people from their sins.

THE ABRAHAMIC KINGDOM.

BY ELDER S. W. BISHOP.

ANTI-AGES to come Adventists are constantly reiterating the statement that God promised Abraham this entire earth for an everlasting inheritance. Not an intimation of such a sentiment is found in the original promise to Abraham. In every instance where that promise is recorded in the Bible it reads, "the land of Canaan." I will give the texts which record that promise: "Now the Lord had said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, unto a land that I will shew thee."—Gen. xii. 1.

On the supposition that the land promised to Abraham was the entire earth, what sense is there in the above Scripture? If the promised Abrahamic inheritance covers this plane, how could Abraham "get out of the place," where he was into the promised land? On the Adventist hypothesis he was no more in the land of promise after he "went out" than he was before he started. God, however, commanded him to go out of one country into another, and that other country into which he was told to go was to be his possession forever. Where did he go? Verses 4 and 5 answer the question. "So Abram departed as the Lord had spoken unto him; and Lot went with him. And Abram took Sarai his wife and Lot his brother's son, and all the substance that they had gathered, and the souls that they had gotten in Haran; and they went forth to go into the land of Canaan; and into the land of Canaan they came." So then Abram went out from Ur of the Chaldees into the land of Canaan, and not from some country outside of this planet into the earth. After he came into the land of Canaan, the Lord said to Abraham, "Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward; for all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed forever."—Gen. xiii. 14, 15. Abram must have possessed a very strangely formed pair of eyes to have looked all over creation from a definite point in the land of Canaan.

Hear what the Lord said further to Abraham: "Arise, walk through the land, in the length of it, and in the breadth of it; for I will give it unto thee." Abram must have had a long walk if "the land" embraced the whole earth, to say nothing about crossing the two oceans on foot. I am told, as a sort of a vague offset to these statements of Scripture, that Abraham "went out" and "looked" by faith. They apparently mean that he had an imaginative view of the land, something on the clairvoyant idea, but he did not "go" or "look" literally at all. You will please excuse me, for your idea of God's promise is far too etherealistic for my faith to grasp. He went out by faith, it is true, but he went, not in imagination, but literally he looked, and that, too, with the organs of vision that God had given him in common with all other men. To say he did not is to assume that he disobeyed God; for God bade him go and look, and told him just where to go, viz., through the length and breadth of the land of Canaan.

When we begin to etherealize or change God's promise to Abraham there is no telling where to stop. If the Abrahamic inheritance is not just where the plain reading of the Scriptures locate it, it may be, after all, where the old hymn puts it, "Beyond the bounds of time and space." Let God be true if it makes all the mystic theorizers in the world liars.

He went to the land of Canaan, and Heb. xi. 9 declares that he dwelt in that land in tents, and that it was a strange land to him; that he dwelt there by faith. Did he simply believe that he lived in a tent because he sojourned there by faith? He literally dwelt there, but the land was his only by the promise of God, and Abraham had faith in that promise; and in God's due time the promise to Abraham will be fulfilled, and he will have the land of Canaan, and have it forever.

Let us notice other texts which record the original promise to Abraham. Gen. xvii. 8: "And I will give unto thee and to thy seed after thee the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession." No language can more plainly state anything than the text last quoted states the exact extent of the Abrahamic kingdom. It is all the land of Canaan, the land where Abraham then dwelt. To say it is any more or less than that land is to attempt to alter God's land deed to Abraham.

Again, Exod. vi. 3, 4: "I appeared unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob. And I have also established my covenant with them, to give them the land of Canaan, the land of their pilgrimage wherein they were strangers. And I will bring you (Israel) into the land, concerning which I did swear to give it to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob." This language is also very explicit. It declares that God will give to the descendants of Jacob the identical land that he had promised by oath to give to Abraham, to Isaac and to Jacob. Did God give the Israelites all the earth? Did he "bring" them from somewhere else into the earth? I suppose that every Bible reader knows that Israel dwelt in the land of Canaan. One more text, Josh. xxi. 43: "And the Lord gave unto Israel all the land which he swore to give unto their fathers, and they possessed it, and dwelt therein." Amen.

Thus I have given every text wherein is recorded the original promise of land to Abraham, and in every one it reads land of Canaan. Stephen bears testimony to the same truth. See Acts vii. 2-5. I am told that Paul teaches that God promised to give Abraham this entire earth for his inheritance. The only text in the Bible ever quoted to prove this assumption is one verse in the writings of St. Paul; it is Rom. iv. 13. It is strange, if true, that Paul should contradict every statement in both Testaments where the original promise is recorded. We will read the text: "For the promise that he should be heir of the world was not to Abraham or his seed through the law, but through the righteousness of faith." It is assumed that the Greek word Kosmon, translated world in this text, literally, and always, signifies the earth. This is the Adventist position. I have heard this assertion among Adventists from the first years of my association among them, and, without examining, I once accepted it as true. The mere casual examination will satisfy any honest investigator after truth that the position is wholly unfounded. The word Kosmon occurs more than one hundred and thirty times in the New Testament. In more than one hundred times it does not refer to the earth at all, but to the people on the earth. I will give several texts where that word occurs, to show its general use in the New Testament Scriptures: John xii. 19—"Behold the world is gone after him." Ch. vi. 51—"And the bread is my flesh which I give for the life of the world." Ch. vii. 7—"The world cannot hate you, but me it hateth." Ch. i. 10—"And the world knew him not." V. 29—"Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world." Ch. iii. 15—"For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." V. 17—"For God sent not his Son into the world to judge (krisis) the world, but that the world through him might be saved." The Greek word translated earth is gen. It occurs in Matt. v. 5: "The meek shall inherit the earth." I have thus proved that Kosmon does not mean the earth, but it generally refers to the people that live on the earth.

Dr. Clarke makes the following comment on the text, Rom. iv. 13: "This promise intimated that he should be the medium through whom the grace of God should be communicated to the world, both Jews and Gentiles; and the manner in which he was justified be the rule and manner according to which all men should receive this blessing. Abraham is here represented as having all the world given to him as his inheritance, because in him all the nations of the earth are blessed. This must therefore relate to their all being interested in the Abrahamic covenant; and every person, now that the covenant is fully explained, has the privilege of claiming justification through faith, by the blood of the Lamb, in virtue of this original grant."

Dr. Clarke agrees with Paul, Gal. iii. 8: "And the Scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the heathen (nations) through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed." That the meek will eventually possess this entire earth I do not doubt; but that the Abrahamic kingdom, the restored kingdom of Israel, the kingdom to be set up at the coming of Christ, is to be under the whole heaven when first set up, I do not believe, because it is in direct antagonism to the plain reading of the Scriptures of truth. The stone that smites the image becomes a great mountain and fills the whole earth. It is not a great mountain when it is "cut out of the mountain," and does not become a great mountain till it has first removed all other kingdoms. All this is perfectly evident from the plain reading of Dan. ii.

Again: When Daniel explains the dream of Nebuchadnezzar, he says, concerning the meaning of the stone, "In the days of these kings the God of heaven shall set up a kingdom." So certain as "the dream is certain, and the interpretation thereof is sure," the coming kingdom of Messiah will be set up in the lifetime—the days—of the kingdoms, symbolized by the divided feet and toes of the great image; and not after those kingdoms are driven into eternal annihilation. In Dan. vii. 14 there are three things named that are given to Christ when he comes the second time in the clouds of heaven, viz., "dominion, glory, and a kingdom." The dominion is not the kingdom, any more than the glory is the dominion. Christ receives the kingdom, he has the glory in the kingdom, and exercises dominion outside of the kingdom proper. Verse 27 gives the final end of the extension of the kingdom. Please read it, minding the order: 1. "The kingdom." 2. "The dominion" (outside of kingdom). 3. "The greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven"; or the stone has become a great mountain filling all the earth. The kingdom is the land of Canaan—all of it; the dominion is the outlying territory, and when Christ shall have subdued all things unto himself, then the stone will have become a great mountain, and the kingdom in its greatness will occupy every foot of land on this planet, and that will be "the greatness of kingdom under the whole heaven." Then the knowledge of the glory of God will fill the earth as the waters fill the sea. None need attempt to hurry the Lord. Eternal years are his, and he does not need to be in a hurry. The kingdom will soon be set up. May we all secure an entire readiness to reign with Jesus, when he sits on the throne of David and reigns "in Jerusalem, and in Mount Zion, and before his ancients gloriously."

I am asked, "Is Abraham with his seed made heir of the Kosmon, the world, the race?" Most certainly. "In thee and in thy seed shall all the nations, the kindreds, the families of the earth be blessed," is the promise of God to Abraham, made doubly emphatic by the oath of Jehovah. It is to this oath and promise that Paul refers in Rom. iv. 13. Every one can see this who will read the context. See especially verses 17, 18, where it is declared that by this oath and promise Abraham is made the father of many nations. The promise cannot fail and the oath will not be annulled.

When Christ shall sit on his throne, then shall the law go forth "out of Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem"; and it shall continue to go until through it God shall speak in power to the last son and daughter of the race; speak to their understanding, saying, "Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth."—Isa. xlv. 22.

And when this work shall be completed, "Every knee shall bow" at the name of Jesus, "of things in heaven and things in the earth, and things under the earth, and every tongue shall confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father," for to the fact that such a result will at last be reached God has sworn by himself. See Isa. xlv. 23; Phil. ii. 10.

How grand the conception! How gloriously sublime the theme! How do the yearnings of our often-burdened hearts go out after that glorious abiding rest, that rest where no sighs of distress, no eyes dimmed with tears will be heard or seen! How our hearts long to see the dawning of the endless ages, the putting on of immortality by the Bride of the Lamb; the end of the reign of death over the elect; and the work, the perfect work that we shall help to consummate in bringing the mass of the race into a harmonious, loving union with him who died for their sins! Amen.

LETTERS AND EXTRACTS,

CHARLES W. BUYINGER, M.D., Pittsburgh, Pa., sends a donation and writes: "The EXAMINER must not die nor its Editor starved for want of proper support. While error is so blatant and rife in the land we need many more to promulgate the precious truths we hold so dear. May your eye not become dim, nor your natural strength, physically and intellectually, be abated. May you long be spared, and when you are finally called to lay your armor down you will simply exchange it for the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will give in that day. God bless and save you and unworthy me in the everlasting kingdom."

G. B. MARTIN, Iowa, writes: "The signs of the Second Advent seem to thicken every day. The Saviour is certainly at the door now. The signs in Europe point to the fall of the crowns of the oriental world, and all things everywhere indicate it. May the Lord help his people to watch and be ready, that they may receive a welcome reception when he comes. Oh what a feast for all the lovers of our Redeemer to meet the blessed Saviour that they have so long looked and waited for! There will then be a time of rejoicing and glory never yet experienced."

ABEL ROBINSON, Kansas, writes: "I have great pleasure in reading the BIBLE EXAMINER, and hope it may yet be continued. Thanks for all your labor for our good. May God's eternal blessing be yours."

H. S. HOUGH, Florida, formerly of Connecticut, writes: "We are in a new country and at a new business: clearing land for a home, and we earn but little. The place was very sickly last fall and we were not exempt; are quite well now, and rejoicing in the truths the EXAMINER teaches us. We earnestly hope that you and your family, with ourselves and many dear believers, may live to hail the hour that brings Israel's King to reign."

MRS. A. S. JOHNSON, Galva, Ill., writes: "Through the kindness of brother Olson, of Bishop Hill, I have for some time past been the recipient of your valuable BIBLE EXAMINER. It has been and continues to be a welcome and much-esteemed visitor, laden with great and precious truths. God bless you in your labor of love to enlighten in the great plan of salvation."

ANGELINE F. WATERSON, Plymouth, Mass., writes: "I live—for it is Christ that liveth in me and worketh in me to will and to do his own good pleasure. I am still suffering for the truth's sake, and were it in my power, I would let you know how deeply I feel indebted to you and to God for the blessed BIBLE EXAMINER. The more I read 'it the more precious its truths are. By the grace of God I have been letting the light shine; and it keeps growing brighter, and I expect it will till the perfect day. I greatly rejoice that God in his great mercy has given me what light he has on 'the ages to come' and the blessed 'restitution spoken of by the mouth of all the holy prophets since the world began.'"

"Does Gen. i. 26 speak of a class distinct from Adam and Eve? or, is it parallel with Psa. viii. 4-6 and Heb. ii. 6-8? Some think that Gen. i. 26 is not a proper translation of the original Hebrew. Is it, or is it not?"

W."

I have no doubt the translation is correct; it agrees with the texts to which you refer, and also to Gen. ix. 1-3. which see. Ed.

L. D. TANNER, Marathon, N. Y., writes: "Strossmayer's speech" (in the EXAMINER for May) is self-toned, self-sustained, above adulation, noble and grand. May his like be multiplied!

S. C. LOCKWOOD, Saratoga, N. Y., writes: I am greatly interested in your articles, "Man in Death"; also in articles from Henry Dunn, especially the one in the February EXAMINER, "Promised Restoration." "The Gospel for the world is the good news that God is our Father, in spite of our indifference or neglect of the relationship." "The Unpreached Gospel." His remarks under this head are so fresh and full of the love of the precious Redeemer that I never tire in reading them.

AN OLD PILGRIM, Concord, N. H., writes: Through the kindness of Bro. T. H. Ford and wife I have had the great favor of reading the BIBLE EXAMINER. I was 73 years and six months old April 23d. I have been a reader of religious periodicals for about fifty years, and the BIBLE EXAMINER about three years, and it is the best of them all. It is in harmony with the promises of God to Abraham and his seed; and it is also with the prophecies concerning the Jews' return to the land of their fathers. Oh, that rank absurdity, "conditional prophecy"! If the opponents of "the ages-to-come" views would read the arguments and examine the evidence produced from the Bible candidly and prayerfully, I think the scales would fall from their eyes; and while some denounce it as heresy, let them read the letters of correspondents and see if they can find deeper expressions of faith that "GOD IS LOVE." D.

RABBINICAL EXPLANATION OF "I AM THAT I AM."—To prevent a misconception in Polytheism of the various names of the Deity which occur in Holy writ, the Midrash gives a beautiful explanation of the term "I am that I am," which it renders, "I am called according to what I am." Rabbi Abba, the son of Manta, says, "The Lord said to Moses, 'Thou desirest to know my name; know that I am called according to my works; I am called Almighty God, the God of Hosts, Elohim and Jehovah. When I judge the creatures I am called Elohim; when I make war against the wicked, I am called Lord of Hosts (Zebaoth); when I visit man for his sins, I am called Almighty God; and when I take compassion upon the world, I am called Jehovah, which signifies Mercy, as it is said the Lord Jehovah is a merciful and gracious God. This is the sense of 'I am that I am; I am called according to my works.'"

There is very deep signification in this Rabbinical explanation. It saw that God, being spiritual only and not corporeal, can be known only by the works through which we can see Him, and His name varies according to his works, as it is impossible for the human mind to comprehend God, and assign a name to Him, except by and according to the manifestation of his powers within ourselves.—Selected.

THE PROMISE TO ABRAHAM.

THERE are those who seem to suppose that the promise to Abraham, confirmed by the oath of God, was a new dispensation, relating only to some distant, future, uncertain period, and to an equally uncertain or unknown people. I regard such a view as an entire overlooking of the record, and an abridgment of God's declared work for the race, of which Adam and Eve were the head. The woman was "deceived": "Adam was not deceived" (1 Tim. ii. 14); he sinned wilfully; she through deception. Her sin had a mitigating circumstance; Adam's had none. He, though the father of the race, lost the headship, and could not conquer the evil he had introduced. The conquering headship was passed into the hands of the woman's seed, and that seed becomes "the head of every man."—1 Cor. xi. 3. Of that seed it was said, "It shall bruise thy head": that is, it shall destroy the evil introduced by the "one transgression" of Adam, "For if through the offence of one the many" (all Adam's race) "be dead, much more the grace of God, and the gift by grace, which is by one man, Jesus Christ, hath abounded unto the many" (Rom. v. 15); so that this "grace"—which was given us in Jesus Christ before the (aiônion) ages began," or before the beginning of the ages: i. e., the ages that followed the one transgression by which death was introduced into the arrangement concerning the human race—embraces all of the race, the entire posterity of woman.

The race immediately passed into the hands of the second Adam—the seed of the woman—who, in due time, was "made manifest by the appearing of our Life-giver (Syriac), Jesus Christ, who hath abolished (katargeesantos—to annul, to abrogate, to cause to cease, to come to an end, to destroy) death, (the death that came by Adam,) and hath brought life and immortality to light."—2 Tim. i. 9, 10.

Thus we find the meaning of the expression, "shall bruise thy head"—it is to destroy that death which came by the "one transgression" of the first Adam, and to destroy that which was the procuring cause of death, viz., "the evil," or, as it is rendered in Heb. ii. 14, "the devil."

The second Adam was pledged by the word of God, as addressed to the serpent, to destroy, abrogate, annul and cause to cease both the death and the evil brought on the race by the sin of the first Adam. That word of God embraces all that I claim for the promise and oath of God to Abraham; so that my view of its covering the whole race is not going back for its application to those behind Abraham, for the promise to Abraham was only a renewal, now confirmed by an oath, of the word of God in Eden after man's "one transgression"; and it covers all who descended from the woman, or from Eve: to every one of them death—so far as it is the result of Adam's sin—is annulled, abrogated, so as to have lost its power to hold one of the race; nothing but a personal rejection of the Life-giver—the seed of the woman, God's remedy—can hold any man, woman or child of Eve in death's dominion. The blessing promised in Eden, and confirmed to Abraham by an oath, secures to the race, to each individual, an ultimate deliverance from all the consequences of Adam's transgression, and places their eternal destiny on the ground of their personal acceptance or rejection of God's remedy, made and provided, of his mere grace, "before the face of all people; a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of thy people Israel."—Luke ii. 31, 32. That remedy, therefore, will be made known to "all people," either in this present life or in one to come, when the Life-giver shall actually abolish the Adamic death, which is secured by the promise of God in Eden and to Abraham, and therefore is spoken of as if it had actually occurred because of its certainty, as when God said to Abraham, "A father of many nations have I made thee" (Gen. xvii. 5); when as yet Isaac was not born; or, as when it said, "He was wounded for our transgressions," etc., centuries before its actual occurrence (Isa. liii. 5); God "calling those things which be not as though they were" (Rom. iv. 17), because of the certainty of the accomplishment of his promises and purposes.

Thus all is harmony in the divine government, and Jehovah is justified both in his justice and love to the race, and all cause of complaint is forever removed, and God's ways are manifested to be "equal," and will cause heaven and earth, and all things therein to unite in the song of praise, "Saying, blessing, and honor, and glory, and power be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever."—Rev. v. 13.

I make no pretensions of determining who have, in the past and present, had the knowledge of God's remedy, or who have or have not improved it: that is one of the "secret things which belong to God" (Deut. xxix. 29); "but those revealed belong unto us and our children forever." God has revealed to us, by promise and oath, that "all families of the earth shall be blessed," in the Messiah, the Christ, the Redeemer, the Kinsman of our race, "who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time" (1 Tim. ii. 6; God's time, which will ultimately be seen to be the best time; the best for the race as well as most honorable to God, and most promotive of the glory of our Redeemer, manifesting "the unsearchable riches of Christ" (Eph. iii. 8); a view of which made the apostle to the Gentiles say, "Now unto him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us, unto him be glory in the Church, by Christ Jesus throughout all the endless succession of ages."—Eph. iii. 20, ~~21~~.

ALL FAMILIES, ALL NATIONS, ALL KINDREDS.

SUCH are some of the expressions employed in the Bible in connection with God's promise and oath relating to his blessing the children of men in Abraham and his seed. The questions to be settled on this subject are so very simple that it seems marvelous that the opposers of my views, all, so far as I have seen or heard, avoid the issue and try hard to call off attention from the main points, laboring to hide the meagreness of their materials in opposition by attacking some unimportant expression I may have made, and which I can abandon without in the least affecting my main position, which is, God did mean what the words express in the promise and oath to Abraham, and that the promise and oath have never yet had a fulfillment in the sense expressed by the words employed; and, therefore, must and will have in some future period.

Who among all my opposers has even attempted to touch the main question or statement at issue? Not one of them. They build a castle of their own inferences by a forced construction put upon some of my words, and then expend their energies to demolish their own inferences. A marvelous exploit, truly! They are much like a naval commander who might wish to take the fortress of Gibraltar, and should imagine he saw a dark spot on the rock, and supposed if he could succeed in scaling it off the fortress is his. Or they are like the insect which lights upon the horse and is concerned to see if he can find a sore spot, and is highly gratified if successful, while the noble animal is impervious to the assaults of the tormenting creature.

Why will men professing to love truth act in such a manner? Why not take up the main question and meet it fairly? I confess I can see no other reason except a consciousness of their inability to meet the issue in a manly and Christian manner. By an indirect attack they seem to hope to succeed, at least, in keeping others from seeing and feeling the force of the grand argument which goes to show that God is just and equal in his government of the creatures he has made; and that the remedy he has provided for the lost race of Adam shall be made known to them all "in due time," and each have means placed in his or her power to enable them to secure the benefit of the provision of the love of God to the world.—John iii. 16.

Are we now to be told that the words "all" and "every" do not necessarily mean every individual? I have never insisted they did; but I ask, if that is not their primary signification? If so, must not this be received as their true and proper meaning unless the necessity is self-evident for accepting them in a limited sense? When applied to the race of men, or "all the families of the earth;" to "all nations," and "all the kindreds of the earth," can they ever have any other application than to the mass of the race? Can such expressions mean only a few or the smallest portion of the human family?

That the terms all and every are frequently used in a limited sense is readily admitted; but what has my opponent gained by this admission? Will he say it never is used in an unlimited sense? He will soon find himself involved in a mist that is as black as that spoken of by Jude, verse 13. Let us see what darkness will overspread the Bible, and all ground of faith be swept away by the assumption that all and every are in all cases to be construed to mean only a small part. Take the following examples: "The day that Noe entered into the ark, and the flood came and took them all away."—Matt. xxiv. 38, 39. That is, took a "few" away; because "all don't mean every individual." So the flood was only a small affair, only a few were destroyed by it. Again, Christ "tasted death for ever man."—Heb. ii. 9. That is, he tasted death for a few only. "He gave himself a ransom for all."—1. Tim. ii. 6. That is, he gave himself a ransom for only a few. "Go ye unto all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature."—Mark xvi. 15. That is, "Go into a small portion of the world and preach the Gospel to a few." "Don't think the Gospel is intended for the many; it is a mistaken notion, indulged by such men as George Storrs, that the Gospel is to be preached to all Adam's race: it is true they are all lost, but though I (Jesus) came to seek and save that which was lost, I never thought of such a wild idea as that of letting every one of them know I came into the world to save that which was lost; it was only a few I came to redeem. True, I (Jesus) have said, 'God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him might not perish, but have everlasting life,' but that language was only hyperbolical, it was not intended that every man of Adam's race should ever have an opportunity to believe in me, for God determined the vast multitudes should live and die in utter ignorance of me and my mission into the world; 'twas only a few of the world my Father really loved or ever designed to bless and save. True, he promised Abraham, and made oath to it, that in him and his seed all the families of the earth, all nations, should be blessed; but then that was not what he meant; he only designed to seem to love the whole race, while his secret purpose was to keep the vast masses in utter ignorance of the remedy which he only intended for a few."

How would the foregoing language fall on the ears of rational and reflecting minds? Would they not say it was a most shameless misrepresentation of the divine government; charging God with duplicity, insincerity and double dealing with the creatures he had made? But wherein, in fact, does it differ from the representations of those who say, that though God says "all families of the earth shall be blessed in Abraham and his seed," it only means a few; a very small portion of the race are meant?

I have admitted that the words "all and every" are not always used in their primary sense; but I do not admit that, when spoken of the race, they ever mean a few of the masses: they always indicate the mass, as when of a country it is said, "There went out to him (John the Baptist) Jerusalem, and all Judea, and all the region round about Jordan." Does this mean a few went out to him? There is reason to suppose it did not mean every individual in those regions; but a man would be thought an idiot, or next akin to one, that should say, it meant a few went out. It clearly indicates the masses; the few that kept away were the exception.

So when God says and confirms it by an oath to Abraham, "In thee and in thy seed all families, all nations of the earth shall be blessed," to say the least, he means the masses and not a few only. To suppose otherwise is to charge Jehovah with trifling with language and practicing duplicity, and hence preventing faith: for how can a man exercise faith where he does not know what he is to believe? It may be one thing or another, if it does not mean what the words express. Says one, "God does not say whether the blessing is spiritual, national or commercial. To say either is an assumption." In plain English, God's promise and oath to Abraham has no meaning—you cannot tell anything by it. I ask, can such a man have faith in what God has said? He does not know what was said, because he rejects the obvious meaning of the words in which the promise and oath were made. Yet, "Abraham believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness." Why do not the opposers of the universality of the blessing promised grapple at once with the main question at issue, and deny that God meant what the words express in the promise and oath to Abraham? Is it because they are conscious that by such a course they will meet with disaster and defeat to themselves? If such a defeat is not the result, they do that to others which is worse—that is, they destroy all reliance on divine testimony, and open the flood-gates of universal unbelief; for, if God's promise, confirmed by an oath, is not reliable, in its most obvious sense, then what reliance on any divine testimony? It becomes like the heathen oracle, which means one thing or another, just as happens, but has no certainty.

Do they think to alarm the weak and feeble-minded by crying out against my view of God's promise and oath, "It leads to Universalism!" Let them know their view leads to universal infidelity. Which of the two is worst, judge ye.

The argument of the opposers of the view that the promise and oath of God to Abraham covers the entire race of Adam runs thus: "The word all does not always mean every individual, and, therefore, does not in the promise and oath to Abraham; only a few are embraced in it."

This is an unfounded assumption; an inference from a truth which is ruinous to all divine testimony. I have said, all never means a few when spoken of a class of men. It always means the mass, if not every individual. Now let us see the result of the assumption above: "As by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men."—Rom. v. 12. "As in Adam all die."—1 Cor. xv. 22. Does all mean a few in these texts? Does it not mean every individual? True, a few may be excepted, such as Enoch and Elijah, and the saints alive at Christ's return: but the mass of the race are included. "For the love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead."—2 Cor. v. 14. No escape from the conclusion that the all who die by Adam are the same all for whom Christ died. Any other construction of this language contradicts Paul's testimony; for, he adds, "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself," etc.—Verse 19. The ministry of reconciliation relates to the whole world—the race—and not to a few as opposed to the masses. If such testimony—and it might be increased to any extent—can be frittered away by saying, that "all does not always mean every individual," etc., then what divine testimony can be depended on? "All in Christ shall be made alive."—1 Cor. xv. 22. But these fritters of the promise to Abraham will prove, if their assumptions are not worthless, that it is only a few in Christ that are to be made alive. Such is the "pit" of their own digging into which "they have fallen."

AN EXPLANATION ASKED.

"I SHOULD like to see an explanation of Gen. xx. 2, where it is said that God commanded Abraham to offer his son as a burnt-offering, as it has always seemed to me unlike God to give such a command.—L."

REPLY BY THE EDITOR.

Some transactions recorded in Old Testament times are misconstrued from not understanding the customs of the nations or their practices. In those times it was not an uncommon thing to sacrifice their children to their gods—even their first-born. This was the practice of those who knew not the true God or were idolaters. The king of Moab, in a time of great defeat in battle, "took his eldest son, that should have reigned in his stead, and offered him for a burnt-offering."—2 Kings iii. 27. The prophet Micah refers to this practice when he says, "Shall I give my first-born for my transgression," &c.—vi. 7.

These two samples are sufficient to show the practice among heathens in Old Testament times, and even Israel is rebuked for having fallen into the idolatrous practice in the time of the prophet Jeremiah. God said of them, "They have built the high places of Tophet to burn their sons and daughters in the fire."—vii. 31. But the practice may have been universal in Abraham's day among all nations of idolaters.

Hence the "command" to Abraham would not seem so strange to him as it would in our times. Let it be recollected, also, that God had given Abraham this son with the promise, "In Isaac shall thy seed be called." The command, therefore, was only given for the trial of Abraham's faith; for "By faith, when he was tried, he offered up Isaac; and he that had received the promises offered up his only begotten Son, of whom it was said that in Isaac shall thy seed be called, accounting that God was able to raise him up even from the dead; from whence, also, he received him in a figure"; i. e., he was born to Abraham out of the ordinary course of nature—(See Rom. iv. 18–22, in connection with Heb. xi. 17–19.)

When Abraham was tried he came forth as gold, and great was and is to be his reward.

What, therefore, might seem to be a cruel command, proved to be a blessing of the first magnitude.

In examining various other things in the dealings of God with individuals and communities, which may seem "cruel" to us in our ignorance, we may yet find were the greatest mercies that could come from him whose nature and name is "love"; even the case of Sodom is not an exception; for that people are yet to be restored and become partakers with restored Judah and Israel in the blessings of "the ages to come"—(See Ezk. xvi. 48 to the end.) After the experience they have had of the evil of sin, when brought back from that death they will not be likely to try the experiment of sinning again lest "the second death" should be inflicted on them.

The word knowledge, strictly employed, implies three things; viz., Truth, Proof, and Conviction.

HEBREW XII.—AN INQUIRY.

"CHASTENING AND SCOURGING."

"WILL you please give me your ideas with regard to the chastening and scourging of God's children, spoken of in Heb. xii.? If it is sickness, trouble and loss of friends, the wicked have all that as much as the children of God. I believe there is a physical cause for sickness: it comes by violating the laws of nature. How then can it be a chastening from God? As I said, others have that as much as God's children.—H."

EDITOR'S REPLY.

The main text reads, "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth." "God is love," and he loves all men; and chastens all men because he loves them, and designs their good by it; as a kind and wise parent chastens his children to perfect them in goodness and usefulness. The fact that any one has become a child of God does not exempt from chastisement of which "all" men "are partakers" (Verse 8), for they are still under discipline to be perfected in a mind reconciled to God in all things; for perfect reconciliation to the will and dealings of God with us is the result of "perfect love," which "casteth out fear" that "hath torment" with respect to God's present and future purposes with regard to us. So Christ, "Though he were a Son, yet learned obedience by the things he suffered."—Heb. v. 8.

The children of God suffer from other causes besides the ordinary ones common to all men: in mind, especially; by a sense of their short-comings and unworthiness of the divine love; also by the neglect or betrayal of professed friends; and sometimes by persecution, in one form or another, for conscientiously following their convictions as to duty in faith and action. True, they are not now literally "burned at the stake" for their course; but, not unfrequently, they are by words and deeds of opposers called to endure trials almost as tormenting as fire and fagots. Let us accept these "scourgings" as from our Father's hands—by sufferance—to make us "perfect," as was the Captain of our salvation, who prayed "in agony," "O, my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me: nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt." If God suffered his own Son to be "scourged" (Matt. xxvii. 26), literally, who "knew no sin," shall we ever refuse shame for being attached to him and his truth; knowing, "If so be that we suffer with him, we shall be also glorified together."—Rom. viii. 17.

Says our Lord, "Whosoever shall be ashamed of me and of my words in this adulterous and sinful generation, of him also shall the Son of man be ashamed, when he cometh in the glory of his Father with the holy angels."—Mark viii. 38. Not to be ashamed of Christ nor of his "words," under any circumstances, is a great attainment; but it is doubtful if any one attains to that faithfulness till they have passed through some scourgings in mind, i not also of some outward afflictions which result from past neglect of confession of truth.

BROTHER STORRS: The following note in connection with the article appended will speak for themselves, which I send for your consideration, to be disposed of as the Lord may direct. Up to their receipt I cherished the hope the good Lord was about to use the secular press, not only to show the folly of the "endless torment theory," but also to make manifest the truth as revealed in the Bible concerning the promised immortality; but this dissipates that hope and compels us to fall back upon the resources of the little flock of his chosen ones for this purpose. As God will in due time accomplish his own purposes, it is becoming in us to bow to his will and say, "Amen," for he doeth all things well. Your Brother in Christ.

A SMALL TYRANT.

THIS is the heading of an article that recently went the rounds of our papers, giving an account of the arrest and commitment of the proprietors of a hair-dressing factory in London, Ont., for using instruments of torture upon their young apprentices. As I read of the thongs, the pullies, the gags, etc., a feeling sprang up in my heart similar to that manifested by the mob who heard the testimony, and who would have executed summary punishment upon the principal offender had they not been restrained by the police. If I mistake not, most of those who read the account felt that such fiends ought not to live. If such feelings are excited by this small specimen of "torture," what shall we say of a religious theology that assigns by far the larger portion of the human race to the torture of an endless hell, for offences against their Creator, perhaps no greater than were those of the apprentices against their employers.

I, for one, will say a theology so terrible in its results and so dishonoring "to the God of love," carries upon its face evidence that there must be, in some way, an error at its foundation that should be ferrited out, and, if possible, corrected. The cause of truth and of benevolence, as well as a regard to the character of the "Creator of all things," demands this.

This is a work in which all of the clergy of Christendom, as well as religious papers, should be engaged in heart and hand with the one desire of attaining. But, strange to say, instead of helping forward the investigation now in progress, through this and other intelligent secular papers of the day, they, as a body, stand opposed, and denounce it as the work of the adversary, and use all their influence (with few exceptions) to hinder the work! This course clearly indicates on their part a feeling of weakness in this system that will not stand the scrutiny of investigation. But if this work is of the Lord, as I humbly believe it is, its course will be onward and the truth will in the end be made manifest. As this theology has been a life-long hindrance to me, and at one time drove me clear over to the Robert Dale Owen school of infidelity, I feel constrained to do what I can to make manifest its errors. I have, therefore, ventured to pen the foregoing and following thoughts for the consideration of all the lovers of truth.

Not long since I attended the funeral of a Christian lady. The minister, a learned and pious Methodist, remarked, "there was no such thing as death—that death was only a sweet sleep which introduced the real man into a higher life," etc. This suggested the thought as to which was right, the Almighty, when he said to the happy pair in paradise, "Ye shall surely die," or the enemy, who said, "Ye shall not surely die?" Now, if the minister's statements are true, "there is no such thing as death," then a harmony must be found in these antagonisms in some way. At last this reconciliation came up, viz., that God meant only the body, and the devil meant only the soul, which could not die; consequently they both told the truth. But Christ said, some four thousand years later, "The devil was a liar from the beginning."

Question: How can this statement be disposed of? Very easily upon the same hypothesis; for if there is no death, then we are justified in believing that Christ may have referred to some other personage, or to words spoken prior to the beginning of Genesis, second and third chapters. This makes all plain.

That this is the practical theology of the world at this time, including both Christian and heathen nations, as also of all ages past, as far back as the history of man is known, "is too evident to admit of a doubt." Now, if it is true that all men have, by creation, this undying nature, it follows, to a certainty, that if the Bible record is true, that there is to be a future executive judgment, an endless hell will be the final condition of all the non-repenting family of man, without the possibility of a doubt. But if the converse be true, that immortality now only belongs to God, as declared in the Bible, and is a conditional attribute promised only to the righteous who "seek for it by patient continuance in well-doing," through Christ in the resurrected state, as taught in the New Testament Scripture, then all is plain. In this case the sinner can die, both soul and body, and having proved himself unworthy of eternal life, will receive "his wages" (death) and "be as though he had not been," in the resurrection state. This will be the second death, from which there will be no further remedy; consequently eternal. To this point I earnestly desire to direct the attention of all candid seekers of truth. Let Bible testimony alone decide its truthfulness or falsity.

P. ALLING.

Though not always called upon to condemn ourselves, it is always safe to suspect ourselves.

In the declaration, Where no law is, there is no transgression (Rom. iv., 15), a principle of judgment comes out that is too often overlooked when we contemplate the moral condition of the world. God is no task-master, demanding service where light is denied, or condemning persons for acts, the guilt of which they were unable to estimate. Sin injures our moral nature just to the extent that it is known and felt to be sin.

ESCHATOLOGY.

THE KINGDOM.

THE term "kingdom of God" occurs in the New Testament about seventy times; "kingdom of heaven" about twenty times; and other references to this same kingdom probably thirty times more.

The signification of the term is not, however, always the same.

Sometimes it implies that which is subjective—a moral and spiritual condition. It does so when our Lord says to the Pharisees, who demanded when the kingdom of God should come, "The kingdom of God is within you" (eutos umoon)—rather, among you (as in marg.), for the kingdom could not be said to be within the Pharisees, to whom he was speaking. The expression probably means that the kingdom was embodied in himself. St. Paul, when viewing this kingdom subjectively, speaks of it as consisting in doing right and being happy; or, as he expresses it, in "righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost."

More frequently, however, the term indicates that which is also objective—a reign of God, announced as approaching; a promised kingdom, in which the saints should rule; a government, of which "the poor of this world, rich in faith," are, under Christ, "the heirs."

The universal expectation of the devout and thoughtful amongst the Jews was that there remained for the nation "an inheritance in reversion"—a national kingship over other peoples—the fulfillment, in short, of the promise to Abraham and to his seed that he should be "the heir of the world," a promise repeated through Moses in those remarkable words, "Ye shall be a peculiar treasure to Me above all people; for all the earth is Mine. And ye shall be unto Me A KINGDOM OF PRIESTS, and an holy nation."

The certainty of the fulfillment of these high expectations was the continual theme of the Hebrew prophets, and formed the basis of the national belief—carnal or otherwise—in the coming Messiah. And so, when our Lord was upon earth, no one thinks of asking what "the kingdom" means, although He was continually discoursing about it.

The disciples, we are told, were always thinking "that the kingdom of God would immediately appear;" one of their latest inquiries was, "Wilt Thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?" and throughout they indicate what appears to us a very carnal expectation regarding it. Yet in no instance are they rebuked for apparent materialism; in no case are they told that they were under a delusion; nowhere are they taught that the kingdom was a purely spiritual thing. How strange, if their views were essentially wrong! How unlike is silence, in such a case, to the conduct of their kind Master on other occasions, who said, "If it were not so, I would have told you."

Right or wrong, there could be no question that the kingdom of God meant, to the pious Jew, Messiah's kingship, and his own kingship. To enter into that kingdom was to be a member of that kingly company who, as priests of God, should rule and teach all other nations.

The testimony of the Gospels regarding it is very comprehensive; embracing, first, the message of John, "Repent ye: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand;" then the prolongation of the message by Christ, first personally, and afterward by the agency of the apostles; then the characteristics of those who should enter the kingdom—viz., humility, poverty of spirit, perseverance, open profession, consequent tribulation and independence of all human authority; then the hindrances to its attainment—viz., riches, self-righteousness, self-indulgence, injustice, impurity, dishonesty, covetousness, drunkenness and reviling; and finally, its realization in a judgment both of quick and dead; in various forms of honor and dignity, such as brilliant attire, eating and drinking with Christ, and royal rule and dominion; the whole being described as glad tidings and a free gift, but not of this world, and therefore retributive, compensative and restorative; an inheritance to be enjoyed after death, and everlasting in duration.

To the Jews Jesus says, "The kingdom of God shall be taken from you." To the "little flock," "It is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." "I appoint unto you a kingdom, as My Father hath appointed unto Me." To the Corinthians Paul writes, "Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God?" To the Galatians who were living in sin, "They who do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God." To the Thessalonians, "God has called you unto His kingdom and glory." Take heed "that ye be counted worthy of the kingdom of God, for which ye also suffer." The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews stimulates believers by the assurance that a day is coming when they will "receive a kingdom which cannot be moved," and the apostle James marks out the despised "poor," who were "rich in faith," as those whom God had chosen to be "heirs of the kingdom," which He hath promised to them that love Him."

These passages might be multiplied if needful, but it is, perhaps, enough to say that in every one of them more is clearly meant than mere deliverance from ruin; that each is intended to convey the idea of eminent, although not equal, distinction; and that the force of the inspired utterance would in all of them be taken away if any expression signifying mere safety were substituted for that of the promised royalty.

I am far from denying that the phrase "the kingdom" is sometimes used to express the entire Christian community or commonwealth; but this is only done when it is intended to describe the special work of the Redeemer on earth as the founder and fashioner of that kingdom which is indeed a kingdom of kings, a royal priesthood, an elect church, of which He is the head.

It is in this sense that our Lord speaks of "the word of the kingdom;" compares the kingdom itself to "treasure hid in a field;" calls "the children of the kingdom good seed, sown by the Son of man;" says that, at the last, the angels shall gather out of it "all things that offend;" speaks of the Pharisees as trying to shut it up; and tells them that the publicans and harlots shall go into it before them. It was in this sense—as a kingdom revealed in the heart of the believer—that St. Paul gave thanks that the Colossians had been (already) translated into it.

Not one of these instances, however, is opposed to the supposition that the kingdom, properly speaking, is an inheritance to be enjoyed in the future, or that entrance into it is a far greater thing than mere salvation; nor can any passage to a contrary effect be found in Scripture.—"The Destiny of the Race."

A CONVERSATION.

It happened to me some weeks ago to be present at a conversation in which the most conflicting views regarding the nature and character of the kingdom of God were brought forward and advocated. Of the four gentlemen by whom this discussion was carried on, two held that the kingdom of God, properly so called, is FUTURE; that it is the kingdom of the resurrection—the visible and objective reign of the Lord Jesus Christ over the world He has redeemed. The other two insisted that the kingdom of God is now among us; that the term simply implies the spiritual reign of Christ in the heart of His believing people, and the sway He exercises in the secondary Christianity which more or less modifies the life of millions.

These last maintained that Scripture teaches the kingdom of God was literally "at hand" when John the Baptist appeared as its forerunner; that Christ Himself declared it had "come" when He said to the Pharisees, "The kingdom of God is within you;" that the least believer in the Christian dispensation is therefore greater than John; that the meek, even now, possess the earth; that those who have been persecuted for righteousness' sake enjoyed, by their moral superiority, the kingdom spoken of as theirs; and that, in short, it becomes us all, while rejecting Romish pretensions, gratefully to acknowledge that we have entered into what Jesus promised. The discussion was serious and earnest. All the disputants alike were true Christians, and in most other respects they were agreed in their theology—that of the evangelical school.

My first impression was that, as these men were supposed to have a common faith and a common hope, the difference between them must be more apparent than real; that they were, in fact, each looking at one side only of a great truth. I thought so because I saw that the one party, while refusing to allow that "the kingdom" was future, did not affect to deny that a nobler life than this, and a more abundant spiritual existence, was in store for the saints; while the other, denying that the kingdom was present with us, did not, in so doing, dispute for a moment the fact that Christ is now exercising a subjective and spiritual rule in the hearts of His people. Neither party attempted to evoke the question by affirming that it was both present and future—a conclusion which, for any practical purpose, concludes nothing.

As the conversation advanced I was obliged to abandon the supposition that the question at issue was one of words only. I saw no reason to doubt either the sincerity or simplicity of any of the disputants. I had no right to assume that this or that man was biased by his antecedents, by his circumstances, by his education, or by his desires. But I felt increasingly convinced that the divergency of view was far too great and too important to be lightly disposed of.

These Christian men, whether they knew it or not, were holding totally different ideas regarding the Gospel of Christ; regarding the condition of the world at large; regarding the status and duty of the believer; regarding the character of the dispensation in which we are living; regarding what is taught us as to its termination ; regarding the second advent of the Lord ; regarding prophecy generally ; regarding many of the words and warnings of Christ ; regarding almost everything, in short, that is distinctive in Christianity, except—and the exception is an important one—the value of the atonement made by the Redeemer, the consequent “breaking down of the middle wall of partition” between Jew and Gentile, and the passing away of the priests, altars and sacrifices of the Levitical economy. On these points they were agreed.

To the one the world that now is was in a very hopeful state, gradually advancing, however slowly, to a high degree of culture and of moral and spiritual excellence. To the other it was a world destined ere long to pass away under Divine judgments, the end of the dispensation being foreshadowed by the flood and by the ruin of the Jewish people.

The one thought it right to speak (and act) under the belief that Christ may be “at hand,” even at the door, since his re-appearance in the clouds of heaven may be expected at any time, and ought to be the daily theme of a Christian’s prayer and hope. The other argued that the world might last ten thousand or even ten millions of years ; that it was as yet only in its infancy ; that the apostles displayed ignorance not only of the time of the advent, but of the nature of it ; that the “coming” so frequently spoken of in Scripture is a figurative coming ; that Christ came at the destruction of Jerusalem ; that He is now on earth in the only form in which He ever will be, and that He is at present reigning on His own throne.

These, I found, held that as the world is already Christ’s, the believer might lawfully enter into its ambitions and seek to attain its rewards, whether of rank or wealth, so long as he did so without abandoning or disgracing his Christian profession, and with the intention of devoting the rank or wealth thus acquired to the furtherance of the Gospel. The opposite party maintained that such objects ought not to form any part of a Christian’s desire ; that he is “a pilgrim and a stranger” here ; that his “citizenship” is above ; that to him everything in the world is stained by sin, and has the slime of the serpent upon it ; that therefore he who would be in the world, without being of it, must, to a great extent, stand aloof from its chief interests, becoming light to its darkness, and salt to its corruption, by a separation similar to that which the lamp has from the room it illumines, and the salt from that which it purifies and preserves. The tendency of the one party was toward a modified asceticism ; that of the other was toward a Christianized worldliness.

I found further that while the one regarded the dispensation in which we are living as that of “the Spirit,” to be followed by no other, to be superseded by no greater, the other thought of it as parenthetical in character, its object the calling out of a Gentile election, and its distinguishing feature the birth, the development and final destruction of “the mystery of iniquity.” I saw, in short, that in relation to the designs of Christ, and regarding what ought to be the distinguishing characteristics of a Christian, so far as he differs from a pious Jew, or from an enlightened heathen like Chunder Sen, these two parties were almost as much opposed to each other as they would have been had they accepted two different revelations.

Three other observations I made may also be mentioned. The first was that the diversity of view I so much lamented did not in any degree appear to be occasioned, or even materially affected, by differences of temperament—by a greater or less degree of natural hopefulness. The differences related not so much to degrees of hope for the world as to the right or wrong object of faith and expectation.

The second was that those who held to the present kingdom and reign of Christ obviously regarded the entire subject as comparatively unimportant ; they seemed to consider the whole discussion as little better than a waste of time ; the advocates of the future human kingdom of the Redeemer, on the contrary, as obviously attached the highest degree of importance to their doctrine. They were evidently prepared to make great personal sacrifices, if called for, in furtherance of what they believed to be the truth.

My third observation was, that the parties thus differing were all experienced Christians, and in one form or other had been for many years teachers of others. Three out of the four were upward of seventy years of age.

Much that was said was to me exceedingly painful, and became the occasion of many sorrowful reflections. Yet the discussion was not un instructive. It made me think less hardly than I had done of those who call our modern Christianity “Babel, or confusion,” and more charitably of men who pant after some recognized authority, whether Pope, or church, or apostle. It made me feel also that the time is not far distant when a change will take place in the character of our so-called evangelical Christianity, neither less radical in its nature nor less important in its issues than that which separated the Christianity of the second and third centuries from the faith and spirit of the first.

I have long felt, and still feel, that some degree of uncertainty in relation to divine truth appears to have been designed; that for the wisest of reasons doubt was intended to attach to many things—to the Bible itself as a book; to the evidence on which its documents are presented to us; to the formation of the canon; to what may or may not have been interpolated; nay, to the very meaning of statements which are nevertheless important portions of God's message to man. But it never was intended that Christian hearts should differ as they do on matters which lie at the very root of the character Christianity is meant to form. That such a condition of things has arisen and is spreading is one of the most portentous signs of the times.—Sunday Morning.

UNFULFILLED PROPHECY.

A great many persons in the present day feel—whether reasonably or unreasonably matters not—that UNFULFILLED PROPHECY is not generally dealt with in a satisfactory manner. On one side we have abundant assertion, based on very little that is clearly revealed. On the other we have but too much neglect, and even contempt, of what ought to receive at least serious and thoughtful consideration.

That much difference of opinion should prevail regarding prophetic interpretation is by no means marvelous. For, first, this part of Scripture is, from its very nature, obscure, and men generally hate subjects that cannot be comprehended without labor. Study of any kind—and certainly the study of Scripture forms no exception—is singularly distasteful to the majority of mankind. Most men, indeed, are absolutely incapable of enduring solitary thought; and thought, if it be earnest and independent, is always solitary. They are ready enough to merge their individuality in any great current of feeling or opinion which may be flowing near them, but they cannot endure to be the lonely rill which flows apart, uncheered by tributary streams.

Again, men are very prone to demand, as if it were a right, clear views regarding what may be brought before them, at whatever price; they forget that what God has left dark or dim can only be made light by being more or less falsified. They imagine that what can be but partially apprehended must necessarily be useless. They do not know, or do not care to remember, that doctrines, like duties, are often far from being obvious; that as the line of action we are in any given case called to take is often a perplexing question, which can only be solved by care and thought, so truth is to all of us frequently dubious, and has to be sought out with infinite care and pains.

"A wise conviction," it has been well said, "is like light; it at first gradually dawns only upon a few minds, and then not unmixed—a slight mist rises also with this rise of light. As the day goes on, and the light rises higher, spreads further and is more intense, growth of all kinds takes place, but silently and without great demonstration of any kind. This light permeates, colors and enlarges all it shines upon."

Eminently is this true of Scripture prophecy. On this it may be said light is dawning, but the mists have not yet cleared off. The day is advancing, but it may be some time yet before brighter and clearer beams fall upon the world. Not such, however, is the spirit in which unfulfilled prophecy is generally studied. The possibility of but partial enlightenment is ignored. In its interpretation everybody is positive he is right and all others wrong. And so it comes to pass that dogmatism is only met by counter-dogmatism, until the skeptical spirit comes in and puts the whole study aside as unworthy the attention of rational men.

The students of prophecy are themselves the cause of much of the neglect of which they complain. It will never be otherwise so long as magnificent edifices rise on sandy foundations; so long as a devout fancy is allowed to revel in visions of the future before reason has presented Scriptural evidence that the future of the kind supposed is yet to come. What we want is less dogmatism and more "reasoning out of the Scriptures."

In no other department of Biblical study is skepticism so rampant as it is in relation to prophetic Scripture. We all perhaps reason, more or less, from our own experience—however limited that may be—but I think I shall scarcely be accused of forming a judgment from too narrow a basis if I say that, in urging the results of my own Scriptural investigations on Christian ministers and intelligent laymen, I have commonly been met by objections such as these: "You quote Daniel. Are you not aware that the canonicity of this book is very doubtful?—at least, that the genuineness of the latter chapters is by no means universally admitted?" Another says to me: "My friend, you make too much of the predictions of the Hebrew prophets generally. Has it never occurred to you, that, 'with the exception of those prophecies which relate to our Lord, the object of prophecy is rather to delineate principles and states of opinion which shall come than external events? We mistake the nature of Hebrew prophecy if we suppose it to consist largely of prediction. The prophets were great preachers of righteousness to the men of their own time, and they were so far inspired messengers of God; but as predictors, except to a very limited extent, they can scarcely have much authority."

A third observes: "You build far too confidently on the Apocalypse. It is indeed a wonderful book—rich in texts to preach from; but as to what may be its interpretation I have not the least conception—indeed, I have never considered it profitable to bestow much time or thought on the subject. Moses Stuart is probably right in supposing the book to have been written by John—if the apostle John did write it—at an early period of his life, and that it found a fulfillment in the events which terminated in the breaking up of the Jewish dispensation. But if it be so, where is the value of all your speculations?" So I am silenced. For what can I say to such criticism? The ground of controversy has changed altogether. The question now is, whether the Bible itself be intelligible and trustworthy?—Ibid.

MAN IN DEATH.

CONSCIOUS OR UNCONSCIOUS.

SEVENTH ARTICLE.

MISCELLANEOUS TEXTS CONSIDERED.

It is urged that Rev. vi. 9-11 shows that dead saints are in a conscious state. The souls of them that were slain for the word of God are represented as seen, and crying for vengeance on their murderers.

In the first place, these "souls," whatever else they may be, are not theological souls, for those are represented as immaterial, occupying no space, and not to be seen; but John "saw" the souls he speaks of, and describes the space they occupy. If these were the souls of deceased men, they were entirely different from those of which theologians speak.

Moreover, if they were the theological souls of saints, they seem to be very far from being "made perfect" by passing into that state; for "they cried with a loud voice"—which imports earnestness and anxiety—"how long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood," etc. They not only seem disquieted by the delay of vengeance on their murderers, but they speak of their "blood." Theological souls surely have no blood, and never had. Bible souls do have blood, and differ as widely from the theological ones as substance differs from nihility.

Again, these souls had "white robes given" them, after their cry. So they are not such souls as theologians talk about; for, even if these robes are symbolical of righteousness, saints do not receive such after death, but before, and while in this state of trial.

Finally, this whole scene was laid under the opening of the fifth seal, embracing the time of pagan and papal persecutions, being far in the future when John wrote; so that these souls had no existence at all at the time Revelation was written; and as it was a symbolical representation of a bloody persecution, of long continuance, it presents not the state, feelings or condition of the dead, but of the living and suffering saints under that persecution, showing the terrible trial of their faith and patience, when the "Lord, holy and true," seemed to abandon them to the vengeance of their persecutors. Seeing this bloody persecution so long protracted, with no apparent end to it, they cry, "how long!" The answer is, "Until their fellow-servants also and their brethren, that should be killed as they were, should be fulfilled." They were pointed forward to the completion of this bloody scene as the time when God would avenge them, and in this trial of themselves God designed to purify them and make them white, or give them "white robes," after which "they should rest" awhile "in the dust of the earth" (see Dan. xii. 2) and then "awake to everlasting life."

On this scenic representation of a bloody persecution and its final result I might greatly enlarge, but I think enough has been said to satisfy the candid inquirer after truth that there was no design in the Revelator of representing the state of death as being one of consciousness, but only the feelings and hopes of the living and suffering Christians under a most unparalleled and protracted persecution. "The souls" are the persons, in their visible, tangible and suffering state; but when made "white" they were to rest till all that was written should be "fulfilled," then would come their reward.

On our Lord's promise to the dying thief, Luke xxiii. 43, little need be said. Having demonstrated that the Old Testament condemns the idea that the dead know anything, unless it can be shown that Jesus taught the contrary, explicitly, no one has the right to claim the text in Luke as proving a living existence when dead. Jesus did teach distinctly that the "resurrection at the last day" is the hope of a future life. What he said to the thief, therefore, is to be interpreted in harmony with all his other teaching. He never promised his followers their reward till "the resurrection of the just."—See Luke xiv. 14; John vi. 40 and Matt. xvi. 27. "When the Son of man shall come in his glory and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory"; then will be the time of "his appearing and kingdom." The thief prayed, "Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom." "Into," says Archbishop Whately, "is a mis-translation; it should be, 'in thy kingdom': the meaning is—at thy second coming in triumphant glory." See his "Future States," p. 324. Jesus' answer is in harmony with the prayer: "Verily I say unto thee to-day," or this day—what day? the day they hung upon the cross? No; but the day just spoken of, viz., when Christ shall come "in his kingdom." The answer is, in the day of Christ's coming into, or in his kingdom, he thief should be with him in paradise—i. e., in that delightful place.

The idea that paradise is the theological heaven of disembodied souls is an assumption, without one text in the Bible to sustain it. Three days after Jesus' death he declared to Mary, John xx. 17, "I am not yet ascended to my Father." He did not then ascend to paradise the day he died, and had not for three days after; hence, if the thief went there, he did not find Jesus, and the promise failed. There is no evading our Lord's words to Mary by saying, "Jesus meant he had not been to heaven in his body." He speaks of his personality: "I am not yet ascended," etc. Jesus—the person—had not been to paradise. He said to the thief: "Thou shalt be with me." Not thy soul shall be with my soul. Three days after the same me saith, "I am not yet ascended." Here is demonstration of the incorrectness of the common construction of this scripture. There is no proof from it of the survivance of a conscious entity, called the soul, in death. Jesus saith nothing of a soul or souls in the entire account. I might extend remarks greatly on this text, but judge enough has been said to show its utter irrelevancy as proof of the common theory of going to heaven at death.

The case of Moses at the transfiguration is urged as proof that souls disembodied do live and are conscious when men are dead. It is, however, maintained theologically that souls are immaterial; hence it would be impossible for them to be seen by material eyes; therefore it was not Moses, as a disembodied soul, that was present on that occasion; for the disciples saw "two men, who appeared in glory"—Luke ix. 30, 31; hence Moses had been raised from the dead for the occasion, or it was a sight in vision. Christ appeared in glory at that time; but that was not his permanent condition—for he afterwards died. Moses, if really there, was so "in glory"—so saith the text; therefore he had been raised from the dead for this manifestation; though this was not yet his permanent state, any more than that of Jesus at that time. It is then perfectly clear that Moses was there by a revival from death, or he was there only by a representation in vision of that glory which is to be possessed by the followers of Christ when he shall actually appear in glory—"When Christ who is our life shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory."—Col. iii. 3. See also 2 Peter i. 16-18. Moses was dead—Moses was buried; but Moses appeared in glory at the transfiguration—not Moses' soul: no; it was Moses—the same that died and was buried. If he really appeared in person, then it is manifest he had been revived from the dead, though he might fall asleep again to wait the revelation of his Master in his permanent glory.

Another view also may be taken of the case of Moses.

In Dr. McCulloh's "Recast" of the "Credibility of the Scriptures," on the case of Moses' appearance on the Mount of Transfiguration, which is supposed to prove the consciousness of the human soul after death, he speaks as follows:

"There are many objections as to the accuracy of such an inference, for, in the first place, as Elijah did not die, but was translated, his reappearance in a visible manner throws no light on the general subject. And there is such a mystery concerning the termination of Moses' mortal career that his case cannot be fairly estimated by the ordinary phenomenon of death. The account given in Deut. xxxiv. is that Moses ascended to the top of Mount Pisgah, from whence Jehovah showed him the promised land. It is then stated: 'So Moses, the servant of Jehovah, died there in the land of Moab . . . and he (Jehovah) buried him in a valley; . . . but no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day.'

"By whom this addition to Deuteronomy was made it is impossible to conjecture. The general opinion of commentators ascribes it to Ezra, but by whomever written, it must have been long after the death or disappearance of Moses, as is evident from two passages in it, the first of which is, 'But no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day—i. e., at some time long posterior to his disappearance. The second passage is still more forcible in the inference: 'And there rose not a prophet since in Israel like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face.' This implies, at least, that many of the Old Testament prophets had already appeared among the Jewish people; for unless many such persons had been recognized as prophets among them, such a comparison could not have been made.

"But, under all circumstances of the case, Moses' departure from the world was under conditions of which we are totally ignorant. We cannot, therefore, consider Moses to have died the ordinary death of other men, and as such cannot admit that his appearance on the Mount of Transfiguration justifies us in supposing that the souls of men in general are conscious after death."

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.

I am a little surprised that Dr. McCulloh, in taking this position, had not gone a step further, and shown the probability that the account of Moses' death is an interpolation. It certainly has evidence on the face of it that it is so. I confess the thought was first suggested to my mind by the Doctor's quotation of the account. It says: "Jehovah buried him (Moses) in a valley of the land of Moab over against Beth-Peor, but no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day." How then did any "man" know how to tell so exactly where he was buried? Most likely, then, no man knoweth of his death unto this day; and his appearance with Elias is pretty good evidence that he did not die, but was translated.

I have not for years claimed inspiration for historical accounts, and hence do not claim for them infallible accuracy. Good men wrote those accounts according to their understanding of them at the time, or from traditions handed down to them from others, and their general accuracy can be relied on; that fact Dr. McCulloh has clearly shown. Those historical accounts cannot command faith where they are clearly contradictory in themselves: nor should we insist on others receiving them as a revelation from God, unless we wish to bring discredit on the Bible itself. As to the doctrines of the Bible as given by Moses, the prophets and Jesus Christ, and the prophecies from the same authors, they are entirely another matter. But even for these we are not to claim that the precise words in which they are recorded in all cases are given by inspiration. The inspiration is in the sentiments; each writer employing his own peculiar phraseology in expressing the thing which is revealed or the sentiment made known. By disregarding this view we give weapons to unbelief and arm it against all conviction of the value of the Bible itself.

The Bible is a great and glorious light. It is to the moral world what the sun is to the natural world. We do not reject the sun because we sometimes discover a dark spot on its face, or because a dark cloud may hide it altogether for a time; no, nor when it is under a total eclipse, for even then its light is not wholly obscured, and we wait anxiously for its clear brightness to return. So let us regard the Bible; with all its faults, or the fault of those who wrote, transcribed or translated it, it is the only sun of truth to enlighten our pathway into the future, and teaches us how we may enter into life eternal. Yet we need, also, the Spirit of God as the living atmosphere to breathe in, or the sun itself will shine in vain. The Spirit and the word agree. Here is harmony, and here is life to all who walk in the light of the one and breathe the atmosphere of the other. Let both dwell in us richly; so shall we live forever.

IN MEMORIAM: HENRY DUNN.

BY W. MAUDE.

It was but a short time ago that we heard a venerable Christian minister—most widely known as a Christian poet—speak these words: "How many of our greatest, yes, and most useful men seem passing away, notable witnesses for Christ, one after another! What does this mean? Does God mean to leave us face to face with utter darkness? In our feebleness and helplessness are we to be left alone with this gloom, and is there no hope beyond? Alas! we are oftentimes cast down as we see these noble men disappear, and we cry, 'Help, Lord, for the godly man ceaseth: for the faithful fail from among the children of men.'"

But, he went on to say, "there is a brighter side. I remember, when travelling on the Rhine, staying for two days at Mayence, I noticed that, as the twilight came on, all along the long bridge that crosses the river there, a man went and lighted the lamps one after another. What was the meaning of that? It seemed to say, 'Night is coming.' I awoke next morning very early, and I saw the man retracing his steps. He was putting out the lamps one after another. What could that mean but this—the day is coming up, the sun will soon be here? So when we see these lamps extinguished, we know that the day is nigh and that the Sun of Righteousness will soon be here."

That is one way doubtless, and a very legitimate one, of looking at it; but for those who, like the speaker himself, and like the present writer, are rapidly traversing the downward slopes of life, and whose feet must apparently soon touch the dark waters of death, the incident described admits of another spiritual interpretation. As we start on the journey of life—a night journey, alas, to most of us—God mercifully kindles some lights of love and friendship to guide and cheer us on our way; but as we ourselves approach the end these lights so kindly lent are withdrawn—not extinguished—not simply because we need them less, but also that, by the cords of even our human love, our hearts may be drawn to that brighter and better world where alone we may hope that they shall again shine upon us.

Such was the thought in our mind as, on Thursday, March 21st, we stood in Norwood Cemetery beside an open grave, and looked down upon the coffin of a loved and honored friend. On the lid of that coffin were engraven these words: HENRY DUNN. Born January 22d, 1801. Died March 16th, 1878.

We shall not attempt here to give, even in merest outline, a biography of our lamented friend. Mr. Dunn's life-work was, more than is often the case, of a distinctly two-fold character. For many years, as the highly-esteemed Secretary of the British and Foreign School Society—to the remarkable success and influence of which society his great ability and administrative talents largely contributed—"his name," to use the language of the Times in its obituary notice, "was honorably identified with the history of public education in England during the second quarter of the present century." But it is not with Mr. Dunn as an eminent educationalist that we have here to do. When, more than twenty years ago, he retired from public life, his health but slightly impaired, and his mental powers only in the maturity of their strength, he felt, as he himself has more than once told us, that God had still work for him to do in the world. Taking a deep interest in Missionary work, he went to Italy and identified himself for a time with Protestant Missions there, and it was while travelling in that fair land that the idea of devoting his leisure during the years that might remain to religious literature developed itself in his mind. The resolution was a wise one, and we doubt not of divine inspiration, for many a Christian thinker, not in England only, but throughout the world, has reason to thank God that it was ever taken. It is only a few days ago that we received a letter from a Christian friend, in which, referring to Mr. Dunn's death, he says: "Dear friend and master he was to me. I owe him a peculiar indebtedness. The whole world and God's government of it appearing in a new and comforting light; so that as every new day dawns I count all things a stage nearer the restitution, and everything that breathes I regard as opening its eyes in a redeemed world."

It is as a religious writer and teacher, then, that we shall now speak of Mr. Dunn; as such alone we knew him; nor, in our many conversations, was more than a passing allusion ever made to what had previously been his work in life. That seemed to lie altogether apart, though there was, we think, one subtle link which bound the two together. His intimate acquaintance with the education of the young for the after business of this life formed a mental preparation, so to speak, for the reception and development of that profoundly true and consolatory conception of our whole earthly life as educational rather than probational, to which Thomas Erskine, of Linlathen, attached so vital an importance, and which unquestionably formed the leading principle of Mr. Dunn's special teaching. But here we are anticipating, and must therefore stop.

Mr. Dunn's principal writings—for we shall not endeavor to make the list complete—are the following:—The Interpreter, a periodical issued during the years 1860, 1861 and 1862, forming, when complete, three vols. 8vo. which we are in a position to state was entirely written by himself. This led to the subsequent publication of "The Destiny of the Human Race," a Scriptural Inquiry and "The Study of the Bible," a Series of Chapters intended to promote Truth and Unity. These works were followed in 1866 by "Organized Christianity": is it of God or of Man? and at a later period by "The Kingdom of God," the Kingdom of the Resurrection; and by Essays on "Eternal Punishment," on "Election," and on "Future Restoration," which were at first appended to "The Righteousness of God," as taught by St. Paul in his Epistle to the Romans. In 1872 appeared "The Churches," a History and an Argument, a book in which we feel a special personal interest, inasmuch as we were invited to Blackheath to hear the whole read by the author previous to its publication. The book is a fair sized octavo volume, but we remember that, with characteristic energy and perseverance, the entire manuscript was read in a single morning and afternoon. Mr. Dunn's next publication—a small one—was "Life in the Invisible," a plea for the immediate state, suggested by the perusal of Prebendary Constable's "Hades," and which first appeared as a series of papers in Our Hope. Then came, in 1875, "The Limitations of Christian Responsibility;" and lastly, within the present year, "The Decay of Churches," a Spiritual Outlook. To Sunday Morning, another monthly periodical edited by Mr. Dunn during the years 1870, 1871 and 1872, it is not necessary specially to refer, inasmuch as a considerable part of its contents was written by other hands; while "Following after Truth," the fourth part of which was published a few days after his death, consists merely of selections chosen by himself from his previous writings. Probably the last words he ever wrote for publication were the brief paper, "A Few More Words on Theology," which appeared in the March number of The Rainbow, and a letter in the Christian World of the 8th of March, in reply to a friendly criticism on "The Decay of Churches."

In order to form anything like a fair and accurate estimate of the value and influence of Mr. Dunn's writings, it must be understood at the outset that he was a literary rather than a learned man; a Christian thinker more than a scientific theologian. Endowed in no ordinary degree with the critical faculty, he was not an accomplished critic, inasmuch as he neither possessed nor laid claim to advanced and accurate scholarship. Hence while, as Mr. Heard has truly said, he "had an almost Socratic power of finding out an opponent's weak point, and exposing the half truths which pass current in our popular theology," his own conclusions were sometimes based on a scarcely solid critical foundation: nor did an unfriendly eye find it difficult to detect here and there a bit of doubtful exegesis. But he possessed something far higher and more valuable than mere skill in textual criticism, namely, that spiritual insight into the mind of God as expressed in Scripture without which the pedant's lore is but as a set of delicate instruments without the skill to use them with effect.

He was avowedly a firm believer in the opinion of the Master of Balliol and of the late Dr. Chalmers, when those eminent men affirm that—allowing for a few obvious errors in translation—difficulties in the interpretation of Scripture are seldom removed by mere verbal criticism: that "the minute examination of words often withdraws the mind from more important matters;" that the differences which prevail among ourselves are largely "inherited from the controversies or former ages;" that ordinary readers of Scripture need "no theory of inspiration—a few rules guarding against common errors being sufficient;" and that "he who, in the present state of knowledge, will confine himself to the plain meaning of words and the study of the context in our English Bible, may know more of the original spirit and intention of the authors of the New Testament than all the controversial writers of former ages put together." Above all, that "we can not understand Scripture without becoming familiar with it."

The admirable lucidity of Mr. Dunn's style, for the want of which nothing could have compensated to the general reader, together with the large measure of originality of thought which he possessed, may, we apprehend, be regarded as his distinctive characteristics as an author. As to the former of these there can be no question; and the latter must also in all fairness be conceded, though doubtless he owed much to the writings of John Foster, Isaac Taylor, and more especially Thomas Erskine, of Linlathen. Nevertheless, the truths which he had learned from them he saw from a different—if we may so express it, a more prophetic—point of view. Mr. Dunn was a decided millenarian in his views; to him the kingdom of God, though still future, was an objective reality: and in reference to this part of his teaching we have heard him express his obligation to a remarkable book, never much known and now almost forgotten—Heath's Future Human Kingdom of Christ. With the writings of Maurice—a mightier spirit than any of those mentioned—he had much less sympathy, for that great teacher dwelt in a God-illuminated cloud-land, in which the "strong common sense" on which Mr. Dunn justly prided himself could hardly breathe.

To those readers at least who are not already familiar with Mr. Dunn's teaching, it may be interesting to indicate the principal points on which it differed from the ordinary "orthodox" belief. Here, in the first place, as being indeed the ruling principle of the whole, we must mention—what we have already referred to—his conception of human life as an education rather than simply a probation; a truth, as he conceived, the recognition of which explains, as nothing else can explain, the dark riddle of humanity. And from this two further inferences naturally followed—namely, that seeing how imperfect and elementary a stage the process reaches in this life, generally speaking, for the mass of mankind, this education may, for aught we can tell, extend over illimitable ages; and secondly, that death, per se, cannot be regarded as—according to Protestant theology—eternally stereotyping the character and thus fixing the destiny of any human being.

With a rapidly increasing number of the most intelligent and Christ-like Christians of all denominations at the present day, he denied altogether that the eternal torment of the unbeliever is taught in Scripture, or can be reconciled with our noblest and purest conceptions of the character of God. He regarded that terrible dogma as inherited from the early corruptions of the Christian Church, and as being the support of a religion of terror, and the basis on which the Romish doctrines of purgatory, priestly absolution, masses for the dead and a host of other superstitions rest. At the same time he was not a Universalist, and, while a firm believer in "life in Christ alone," only partially a destructionist. In other words, he believed in the ultimate restoration of the race, but not in the necessary salvation of every individual thereof.

Intimately connected with this belief in the further training of humanity in another world was his view as to the doctrine of Election, which he regarded as the eternal choice indeed of certain individuals but for special service on behalf of others. These he believed would form what is termed in the New Testament the "Church of the first-born," the "mystical body of Christ," the "Bride of the Lamb," to whom, as "kings and priests to God and to Christ," in connection with special reward and honor, will be committed after the resurrection the instruction and government of the untaught myriads who leave this world the bond-slaves of ignorance, of sin and of consequent unbelief. "The kingdom of God" is therefore, to use his own expression, the kingdom of the resurrection. Hence, he maintained, while an unquestionable obligation rests upon Christians here and now to follow Christ and to teach, both by precept and example, the great truths he has brought to light in the gospel, they are not justified in concluding that under the present dispensation the knowledge of the Lord is ever to become universal, or that, in any sense whatever, the eternal destiny of one man has been made to depend on the zeal, the faithfulness or the money of any other human being. He therefore in some measure limited the responsibility of Christians in what may be termed the aggressive attitude toward the world.

On the question of inspiration his views were of a liberal character. The Bible he regarded as containing the word of God, but not itself being wholly such when regarded as a book. He confined inspiration—by which he understood, when the term is used in reference to Scripture, the communication of God to certain individuals of truths intended for the salvation and edification of the Church in all ages—to those portions of the book which, as Dr. J. Pye Smith says, "refer to holy things," or, as Thomas Scott puts it, "to things which, could not have been otherwise known." The verifying faculty, by which this distinction is discerned, he considered to be that "unction of the Holy One" which is spoken of by the Apostle John, by which Christians are instructed in all spiritual things. And the primary object of inspired Scripture he held to be "the instruction and correction in righteousness," to use Paul's words, "of the man of God, who is thereby to be fitted for every good word and work."

It will thus be seen that his doctrinal departures from the paths of traditional "orthodoxy" were neither few nor small; but it was his attitude toward Ecclesiasticism alone that could with any fairness be held to verge on the extreme. Not only did he utterly repudiate all human authority in matters of religion, but he had no faith whatever in the divine appointment, or, indeed, when viewed on a large scale and as a whole, in the practical usefulness of Church organizations. It was not simply against the perversions and corruptions of the churches that he protested—for which, alas, there is ample room—but against the churches per se, holding them to be of man and not of God, and therefore sure to pass away—it may be by evil hands—before the coming of the Lord.

Baptism, he argued, is obsolete under the Christian dispensation, except in the case of Jews and heathen, to whom the revelation of God as the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost has never been presented. He laid great stress on the fact—certainly a very remarkable one—that it is impossible to find in Scripture a single instance of the baptism, either of child or adult, who was not a Jew or a heathen, and this, notwithstanding thousands of children were born of Christian parents and grew up to manhood during the period embraced in the sacred records. His explanation of, and inference from, this fact being, that the rite, being into the name of the triune God, can have no meaning in harmony with Scripture when administered as a divine ordinance to either infant or adult, if the recipient has been born into the doctrine that the Divine Being is to be worshiped as the One God, "the Father of an infinite Majesty," as the Eternal Word or Son and as the Holy Spirit, the giver and sustainer of divine life.

The Lord's Supper, on the contrary, he held to be a perpetual ordinance, but household in character, intended to sanctify the family rather than to sectarianize the Church, which it does when mixed up with the discipline of church-membership or made to depend for its efficacy on any priestly performances.

Thus, by "a short and easy method," our honored friend would get rid of all discussions and disagreements, whether relating to Church government and order or to the connection of Church with State; namely, by denying altogether that Christ or his apostles ever established any visible Church on the earth with a view to permanence; that Christianity was ever planted in the world as a society but rather as an influence from above intended to act on individual natures, and by the force of individual example to become both "light" and "salt" to our fallen humanity.

Such then, in sum, was Mr. Dunn's teaching. We have, of course, presented it only as a meagre outline, but we have means of knowing that he would himself have endorsed it as substantially correct.

A few words as to the closing scene and we have done. Our lamented friend's removal was very sudden. He had for some time been suffering from a painful but not dangerous complaint from which he was recovering. On Saturday, March 16th, he seemed as well as usual, rose and dressed himself, and about midday went to the drawing-room to write a letter; as he opened the drawing-room door he was struck down by apoplexy, never spoke distinctly again, and in about half an hour was gone. Before leaving his room he concluded a brief conversation with a valued member of the household, by saying, "His (God's) love is infinite." These were his last words, and in them we think he unconsciously concentrated the essential spirit of his teaching. "God's love is infinite"—therefore the existence of an eternal hell of torment is inconceivable. "God's love is infinite"—therefore its ministries cannot be bounded by the present scene or the passing moment. "God's love is infinite"—therefore we may implicitly trust him not only with our own souls and those we love, but with the destiny of our whole sinful, suffering, dying race. "God's love is infinite"—therefore let it be ours, in our small imperfect measure, to reflect that love; remembering ever that "he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God," and making our own the heaven-born resolution of the poet, when he says:

"O Love, who formedst me to wear
The image of thy Godhead here,
Who soughtest me with tender care
Through all my wanderings wild and drear:
Oh! Love, I give myself to thee,
Thine ever, thine alone to be."

THE LIFE THE LIGHT.

"In him was life, and the life was the light of men."—
John i. 4.

HERE are two profound statements—two divine propositions, having an amazing depth of meaning. "In him"—the logos, or word—"was life." On the words "in him" the emphasis rests in the Greek. It is a peculiarity of his; among those who bear human form, he is alone in this matter; for it is not the evanescent animal life that is here spoken of, but the divine life, that which belongs inherently and exclusively to God and the word who was with God and was God—that life which properly denotes immortality, and which, consequently, no creature can have except as the wonderful "gift of God." It was in him, as the water in the fountain, or the light in the sun; it is granted to them—the free gift of infinite love—as the irrigating stream from the fountain, or the illuminating beam from the sun. Christ lives, and for that reason alone those who are one with him shall live also. He is "our life;" and therefore when he shall appear we also shall appear, or be manifested as the sons of God. The life of the Saviour and the life of the saint are not two things, but one. He lives in them (Gal. ii. 20; Rom. viii. 9); and they have not, and cannot, any independent spiritual being apart from him. All true Christian living and acting upon the face of the earth is, consequently, the living and acting of Christ through his people, the members of his body. The impulse to love one another, and to do good unto men as we have opportunity, has its first movement in the heart of Christ, and is communicated to our hearts by him.

Out of this fundamental truth of the glorious Gospel—Life in Christ—springs the other—the Life the light of men. All false religions, so far as they even pretend to reform men, and all defective views of the only true religion, proceed upon a reversed proposition. The maxim is that light gives life. The form which this maxim assumes, when it seeks practical application, is, "Let men be well instructed in the creeds, or the general doctrines of the Bible, and they will become good Christians."

This accounts for the unquestionable fact that multitudes who conventionally pass for Christians are blind to everything distinctively Christian. They do not see the things freely given of God to his family, for they have not the "life" which is an essential and indispensable prerequisite to spiritual vision. The natural, or soulish man—the man who is nothing more than a descendant of the first Adam—receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned. He may have splendid natural endowments, vast and varied intellectual powers, much scholastic culture, a refined taste, and an irreproachable character; a man, in short, every way worthy of the respect and esteem of his contemporaries; and yet there is a region of thought where he cannot mentally enter, fields of vision of surpassing beauty and grandeur of which he has no conception. That which constitutes the very essence, and charm, and glory of God's revelation is as dark to him as are the attractions of an exquisite landscape or the splendors of the firmament to a man born blind.

Is not this hard? Has not the door which admits to the inner sanctuary of thought and privilege been needlessly narrowed when such a person cannot enter? Why should God's finest region of beauty, his land of amaranthine flowers, be an unapproachable continent to this intelligent and virtuous and greatly esteemed man? The objection is very old, but the answer to it is very easy the moment we recognise the sublime fact that the salvation the Gospel speaks of is nothing less than the bestowment of immortality, that is to say, DIVINE LIFE upon persons who, at their best estate as sons of the earthly Adam, are only mortal, although they stand at the head of the animal creation. And it is here that we must enter a protest against charges which have been brought against us because we deny the natural immortality of man. It is said that we thus lower man in the scale of being, and rob him of that glorious attribute which so pre-eminently lifts him above all the other tenants of the world. We might content ourselves by calmly replying that the degradation, if it be such, is no work of ours. It is done to our hands by holy men of God, who spake as they were moved by the Holy Spirit. The natural or soulish man—psuchikos de anthroopos—"the breathing, living animal, possessing animal life" (Robinson's Gr. Lex.), is the highest designation which the Scripture has for a human being out of Christ. If there be degradation in this matter, therefore, the responsibility of inflicting it rests not with us: stronger shoulders must bear it; and we willingly shift it to them. But our censors should be careful of their blows, lest, in attempting to wound us, they hit the great apostle of the Gentiles, and thus unwittingly reveal the awkward fact that Plato, not Paul, is their theological tutor.

But we shall take the argument of our kind friends—whose solicitude for our soundness in the faith we thankfully appreciate—and use it for a purpose that did not occur to them; and as our heart is full of charity toward all men, we cherish the belief that some of them will thank us for the hint. We have not, the Scriptures have not, lowered man in the scale of creation by teaching that he is only mortal. Instead of degradation, it is all the other way; for it frail mortals of three-score years and ten can achieve such wonders, can rise to such gigantic mental stature, can live such grand lives, and can enrich nations with stores of wondrous knowledge from the depths of the earth and the sea, and the measureless height of the stars, as some of our family have done, what may we not hope for during the ages to come from men vitalised by the life and possessors of the immortality of the Son of God? The facts of human daring and doing in all the fields open to enterprise and thought and heroism are entirely independent of all theories concerning the nature of the soul; there they are, as facts, constituting the backbone, forming the very texture of human history. Were the workers animals or angels, pigmies or giants, demons or gods, there is the work itself before you, some of it astoundingly bad, some of it sublimely good; but, bad or good, its greatness is so manifest in the sense of power, that we say if God has bestowed on this kingly animal such marvelous intellectual resources, what shall he be when he stands forth in the lustre of resurrection manhood in the life and likeness of Christ? We have no theory whose exigencies tempt us to alter facts either in the way of exaggeration or diminution, but if the doctrine of the non-immortality of the soul, or life, suggests anything in relation to the present position or humanity, it is this: if the moral "sons of men" can be and do what they have been and done in this groaning creation, what shall the immortal "sons of God" be and do when the Lord, their life, shall appear, to inaugurate his glorious kingdom, to appoint his high ministers of state, and to introduce that system of things which, in due time, shall culminate in the new heavens and new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness?

Is there a flaw in this argument? If there be, a clearer eye than ours must detect it. It is not man's "immortal nature," but his intellect that makes him a naturalist, a statesman, a mathematician, a geologist, an astronomer, a philosopher, a poet, and it is neither his learning nor his morality that enables him to discern spiritual things, and to enter into God's finest region of thought, but the life of the risen Redeemer within him. If he receives Christ, he becomes a son of God (John i. 12); the Life-light shines in his heart; he is a joint-heir of the imperishable inheritance with the First-born from the dead; and because his Master lives he shall live also in the resurrection and the glory which are to signalise and celebrate the second advent of our great King.

But there is a doctrine which degrades man and dishonors God, and makes the entire scheme of the universe a disastrous failure; a doctrine everywhere current, which has for ages dominated theology, driven multitudes to madness or atheism, corrupted the Gospel, obscured the light of revelation, and brought fearful discredit upon the ineffable character of our Father in heaven; the doctrine, namely, that all human souls are deathless, that the unsaved, in numbers without number infinite, are to suffer and sin, and sin and suffer eternally, without the faintest hope of either death or redemption, and that moral evil, consequently, on a scale of enormous magnitude, is for ever to exist in the universe of the infinitely holy God. Now, it is worthy of close attention that many good men who cannot endure this terrible dogma—and of course it is unendurable to any man who looks it fully in the face—but who, nevertheless, believe in the natural immortality of the soul, take refuge from the difficulty in the idea of restoration. They know, as we know, from God's precious word, that there is a time coming when there shall be neither sin nor sorrow in the universe; and it is instructive to notice that the restoration for which they plead is through, or for the sake of, Christ; so that, though they interpose a temporary "hell" wonderfully like the papal "purgatory," yet after all they come round to the doctrine of eternal only in Christ. The "natural immortality" notion is therefore a most perplexing element in the scheme; and though it has been a source of enormous pecuniary profit to the papal clergy, and still holds a foremost place in the theology and preaching of Protestant ministers of all denominations, we humbly suggest that the true way out of the difficulty is to give it up altogether as a delusion and an impossibility, against which the Gospel doctrine of redemption is an unanswerable argument.

The truth is, the Scripture doctrine of immortality only in Christ is the key to the whole

Bible. With this key in our hand, its priceless treasures can be unlocked, and its divine purpose seen in the light of infinite love. By it the necessity of the new birth becomes obvious in a moment. We must be born from above, born of the Spirit, if we should enter into the kingdom of God. The natural man, even if he were sinless, could not enter there; for the region and the associations are supernatural, and make supernatural qualifications essential to admission. It is not merely because of sin and the corruption which it has entailed that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God. Flesh and blood are corrupt, and cannot inherit incorruption: this is so obviously true, as to render illustration or proof needless; but we see more than that in this matter. The first man was of the earth earthy, even before his disobedience: that was his nature and condition from the moment of his creation; and though it would be useless to speculate about the possible constitution of the world had our first father not sinned, yet we are perfectly certain that the position to which believers are raised by union with the second Man, the Lord from heaven, and the magnificent future secured to them in consequence of that union, are immeasurably superior to anything that could have been possible to a race of merely human beings even in the event of its sinlessness. They argue blindly who tell us that the object of Christ's redemption is to bring us back to the condition of the unfallen Adam in Eden. Thanks be to God, its object is unspeakably greater than that! The first at his best estate is no model for us, and the paradise of our inheritance dwarfs his to invisibility. We are made partakers of the divine nature, are the children of light, the sons of God, temples of the Holy Spirit, and heirs of the glory which shall be revealed and the crowns which shall be given when our Lord, our Life, returns to wield the sceptre of universal dominion. Truly, we must be born from above to make these things, or any one of them, possible! We have borne the image of the earthy, and are not by any means proud of it; but we shall bear the image of the heavenly; and when we see in the Life-light what God has done for us by his dear Son, we would not have the nature and history of man other than they are; for where sin abounded grace did much more abound; that as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life, by JESUS CHRIST OUR LORD.

The other special teachings of revelation become equally clear when viewed in connection with immortality only in Christ. Take, for example, those of Resurrection and the Second Advent. These determinations of the divine purpose will, it is well known, be realized together. "When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory;" or, to adopt Alford's reading, "When Christ, who is our life, is manifested, then shall ye also with him be manifested in glory." The appearance, or manifestation, here spoken of can be none other than the actual, literal coming of the Lord according to His promise: "I go to prepare a place for you; and if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself; that where I am there ye may be also." But all this belongs to the supernatural, and proceeds upon the principle that God's people are not a natural or earthly, but a supernatural or heavenly family. It is the Christ-life, not the Adamic, the divinely communicated, not the naturally inherited, immortality that is in them. If the doctrine of human immortality, with its theological branches of a happy heaven and a miserable hell of conscious souls, were true, why the return of the Saviour to this world? and why the resurrection of the righteous from among the dead? An intelligent answer to these important questions cannot be obtained from "orthodox" theology; for, hampered as it is by its utterly false notions of immortality and its equally false soul-worlds of glory and of woe, the magnificent objects to be attained by the advent and the resurrection are not discernible by its eye. But when it is remembered that the Church is the Body of Christ, and that He is its life, the advent and the resurrection are seen to be constituent parts of a wonderful whole every way worthy of the infinite wisdom of God and the everlasting admiration of men. The redemption of the body can only be effected by Him who has given us the first-fruits of His Spirit; but as surely as we are conscious of the latter, so surely "shall the Lord Himself descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore comfort one another with these words."

COMMUNITY OF GOODS.

A FRIEND writes me as follows: "I have a few questions to ask and suggestions to make in regard to the Holy Spirit. First, I ask what induced the multitude of followers in the days of the apostles to surrender up all their worldly possessions? Was it not the direct teaching of the Holy Spirit? If it was, does it not teach the same now? The next question is, Can those who are not joint heirs in temporal things become joint heirs in the kingdom to come? If the early teaching of the Holy Spirit then required this, and the withholding of it was fatal, as in the case of Ananias and Sapphira, is there not a fearful responsibility, to say the least, on the part of those who resist this Spirit by holding back this material part of Christian duty? Is it not doing the same as they did? If death was then the penalty, is it not so now? Even if not executed in that summary manner, is it not a lesson as much for us as for those who were then present? I hope to receive an answer to these questions. V.

RESPONSE BY THE EDITOR.

I do not consider it necessary to give an answer to each question of our friend. In the first place the occasion recorded in Acts ii. has never occurred since, where thousands from various parts of the world were detained by an unlooked-for occurrence, so that there was a necessity to give them relief. While thus detained, all who had the means contributed to those who had not, and did it with joy. So Christ sometimes fed the multitudes who waited on his ministry, by miracle.

Again: The case of Ananias and Sapphira is not properly considered. In that case, also, a multitude had been converted, and there was a necessity to provide for their temporal wants for the time being. Those disposed to aid in that work made common cause of it, and sold houses and lands for that purpose, and presented the funds to the apostles to distribute to "every man according as he had need." There was no command given to any one to sell their houses and lands, but if they did do it, it was a voluntary matter. The guilt of Ananias and Sapphira was that they lied about it, professing that they gave all when they kept back a part. This is evident from the fact that Peter said, "While it remained" (i. e., unsold) "was it not thine own?" That is, you were not under obligation to sell it. "And after it was sold was it not in thine own power?" That is, you were at liberty to give all or only a part. But they "kept back a part," and professed they had given all. Here was the sin—not in giving a part only, but in "lying unto God" by pretending to give all when they had not. It is the lie on which Peter pronounces the guilt. He admits they need not to sell unless they chose, and after it was sold it was their right to give all or only a part; but they lied about it, pretending to give all, but kept back a part. For their lie they died.

That it is the duty of Christians to give aid to their needy brethren is clear, provided they have means, or as "God hath prospered them."—1 Cor. xvi. 2. "Whoso hath this world's goods, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?"—1 John iii. 17. Again, "Charge them that are rich in this world . . . that they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate," etc.—1 Tim. vi. 17, 18.

There is no command to give all Christians an equal share in what is your possession, or to form a community therewith. Such a community might possibly exist, but then every member is bound to contribute by industry to the common stock of goods; and, says Paul, "We commanded you, if any would not work, neither should he eat."—2 Thess. iii. 10. A lazy or idle man or woman has no claim on God nor man for food or help. But the destitute, from unavoidable circumstances, call for our compassion and assistance to the extent of our ability. All men in this respect are one community; and, "As we have opportunity, let us do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith."—Gal. vi. 10.

DID DAVID POSSESS THE SPIRIT OF CHRIST?

If he did not, "he is none of his" and cannot be made like him when He comes. If he did, on what principle can we reconcile some of his writings with that spirit? There are expressions in the Psalms of David that take the form of prayer that, viewed in the light of popular religious views, must shock the fine sensibilities of every truly sanctified heart. Here is a sample—Psa. lv. 15: "Let death seize upon them, and let them go down quick into hell; for wickedness is in their dwellings, and among them." Suppose the "orthodox" idea of hell is correct, what sort of spirit must David possess to pray God to send men quickly down into a place of unutterable, intolerable and interminable torture? Does it fulfill that requirement of the Gospel of the loving Christ which reads, "But I say unto you, love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you."—Matt. v. 44.

It is true that the case with David was an aggravating one. The people that he wishes to send to hell have abused his confidence. They have, while professing to be his friends, treated him very wickedly and very cruelly; but Christ tells us just what we must do under just these circumstances in order to be the children of our Father which is in heaven.—(See verse 45.)

If this was the only text where David prays in this manner for wicked men we might suppose that he had been left to fall into a wrong state of feeling and afterward repented of it. It is, however, only one text out of many of the same import.

Here is another specimen—Psa. lxx. 13: "Consume them in wrath, consume them that they may not be." There is a class of religionists who believe that every individual of our race who is found out of Christ when he comes the second time will be utterly destroyed, and that, too, without any opportunity having ever been given them to believe in Christ and be saved. Is this what David prayed for? Was he so anxious that God should annihilate the wicked? It must be evident that if David understood that the destruction that he prayed might overtake his enemies was final, he had not the spirit of Christ. Christ rebuked his disciples for manifesting a desire that wicked men might be consumed, and told them, "ye know not what spirit ye are of."

If David understood that the judgments that he desired should be visited upon the heads of the unregenerate would send them into irrecoverable ruin, whether that ruin be torment or annihilation, his feelings and the spirit that he manifested are diametrically opposed to the Gospel of Christ, and to the mind of that God who has declared that "he doth not willingly afflict nor grieve the children of men," and that "his tender mercies are over all the work of his hands."

David was a man of God, and was recognized by Christ as a prophet. How then can we account for the language of the texts quoted, and of others of the same character? My plan is to let David explain himself. Take the last text named. The whole verse reads, "Consume them in wrath, consume them that they may not be: and let them know that God ruleth in Jacob unto the ends of the earth." How can they know that God ruleth to the ends of the earth after they are destroyed so as not to be, if that destruction is final? The question is a fair one, and should be answered satisfactorily by those who believe that the above-named consumption is unending annihilation.

David, however, tells distinctly why he wants them destroyed. It is that they may know that the Lord ruleth in Jacob unto the ends of the earth.

The entire eighty-third Psalm down to the seventeenth verse is a continued prayer of David for God's judgments to be visited upon unregenerate men; but the last verse tells plainly why he wishes them to be afflicted. It is "that men may know that those, whose name alone is JEHOVAH, art the Most High over all the earth."

What benefit would this be to them if they were only to awake to this knowledge to mourn and wail in utter despair? This they must do if there is no hope for them beyond that awakening. How could David use the language recorded in the one hundred and thirty-sixth Psalm, if the destruction spoken of sent the subjects of it to endless suffering; or into a death sleep to be raised again only to weep and wail; or into everlasting oblivion, never again to open their eyes in life? I will quote a few texts: Verse 15, "But overthrew Pharaoh and his host in the Red Sea: for His mercy endureth forever: Verse 18, "And slew famous kings: for His mercy endureth forever." Sihon, king of the Amolites, Og, king of Bashan, are enumerated among these famous kings, and the declaration of their slaughter is accompanied with the statement that "his mercy endureth forever." If the doom of these kings was torment, will someone tell how God manifested any mercy to them? Neither Sihon, or Og, or the people over whom they reigned ever had the smallest opportunity to believe in God before their destruction, and were, therefore, never put on probation for eternal life. How their slaughter can be a manifestation of God's everlasting mercy I am not able to see. When, however, I recognize the principle laid down by David that through these visitations of divine wrath God will convince those kings and their people that He is God, He is the ruler over all the earth; it being the first lesson in bringing them to recognize God's sovereignty, it will in a measure prepare them to receive the news of salvation in the coming ages; or, if they reject it, and die the second death, the fault will be wholly their own.

When God shall, as David prays (See Psal. ix. 20), "Put them in fear," it is "that the nations may know themselves to be but men;" and if they will profit by that knowledge and turn to him who is their God and Saviour, they will secure a life that shall never end. That the vast majority of them will thus turn unto the Lord is plainly affirmed by David, the prophet of God. The language employed in stating this great fact is plain and forcible. "All the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord: all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before thee."—Psa. xxii. 27. "He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth. They that dwell in the wilderness shall bow before him; and his enemies shall lick the dust. The kings of Tarshish and the isles shall bring presents: the kings of Sheba and Seba shall offer gifts. Yea, all kings shall fall before him: all nations shall serve him."—Psa. lxxii. 8-11. "All nations whom thou has made shall come and worship before thee, O Lord; and shall glorify thy name. For thou art great and doest wondrous things: thou art God alone."—Psa. lxxvi. 9, 10.

These nations will be punished, destroyed for their sins, it is true. They are destroyed because their ways are evil, and only evil, and that continually. There is, however, a very important consideration in their case. They have an evil nature; a nature that at all times leads to evil. It is the very nature in which they were created; and its tendencies are so strong to evil that they could not do good, if they had a disposition, without divine help. "The carnal mind is enmity against God: for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be."—Rom. viii. 7. "They that are in the flesh cannot please God."—Verse 8.

These peoples have had no opportunity whatever to get rid of carnality—to get out of the flesh—for they died in total ignorance of the plan that God has devised to accomplish their redemption from the flesh, make them spiritually minded, and thereby bring them into a condition of obedience to the law of God. On the principle that no such opportunity will ever be given them, how are we to reconcile David's oft repeated prayer for their destruction with that declaration recorded by another of the holy prophets that God has no pleasure in the death of the wicked? When, however, we remember that those judgments which have been visited upon nations in the past are designed to be disciplinary—to lead them to see after that through the efficacy there is in the death and resurrection of Christ, they are redeemed from the Adamic death, that God meant it for their good; and to know his power, not only to kill, but to make alive, it will be one of the means God will employ to lead them to the great life-giver, that they may, by faith in him, have an unending life.

This great leading fact in the divine economy is referred to in the Apocalypse. John sees the redeemed bride of Christ, standing on the sea of glass, having the harps of God in their hands. He hears them sing the song of Moses the servant of God, and the song of the Lambs, "Saying, great and marvelous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways thou king of saints." (King of the nations: EM. DIA.) Who shall not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name? for thou only art holy: for all nations shall come and worship before thee; for thy judgments are made manifest."

Here a song is sung by immortal, redeemed saints; and in that song they declare that all nations shall (in the future from that time), come and worship before God. The reason assigned why they shall do this is that God's judgments are made manifest. They have been made manifest to them; they see what God meant by them. They then see that even in these inflictions of judgment God's mercy endureth for ever. But, says one, Why does God take such a long road to reach the accomplishment of this work? Why did he not give them their probation in this life? You might just as well ask, Why did he not make all the race immortal at once. Why put them on probation at all? God's plan is to bring every child of the race to salvation, if they are saved at all, through a course of discipline and trial. It is best for all, instead of attempting to arrange a plan for the adoption of the great I AM, to accept the plan he has given in his word, obey the conditions of that plan, and gain eternal life when that plan shall be consummated.

S. W. BISHOP.

West Meriden, Conn., Box 566.

[I commend the following article to the careful reading of all sincere inquirers after truth. I dissent from it in one particular. I believe the second advent is presented in the Bible in two aspects; one relates to the true "body of Christ," or "the Bride of the Lamb," and may now occur at any moment, in which Christ cometh "as a thief," unseen by the world in general.—Rev. xvi. 15. Such "escape" the "great tribulation" coming on the world, and "stand before the Son of man" by a translation.—Luke xxi. 34-36. This is overlooked or not believed by the author of the following "Address."

The other aspect, or the "coming of Christ in glory, with all his saints with him."—1 Thess. iii. 13. Then "every eye shall see him."—Rev. i. 7.

That this open revelation of Christ from heaven will not occur till after the restoration of Judah, or the Jews, and perhaps Israel also, is most likely the truth, as the "Address" below affirms. I have long thought that such is the order of God in relation to the return of Christ from heaven.

Let the article below be pondered well, remembering, "of that day and hour knoweth no man, no not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father." "Take heed, watch and pray; for ye know not when the time is."—Mark xiii. 32, 33.—ED. OF EXAMINER.]

ISRAEL'S NEARING RETURN, AND RUSSIA, TURKEY AND ENGLAND.

THE great subject of our conference is the second coming of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Our object is to help each other in looking hopefully for him. We believe that the night is far spent, and that the day is at hand, and we desire to be up and ready when the morning dawns, prepared to bid a joyful welcome to the Son of Righteousness, when he arises with healing in his wings.

I am not about to quote the many passages in which the restoration and conversion of Israel is clearly predicted, but simply to consider the bearing of the subject on our hope of the Lord's return. I take it for granted that those to whom I am speaking are thoroughly satisfied that the time is coming, sooner or later, when Israel, as a nation, will be both restored and converted; and my only object is to consider the connection between their restoration and the second advent of our blessed Redeemer.

That the two events are most intimately connected in the prophetic Word there cannot be a doubt. The words of David (Psalm cii. 16) are perfectly clear: "When the Lord shall build up Zion he shall appear in his glory." So Christ's future glorious reign is constantly connected with Jerusalem. It is upon the throne of David, and over his kingdom, the son of David will be seated; and it is at Jerusalem that he must reign in glory; for the Scripture declares, "The moon shall be confounded, and the sun ashamed when the Lord of Hosts shall reign in Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously."—Isa. xxiv. 23.

But now arises the most important practical question, and one most deeply affecting our immediate hope of the Lord's return: Will the restoration take place before the return of our blessed Lord, or after it? Will the house of Israel be gathered in from all nations to Palestine before he comes, or will his coming bring them back?

You see at a glance the importance of the question, and its overwhelming influence on our daily expectation; for if we are told that our Lord when he comes will find his people despised, and Jerusalem still trodden under foot of the Gentiles, then the second coming may take place at any moment; and there is nothing in Jewish prophecy to prevent our waking up to-morrow morning and finding that he is here. But if, on the other hand, we are taught that Israel is to be restored before he comes, then it is plain that we are not now justified in expecting his advent.

We have been told recently of the return of many Jews to Palestine, and have heard that the number in and around Jerusalem has increased three-fold; but that increase is only from about five to about fifteen thousand, and that is not enough to constitute the fulfillment of the prophecy. That is in no sense the restoration of the nation; so that if the restoration is to be brought about before the return of our blessed Saviour, we must come to the conclusion that there are further changes of great magnitude and importance before the second advent, and we are not justified by the word of God in expecting that advent at once. I have no hesitation in stating my own conviction on two points:

1. That we cannot expect the second advent until after the restoration of the Jews.
2. That we may expect the restoration at any time.

I believe it to be now, in reference to the restoration of the Jews and the second coming of the Lord, as it was in regard to the predicted apostasy in connection with the second coming. The Apostle Paul in his first Epistle to the Thessalonians, iv. 6, spoke as if he expected the second advent at once; but in the second he warns the Thessalonians not to be "troubled, as that the day of Christ is at hand," that is, "now upon you, enesteken;" "for," said he (2 Thess. ii. 3), "that day shall not come until there comes the falling away, or the apostasy, first." He taught them, therefore, that although they were to be on the look-out, and were to comfort each other with the delightful hope of welcoming the Lord, they were still to be prepared to wait on till after the development of the predicted apostasy. Just so I believe it to be now with reference to the Jews and the coming of the Lord. We are to be looking out for his coming. But if we expect him before the Jews are restored our expectation will, I believe, end in disappointment; for we may say of Israel's restoration what St. Paul said of the apostasy, "That day shall not come, except there come the restoration first."

But if this be the case, it behooves us, of course, to consider what prospect there is of a speedy restoration which, I have said, we may expect at any time. Now, I believe it to be the teaching of the Word of God that the restoration of the Jews, as a nation, to Palestine, will take place before their national conversion. Hence the restoration may take place at any time, even though Israel, as a nation, is still unconverted to the Lord.

For the proof I must be content with referring to only one passage, and that shall be Ezekiel xxxvi.

The order of events in this passage, relating to the whole house of Israel, exactly corresponds to the twelfth chapter of Zechariah respecting Judah. There is, first, restoration, and after that, conversion; first, the regathering of the people to the land, and then the pouring forth of the Holy Ghost on the regathered people for their conversion, that so they may look on him whom they pierced and enjoy the promise of verse twenty-eight, "Ye shall dwell in the land that I gave to your fathers and ye shall be my people and I will be your God."

We are not, therefore, to wait for the conversion of Israel before we are free to expect their restoration to Judea. The work of conversion may be going on slowly, and there may be at present no more than the ingathering of the elect remnant of the Lord; but the restoration may be upon us any day, and the world may be startled any morning by the sound of the Jubilee trumpet summoning the scattered people to return to their homes.

And why should there be any further delay? For, look at the subject in the light of modern politics. All eyes are turned with deepest interest to the East, and all England is watching with the utmost anxiety the occupation of Constantinople by Russia, and why? Not because of any intrinsic value in Constantinople itself, for we do not want, as Englishmen, to hold Constantinople; but because Constantinople commands the high road by sea to Suez, just as Kars and Erzeroum command the high road by land.

Our communication with India is dependent on that narrow Isthmus of Suez, and in consequence of the absence of the Jews in Palestine, the approach to that isthmus from the north is altogether uncovered. The highway from the north is open to any enemy; and what England and France require for the protection of Suez is a strong people in the very district which God gave to Abraham, the district reaching from the sea to the rivers.

The return of the Jews to Palestine is the very thing required to allay the anxieties of Western Europe. If they were to return, with all their great talents and enterprise, with a prime minister of the statesmanship of Lord Beaconsfield, a commander-in-chief with the ability of Von Moltke, a Rothschild for Chancellor of the Exchequer, and a Montefiore at the head of every benevolent and patriotic enterprise, and if they were to throw all their wonderful energy into the revival of that magnificent fertile territory, they would supply exactly what Europe requires, a protective power on the northern side for the Alexandrian railway and the Suez canal.

But we are students of prophecy, not of politics, and our business is to consider, not so much the plans of the politician as the predicted purposes of God. And surely when we look at those predicted purposes, and compare them with the most conspicuous elements of the present crisis, it is very difficult to avoid the conclusion that the great event may be close at hand.

God has foretold that the great Euphratean flood is to be dried up so that the kings of the East may pass over, which means, as I believe, that the Turkish power shall be exhausted, in order that the house of Israel may return to Palestine. Accordingly we are witnessing in these days the rapid decline of the Ottoman Empire. The Euphratean flood has already receded from Europe, for the Turk has ceased to be a European power. The waters are as shallow as possible over Asia Minor; dry land has already appeared; and there is nothing to prevent the waters receding any hour from Palestine.—See Rev. xvi. 12.

He has foretold that there will be a mighty power in the north, the prince of Rosh, Mesekh and Tubal, (or, as in modern English, of Russia, Moscow and Tobolsk), ready to swoop down on the people when restored; and accordingly we see that colossal empire of the north pushing its conquests southward, and already as far as Erzeroum, on the high road from St. Petersburg to Palestine.—See Ezek. xxxviii. 39.

And he has foretold that the ships of Tarshish are to have the honor of being the first to carry back his people. And believing, as I do, that the ships of Tarshish are the ocean-going ships of Western Europe, I think I can see in that prophecy the honor in store for our own dear country, and look on England as having been raised to be the greatest naval power in the world, in order that she may be the leading nation in the sacred work of conveying God's people to the land which he has given them.

All, therefore, is ready. The land is ready, being stripped, to a great extent of its population. The people are ready, being preserved all these eighteen hundred years, scattered, but yet distinct. The Turks, we may say, are ready, for it is perfectly clear that they have no power to check the rapid progress of their own decay; and if the report be true that they are already packing up for Broussa, what is to prevent their extending their journey to their original starting place at Bagdad?

The Russians are ready, for their eye is already on Jerusalem; and I trust that England is ready, according to the prophecy, in Isaiah xi. 9, already waiting for the Lord herself, and prepared to fulfill her sacred mission: "To bring thy sons from afar, their silver and their gold with them, unto the name of the Lord thy God, and to the Holy One of Israel, because he hath glorified thee."

But if all be ready, what is the hindrance? Why should not the restoration be decided upon by the powers of Europe in the approaching conference? Why should we not, this very summer, witness the fulfillment of the prophecy, "Who hath heard such a thing? Who hath seen such things? Shall the earth (or land) be made to bring forth in one day? or shall a nation be born at once? for as soon as Zion travailed, she brought forth her children.—Address at the Mildmay Conference on February 27, by Rev. Canon Hare, Vicar of Tunbridge Wells.

THE SEVEN CHURCHES.

BY HENRY BRITTAIN.

I HAVE long considered the Seven Churches (to whom the letters through John were addressed, as given us in the Revelation of Jesus Christ) to be representative churches, and as affording the sure standpoint for those who, not accepting the vagaries of year-day expositors, yet could point to these churches as filling up the whole period of the history of professing Christian churches till the end of the Christian age. I am indeed thankful to God that I do not stand alone in this matter. In directing the attention of the servants of God to the statements I make, I must acknowledge my indebtedness to Moir, Trench, Maitland, W. Lincoln, J. Smith, and Gen. Goodwyn.

The Seven Churches are connected with "the things that are." The apostle, after stating them, is summoned to "come up hither," and then is shown the things about to occur after these things shown before. (Compare Rev. i. 19 with Rev. iv. 1.)

Bearing this in mind, I will now state the position I take with regard to the Seven Churches in the form of a proposition, as follows:

The Seven Churches were to be, prophetically, the historical representatives of the various phases of the professing Christian assemblies, until the removal of the true and faithful servants of the Lord.

I. Ephesus. Names are not given or chosen in these things of God without a purpose. The word Ephesus means, the sender forth, or, as others state, the desirable. "The sender forth." It was here the apostle Paul dwelt for two years, so that all they which dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord Jesus, both Jews and Greeks—Acts xix. It was here the word of God mightily grew and prevailed. The word was sent forth with no uncertain sound, but was the power of God unto salvation.

It was a "desirable" church, for heron we have stamped the seven unities: one Body, one Spirit, one Lord, one Faith, one Immersion, one Hope and one God and Father of all. The Church of Unity and Peace.

As a city of importance and standing it had long been known. It was styled, "The Empress of Ionia, renowned Ephesus, famous for war and learning." Pliny names it, "One of the Eyes of Asia." It was the seat of the Panionium, and termed "the good city of Ephesus." Its Temple of Diana, one of the seven wonders of the world, had been built seven times, and seven times been destroyed. In it Darius had walked, Alexander sacrificed, and Anthony worshiped. Its goddess was famous and known under the name of Magos. The roll of its citizens was rich in philosophers, rhetoricians, painters, sculptors, poets, and historians.

It was celebrated for its tents, made in the Persian manner. In the manufacture of these it was, doubtless, that Paul worked with his own hands—Acts xx. 34. It was here Paul left his cloak, and the books, and the parchments, which his heart longed for when he wrote to Timothy. (See 2 Tim. iv. 13). It is in connection with the elders of the church at Ephesus we have recorded one of the most touching scenes in the Apostle Paul's chequered life—Acts xx. It is to them the words are spoken—how they must have cut into the apostle's heart as he spoke—"For I know this, that after my departing shall grievous wolves enter in among you, not sparing the flock. Also, of your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw disciples after them."

How true his words! For was it not said, not long afterwards, to this church (Rev. ii. 6)—"Thou hatest the deeds of the Nicolaitanes, which I also hate?" Nicolaitanes—who were and are they? The conquerors of the people. (Nikao, to conquer; Laos, the people) This church hated their deeds. The wolves did arise, not sparing the flock, and the people are subdued. True, some say that the Nicolaitanes are so called after a person named Nicolas, or Nicolaus. But Nicolas means a conqueror of the people.

This Church had tried them which had said they were apostles, but were not. No apostles have existed since the time of Paul and his apostles, therefore we are kept to this period by the use of this expression.

But it had left its first love. Therefore the warning, "Do the first works." The decline foreseen by the apostle had commenced; despite the gracious encouragement and warning, was continued; and its candlestick was removed out of its place.

So the first phase passed away in all churches similar to Ephesus. Active in the sending forth of the word, ever to be desired for their unity, fit and meet for the Master's use, its worst foes rose within its own fold, and became the source and cause of downfall and rejection.

Shall we connect this phase with our nation and land, Britain? In 2 Tim. iv. 21, it is recorded: "Do thy diligence to come before winter. Eubulus greeteth thee, and Pudens, and Linus, and Claudia, and all the brethren." Thus wrote Paul to Timothy at Ephesus, while he, a prisoner in chains, was at Rome—2 Tim. i. 16. This sister, Claudia, known to the apostle Paul, was a British princess, and Pudens, her husband, was a Roman senator. The proofs of this statement are well known to scholars. Hence, then, we have a link given us, which enables us to fasten on our hearts and minds the first phase of the professing Christian Church, portrayed to us as the assembly in Ephesus.

OBITUARY.

BROTHER STORRS: It becomes my painful duty to give notice, through the BIBLE EXAMINER, of the death of a faithful, loving disciple of our Lord Jesus Christ. Our beloved brother in Christ, L. S. Montrose, of Lynn, Mass., fell asleep in Jesus on Saturday, March 23d, after an illness of only one week. The disease (acute rheumatism) seated on the heart, and death, the great conqueror, claimed him for his prey; but he went down sweetly, and firmly trusting in Jesus the great Life-giver of the race, looking for a life that shall never end in the endless succession of ages. Brother Montrose was thirty-four years, one month and ten days old. He was in everything a Christian. He was an earnest and zealous advocate of truth, and was one of the first in Lynn to embrace the doctrine of the ages to come as taught in the EXAMINER. He possessed something more, however, than a mere intellectual conception of truth; he knew the power of the Spirit of God in sealing truth on the heart; and he evinced by his daily walk, and in the manifestation always of the meek spirit of our divine Lord, that he was a Christian in deed.

My acquaintance with Brother Montrose was brief, but of the most pleasant character. He leaves a dear companion, with whom all the days of his married life were crowned with the joy of a loving union of kindred hearts. She is almost distracted with grief; but, trusting in a God of infinite love, she will be sustained while draining to the dregs the bitter cup that has been pressed to her lips. Two sisters, also, are left in deep sorrow—sorrow such as none but sensitive, loving hearts can feel when compelled to yield to the stern demands of death our dearest treasures. They know, however, that he will sleep but a little while. The morning of joy “hasteth greatly”; and soon the opening heavens will reveal the King of kings, and the darkness of death with the elect of God will give place to the light of the eternal ages. Amen. Come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly. Come and give us back our jewels. Come, and introduce those endless years of reunion, when, crowned with immortality, we shall meet and never more be separated by death for the ages of the ages.

S. W. BISHOP.

LETTERS AND EXTRACTS.

FROM POLLY G. PITTS.

BROTHER STORRS: I bless God for sweet revivings; yes, and bless his name for the BIBLE EXAMINER, and for giving you strength, health and wisdom to bring it out laden with truth; and I bless his holy name for storing its contributors' minds with the precious truths of the Gospel of the kingdom; and I bless him that the truths of the Gospel are like a polished diamond that has been cut a thousand ways—every way you turn it it glitters and shines. How often I think, what can be said more, on some important truths, than has been said! This came into my mind this morning while reading Brother Bishop's article, “The Abrahamic Kingdom.” Oh! may that blessed Holy Spirit that now again opens my understanding to see new light in God's light keep me from again thinking or feeling that all has been said on any of God's eternal truths that can be said.

God's oath and promise to Abraham must last as long as God exists; and the blessing must last as long as Abraham and his seed last.—Gen. xii. 2, 3. Abraham's seed, which is Christ (see Gal. iii. 15), must last as long as God exists, for God and Christ are one (John x. 30); and as Christ was made Priest by the oath of God, and after the power of an endless life (Heb. vii. 16-28), his Priesthood must continue as long as he lives, and his body—“the Bride”—must live as long as the Head.—Col. i. 18. His kingdom must last as long as he lives. See Dan. vii. 19. And of the “increase and peace of his government there shall be no end.”—Isa. ix. 7.

Now, if the government of Christ is to increase without end, there must be generations, and, of course, probation. Let us look at what the prophet David says, Psa. cv. 6-11: “O, ye seed of Abraham his servant, ye children of Jacob his chosen. He is the Lord our God: his judgments are in all the earth. He hath remembered his covenant forever, the word which he commanded to a thousand generations. Which covenant he made with Abraham, and his oath unto Isaac; and confirmed the same unto Jacob for a law, and to Israel for an everlasting covenant,” etc. Now, if we have had but about 200 generations in 6000 years, and Christ is at the door, how many 1,000 years must there be, after he comes, for 800 generations to pass away? Surely there must be, according to God's word, “ages to come,” and probation in those ages. Oh! when I am revived, the blessed Spirit carries me back to the time when God's blessed truths, of the last days, began to shine into my mind. I think it was about 1835 that the Book of Daniel became opened and very interesting, and I read it with delight; not that I understood as I do now; but I loved Jesus and loved his word, and it drew me nearer to him. In 1838 I read the first pamphlet that William Miller put out on the coming of Christ the second time in 1843 or '44. Oh! it made me glad; the Book of Daniel grew brighter; but the penalty of God's law, as it was preached, troubled me; how could it be ever executed? If man was immortal he must live as long as God lives; and is there any proportion between the crime and the penalty? No; to me there was none. Job says: “Man, that is born of a woman, is of few days, and full of trouble. He cometh forth like a flower and is cut down; he fleeth also as a shadow, and continueth not." Again he says: "There is hope of a tree, if it be cut down, that it will sprout again," . . . "but man dieth and wasteth away: yea, man giveth up the ghost (or expires), and where is he?" Answer—"As the waters fail from the sea, and the flood decayeth and drieth up: so man lieth down and riseth not: till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake nor be raised out of their sleep."

How many such clear and blessed truths are in the Scriptures! And yet the mind is so filled with tradition, and man "immortal," that it is hard to see the truth. But, bless the Lord forever, the light came; for God had been preparing it; and it came in the "Six Sermons" in 1842. Oh! what light, what comfort, what consolation! Could there be anything more said on that point? No, not then; but afterwards much—yes, much. When I look back to that time I compare the "Six Sermons" to great drops that come before a powerful shower. Oh! what light is spreading on the great leading truths of the Bible; and they grow brighter and brighter, and will till the perfect day.

I should like to speak of many things, but cannot; the mind is weak and feeble; and I could not do justice to any. I should like to say something on the blessed "ages to come," when the "everlasting Gospel" is to be preached to them that dwell on the earth, and "to every nation, kindred, tongue and people"—Rev. xiv.; and on the blessed, holy Sabbath of the Lord, which has been my delight many years, and of prophets and saints. And the light that has shone on the judgment day. But I am not equal to the task; the mind is weary, the flesh is weak.

Your sister in the Lord; looking, watching, waiting for our Lord.

Fredericksburg, Iowa, May, 1878.

FROM R. H. SHERRILL.

BROTHER STORRS: Through the kindness of my highly esteemed friend and brother, J. S. Lawver, of Columbus, Kansas, I am in receipt of several numbers of the BIBLE EXAMINER. Two years ago I was baptized into the faith that this earth, renovated of sin and transgression, would be the everlasting abode of Christ and his resurrected and immortalized saints; and that Christ would descend from heaven to earth, sound forth the trump of Almighty God, awake the sleeping saints, change the living from mortal to immortality, confer upon them that precious boon and gift of God, eternal life; and that man is depending absolutely upon the resurrection from the dead for immortality; and that the dead, from death to the resurrection, are unconscious, and know nothing; and that the Lord Jesus will personally return to earth, and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over Israel and the nations of the earth throughout the unending age of the ages to come; and that in the seed of Abraham should all the nations of the earth be blessed. But I am free to confess that until I read the BIBLE EXAMINER was I ever able to see clearly God's proposed plan in bringing about the final redemption, restoration or restitution of all things. But now, to my mind, nothing can be clearer. And now the sincere gratitude of my heart is to you, Brother Storrs, as being instrumental in the hands of God of shedding forth an ocean of thought, a world of intelligence, in enabling me to thus behold the wondrous workings of Almighty God, in redeeming the world of mankind. "But we see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honor, that he by the grace of God should taste death for every man." Glorious thought, transcendently marvelous! Conceived in wisdom peculiar alone to the eternal Jehovah. That untold millions of human beings have lived and died without a knowledge of God, without a knowledge of the plan of human redemption, will be made alive in Christ, who "gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time," and will either reject or accept of the benefits of the atonement and be saved with an everlasting salvation, or perish for wilful rejection of Christ. May God bless you, and may your labors be abundantly blessed. Press onward with renewed energy and zeal; the prize will soon be won. Your laborious task will soon be over; the Lord of glory will soon call us home, and may we be found ready, patiently waiting and looking for that blessed hope, and a full and perfect realization of all the glory and felicity guaranteed to us in the kingdom of Almighty God.

Spring Valley, Ark., April, 1878.

FROM GORWOOD BURSELL.

DEAR EDITOR: Although a stranger to you, I feel under obligations at least to write one short letter as a word of cheer to you, that I myself have been benefited by the reading of your BIBLE EXAMINER and other works, especially your tract on "Election." After I had read it the light shone on the Bible like the noon-day sun. I feel as though I had been ungrateful to you and to my God—to you, as the channel which conducted the light to me; and to God, the great fountain from whence you derived it. I have read the BIBLE EXAMINER some three years. The first year Bro. S. S. Call brought his numbers to me after he had read them. Although I had but little faith in them at first, I soon became interested. The tract on "Election" made it all clear. Since that time I have been trying to let my light shine before my fellow-men; it is like fire shut up in my bones. I dare not hide it, neither have I any disposition to do so. I feel in my heart you are doing a great work, although well stricken in years. My prayer to God is that you, together with your noble correspondents, may live to carry on the work of spreading light and joy to many hearts. May you live till the blessed Saviour shall come and speak the word, "Well done!"

I am seventy years of age. I feel natural vigor begins to fail; but the hope beyond, in the coming ages, makes the spirit joyful. May you be preserved unto his heavenly kingdom!

FROM LUCRETIA B. LAMB.

BRO. STORRS: I write now with emotions such as I never experienced before, believing that I am addressing you in this way for the last time. This does not, however, produce sadness or regret, but thanksgiving and praise that the Infinite Father in his wisdom and love has provided such a glorious future for the believing, trusting heart, and now, after many years of conflict and victory, is presenting to our view the clear evidence that the haven is so near that we can lift up our heads and rejoice, for redemption is drawing nigh. How rich the thought that the Master has, in this time of trial and conflict, been strengthening us to stand, so that we have not deserted our colors or betrayed our trust—have made his word the foundation of faith and hope by his grace and love! Can it be that riches so great and glory so infinite are to be ours, who have no righteousness of our own? Yes, we shall see Jesus as he is, and be permitted to wear his image. What glory fills the mind in this contemplation! We need have no fear that our expectations will be overdrawn, for it has not entered into the heart of man the things God has prepared for them that love him. Such shall be mine, saith the Lord of Hosts, when I make up my jewels.

Now, dear brother, I bid you an affectionate farewell, expecting when I address you again it will be in the company of those who have turned many to righteousness—not among the popular divines who have electrified their hearers with their eloquence and display, but among those whose hearts beat in unison with that of the Lord Jesus, enduring the cross, despising the shame—counting all things as loss for Christ's sake: 'Such, says the prophet, shall shine as the brightness of the firmament and as the stars forever and ever. That this may be yours I have for many years offered my feeble request, and will continue to do so until faith is lost in sight.

St. Paul, Minn., May 12, 1878.

FROM WILLIAM SUNTER.

DEAR FRIEND: I am sorry in having to inform you that our dear uncle, Alexander Evart, has departed this life. He died on the 17th of February last, at the age of seventy-two years and eleven months. The principal object I have in mentioning the circumstance to you is from the fact that, although he has been unknown to you, you have not by any means been unknown to him, and your writings have for many years been the source of much pleasure and comfort to him. For many years he had been a consistent and respected member of the Scotch Baptists in Edinburgh, Scotland, but his "consistent" qualities were the means of bringing about a separation from that body over forty years since, and never to the end did he find cause for repenting of the step.

He found his chief trouble arising out of what he considered the very common mistake of taking the Scriptures as authority for establishing the Church of Christ, and looked upon this as the chief cause of the present "Babeldom" of Christianity. He accorded to the Bible a divine origin; but that it was meant to fill the place of prophets and apostles and supply the wants, as recorded in 1 Cor. xii., of the Church was what he could not at all contemplate. Mr. Henry Dunn's views of the Scriptures came the nearest to his of anything he ever read, and he has unequivocally believed these many years that all the so-called churches were simply human organizations, and in no respect entitled to the name of churches of Christ.

Your "Six Sermons" were read by him over twenty years ago, and were the means of entirely changing his views on life and death and kindred subjects, and since that time much from your pen has pleased and gratified him exceedingly. He sympathized deeply with you in the consequences of the last Light (only, however, by losing the countenance of earthly friends), and honored and respected you for the action you took in the matter.

Dear uncle has long looked for the great and glad change to be wrought on this "vale of tears," but passed away without seeing it; he had, however, that lively faith which lent to him a full realization of its truth, and with the certain hope of yet seeing that day. His life and example are of lasting benefit to me and my family, as well as to those who were favored with his acquaintance.

Everton, Ontario, Canada.

S. B. EMMONS, of South Carolina, writes: I have received Dr. Farrar's sermons which you kindly sent me, and have read them attentively, and find them defective in one particular, as all other works are when based upon the doctrine of the immortality of the soul. There is a vagueness and uncertainty in all writings and discussions when predicated upon that dogma, for I can call it nothing less. Still the work, with that exception, is very interesting and instructive, and no reader can doubt the author's great learning and piety. And, notwithstanding the defect I have alluded to, it is calculated to do great good in correcting some great errors in orthodox teaching. There has always been strong, and I may say violent, opposition in this place to the views as we hold them; but since this question of the final destiny of those who die in their sins, unrepented of, has been so fully discussed, pro and con, the opinions and prejudices of many have, I think, been greatly modified. I took upon myself, a few months since, to write a MS. of about 100 pages, stating my views of this and kindred subjects, which has been read by a few of my neighbors. Following upon this I put the work of Dr. Miller, of Princeton, N. J., into their hands, which corroborated so fully with my MS. as to make a favorable impression. Dr. Farrar's sermons are now being read by a strong orthodox friend, a gentleman well instructed and learned in the Greek language. I requested him to note down anything unscriptural, any wrong interpretation, any sophistry or false reasoning of the author, as my wish was to arrive at the truth. I have proposed to some of my friends to read the BIBLE EXAMINER or other works I have, but I can discover a decided reluctance in the manner of most of them to read anything on the subject. Indeed, I have incurred no little of the odium theologicum already, but that gives me but little concern, feeling as I do that I have both reason and revelation to sustain me, as well as the approval of my own conscience.

A REDEEMER.

THE law, given by Moses, was "the shadow of things to come; but the body is of Christ."—Col. iii. 17. The law required that a Redeemer (Heb. Gouail) should be a kinsman, a man of the same race or family. "One of his brethren may redeem him."—Lev. xxv. 48. Christ, therefore, must become a Kinsman of the race in order to be a Redeemer. For this end he became "the man, Christ Jesus," "who gave himself a ransom for all" the race, "to be testified in due time."—1 Tim. ii. 5, 6. When that ransom is made known, or "testified" to the ransomed, if rejected, death takes its course and holds its victim in its bondage; for, as there is but "one Mediator," so there is but one Redeemer; hence, if the testimony concerning him has come to the knowledge of those for whom the benefit is intended, and they despise or reject it, there remaineth no deliverer for them.

This rejection, however, can only take place after the Redeemer's presentation to them; or after he has been so presented to them that there can be no excuse for the unbeliever's rejection of him. Till then death cannot hold one of the race redeemed; they live again by virtue of the connection with "the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all" men, by the virtue and right of his kinsmanship.

"Beulah; or, Eden Restored in Immanuel's Land, and the better, that is, the heavenly country, sought for by the Hebrew Fathers; also showing the manner of the future occupation of the Holy Land by the restored twelve tribes of Israel during the millennium and beyond ; and the true nature of the kingdom of Christ." By Geo. D. Wilson, 4 Oxford Street, Glasgow, Scotland.

No. 7 of the above-named magazine has just come to hand, after an interruption of several months. I have read it with much interest. It is an interesting work, published occasionally, containing 32 pages, at 20 cents per number to Americans. Agent, Mr. W. C. Taylor, 477 Washington St., Boston, Mass. No. 4 has failed to reach me. All the others, together with the Atlas of prophetic maps, have been received ; for which friend Wilson has my thanks.

S. BATTEY, Marion Center, Kansas, writes : BRO. STORRS—I am still in receipt of the BIBLE EXAMINER; it is a welcome monthly visitor, and I could not do without it ; it is the best of all books but the Bible: it brings light and consolation to the weary traveler who is trying to gain an entrance through the gates into the City of our God—"New Jerusalem"—that cometh down out of heaven from God our Heavenly Father. The fig-tree's tender branch is putting forth in all parts of the earth, showing the near approach of our blessed Saviour, when he will set up a kingdom under the whole heavens to reign over the children of men. In justice and righteousness will he reign over them from the river to the ends of the earth; for he must reign until he has put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy to be destroyed is death, when the saints of the Most High will take the kingdom under the whole heavens and possess it forever. Then shall we enter the new heavens and the new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness, when all sorrow shall be done away and the last tear shall be wiped away with the soft hand of Infinite love.

Yours, in the bond of love.

A RETROSPECT.

SEVERAL articles have appeared in the World's Crisis against what the writer calls "DUNNITES," because they so far agree with MR. DUNN, of England, as to maintain that such of the human family as have by unavoidable means been deprived of the knowledge of "the only true God and Jesus Christ" in this life will have that knowledge granted to them in a future life, and means necessary to secure an endless life before their final destiny is determined. The misrepresentations of the writer in the Crisis are of a character which should make him and the publisher blush. But I leave them with their own master. "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor," is the divine command.

The first year of the revived EXAMINER, and of my presentation of a "VINDICATION" of the "DIVINE Government," as I now understand it, a friend in the West sent me an article which was published in Vol. XVI., with my response. As the writer put forth his strength—and he is a strong man—to overthrow what he called "Bro. Storrs' new view," it is thought best to give the whole a new insertion, as showing the methods employed by opposers and how they have been met.

No reply has ever been presented to my response. Opposers in general seem content to revile, instead of candidly replying to the views really held by "the ages to come" believers.

The name of the writer of the article now republished I shall omit, using instead the letter "A." The article is headed:

"THE WORK OF CHRIST."

By A.

"The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them that do iniquity."
—Matt. xiii. 41.

In this passage we have a description of an important work to be done. This work is ascribed to the SON OF MAN.

It is not the work of the Father while the Son of man remains in heaven; but it is the work of Christ after he has returned from heaven, having received for himself the kingdom. He now takes possession of his kingdom and sits upon the throne of his glory. He gathers all nations before him and executes upon them a righteous judgment. He shall be king over all the earth, and he must reign until all things shall be subdued unto him. He will have dominion over all people, nations and languages that they may serve him. It is the Son of man that will restore all things. He will send forth his angels, or messengers, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend.

THE WORK TO BE DONE.

There are things in the kingdom that offend and those who do iniquity. In the parable it is called the field where the seed is sown. In the explanation of the parable it is called the world; and when the work of the Son of man is described it is called his kingdom. The field, the world and kingdom are the same thing. After Christ shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory. At that time he designates the kingdom as the one prepared when the world was made.

The kingdom, then, out of which the Son of man will gather all things that offend is the kingdom prepared when the world was made, where all people, nations and languages under the whole heaven have ever dwelt, and which is to become Christ's at his second coming.

THE OBJECT OF THIS WORK.

The object of this work is to so affect the condition of the kingdom that all the nations whom God has made may come and worship before him, and glorify his name, that at the name of Jesus Christ every knee should bow, and every tongue confess that he is Lord to the glory of God the Father; that the earth may be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea; that all nations may serve him as long as the sun and moon endure.

The object of this work is that all the nations of the earth may be blessed instead of being cursed as now; that there may be no more sickness, or pain, or death, or curse, under the whole heaven; that the will of God may be done in earth, or in this kingdom, as it is done in heaven.

Are the things I have written true? Is it true that Christ will do this work after he comes? Is it true that the work to be done by Christ is to gather out of his kingdom all things that offend? Is it true, that the kingdom out of which the things that offend are to be gathered, is the kingdom which was prepared when the world was made, and which was given to Nebuchadnezzar, and which, after becoming subject to the Medes and Persians, to the Grecians and to the Romans, is to be given to Christ, even the kingdom where the wheat and tares grew together until the harvest? If these things are so, then we have a very serious objection to Bro. Storrs' "new view."

The objection is this: that while Christ's work is to gather out of his kingdom things that offend and them that do iniquity, the "new view" requires him to bring into the kingdom a hundred times as many offences as there are in it now.

Every one who has died under sin was an offence in the kingdom and worthy of death. Who are they that are worthy of death, and not worthy to live?—1 John v. 19. The whole world lieth in wickedness—Rom. i. 18. For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men. After describing almost every kind of wickedness, the apostle said the judgment of God is that they which do such things are worthy of death. He also said, They are without excuse; and again, For all have sinned and come short of the glory of God, both Jews and Gentiles; they are all under sin. Now to bring into the kingdom all who have died in sin, all who have been an offence in the kingdom, is a very different work from that of gathering out of the kingdom the things that offend.

Could such a work be regarded as good news of the kingdom? Can we conceive of a greater injury than such a work would be to the kingdom? To raise up from the dead all the ignorant and degraded, and the vile and the selfish who have ever lived, with all their prejudices and their corrupted bias of mind, and give them another chance to develop themselves; I say, if this should be done, what possible good could come out of it? Judging from the past and what is revealed of the future, but few of them could be saved; the great mass of them must return to dust a second time.

In the parable of the Sower only one class out of four who heard the word furnished any who brought forth fruit unto perfection.

In the kingdom under the reign of Christ, and after 1,000 years of experience under its benign influence upon the world, there will be a great rebellion; the number of those who engage in it will be as numerous as the sands of the sea. But the Lord will gather them out of his kingdom. Fire will come down from heaven and devour them. What better results could be expected from the proposed resurrection of the heathen?

The work of this new system is exactly opposed to the work of Christ. The work of Christ is to gather out of his kingdom all things that offend. But the work of this "New View" is to gather into the kingdom all the offences that have existed in it since the world was made. The work of Christ acknowledges the righteousness of the judgments of God in the past. The "New View" proposes an appeal from them for a second trial. The work of Christ is in harmony with all that the prophets have said. The "new view" is without a record in the Bible.

RESPONSE BY THE EDITOR.

As our friend has called me by name and spoken his mind freely on what he calls my "new views," he doubtless expects a response, which I most cheerfully give him. I would have preferred that he should have taken up my main questions, viz.: 1. "Did God mean what the words express in the promise and oath to Abraham?" 2. Has that promise and oath had a fulfilment in the past?" These are the real questions at issue, and, as a rule, I shall decline controversy on other points till these are frankly met. Friend A. has chosen another route, doubtless intending to arrive at the answer of my standing questions.

In the first place, then, does the parable he has chosen for his text represent anything more than the nominal Church as it does now exist or has existed? It is the conclusion of the explanation of the parable of "the wheat and tares." The tares were sown "among the wheat," and "both grew together," showing that it is a class of sinners under the Gospel and possibly may refer especially to a class of professors of religion; as some commentators have said the original expression, translated tares, denote "bastard wheat"—a spurious grain looking like wheat and known only by its "fruit" when it is grown. Plenty of such "bastard wheat" has been sown in these last days, and they are ready to be bound, being already fast in sectarian "bundles." "In the end of this age," or dispensation, our Lord will fully separate the tares from the wheat; he will "gather out of his kingdom all things that offend [all scandals—so the margin has it], and them which do iniquity; [all these hypocritical professors, represented by the tares, or bastard wheat], “and shall cast them into a furnace of fire; there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth. Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father.”

If such is the true representation of the sentiments of the text, then it has no reference to any man who has not in some way been identified with the nominal church, and passed as one of its number, while practicing “iniquity” and spreading “scandals” to the injury of true piety; and hence does not relate to the kingdom proper at all.

The idea that the kingdom proper embraces the whole world, at its first commencement, appears to be an error. The general language of Scripture and its prophetic utterances seem to forbid such a conclusion. The kingdom and dominion are spoken of as distinct. When one like the Son of man came before the Ancient of Days, “There was given him dominion and glory, and a kingdom,” etc.—Dan. vii. 14. “His dominion” was universal; but was his kingdom equally so? The kingdom of “the Most High” is universal (verse 27); but it does not follow that the kingdom of the Son of man is so, though it may ultimately become so.

The kingdom of Israel never was universal; and David never had such a kingdom. The Lord sware unto David to set one on his throne who should maintain it forever, and repeated this promise by the mouth of the angel to Mary before the birth of Jesus, saying, “The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David; and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end.”—Luke i. 32, 33. And again, when the Lord God removed the diadem and took off the crown from the last king of Israel, he said, “It shall be no more till he come whose right it is, and I will give it to him.”—Ezk. xxi. 26, 27. Thus the kingdom proper is the same, and no more, at first, than his father David had. His dominion is another matter, and is to extend over the whole world, or habitable globe.

In further confirmation of this view, the language of Jesus to the unbelievers in his day may be contemplated. “I say unto you, That many shall come from the east and west, and shall sit down with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven.”—Matt. viii. 11. If territorially the kingdom spoken of embraces the whole habitable globe, where do these from “the east and west” come from? To my mind, these facts show that friend A. has made “a very serious” mistake in locating the kingdom of the Son of man; and this mistake shows his whole argument, so far as it affects my “view,” is of no value, and it might be passed without further remarks; yet I desire to treat respectfully what he has respectfully presented.

It will be seen that friend A.’s first objection to my views has no bearing on the question at issue; for the fact that evil things and persons are in his dominions does not involve their entrance into his kingdom; that is distinct. For, the kingdom proper commences as a “Stone,” and only by a process of development, or conquest, does it become “a great mountain and fill the whole earth.”—Dan. ii. 34, 35. Christ’s kingdom, territorially, is limited at first; but his rule will extend over all the earth. His kingdom, in all that pertains to its character and government, will be clear of all evil; and “the righteous” [who are “joint-heirs with Christ”] “will shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father.”—Matt. xiii. 43.

Friend A. says: “Every one who has died under sin was an offence in the kingdom, and was worthy of death.” To prove this assertion he quotes texts which relate wholly to those who were living, not those who have “died”; and if his texts prove anything to his purpose, they prove the impossibility of salvation for any soul of man; for he proves “all have sinned,” and therefore all are “worthy of death.” His argument, therefore, goes to make salvation impossible for any man. But because a man is “worthy of death,” that does not prove his death is inevitable or irremediable; else all must inevitably die the death that is the wages of sin. The peculiarity of the grace of God is, that it has provided a way whereby those who are worthy of death may yet be delivered from the death which is the wages of sin; for where sin has abounded grace has much more abounded (Rom. v. 20); hence it does not follow that because a man goes out of this life under the law of sin that he is hopelessly lost, or that he has passed beyond the abounding grace of God; there is not a text in the Bible that affirms such a doctrine; certainly none of those quoted by my friend prove it.

The insinuation that my views “bring into the kingdom all who have died in sin” is an unfounded one. They may be brought under the dominion of the Son of man; whose mission is to “destroy death,” as well as “him who had the power of death," and all his "works."—Heb. ii. 14; 1 Cor. xv. 26; 1 John iii. 8. Their being made alive from the dead for a real and true probation under God's remedial scheme for human redemption, and being brought "into the kingdom," is by no means one and the same thing. These are not "an offence in the kingdom," for they never were in the kingdom proper.

"Can we conceive of a greater injury than such a work would be to the kingdom?" asks my friend. What is the work that alarms him? He says, "To raise up from the dead all the ignorant, and degraded, and vile, and the selfish, who have ever lived, with all their prejudices and their corrupted bias of mind, and give them another chance to develop themselves." Does my friend really think such a work would be unlike God, whose "tender mercies are over all his works," and who is "long-suffering, not willing that any should perish," and who has "sworn by himself that he has no pleasure in the death of the sinner?" Such "ignorant and degraded" creatures are among those for whom Christ died; for "He gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time." Will that "due time" never come? Surely it never has come to millions who have died under the law of sin which passed upon all men through Adam? Did God so love the world as to give His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish; and yet leave millions on millions without the means of ever having any knowledge of that Son that they might believe on him? Does the thought that God will, somehow, at a future period, cause to be "testified" to them the boundless character of his love, and give these poor "ignorant and degraded" creatures a chance to be benefited by the "Good news," alarm the kind heart of my friend? Would he feel, like the elder son in the parable, "angry," and so "would not go in" to the kingdom, because the compassionate heart of the Father receives joyfully these "prodigals," who had "wasted all their substance in riotous living"; or rather had never learned before that there was mercy for them in the Father's heart? Friend A. is no such man as that; his generous soul would fly with wondrous swiftness to publish the wonders of God's love to these "ignorant, degraded, vile, selfish, prejudiced" beings, who then for the first time are brought into a state where they can hear the truth concerning the love of God their Maker, unpolluted by the traditions of men, and the corrupt representations of God's government over the creatures he has made. Then the "Watchman shall see eye to eye," and no more corrupters of the truth will be tolerated.

But my friend asks, "If this should be done, what possible good could come out of it? Judging from the past, and what is revealed of the future, but few of them could be saved," etc. In this matter we are not to judge by the past; "and what is revealed of the future" is all in favor of a wonderful display of the power and grace of God when Christ and his saints shall take the kingdom, and God shall "pour out his Spirit upon all flesh," and "the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters do the sea," and his oath is fulfilled, "As truly as I live the whole earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord." Yes, "all shall know the Lord from the least to the greatest." Before this glorious display of divine love and power the "ignorant" will find knowledge; the "degraded" will be exalted; the "vile" will turn from their vileness; the "selfish" will become liberal; "prejudice" will die in the sun-light of truth; the "corrupted bias of mind" will pass away, and no one will then say, tauntingly, "This man receiveth sinners and eateth with them." No: but there will be joy in heaven and earth to find the lost are found, and Christ's mission to the world "to seek and to save that which is lost" has had a glorious consummation.

In our friend's concluding remarks he has several assumptions which arise from his previous "views" of the kingdom. He assumes that, "In the kingdom, under the reign of Christ, and after 1,000 years, . . . there will be a great rebellion." Surely that does not look as if he had "gathered out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity," as my friend says Christ will do; and his text says, he will do it "in the end of this (aionos) age;" not after the end of the next age.

But, again: The rebellion is not "in the kingdom," but outside of it, and against the dominion or rule of the kingdom; the kingdom is untouched and unmoved by it.

Our friend stumbles at our "new views," as he calls them. He says, "The work of this new system is exactly opposed to the work of Christ. The work of Christ is to gather out of his kingdom all things that offend; but the work of this 'new view' is to gather into the kingdom all the offences that have existed in it since the world was made."

This is an entire mistake. Our friend's own view takes Christ a thousand years and an indefinite period "after" to "gather out of his kingdom all things that offend and them that do iniquity;" while mine makes that work done immediately "in the end of this age," as Christ saith; showing my friend's view of the kingdom proper is a misapprehension of the subject. My view does not "gather into the kingdom" any others than such as "possess the kingdom," viz., Christ and his Body, the true Church, the "kings and priests." These are gathered into the kingdom of Christ's second advent; or the kingdom of Christ is then established forever, and the dominion of this kingdom extends over the whole earth; all its inhabitants, living or dead; for "Christ is Lord both of the dead and living" (Rom. xiv. 9); and he is the "judge of the living and the dead" (2 Tim. iv. 1); and the "Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son" (John v. 32); so that no man will receive his final judgment (till Christ passeth his decision in his case; and as Christ has "tasted death for every man, and gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time," it may be safely affirmed no man can be holden by death unless the fact that Christ gave himself a ransom for him has been "testified" to him, and that man wilfully sins against that testimony by rejecting Christ as his Deliverer or LIFE-GIVER.

Our friend might have spared himself and me some of his closing insinuations. Take the following:

"The work of Christ acknowledges the righteousness of the judgments of God in the past; the 'new view' proposes an appeal from them for a second trial."

This statement is wholly groundless. The whole work of Christ in redemption is an acknowledgement of the righteousness of the judgments of God in the past. But where in the Bible is it stated there is no redemption from past judgments, from Adam to the end of the present age? The scheme of redemption is a remedial one. God has judged "all men worthy of death," our friend truly says. Is there, hence, no remedy? Did not God himself provide a remedy? and is not that remedy Christ, the LIFE-GIVER? and has not God given "him power over all flesh," the dead as well as the living? and that, too, for the very purpose of giving them "eternal life," if they will believe on him? and can they believe on him of whom they have never heard? and will God so defeat his own plan as to exclude unnumbered millions from ever hearing of his love to them in giving his only begotten Son to "give life to the world"? —John vi. 33. Is death, to which all men were subjected by God, "not willingly, but by reason of him who had subjected them in hope" (Rom. viii. 20): I ask, is death so powerful that Christ cannot overcome it? and is death to be the victor, and Christ the defeated? Is there any such "record in the Bible"?

There is no "second trial" in my views of the dispensations; that is only an imagination of my friend. What is trial for? Is it not for eternal life, which Christ has power to give? Can a man be put on trial for a thing of which he has never heard? Is God a "hard master; reaping where he has not sown, and gathering where he has not strewed"? —Matt. xxv. 24. No man can be on trial till the matter and manner of his trial is made known to him. Millions of the human race have not and never have had any knowledge in these matters. Are they to be condemned to death eternal, not for the want of a "second trial," but without any trial? Believe it who will; I reject such an imputation on the divine government, and regard it as a high impeachment of both divine justice and grace.

"A KIND OF FIRST-FRUIT."

THIS is an inexhaustible theme. It is the basis of God's blessing to the world. Christ, and "they that are Christ's at his coming," (1 Cor. xv. 23), constitute the "first-fruits" of the harvest which is to follow. James, in speaking of believers, says: "The Father of lights . . . of his own will begat us with the word of truth, that we should be a kind of first-fruits of his creatures." —James i. 18. Believers gathered out of the ages past and present—having suffered with or for Christ—are the first-fruits and pledge of a harvest of God's "creatures," or the mass of the race. John saw these gathered believers in vision, and describes the scene thus:

"And I looked, and lo, a Lamb stood on Mount Sion, and with him a hundred and forty and four thousand, having his Father's name written on their foreheads; and I heard a voice from heaven, as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of a great thunder; and I heard the voice of harpers harping with their harps; and they sung as it were a new song before the throne and before the four beasts" (vital beings), "and the elders; and no man could learn that song but the hundred and forty-four thousand, which were redeemed from the earth. These are they which were not defiled with women" (spiritual fornication); "for they are virgins" (unpolluted by the whoredoms of such corrupt organizations as the harlot woman and her daughters were guilty of); "these are they which follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth. These were redeemed from among men, being the first fruits unto God and the Lamb."—Rev. xiv. 1-5.

Here is the pure "church of the first-born, which are written in heaven;" here is the "Mount Zion" to which believers of the past and present ages "are to come."—Heb. xii. 22, 23. After this gathering, what next takes place? Let John answer:

"And I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting Gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation and kindred and tongue and people, saying with a loud voice" (which all men everywhere shall hear and understand), "Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come; and worship him that made heaven and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of water."—Rev. xiv. 6, 7.

Here is the work of the hundred and forty-four thousand, who "are a kind of first-fruits of his creatures," whom God will employ, when glorified, to proclaim the pure Gospel to the rest of "his creatures" of the Adamic race. There will be no schism in their theology; for these "Watchmen shall lift up the voice; with the voice together shall they sing" (the song of Rev. xiv. 3): "for they shall see eye to eye, when the Lord shall bring again Zion."—Isaiah lii. 8. This is the time when the Gospel shall be proclaimed to "every creature" in its purity; "For then will I turn to the people a pure language, that they may call upon the name of the Lord, to serve him with one consent."—Zeph. iii. 9. At that time when the immortal ones shall "fly in the midst of heaven having the everlasting Gospel to preach," God's promise and oath to Abraham and his seed will have its perfect fulfilment; for these messengers are commissioned to go "to every nation, kindred, tongue and people" with glad tidings—the Gospel.

But, says an objector, the proclamation is, "The hour of God's judgment is come." True; and what more joyful news ever was heard than that God's rule, by his own chosen King, has actually commenced, when ungodly rulers—civil and ecclesiastical—will be stripped of their power, and Christ "shall execute justice and judgment in the earth."—Jer. xxiii. 5. Such an event caused a joyful acclaim in heaven, saying, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdom of our Lord and his Christ; and he shall reign forever and ever."—Rev. xi. 15.

When that begins, wickedness and oppression in all its forms will be made to cease, and "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea."—Isa. xi. 9. Then will the tidings of God's love to "the world" be made fully known; and the "due time" will have come when "every creature" shall understand that "Christ Jesus gave himself a ransom for all;" and such as have never before heard this good news, or have been by unavoidable means hindered from knowing that love of God, shall now be blessed with that knowledge which is "able to make wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus."—2 Tim. iii. 15.

The hour of God's judgment will be the time in which the whole earth will be brought into subjection to Christ. It begins with the call to "all nations, kindred, tongue and people" to "Fear God, and give glory to him," and to "worship him." Impenitent oppressors, and all such as wilfully reject the reign of Christ, will be cut off or destroyed; but "Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved" (Rom. x. 13); but none can call upon that name till they have first heard of it; for, "How shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? and how shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard."—Verse 14.

The great work of earth's redemption, then, is in "the ages to come" (Eph. ii. 7); and it is in those ages that "the unsearchable riches of Christ" will be fully manifested, and the innumerable company "which no man can number," who will "have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb," shall then appear "before the throne, and before the Lamb," and triumphantly ascribe "Blessing, and glory, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and honor, and power, and might unto God forever and ever." Such will be the harvest gathered by means of the FIRST-FRUITS:—EDITOR.

Three great requisites for decision are within the reach of ordinary men as well as of the most learned and able. (1) A sincere desire to attain truth in order to regulate opinions and conduct by it alone; (2) pure moral principle; and (3) attentive study and calm inquiry. Do not be in a hurry to form an opinion, but do not unnecessarily put it off. Do not decide without inquiry, but do not, in order to avoid deciding, omit inquiry.

THE SECOND ADVENT.

PRELIMINARY.

EVANGELICAL Christians—constituting, probably, the vast majority of the visible Church—maintain that Scripture leads us to expect that, before the return of the Redeemer, a signal and unprecedented outpouring of the Spirit will be vouchsafed, in the power of which the world will be converted, and the principles of the Redeemer triumph in all lands. It is not, they say, till that period has passed away that the Lord will return in person to close the dispensation and to take his children to himself. Any other view is supposed to chill missionary enterprise, to foster carnal views of Christ's kingdom, and to promote fanatical expectations relative to the immediate future.

In reply to the argument that many texts of Scripture speak of the coming of the Lord as near, the advocates of the more popular view urge that such expressions must be interpreted by the fact that eighteen hundred years have already rolled away since these phrases were penned; that death is to each individual Christian the coming of Christ; and that, when viewed in relation to the world at large, they find their natural interpretation in those providential visitations from God which are in Scripture from time to time spoken of as his "coming."

The kind of interpretation to which this mode of viewing the matter leads will be best understood by examples. Men eminent for learning and piety, reading Scripture on this principle, tell us that the words of our Lord—"And he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other"—mean that Christ would, after the destruction of Jerusalem, send his ministers to preach the gospel; that they will lift up their voices like a trumpet, and so gather converts to the faith from the four quarters of the world.

Again, we are informed that what is said about the second coming of Christ refers to a figurative advent; that when, in vision, the redeemed sing, "We shall reign on the earth," it is but a prophetic declaration that the Church shall one day subdue the world and reign spiritually; that when the Thessalonians were led to believe that the day of Christ was at hand, even at the doors, the prophecies which led them astray found their fulfilment when Christianity ascended the throne of the Cæsars; that the "first resurrection," spoken of in the Apocalypse, is a happy state of the Church which may well be called life from the dead, and that the statement, "The rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished," simply implies that the wicked shall not recover their power to disturb the peace of the world. Well might the late lamented Dean Alford say that if this kind of interpretation is to be sanctioned, "then there is an end of all definite significance in plain words, and Scripture or any other book may mean anything we please."—Editor of the "Following After Truth."

THE ADVENT.

Whatever opinion may be adopted by any of us regarding the second advent of Christ, it must be admitted by all candid persons that in the New Testament very striking prominence is given to this event. The expectation of it is continually brought forward as the great motive to holiness. Exhortations to repentance, faith, good works, purity, the mortification of evil affections, heavenly-mindedness, patience under trial, watchfulness and moderation are there all based on and sustained by the assurance that the Lord will return to earth.

A few instances may be given in illustration.

Repentance.—"Repent ye therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord; and he shall send Jesus Christ, . . . whom the heavens must receive until the times of restitution of all things." Faith.—"And now, little children, abide in him, that when he shall appear we may have confidence and not be ashamed before him at his coming." Good Works.—"Behold, I come quickly, and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be" (written probably thirty years after the fall of Jerusalem). Purity.—"When he shall appear, we shall be like him: for we shall see him as he is. And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure." Mortification of Evil.—"Denying ungodliness and worldly lusts; . . . looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ." Heavenly-mindedness.—"Set your affection on things above. . . . When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory." Patience under Trial.—"Be patient therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord. . . .

For the coming of the Lord draweth nigh. For yet a litle while, and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry." Watchfulness.—"Watch therefore, for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come." Moderation.—"Let your moderation be known unto all men. The Lord is at hand." Further, it is "when the Chief Shepherd shall appear" that the crown of glory is to be given. Christians are to "judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come." Finally, in the Supper they are to "show forth the Lord's death till he come." These quotations might be multiplied. They are only some of the passages in which the motive to all excellence is found in the second coming of Christ.

It is not needful here to give any opinion as to the meaning of these apostolic expressions. Those who refuse to take them in their natural and obvious sense are bound to tell us, or at least are bound to satisfy themselves, that in rejecting them, or rather in explaining them away, they are justified by the general teaching of Scripture. I am simply desirous of calling the attention of Christians to them. And I do so the more earnestly because, whatever may be the reason, it is not usual in orthodox pulpits to hear these or similar phrases adduced when Christian virtues are enforced, or endeavors are made to stimulate men to goodness.—Sunday Morning.

FURTHER TESTIMONY.

Whatever may be the true decision in relation to the points on which Christians differ, it is certain that far more turns on the acceptance or rejection of a pre-millennial advent than is generally supposed. If, as is now commonly admitted, "these views appeared to the early Christians of the very essence of the gospel," and if their rejection is to carry with it—as it usually does—the conclusion that the apostles were, in regard to the nature of Christ's kingdom, utterly deceived; that our Lord permitted them to remain, and finally left them under so great a delusion; and that modern progress represents "the essential spirit and meaning of the gospel"—then we are quite sure the authority of Scripture will not long be regarded as paramount, and its claim as a divine revelation, to guide and control human thought, must be abandoned.

The fact that Christ will yet come again to earth is one which no believer in Divine revelation can allow himself to doubt. He can scarcely be a believer in Jesus at all who suffers himself to adopt the language of the scoffer, and say, "Where is the promise of his coming?" The differences which prevail among real Christians in reference to this important topic relate exclusively to the place this great event is supposed to occupy in the world's history, and to the character it will assume.

The testimony of Scripture in relation to the second advent of Christ may probably be summed up thus:

It is certain as to the fact, but uncertain as to the time. The expectation of it is to be a constant motive to the exercise of watchfulness and holiness. It is to be preceded by the appearance of a man of sin; by the preaching of the Gospel as a witness to all nations; probably by an extended conversion of the Jews, and assuredly by remarkable calamities. It is to be accompanied by a resurrection of dead saints; by a change of living ones; by the judgment of believers; and by a visible manifestation of Christ in the clouds of heaven. Whether the conversion of the Jews will take place through the spectacle of the second advent, we dare not venture to assume. Some have supposed that the conversion of St. Paul by the sight of the Lord—the only instance on record of the kind—may be regarded, in its mode, as typical of that by which his countrymen will be won at the coming of Christ. It may be so; and some passages of Scripture certainly seem to favor such an idea, especially that in Zechariah—"They shall look upon me whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn for him as one mourneth for his only son, and shall be in bitterness for him as one is in bitterness for his first-born." This is not terror, but grief; not despair, but heartfelt sorrow.

The first text that directly announces the advent is in the form of a distinct declaration from the lips of Jesus himself—"The Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his angels, and then he shall reward every man according to his works."

A second declaration, also from his lips, without fixing any time for the advent, intimates what must precede the "coming." "This Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come."

The third text, and a most remarkable one, is Christ's memorable reply to the high priest: "Hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven." The exclamation of Caiaphas sufficiently indicates that Christ was literally understood. The high priest rent his clothes, saying, "He hath spoken blasphemy;" and the people respond, "He is guilty of death."

Such is the testimony of the Lord himself regarding his second coming, and it is impossible that it should have been more explicit. At last angels testify: "This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." Need it be added that Christ invariably speaks of his return as the great and crowning event of the earth's history; the termination to which all other things point, and to which everything else is absolutely subservient?

How came it to pass, then—for it is a fact, explain it as we may—that many Christian men still, in their hearts, doubt or deny? The apostles certainly did not do so. They never neglect to urge the Lord's return upon their converts. Our chief error relating thereto is one which has always prevailed, and still prevails—an undue eagerness to get hold of something or other that may be regarded as pointing to the approximate period of the advent. Men are constantly forgetting that this is positively reserved, that it is a secret thing belonging only to God. Hence the theory of one party that a period of peace and spiritual prosperity, lasting at least a thousand years, must intervene before Christ's return, and, by reaction, that of another, to the effect that we ought to expect the great event every day—a notion as unreasonable and unreal as it would be to say that, because we know not the day of our own death, we ought to expect to die every day.

We have, in fact, no business to expect either the one or the other. Let us be content to know that God, for infinitely wise and good reasons, has concealed both. Let us, above all things, guard against the habit of looking upon the return of Christ to earth as something ridiculous, or of associating the thought with mere caricature, or with anything grotesque. A little consideration may, perhaps, lead us to see that the return is involved in the Incarnation.

The direct statements of the Lord are echoed, so to speak, both in his parables and in his conversations, and these reverberations of the doctrine show us how far the statements Jesus put forth relative to his second advent affected his general teaching, and what impression they left on the minds and hearts of his disciples.

Let us notice then, first of all, some of the parables that distinctly teach the fact of the Redeemer's return.

The first, I think, is that in which Jesus bids his disciples, as watchful servants, to wait, with their loins girt and their lamps burning, for their Lord's return from the wedding. His closing words are, "Be ye therefore ready; for the Son of man cometh at an hour when ye think not." That they understood him to imply that he would return in person may, I think, be safely assumed. To suppose, as many commentators have done, that he merely meant to teach that the hour of death was uncertain is simply ridiculous.

The second parable, which follows that of the ten virgins, and is apparently intended to illustrate it, represents the Lord, under the figure of an earthly prince, as one traveling into a far country, and returning "after a long time," to reckon with those to whom he had entrusted various talents, rewarding or depriving each of them according to their conduct. The lesson is, "Watch therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour"—neither the exact nor the approximate time—"wherein the Son of man cometh."

The third is that of the sheep and the goats, a judgment which it is said will take place "when the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him." These instances will perhaps be sufficient to show to what an extent the doctrine of the second advent pervaded the parabolic discourses of the Lord.

His conversations are of the same character. Take the following as evidence that such was the case:

"I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am there ye may be also." "Hereafter ye shall see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man"—words to Nathanael which singularly correspond with those to Caiaphas. "As the lightning that lighteneth out of the one part under heaven shineth unto the other part under heaven, so shall also the Son of man be in his day." The "coming," whenever it takes place, will be visible, sudden, glorious and unexpected.* "The powers of heaven shall be shaken, and then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven, and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn. Then shall they see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with great power and glory! When these things come to pass, then look up and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh."

That the apostles taught the same truth is evident from the following passages: Paul to the Corinthians.—“Come behind in no gift; waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.” And again, “Ye do show forth the Lord’s death till He come.” Paul to the Philippians.—“Our conversation is in Heaven, from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ”—“the Lord is at hand.” Paul to Timothy.—Keep this commandment “until the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ.” James to the Twelve Tribes.—“Be patient therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord.” And again, “the coming of the Lord draweth nigh.” Peter to the Scattered.—“That the trial of your faith might be found unto praise and honor and glory, at the appearing of Jesus Christ.” John to the Seven Churches.—“Behold, he cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him; and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him. Even so, Amen.”

That in spite of declarations so plain and explicit as are those of Christ; in spite of parables and conversations from the mouth of the Redeemer himself; and in spite of all that has been written by the apostles in confirmation of the teaching, ministers of the Gospel should very rarely introduce it into their sermons, and that Christians generally should deny that any return of Christ to earth is either to be expected or desired, is one of those mysteries which I at least confess my inability to solve.—“Destiny of the Race.”

THE KING OF MEN.

It has been often said that any interpretation of Scripture must be a wrong one which sanctions the expectation that the Lord Jesus will ever return to earth to reign upon it as a king, since such an idea is quite inconsistent with the spirituality of the New Testament dispensation. Yet, if a reign on earth be denied, it is hard to see how numerous passages which fairly admit of no other interpretation can be properly understood.

So strongly has this been felt by many modern critics that even those who deny the authority of what is taught, feel obliged, in the exercise of common sense and common honesty, to avow their conviction that the future objective rule of Christ on earth is distinctly asserted in the Bible; that the eschatological element (the doctrine of the last things) in the New Testament must be received as an essential part of primitive Christianity, or its inspiration must be given up.

The gloss commonly put upon certain passages by commentators explains them thus:

“Christ’s kingdom is in the hearts of men. He is reigning now in the affections of his people, and He never will reign on earth in any other sense.” Paul himself, say they, came eventually to perceive that this was the true state of things, and therefore he writes to the Corinthians, “Henceforth know we no man after the flesh; yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now henceforth know we him no more.” The assumption is that Paul here admits he had once preached the second coming of Christ in a somewhat carnal fashion, but that now he had seen his error, and taught only a “life hid with Christ in God.”

Once, they tell us, he was waiting for the Son from heaven; later he is desirous to depart and to be with Christ in heaven. The fact that in the very same epistle—viz., to the Philippians—in which he writes about his approaching death and desire to be with his Lord, he also speaks more than once of the day of Christ as coming, and urges them to moderation in all things, on the ground that “the Lord is at hand,” is of course passed over; or, if that be impossible, the “coming” referred to is explained away as pointing only to the day of death. This is surely trifling with Scripture. Mr. Llewellyn Davies (no Millenarian) may well say: “If St. Paul was mistaken in his expectation of the day of the Lord, it is useless to pretend that he ever grew out of the mistake. It is the common mistake of our Lord and his apostles to the end of their lives.”

Leaving this, however, may it not fairly be asked, “If Christ is King only in the sense of ruling by the Holy Spirit in the hearts of the obedient, why was He made flesh? Was it merely that He might suffer, ‘the just for the unjust, to bring us to God’? Scripture does not say so. There the suffering is never separated from the glory. Was it then only that in addition to his death on the cross he might reveal God, and bring ‘life and immortality to light’?” On what ground do we venture to assume a right to confine the Incarnation within such narrow limits?

Finally, if Christ is never to do more than reign in the hearts of men invisibly, in what respect does such a rule differ from that which God has exercised from the beginning? How can Jesus be the second Adam, and as such the head of restored humanity, if he is nothing more to a redeemed man than God has been from the creation? Surely it will not be pretended that there was no pardoning love in God before Christ came, or that if he had not come “holy men of old” would all have perished miserably? Some good men, indeed, talk as if by a sort of iron necessity, arising out of the nature of the Divine law, God could not in this case without violating his justice have saved any one from the eternal slavery of Satan. To them all the ends of the Incarnation are therefore answered in the fact that Christ died on Calvary. But this is not the teaching of Scripture.

That men, with the Bible in their hands, should fall under such delusions fills one with amazement; but they do so; and never will it be otherwise until the relationship which exists between Christ and humanity is more clearly and fully recognized; until it comes to be seen that mankind, whatever may be the nature of the resurrection body, will remain human forever; that men will no more become angels, or remain disembodied spirits, than angels will become men; that the one true King, Jesus Christ, the God-man, will reign over the earth he has redeemed.

It is because this human yet Divine kingdom has yet to come that so much importance is attached in Scripture to the resurrection of the body. For this reason it is that hints are found there, hard to be understood, but not to be neglected, relating to the future judgment of nations and of cities. For this reason it was that the Lord appeared to the disciples in the body after his resurrection; that on his ascension He took his human body with him to heaven; that the apostle bids us remember that our bodies are "temples of God," and that moderation becomes us in all that concerns animal necessities. The glowing descriptions given by the prophets of a state of things absolutely incompatible with earth as it is, yet in a high and noble sense intensely earthly, can only be explained, or indeed become intelligible, on the supposition that a reign of the Redeemer on earth is yet to be manifested.

That a "new earth, in which dwelleth righteousness," is one day to spring into existence, Scripture directly asserts and indirectly implies. The future reconstitution of humanity under a human though Divine King; the final perfection of the race, which is but the realization of God's original intention; the eventual triumph of grace and goodness, and the most complete satisfaction of the highest aspirations that human nature is capable of, are everywhere assumed. But none of these things can come to pass if Christ be not properly the King of men, if he does not one day visibly reign on earth over a restored creation.—Sunday Morning.

PREVAILING DOUBT.

It has been regarded by many as a most extraordinary omission at the Conference of Evangelical Christians, held some little time ago in New York, that no reference whatever should have been made to the doctrine of the second advent, since, if true, it would, one might naturally expect, take precedence of all others, both on account of its vast importance and practical character. Instead of this there was the entire absence of any allusion to that great event as a matter either to be anticipated or thought of. Nothing that passed at any of the meetings brought before the assembly for a single instant even the possibility of any return of Christ in the clouds of heaven.

The assembly consisted of godly men, Americans, English, French, Germans, Italians, Spaniards and Dutch; all, or very nearly all, of them ministers of the Gospel, of high standing and much experience; and yet not one of them seemed to believe that the return of the Redeemer was, in any sense whatever, the hope of the Church, or will be a response to the groans of a sin-stricken world.

Can this be accounted for except by the supposition that faith in the second advent of the Lord is dying out even among the children of God; that many who held the doctrine a few years ago do not hold it now; that even firm believers in Scripture have come to say, "Since the fathers fell asleep all things continue as they were from the foundation of the world."

A strange state of things without question; unaccountable, although predicted; mysterious, though foreseen.

Does it not teach us that hindrances have to be removed before this lamentable evil can be met? especially such as arise from our expectations being intermingled with doubtful propositions and speculations regarding the Millennium. "Why," it may well be asked, "should the great and all-important truth of the return of Christ be embarrassed by other questions with which it certainly has no necessary connection?"

My own conviction is, that until those who hold to the second advent consent to separate that hope from everything else, and unite, as one man, in maintaining it on the Lord's authority alone, they will never succeed in awakening the churches generally to a sense of its importance. What I consider to be needful is, a reconsideration of the doctrine of the second advent in the light of direct Scriptural teaching alone.

MAN IN DEATH.

CONSCIOUS OR UNCONSCIOUS.

EIGHTH ARTICLE.

THE CONTRAST.

THE cry that the idea of unconsciousness in death is comfortless and gloomy has deterred not a few from allowing their convictions of the truth to settle down into faith that a future life is dependent on a resurrection from the dead; thus they have had their faith weakened or destroyed in the Scripture doctrine of a literal resurrection "at the last day."

We propose, therefore, to discuss, as fully as our space will permit, the Comparative Merits of the doctrines of the disembodied consciousness and human unconsciousness between the period of death and resurrection; from which it will be seen that the doctrine of human non-existence and, therefore, of necessary unconsciousness in death, is a doctrine less gloomy than that in which the popular faith so implicitly reposes.

By non-existence we do not mean to assert nor do we imply anything touching the respective destiny of the component parts of man's nature. All we mean is, that after the dissolution of death the conscious being, MAN, ceases to retain his consciousness. That this is a mystery, and a very great mystery, is readily acknowledged, but not such a mystery as cannot be believed. No less a mystery, certainly, is the popular opinion of the elimination of the human spirit as a distinct being from the material organization of man at the moment of death, but which, nevertheless, receives the faith of the great mass of Christian men. Of this latter opinion it may be said with truth that it is the greater mystery of the two, baffling every attempt at intelligent conception. The former—and which we maintain is the Scriptural view of the state of man in death—is supported by the phenomenon of death itself and of the preliminary circumstances of dying. The gradual decline of the expiring life—showing at every step of its progress a farther withdrawal from all external things, until at last all consciousness of what is beyond itself seems entirely to have ceased, even while the pulse continues its feeble vibrations—should encourage rather than forbid the conclusion, that death itself is a total cessation of the conscious being, and not a more complete retention and development of it.

How tenacious is the material organization of the life that animates it! And how, apparently at least, does the self-consciousness decline as life ebbs from its high mark. Even before death self-consciousness is again and again destroyed, and in the case of the swoon and delirium, and because of disease and derangement in the material organization. Is it then reasonable to conclude, in the presence of such phenomena as these, that self-consciousness only seems to, but does not really, decline, until in death it actually expires? The phraseology and entire reasoning of the Bible bid us deny a condition of life for man in or during the continuance of death, and therefore the popular theory which maintains this doctrine ought to be prepared to show that it is more rational to accept than reject it. Moreover the mystery of absolute non-existence of the human consciousness in death is commended to our intelligent faith by the fact that, previous to our human birth, we had no conscious existence. There has been a time when we were not; why should there not be a time again when we shall not be conscious? What has been may be repeated. The doctrine of the soul's survivance as a separate being after death has neither reason, analogy nor Scripture for its support, unless it be again absurdly maintained, as some of the ancients held, that the human soul had a pre-existence.

That this doctrine is gloomy and repulsive arises not so much from the view we take of the state of man in death as the fact that the doctrine concerns death itself. The subject is necessarily a gloomy one in itself, and whichever view we take we cannot divest it of its essential gloominess. To our life-loving natures death must ever appear as the king of terrors; and it argues no little against the popular faith that they who believe that death is but a new and higher development of life have as strong an instinctive dread of it as those who deny this doctrine. They who regard death as the door of life, and who believe that death introduces immediately to the bliss of the heavenly world, ought to welcome rather than strive to shun it; and the fact that they do not so welcome its approach is a strong presumptive evidence against the truth of their opinion. The natural instincts give the lie to the artificial faith. We do not forget, indeed, that some have died in triumphant anticipation of a glory immediately following their decease; but this is no proof that their faith was right; all this fact proves is that death did not and could not destroy their hope in the future realization of immortality. It is true they were expecting it at the moment of death, but the time of possessing their reward was less the occasion of their dying joy than the certainly of possessing it. These happy deaths are, however, comparatively rare, which ought not to be the case; they should be the rule, not the exception, where the popular faith is professed.

It should, therefore, be distinctly pointed out that those who believe in a state of life for the soul after death, and before the resurrection, view the fact of death with as much dread as those who regard the intermediate state as one of unconsciouness and non-existence. Like Hezekiah, they think it a greater blessing to live than to die—although they profess to believe that death removes them from a scene of suffering and sin to the presence of God and his Son and the companionship of the holy and blessed. They rejoice also in the recovery of their dying friends, and, like Paul of Epaphroditus' recovery, speak of it as an act of God's "mercy." Here are ample evidences that a deep instinctive dread of death exists in the human nature, and which, despite a false though fondly cherished faith, expresses itself on all suitable occasions. The instincts of humanity are against the dogmas of false religion. Facts, therefore, prove that even the popular doctrine of death is regarded as a gloomy and repulsive doctrine; so that there is no advantage enjoyed by the believer in the soul's separate life after death over the believer in a state of entire cessation of conscious existence. No accommodating theology can convert the curse of God into a confection! Death is the curse, "the wages of sin," which we can never treat as a guest, but must ever dread as an enemy. The Christian consolation which the Bible administers is the assurance to all who are in Christ Jesus that, though they die, they shall live again, when Christ, who is "the Resurrection and the Life," shall come to raise the dead saints and invest them with their "building of God"—their "house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens"—their "spiritual body" or perfect resurrection and incorruptible nature.

So far, then, the practical advantages of both theories are equal. The disciple of the one theory can be as hopeful and joyful in the hour of his mortality as the disciple of the other. Nor is the disadvantage greater in the one case than in the other, for both theories recognize the necessity of dying—of passing through the pains of dissolution—and of quitting this scene of things forever. Each theory has its coffin and its grave. In both corruption and the worm have their work to do. In these respects neither has the advantage of the other; both alike are gloomy; and from one as much as from the other our natures instinctively recoil. But beyond this point there is a difference in the respective theories. According to one, the man has ceased to be; he is from this time the subject neither of hope nor fear; of pleasure nor pain; of satisfaction nor disappointment. The "shadow of death" has cast its, sable mantle over him, and the "gates of death" have opened to welcome him. He has gone down "into silence" (Psalms cxv. 17). His dwelling is "in the dark," in "the land of forgetfulness" (Psalms lxxxviii. 12). He is registered among "the congregation of the dead" (Prov. xxi. 16). He is where there is "no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom" (Eccl. ix. 10), for "the dead know not anything" (Eccl. ix. 5). We are disposed, and naturally so, to turn away from this vision of death; we say it is cold and gloomy. It is so; but call it not the writer's theory, nor a human theory at all, for its description is given in the language—not of speculative man, but of the infallible Word. The language and imagery are from the Bible. Turn away, we may, after learning the solemn lesson of our guilt, to seek deliverance through him who is "the Resurrection and the Life"; but turn away to another theory we cannot without discrediting the revelation of God and reposing in a mere fond conceit. This, however, is not the place for entering upon the proof of our theory of death. We will keep to our professed purpose, which is not to discuss here the truth of the doctrine, but the comparative advantage of the two theories.

We have admitted, then, that our view of the state of man in death is most repellant to human feelings. But be it acknowledged that both theories stand on an equal footing up to a given point—the point of actual decease. Beyond this point, whatever repulsiveness may attach to our theory of death does not, let it be observed, affect him who is the subject of death, but only those who are living and may be contemplating it. To the deceased, who is deprived of consciousness, there can, of course, be no painful experience whatever. All the repulsiveness that is peculiar to this theory is in the aversion with which we contemplate the extinction of our being. The thought of not being is the painful thought—and the whole sum of the gloominess of this theory of death.

We turn now to the popular theory of a state of consciousness for man in death as a separate spiritual existence or soul. Of this condition of the human being we can form only a vague idea. It is beyond possibility for us to conceive of a condition of being apart from a material organization of some sort. To have an idea of personal existence we must have both material and form. It may be of a texture as pure and impalpable as light, but a material there must be, however subtle, and of necessity our conception invests it with form and gives it locality. Of a pure immaterial essence we know nothing. They who believe, therefore, in the soul's separate state after death, as the human personality, conceive of it, we apprehend, in a human form—the express image of that possessed before death, but of a substance altogether different—ethereal. The common notion of an apparition is probably that which generally prevails with respect to disembodied souls. In this condition of existence, then, it is presumed that man passes after death. The human being becomes an apparition, a “shade,” as the poets represent. Will it be maintained that so far as this change of the mode of human existence is concerned the popular theory of the state of man in death has an advantage on its side? The perpetuation of life is an advantage, unquestionably (supposing it to be a fact), but is such a perpetuation of the living being an advantage? Without offering any opinion on the reality of apparitions or ghosts, we merely ask, does the expectation of becoming one of these mysterious beings after death invest the state of death with attractiveness? The popular theory holds out the prospect of an intermediate state in the society of shades or ghosts, into one of which we ourselves are to be transformed. This is a feature in the popular theory which does not belong to what we believe to be the Scriptural theory; is this feature, then, such as commends the popular theory of the state of man in death? Ours is condemned as gloomy—is this more inviting to human nature? If we may judge by our present views and feelings, we should be disposed to decide that such a prospective condition and companionship as the popular theory holds out is rather against than in favor of its doctrine of death. It is natural to us to have a fear of supernatural existences. The disciples, when they saw their Lord walking on the sea, felt as we should have felt under such circumstances: “They were troubled, saying, ‘It is a spirit’ (some have erroneously concluded that the word ‘spirit’ here means the disembodied human spirit. If the disciples had meant the spirit of Christ they would not have said ‘a spirit,’ but ‘his spirit.’ The meaning is, they supposed they saw a being of a different nature a spirit), and they cried out for fear.” With respect, therefore, to the personal nature and society of the intermediate state of conscious existence, the popular doctrine rather loses than gains by the comparison. Our human sympathies pronouncing the judgment of this view of the comparison decide in favor of unconsciousness rather than such an existence of man between death and resurrection.

And if we examine the other characteristics of the popular representation of the intermediate state we shall be prepared to admit that the advantages are decidedly on the side of the unconscious state of man in this solemn interval in his history. The period between death and resurrection is of necessity—even according to the popular belief—a unique condition of existence—constituting a second estate, perfectly distinct from the first and last estate of the human existence. In religious phraseology it is termed “the intermediate or disembodied state.” During the continuance of this state—which must be long or short, according to the distance of the decease of any individual of the human family from the final consummation of all things—there is a complete separation, in the experience of the blessed dead, from all painful experience of the former life in the body; but no less separate and distinct is this intermediate condition from that which is to distinguish the life to come. While, therefore, this second condition of human existence is represented as a higher condition than the first, being exempt from all its painful contingencies, it is yet but an imperfect state, and awaits some unknown, distant period, when its condition shall be perfected. It is sometimes, in general discourse, called heaven and a state of glory; but when its teachers enter upon an explanation of their theory, they always, as they are compelled to do, admit that it is but an imperfect condition—not that perfect state of glorified existence which shall be introduced after the resurrection of the dead. As man carries with him into this new state of existence his characteristic nature as an intelligent and emotional being—which his organic change leaves unaffected—he must be still the subject of hope, desire and of all other emotions proper to him, as possessed of a mental and moral nature. By the aid of memory he can recall the past, and by the faculty of foresight he can anticipate the future.

Think of the patriarchs immured in this state—cherishing ardent hopes of the future bliss—through thousands of long years. Paul tells us that these ancient worthies “having obtained a good report, through faith, received not the promise: God having provided some better thing for us (in these last days), that they without us should not be made perfect.”

—Heb. ii. 40. Is such a state of hope deferred consistent with a state of blessedness? Since there must be a lapse of time for the accomplishment of the beneficent purposes of God concerning the human race, the consciousness of this long lapse of time, which is the vaunted quality of the popular doctrine of the intermediate state, is rather to be deprecated than desired. To the Divine Being "a thousand years are as one day," but not to the human being: to the latter it is the long, slow-moving series of ages, especially if a prospective good is at its farther end. This doctrine of a conscious state for a fractional part of man between death and resurrection is like all attempts at patching God's revelation—a most miserable mistake! Blessed it cannot be to live in a state of almost perpetual hope deferred; rather, "blessed are the dead which die in the Lord, for they rest"—in unconscious repose—"from their labors," awaiting "the crown of righteousness which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give" them "at that day"—the day of his appearing.

The popular doctrine of a state of consciousness for man between death and resurrection, when examined on its own professions, is evidently rather an evil than a good. To the doctrine of a cessation of consciousness in this interval, which the Scriptures most decidedly teach, must be given the ready choice of every rational mind. On this latter, and unpopular, yet Scriptural theory, the holy man who died five thousand years ago is at no greater advantage or disadvantage with respect to the future reward than the last man who shall die in this life. To borrow the words of Archbishop Whately, "The moment of our sinking into this state of unconsciousness will appear to us to be succeeded by that of our awaking from it, even though twenty centuries may have intervened; of which any one may convince himself by a few moment's reflection." On the theory we advocate, the moment of death is virtually the moment of resurrection and the instantaneous realization of the great reward. Not so on the popular theory. The moment of death is to dismiss the conscious being to an intermediate state of imperfection and discontentment, possessed of a nature, and destined to be the companion of natures, from which our human sympathies instinctively withdraw as both unnatural and undesirable. The state of glory, according to the popular doctrine, is far distant in the unknown future—waited for by the disembodied soul, but still disappointing its hopes and prolonging its patience.* We leave it, therefore, with the candid and intelligent reader to decide which, on its own independent merits, commends itself most to our approval as human beings—the popular theory of a state of consciousness or the unpopular theory of a state of unconsciousness for man, between the periods of death and resurrection.

From our "WATCH TOWER," we learn what is the State of Man in Death, and what the hope for the future is for him. A future life depends on the return of Christ from heaven, and the resurrection from the dead by him who is "the resurrection and the life." If there be no return of our Lord from heaven, and no revival into life by him, death holds eternal dominion, and the whole race of Adam perish, or cease from life eternally. But thanks be to God that in Christ there is hope: that hope is the glad tidings of revelation.—Selected.

MUSINGS ON MORTALITY.*

II.—THE INFANT'S GRAVE.

"Suffer the little children to come unto me."—JESUS.

THERE is something peculiarly touching in an infant's grave. The green turf seems so lightly to cover the remains of one who but looked upon this sinful world, and then, as if distressed by its atmosphere, took flight to better and brighter scenes. The white stone that tells us of its brief existence seems to speak also of its innocence, and to remind us that while

"It died, for Adam sinned;
It lives, for Jesus died."

Ought we then merely to think of this little stranger as a highly favored mortal, a young but happy voyager who has soon arrived at the haven of rest? Surely not. More profound reflections should be excited. The child has indeed escaped the stormy waves of a more lengthened life, but where will it find its needed discipline? It has apparently been accepted by God without any earthly probation, but can it enter the kingdom of heaven without even a trial?

That can scarcely be the case. Nor should we either imagine or wish that it might be so. We know not indeed what may be the precise position of this infant of days in the world of the future, but of this we may rest assured, that whatever its position, the needful preparation for service will not be withheld.

*The following meditations, written some time ago by our lamented friend, the late Mr. Henry Dunn, will be read, we think, with a mournful interest now that he has been taken from us. There is reason to suppose that they were written after a ramble in Norwood Cemetery, where his mortal remains now rest.—W. MAUDE.

That its training may be completed under happier circumstances than those in which we find ourselves is probable. It may have a gentler discipline, a less rude experience than many of us have had. It is likely that it will be so. But its character will have to be formed by some kind of trial, and its faculties will need to be developed by exercise, whatever may be the field in which they are ultimately exerted.

Vain indeed is it, in our ignorance, to let fancy moved by love dwell on these possibilities for our comfort, since knowledge we have none. But it is not in vain to rest satisfied in the thought that the little loved one is in the hands of the Heavenly Father; that he who on earth rebuked those who imagined that he would not be troubled by the presence of children now welcomes them to his bosom; or that the builder of the "many mansions" has a place and a palace for them.

Why, therefore, weeping parent, should you be disconsolate when the being around whom such large affections gathered and in whom so many hopes centred is, to short-sighted humanity, so prematurely called away?

Lament not, then, that the babe is withdrawn from sight. It may be that, as the infant and apparently lost Moses was again committed to his mother, you may be ordained, in other worlds, to perfect that work of education which you were not permitted to carry on upon earth.

If it should be so, what new joy will it occasion to have the opportunity of teaching such an one by the sad experiences of earth the evil of sin, the force of temptation and the necessity for entire dependence upon God; lessons which they who have sojourned below learned only amid many sorrows. What a privilege will it be to feel that in this particular you have suffered vicariously. What rapture to be, in this form, a co-worker with God in bringing the young spirit to himself.

Think, too, what the child may have escaped! What sufferings, what adversities, what snares, what sins—to what a large extent it has been taken away from the "evil to come."

Think again of the mournful possibility that the babe, now so safely housed and adorned with so much innocence, might, had it lived, have developed into a monster of wickedness, and have finally fallen crushed by the Divine displeasure, crushing in its fall the hearts that clung around it with natural but misplaced affection.

Think of the bitterness with which you would then have followed your child to the grave, and with what a pierced heart you would have mourned over one whose early death would even to you have been one of the greatest of blessings. How would your distress be aggravated by the thought that instruction, example, prayer, had all apparently been in vain; that a worse than useless life had ended in a miserable death! Dry, then, fond mother, your tears. He who alone knows the end from the beginning has doubtless done well in permitting the event you so greatly deplore. What you know not now you shall know hereafter. Confide everything to the infinite wisdom and infinite love which directs all mortal affairs, and be glad that he should rule who alone is competent to determine what is or is not for the best.

"Leave all to God,
Forsaken one, and stay thy tears;
For the Highest knows thy pain,
Sees thy sufferings and thy fears;
Thou shalt not wait his help in vain,
Leave all to God."

II.—THE TOMB OF THE STRONG.

"Let not the strong man glory in his strength."— Jeremiah.

HERE lies one who suddenly and unexpectedly departed this life in the thirty-fifth year of his age, in the full bloom of health, strong, active, enterprising and successful. His sun is gone down at noon, and his days are cut short in the midst. Of the dead man we can know nothing. Perhaps he solaced himself for many days with the hope of a long and happy life. Perhaps he dwelt much on a continued series of earthly satisfactions. Perhaps, in imagination, he already grasped the wealth, the distinction, the world-wide prosperity for which his soul longed.

Perhaps it was otherwise. It may be—and we may hope it from what is recorded on the marble—that he was a wise and good man, and one who amid all his prosperity felt himself to be after all only a pilgrim and a stranger on the earth. Be that as it may, in an hour when he thought not the summons came.

Oh, how slight is the partition which separates this world from the next! How sudden may be the transition from time to eternity! How uncertain, at the best, are the plans and schemes of the children of men!

In imagination I behold the funeral procession approaching, and watch its progress. It reaches the grave. The weeping wife and children, stunned by the stroke, stand there full of amazement. Can it be, say they, that he who, so short a time ago, moved amongst us, exercising authority, imparting benefits, guiding and controlling the industry of a multitude, is now no longer among the living, and will soon be but a handful of dust? Has he left us forever? Shall we no more hear his voice, no more profit by his counsel, no more partake of his pleasures, no more share his love? The thought is overwhelming. It crushes every hope and poisons every joy.

So mourners think. But God has determined otherwise. Time, change, anxieties, the necessary avocations of life, all combine to deliver the bereaved from memories which, if permanent, would be fatal.

The Christian has other and higher consolations. His life may be spent with grief and his years with sighing, but he knows and feels that this sadness is but the earnest of an inheritance. Grief, the lot alike of the sinner and the saint, is ever rising and swelling in human hearts, for in the school of sorrow man is mainly disciplined. But it is always more or less transitory and its results vary wonderfully. To one it is never more than a lamentation—an unheeded monster. To another it becomes a proof of the dignity which is in store for the children of God.

"Man that is born of a woman is of few days and full of trouble. He cometh forth like a flower and is cut down: he fleeth also as a shadow and continueth not." . . . "As the waters fail from the sea, and the flood decayeth and drieth up: so man lieth down and riseth not: till the heavens be no more they shall not awaken nor be raised out of their sleep."

Meanwhile, "until the day break and the shadows flee away," the believer is "indissolubly one with those who have passed within the veil." And the voice that comforts him as he ponders on his pious dead is that voice from heaven which the beloved apostle heard saying unto him, "Write, From henceforth blessed are the dead which die in the Lord. Even so, saith the Spirit; for they rest from their labors and their works do follow them."

"I would go home! fain to my Father's house,
Fain to my Father's heart!
Far from the world's uproar and hollow vows,
To silent peace, apart.
With thousand hopes in life's gay dawn I ranged,
Now homeward wend, with chastened heart and changed:
Still to my soul one germ of hope is come—
I would go home."

III.—THE RESTING-PLACE OF THE AGED.

"Like as a shock of corn cometh in in his season."—
Job, v. 26.

As I turned into one of the many side walks which relieve the monotony that would otherwise be painful, I came all at once upon a tomb distinguished among others by the richness of its appearance. It was lofty and imposing, and was evidently the memorial of one who in his day had made a figure in the world.

Who sleeps here? I said to myself as I drew near to inquire of the speaking marble. I found it to be the resting-place of a rich and aged man, of one who had died full of years, and apparently surrounded by every comfort and luxury that wealth could procure.

He had lived to be nearly ninety, and until that late period of existence would appear scarcely to have tasted of the labor and sorrow which is common to man.

But however long delayed, the day of change at length arrived. The keepers of the house began to tremble; fears were in the way; the grasshopper became a burden; desire failed; the silver cord was loosed; the golden bowl was broken; the dust returned to the earth as it was, and the spirit returned unto God who gave it.

All that remains of him is this splendid monument, covering but not staying the rapid decay of his remains. "Vanity of vanities, saith the Preacher, all is vanity."

How different, I thought, is the lot of different men? How varied their probation! And yet how uniform their end! How short a period will elapse before this merchant prince and the peasant that lies near him will alike crumble and be forgotten! A little while more, and this proud monument will perish too. Again a little while, and every relic will have passed away, every remembrance of the departed will have been altogether obliterated.

I gaze through the iron grate of the superb vault, and I behold, half concealed by shade, the coffins of a family. One by one they have gone before him who gave them birth, and now, after long dwelling in loneliness, he too has joined the company and in the silence of death reposes by their side.

How worthless, then, is the world at its highest and best! Of what small value are its glories! What can it now do for these breathless beings? Is it not as a dream that vanisheth away? Shorter than a span, lighter than a spark, a shadow which abideth not.

Let this reflection teach me to "number my days that I may apply my heart unto wisdom." Let me strive not for the honors of earth, but for the incorruptible crown.—Let me live as the heir of immortality.

My thoughts pass on to the resurrection morn. The trumpet sounds and the dead are raised. These "prisoners of hope" drop the mystic chain that has bound them so long, and rise to judgment or to joy according to that they have been while on earth. For in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, the soul, long dwelling in the invisible, is again clothed in humanity, and amid an innumerable multitude the resident of this tomb stands before the bar of Christ.

The books are opened. The secrets of all hearts are disclosed. The sons of God are manifested, and the children of the wicked one have their true characters disclosed. The heavens reveal their iniquities and the whole universe joins in their condemnation.

What astounding discoveries shall then be made! What marvelous disclosures! We shall all know then even as we are known. All our mistakes will be rectified. All our misjudgments corrected. All our uncharitableness put to shame. With what self-reproach shall we then recognize many of the honored ones whom we once thought far from the truth, and with what amazement shall we see some to whom we looked up as oracles of divine wisdom hiding their diminished heads and sinking into oblivion!

All hope worthy of the name hangs on the Resurrection. "If the evening of our days were not succeeded by a morning dawn, I cannot express," says Dr. Tholuck, "how poor and insignificant everything would appear to me."

"Oh, then, my Lord and my God, let me feel within my soul the power of that resurrection which has brought life and immortality to light. Give me at the open grave of Jesus a consciousness of victory and peace. Make me to feel that I am no longer in bondage through fear of death. Grant, O my God, that the peace of the resurrection morn may rest upon my whole life. So in his rest and in his great peacefulness shall I be blessed through eternity."

"Oh, 'tis sweet

To see the love of God transcending all,
And in the very breast that harbored ill
Building an habitation for himself!
The chaff destroyed, no more appears in heaven,
The grain is sown afresh on mountain slopes,
And through eternity the harvest fields
Whiten with joy, and liberty, and love!"

HENRY DUNN.

THE MARRIAGE OF THE LAMB.

BY ELDER S. W. BISHOP.—No. 1.

THAT an event is to transpire in the history of the divine development which will bring the Church into a union with Christ, represented as a marriage, is clearly revealed in the Scriptures of truth. That union is not consummated in this life. It lies beyond the destruction of the harlot of Rome. This is perfectly plain in the reading of Rev. xix. 1-7. It is plainly revealed in Matt. xxv. 1-10 that the marriage is subsequent to the second coming of Christ. The Church in this life is merely espoused to Christ. See 2 Cor. xi. 2. Does the use of such language in Scripture indicate anything? or is it without meaning? Who will attempt to so impeach the wisdom of God's Anointed as to urge that he uses language that is meaningless? If it means anything, how much does it mean? I answer: the main features of the accomplishment of the act of union that makes the man and the woman "one flesh" will find its counterpart in the marriage of Christ to the Church. The first act is the espousal. After the espousal the bride must get ready for the wedding. Is it thus with the bride of the Lamb? Most certainly. When are we espoused to Christ if not at conversion? You ask me, Is there a work to be accomplished in us after conversion to fit us for this exalted position? Most certainly. After conversion we are commanded to "grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ."—2 Pet. iii. 18. After we are converted, we are to "add to our faith" seven important graces, or qualifications, in order to attain to a perfectly safe position. See 2 Pet. i. 5-10. Anything short of these additions will not fit us for an abundant entrance into the kingdom of Jesus Christ. See verse 11. After we are converted we must be sanctified wholly. See 1 Thess. verse 23. It is for the purpose that the bride of Christ may have an opportunity to secure an entire preparation for the marriage that she is espoused before the marriage. The exact character of that prepared state is plainly marked in the Holy Scriptures. It is vain for any one to suppose that he or she will be received as a member of the bride of Christ without an exact Bible preparation for the marriage feast. When it is declared that "the marriage of the Lamb is come," it is also recorded, "His wife hath made herself ready." I shall attempt to show in what that readiness consists. Judging from the talk of some with whom I have come in contact, I am led to conclude that they, with many others, expect to attain unto this most closely-wrought union with Christ because they hold a certain set of religious views. On this point, doubtless, many are in an error that will shut them out of the kingship in the ages to come. We all know and acknowledge the great value of revealed truth; but a mere intellectual faith in revealed truth will not save us. There is a faith that, having no corresponding works, is dead (James ii. 20), and surely a dead faith possesses no saving power. The devils believe (verse 19), but such faith as devils exercise will not bring either justification or sanctification. There is a faith that stands only in the wisdom of men, and there is its opposite, a faith that stands in the power of God.—1 Cor. ii. 5. The first-named is merely the acceptance of religious views from men, because these men preach "with enticing words of man's wisdom," and that kind of faith makes of those who receive it mere religious partisans. The second is the truth of God, spoken in demonstration of the Spirit and of power, and is written on the heart by the sealing power of the Spirit of God. "In whom, after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise which is the earnest of our inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession."—Eph. i. 13, 14. "And grieve not the Holy Spirit of God, whereby ye are sealed unto the day of redemption.—Ch. iv. 30. The above Scriptures teach emphatically the necessity that the sealing power of the Holy Spirit must attend the truth to the heart in order that the truth benefit us unto eternal salvation. I am told that we are sanctified through the truth. I most fully and most cordially admit it; but I do not believe that a bare intellectual believing of any or many principles of truth will sanctify any one.

There is such a position as holding the truth in unrighteousness, recognized by St. Paul. "For the wrath of God from heaven is revealed against all the iniquity and wickedness of men, who hold the truth in iniquity."—Rom. i. 18.—Murdock. The text in James assures us that men may have faith in the word of truth, but as that faith does not have corresponding works it is dead, and will not save the person possessing it. The means and mode of sanctification are plainly revealed in the Holy Scriptures. "We are bound to give thanks always to God for you, brethren beloved of the Lord, because God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth."—2 Thess. ii. 13. Again: "Seeing ye have purified your souls in obeying the truth through the Spirit."—1 Peter i. 22. Thus we learn that the word of truth will do nothing whatever toward sanctifying us unless it be vitalized into a divine power in our hearts or minds by the Holy Spirit. It then becomes a real, a divine faith, the only faith that will justify, sanctify and save. Anything short of this amounts to nothing better than a dry, sectarian, selfish theory. Those who are satisfied with such theories usually ignore the real work of the Spirit of God, and of necessity, therefore, are destitute of that love which is "shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, which is given unto us."—Rom. v. 5. They have not a sufficiently clear perception of the divine character to know what is pleasing to our loving Father, and in the hardness of their unloving hearts they, like Saul the Pharisee, appear to think that they are doing God service when they attempt to forge in their ecclesiastical furnace handcuffs, fetters and thumb-screws with which they would gladly torture, cramp and cripple those who refuse to be stretched or shortened, as the case may require, to fit them to lie down contentedly on their iron bedstead. We have seen a great deal of this work among a particular class of religionists, and that, too, while they are constantly saying, "We must be sanctified through the truth." Such certainly need the sanctifying power of the truth of God. The recognized bride of Christ will know, in all its divine reality and power, that sanctification that is attained to by having the word of truth written in the heart by the Holy Spirit. When that work is accomplished, it will give her the following marked character: "For if any one be in Christ he is a new creation; the old things are passed away; behold they have become new."—1 Cor. verse 17. "Knowing this, that our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin."—Rom. vi. 6. "But now being made free from sin, and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life."—Verse 22.

This is clean work. Do we wish to get rid of our carnality? Do we desire to cease serving sin? All that is necessary is to have the old man crucified with Christ. His death—for crucifixion always brings death—will destroy the body of sin, and we shall no longer serve sin, for the good reason that there is no body of sin in us to demand our service. If we wish to bear fruit unto holiness and gain the life of all the ages, we must be made free from sin.

If we desire that our works shall correspond with the requirements of the word of God, we must be "created in Christ Jesus unto good works."—Eph. ii. 10. When the Church has attained to this exalted position she will, at his appearing, be presented "a chaste virgin to Christ."—2 Cor. xi. 2.

When she is presented she will be found to possess a character of spotless, sinless purity. Here is the text: "Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the Church and gave himself for it, that he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the Word, that he might present it to himself a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle, OR ANY SUCH THING; but that it should be holy and without blemish."—Eph. vs. 25-27.

This character must be secured in this life, or we shall have no part or lot with the bride of Christ when she is called to the marriage feast. This is "the wedding garment"—"the robe of fine linen, clean and white"—"the righteousness of saints"—in which the bride will be found arrayed when the Bridegroom comes. There will be no time given for any to make that preparation after he comes; and he will make no additions to the spotless company that composes the bride at his coming. All who are ready will go in when he comes, and all who are not ready will then be shut out, and never participate in the glorious fruitions and the exalted privileges of the bride of Christ in the endless ages.

The time that remains to the marriage feast is now very short. Almost six thousand years have passed since the work of gathering out a bride for the only Son of our Father commenced, and the last days of the time appointed for the nuptial feast are passing swiftly by, and if wholly ready we shall soon know how "blessed are all they that are called to the marriage supper of the Lamb." It may be "through suffering" that the readiness is wrought in us, but it will richly repay us for all if we may at the end of our trial "obtain that age and that resurrection out from among the dead ones," to be associated with Christ in his reign through endless years.

QUESTIONS.

1. Do the "new heavens and new earth," spoken of in Isa. lxxv. 17, refer to the second coming of Christ?
2. Do we get the idea that there will be mortal beings in the new earth, and that probation will be extended to them, or how are we to understand verses 20-25?
3. Are we to understand that the "thousand years" of Rev. xx. is yet in the future?
4. Will there be two literal resurrections?

R.

RESPONSE BY THE EDITOR.

1. They seem to me to refer to the government and reign of Christ to be established at or soon after his return from heaven; for saith the Lord, "Behold I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy," verse 18.

The government then established I understand to be symbolized by a "new heavens and new earth"—a government unlike the changeable ones with which the world has hitherto been cursed. Jerusalem will then be the centre of power and authority; "for the law shall go forth of Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem: and he shall judge among many people, and rebuke strong nations afar off: and they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks, . . . neither shall they learn war any more," etc.—Micah iv. 1-4.

2. I have no doubt "there will be mortal beings" under the government symbolized by the new heaven and new earth; and that they will have probation, or trial, for confirmation in life; which if misimproved will end in death, even if the "sinner be a hundred years old." Only with this view can I reconcile the language of verses 20 to 25.

3. I am satisfied that the thousand years (symbolical, it may be, of an indefinite period) are "yet in the future," to commence at the resurrection spoken of in Rev. xx. 4.

4. I am satisfied there will be at least two "literal resurrections"; for I long since gave up the idea that Rev. xx. 5 was an "interpolation." Prof. C. F. Hudson's article on that question—published some time before his death—satisfied me the text is genuine. The text says: "The rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished." It is not till then that the resurrection of the remaining dead ones will commence; nor is it certain that those to be raised, after that period, will all be raised at one time; but none of them will be raised till those thousand years are finished.

Let us all remember that "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection; on such the second death hath no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him the thousand years."—Rev. xx. 6. These "cannot die any more."—Luke xx. 36. Luke-warm Christians, who refuse to follow Christ through evil report as well as good, and who let "the cares of this life" and its vanity and show absorb their chief desires, will hardly come up in "the first resurrection;" if ever saved at all, it will be "so as by fire."—1 Corth. iii. 11-15. Let us all be stimulated to be "crucified unto the world and the world unto us," that we may gain a part among the highly honored ones who are to "live and reign with Christ" in subjecting the nations to his government, which is to be one of "righteousness and peace."—Jer. xxiii. 5, 6.

ISHI.

Thou shalt call me ISHI (my husband, etc.) And I will betroth thee unto me forever.—Hosea ii: 16.

OH, my heart is full of laughter, and I'm very, very glad, For I have a precious treasure, such as princes never had.

Ishi! Ishi! is the jewel, mine He is while ages roll—Angels taste not of the glory, Holy Ishi of the soul.

All my love no tongue can utter, all its wondrous depths and power, Growing deeper, growing stronger, day by day, and hour by hour.

Ishi! Ishi! night and morning, from my lips that holy name,

All the while my soul exulting, in the self-same joyous strain.

Many beauteous names thou bearest, Brother, Shepherd, Friend and King;

But they none unto my spirit, such divine support can bring.

Other joys are short and fleeting; thou and I can never part—

Thou art altogether lovely, Ishi! Ishi! of my heart.

Earthly loves are very lovely, passing, passing fair they seem;

But they come and go before me, like some bright and happy dream.

Thou art a reality; from which, like dreams, I never wake.

These I cast aside as nothing, Ishi! Ishi! for thy sake.

In thy own fair realms of glory, in the Holiest above; Choirs of angels chant the story of thy wondrous, matchless love.

All my longings are contented, all my wanderings turn to thee,

Pole star of my restless spirit—Ishi! all in all to me.

When from heaven thou art coming, and thy head with glory crowned;

When with all thy holy angels, and the trumpet's joyful sound;

Then, oh Ishi! well beloved, I shall see thy glorious face;

Finding in thy loving bosom my eternal resting-place.

REQUISITES IN BIBLE STUDY.

IN the study of the Bible the first requisite is faith. Trust this book. Do not be ever trembling for it, still less even cavilling at it. In it is found the blessed presence of him whom, if you are a Christian, your soul loves above all things. He who is ever sitting at the feet of Jesus and learning, will be listening more to his blessed words than to idle voices that float around. The next requisite is intelligence: "Be ye not unwise, but understanding what the will of the Lord is." The Greek language possesses great capacities for expressing minute differences and fathoming profound depths of thought. Another requisite is honesty—a straightforward, candid spirit: Handle not the Word of God deceitfully. Every fact is God's fact, sent to thee for thy good. Fear it not, face it, give it its due influence. It may seem unwelcome at first—a visitor whose speech jars on thy snug system of cherished home thoughts; but, depend upon it, thou wilt entertain an angel unawares. The last requisite I name is Charity: Oh, my brothers? we all speak and write too many hard and bitter words. We try to break, not to mend, the bruised reed. While we strive to be strong in faith let us not despise the faith of the weakest; for there will come a day to all of us, when in the giving way of the powers of nature, and the pouring in of the great water-floods, we shall grasp at something which may hold us up and carry us over. And then, not how much we have searched out and known, not how much we have disputed and prevailed, will help us, but how much we have lived on Christ and imbibed of his spirit.—Dean Alford

SYRIA AND THE EASTERN IMBROGLIO.

IN common with many students of prophecy, we have expressed a belief that the real centre of the Eastern Question lay considerably south of Constantinople, and that the exigencies—real or conceived—of international politics might any day precipitate the shifting of the world's interest to the locality indicated. A passage in the speech made by Lord Beaconsfield in the House of Lords on the 9th of April, seems an important addition to former signs pointing in the same direction. Speaking of the collapse of the Turkish independence and the reduction of the Sultan, by the treaty of San Stefano, to what he described as "a state of absolute subjugation to Russia," he said:

"The country in which these events were occurring is a country that has always been subject to strange and startling vicissitudes. In the East there is but one step between collapse and convulsion. It was impossible to say what might not occur. . . . We know very well—it is in the memory of many men who sit in your Lordship's house—that an army from Egypt marched through Syria almost without firing a shot, marched through Asia, and held Constantinople in the utmost terror. Why should not Russia march armies in the same way upon the Suez Canal and Egypt, and hold them in trepidation, as Constantinople and the Bosphorus were forty years ago?"

It is no concern of ours in these pages to balance the respective merits of rival political factions. The fears expressed by the Premier may be as "chimerical" as some of his opponents described them. We content ourselves by recording the fact that, in the estimation of practical and responsible statesmen, Syria has already attained somewhat of that importance of situation which has been foreseen. For the time being the British Government considers it an outpost of their dominion.—The Messenger, Glasgow.

How few understand the phrase at the head of this article. To some it means Millerism; others find it nothing but the total destruction of the whole universe; or, as it is presented by one poet:

And the crush of worlds.”

If, however, we turn to the Word of God we never get any impressions like those above expressed. The end of the world is not only a Bible idea, but it has a Bible significance. The word “world” does not express the full idea of the original. Neither is there any ground for the modern notion of a total wreck of our globe. The Bible tells us of the everlasting inheritance of the saints; of an eternal Kingdom and of a throne which shall stand forever. By a still closer examination of the Word we find that the inheritance is on the earth, under a righteous King, who is to rule the world forever, and from the throne of his power on earth he is to have an eternal Kingdom. Proofs of these points are abundant throughout the Word of Inspiration. See Dan. ii. 44, 45; Dan. vii. 13, 14, 25, 27; Ps. xxxvii. Is. lx. 20; Matt. v. 9, 10; Eccl. i. 4.

If the reader will examine the above proofs he will find that our earth is not to be annihilated. The earth has been given to Christ as a part of his royalty. See Ps. ii. 6-10; Acts iii. 18-20. It is, therefore, the very height of presumption to talk about the end of the world involving the destruction of the planet or of its being converted into a pandemonium.

The first man is of the earth and is earthy. He it is that is to be changed to spirit, but that spirit is a spirit body or a man under the laws of spirit, instead of flesh. Such a being must have a place to live. Hence the force of Jesus' words: “Blessed are the meek for they shall inherit the earth” (Matt. v. 5). No system of figures can do away with this plain Bible. If the reader will take the trouble, he will find that the phrase “The end of the world” merely means the end of an age, or of a dispensation. Jesus appeared in the end of the world to put away sin. See Heb. ix. 27-28.

The Gospel is to be preached to the end of the world, and when thus preached in all the Kosmos the end is to come. That is, the end of the aion will come. But another, a greater and a more glorious aion will then be introduced. Messiah will then send forth His law and the nations will learn the ways of truth. The coming of Messiah is not the end of all time, but the end of the captivity and the end of the Gentile rule. But his coming is the beginning of a new, a brighter and a far more glorious world—even the “World to come,” which will be the age of victory and of the crown. We hope, therefore, when our readers meet with the expression, “End of the World” they will not associate therewith the destruction of our globe, but the close of the rebellion against God and the beginning of a new order of things, which shall continue until all things are one with the Father.—Selected.

MESSIAH'S NEAR APPROACH.—Is it not evident from events that are constantly occurring that the “times of the Gentiles” are fast drawing to a close? Truly it is, and the earnest desire of the true Christian is that they may speedily be accomplished, for then the long-prayed-for reign of Messiah will commence; then shall the long dark night through which the bridal Church has passed be succeeded by the radiance of eternal day; then shall the hidden face of Calvary's scarred One be seen 'mid heaven's clouds by eyes long trained to look for God's “Son from heaven.” And then shall a voice peal forth, sweeter than the mellow-toned harp of Israel, and deeper than Sinai's thunders, from lips once whispering the dying notes of anguish, saying, “Awake from death's dreamless sleep, ye sanctified throng! Leave your cold pillows and meet me ‘in the air,’ for I have come to redeem you!”—Selected.

JOHN “wept much” when no man was found worthy to open and read the Book seen in the hand of him who sat upon the Throne. He earnestly desired to know the things concerning the future. God has implanted that desire in all minds; and earnest research will be rewarded, and our tears be dried up. John could not be content to see the book; he earnestly desired to know its contents, and what was to be the destiny of men. His earnestness was rewarded by a vast increase of knowledge. Drones will make no progress.

SINCE the very purpose for which an infallible guide is supposed to be needed is the removal of all reasonable doubt, it is plain that if God had thought fit to provide us with such a guide, He would not have left it at all doubtful where we are to look for that guide.

THE PAPACY CONDEMNING THE TRUE DOCTRINE OF THE RESURRECTION: NAMELY, THE SPIRIT-BODY.

CONSIDERED BY H. BRITTAIN.

ON Monday, May 6th, of this year, I was looking over a Birmingham (England) newspaper when my attention was arrested by a paragraph which stated that the Index Expurgatorius of Rome had put on its list two works written by John Charles Earle, B.A. The titles of these works were, "The Spiritual Body," and "The Forty Days; or, Christ between the Resurrection and Ascension."

Knowing the general tendency of the Papacy to condemn anything not considered true according to its own idea of truth, I at once procured the work, "The Spiritual Body," and was excessively pleased to find that the truth as to the spiritual body was the same as held by myself, although I could not, nor do not, agree as to the time of its manifestation. I cannot do better than give in Mr. Earle's words the statement of his position. It is in the form of a sonnet, for Mr. Earle is a poet of no mean power:

"A TRUER TRUTH.

"The truth that Paul delivered is o'ergrown
With rank tradition, but the hour is nigh
When isles that in perennial summer lie,
And icy tracts where arctic tempests moan,
And bamboo plains within the torrid zone,
And mission ships that in all waters ply,
And darkling tribes that for the true faith sigh
And aspirations after science own.
A truer resurrection truth shall know—
That death from death a double life will see,
A body from the body will set free—
That mortal sowers in the furrow sow
The husk that mingles with earth, air and wave,
But do 'not sow the body that shall be.'"

I wrote to the author expressing my gratification, and was honored by his sending me his two works, one on "The Forty Days," etc., and the other a work entitled "The Master's Field," a series of sonnets (100.).

From the second work I send seven sonnets I have selected for the readers of THE BIBLE EXAMINER." The quality of the rest may be easily deducted, bearing in mind what I state as to my difference afterward.

From the fly-leaf of the first ("The Forty Days," etc.) the following memoranda by Mr. Earle are taken:

"The main propositions of the 'Spiritual Body' and the 'Forty Days,' both now placed on the Index,* are:

1. "That the natural body will never rise again in its natural condition.
2. "That the spiritual body rises from the natural body at the moment of death, and is identical with it but under altered conditions."

I agree with the first, and object to one word only in the second—namely, "death." For this word I would substitute "resurrection." Will your readers read No. 2, substituting "resurrection" in place of "death?"

The difference between myself and Mr. Earle resolves itself into a question as to the time this body will be manifest.

To the dead person the moment of death is immediately succeeded by the moment of resurrection. There is no time measurement only by the living. So that in this, as I consider it, the true sense, the moment of death is the moment of resurrection. The Papacy does not want a body at all, except its own. The disciple of Christ is persuaded that there is a natural body. The one must be so intimately connected with the other as that the identity of each one of us must be preserved, although under altered conditions.

I submit the following extract from "The Forty Days," endorsing the statements made in it:

"The Scriptures throughout presuppose two worlds existing side by side, related to each other and mutually interpenetrated—the world of men and the world of spirits. Those with whom this is an abiding conviction are evidently the more Scriptural in their mode of thought. While the mortal body of Christ was very rapidly etherealized, an angel of the Lord descended from heaven and came and rolled away the stone from the door of the sepulchre and sat upon it. His countenance was as lightning and his raiment white as snow. For fear of him the keepers quaked and became as dead men; and the angel spake to the women who had come to visit the tomb. Now, it would be superfluous to point out that the angel was clothed in a spirit-body, if the entire Christian Church had not fallen into forgetfulness and tacit doctrine of the spiritual body altogether. Yet it pervades every part of Scripture, and is as fundamental as any dogma in the most ancient creeds. The angel of the Lord 'descended'; but locomotion is proper to bodies and to forms. He descended from 'heaven,' which is both a place and a state, and he came, therefore, from a region where bodies of an entirely different order from those to which our senses are accustomed exist and enjoy existence. He had a 'countenance,' which is not proper to an abstract spirit, and he had 'raiment' like almost all spirits whom men have been permitted to behold. He could be visible or invisible at will. He could terrify the Roman guard with the brightness of his appearing, and he could speak in the voice and language of men in words of the most thrilling gentleness and power."—(Pp. 8, 9, 10.)

And (p. 10): "Angels have each a personality as distinct as that of any human being, and that personality is inseparably connected with form."

In speaking of the appearances of the Lord afterward, Mr. Earle says (p. 25): "Can a spirit-body then be handled and subjected to sensible tests of identity? Can a spirit speak with a human tongue and eat and drink with a company of other human beings? It is even so."

And again (p. 26): "When risen from the dead, Christ became a representative of humanity, surviving death and putting on the garments of immortality."

I do not know whether the idea of the resurrection body being a tangible one is new to your readers, but it certainly is not new in the "New Testament" Scriptures. The apostle Paul declares, 1 Cor. xv:14, "There is a natural body and there is a spiritual body." The raised dead will each have a body. But it appears to me that the kind of body differs as we consider the position of the one raised.

The first man was made out of dust out of the earth. The second man was the Lord out of heaven. How the second man, the Lord, took upon Himself the nature of flesh and blood I know not. But, notwithstanding I know not the how of the matter, the fact remains true. It was necessary for our redemption that He should be made like unto us; yet without sin, that through death, death might be destroyed. He died, yet His flesh did not see corruption. Others do. As the first man is of the earth, so also they that are earthy; and as the heavenly, such they also that are heavenly.

Bear in mind that the Epistle to the Corinthians was written to those who had accepted the Christ as their head. Of them and to them alone could it be said, "the last Adam a quickening spirit." In so writing I do not wish to exceed either the bounds of truth or of love to all men. Nor do I think others will do so if they will put themselves in my place and consider this question with me for a time, or as it may for the continuance, from the same standpoint.

The Apostle Paul has been quoted as declaring that "there is a natural body and there is a spiritual body." By the first I understand that there is a body which is animated by the psuche, or the present life; by the second that there will be a body animated by the pneuma, or the Spirit.

The first is a matter of fact; the second a matter of faith. The power or principle animating the first is a perishing one, and ends in death. The power or principle animating the second is an imperishable one, and makes immortal.

In the resurrection the believer stands up with a body thoroughly animated by the Spirit of Christ and of God. Therefore the body in which he stands is in an altered condition. No liability to death, for the first animating power has been taken away, and in its place substituted a second power in which no decay can be found.

It is to these the epithet "heirs" can alone be applied. For "flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, nor can corruption inherit incorruption." Flesh in connection with blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God. But flesh in connection with the Spirit can inherit the kingdom of God.

But heirs are not always heirs—they must come into the estate. The estate is the kingdom belonging to God. The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof. Of his Son it has been said: "Ask of me and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession." His followers will be "heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ so that they may be glorified together." The whole earth is the estate. The point at which the reclaiming it on the earth begins is from Jerusalem. Therefore is it that so much is connected with the destiny of Israel and Israel on the earth.

When the Heir and joint heirs come into possession the estate will be the whole earth and its people its subjects. Here, then, comes out clear the distinction. In one class flesh animated by deathlessness of power; in the other flesh animated by a power of death; and, I think, from Isaiah's statement, even in this second instance, greatly subjected though not permitted to be conquered. Here the conquered; there the conquerors.

The time in which this manifestation takes place is named "the age," the "future age," or "the resurrection." And the life shown forth in this age in the bodies or persons of the Christ and his Church is "Eternal Life." For the common idea attached to eternal life as a life that has simply no end appears to me incorrect. For flesh and blood might be placed under such conditions, ordained of God, as to be endless. Hence, I can understand that Adam and Eve were hindered from eating of the Tree of Life in Eden to prevent this from taking place, especially as by so doing they would have continued endless sinners. To repeat, eternal life to me is not simply eternal existence. Is not eternal life the manifestation of life in an incorruptible body, and this body the spirit-body?

The Body of Christ after his resurrection was capable of being seen, felt and heard. It was the model, so to speak, after which the body of all believers has to be formed. If, then, eternal life be what I state it will be, it follows that the Christ must have manifested this life. Nay, more, as we are only enabled to have this life in him and through him, that he must not be the source only, but the Life itself.

Hence, the apostle John is heard declaring after his resurrection, first Epistle, first chapter: "That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon and our hands have handled, of the Word of Life; that which we have seen and heard declare we unto you, that ye also may have fellowship with us: and truly our fellowship is with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ."

Mark the parenthetical statement: "For the life was manifested, and we have seen and bear witness and show unto you that eternal life which was with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ." Now turn to the statement of the apostle Peter, Acts x. 40 and 41: "Him God raised up the third day, and shewed him openly; not to all the people (Greek reads, God raised up on the third day, and gave or permitted him to become manifest, not to all the people), but unto witnesses chosen before of God, even to us, who did eat and drink with him after he rose from the dead." How the witnesses agree!

If God had not allowed Christ to have become manifest after his resurrection, how could the resurrection of the dead have been proved? And if he had not been raised with a body capable of being recognized by our present ordinary or natural senses, how could his identity be proved, and, therefore, ours?

"That eternal life" which John saw was no principle, but a person, Jesus, the Christ. The faith of John was built on a fact, not an opinion. The fact of being able to be known by sensible proof after his resurrection confirmed the words of Jesus before his resurrection, "I am the way, the truth and the life." He that hath the Son hath the life; he that hath not the Son hath not the life.

In the light (as I trust it is) of what I write, read the following passages, among many which might be chosen: 1 John iii. 2—"Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that when he shall appear we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." And Phil. iii. 20, 21—"For our conversation (our commonwealth, Greek) is in heaven; from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change our vile body (who will transform our body of humiliation, Greek) that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself."

Well may the Roman Church not like the teaching of the Scriptures concerning the body. Sorry am I to say that the majority of Protestant or non-conforming churches are on her side. With the how of the matter we have nothing to do. That belongs to the secret things of God. It is not a solitary mystery. From the mystery of the growth of a blade of grass to the mystery of the existence of the Creator himself, how great a gulf? Between either we are bounded as to finding the cause as to why it is so. Let us be content with acknowledging that which we know, and remember the words, "Blessed are they which have not seen, yet have believed." We have not seen the Spirit-body of him who pleadeth at the right hand of God the Father. But we believe he is there in possession of it. May the time soon come for which the apostle looked (Rom. viii. 23), when the body shall be redeemed and the creation itself be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God.

SELECTIONS.

FREE DISCUSSION.

WHY wouldst thou close the wholesome lists of thought,
 As if the chivalry of mind were o'er,
 And beavered knight must break a lance no more,
 Nor in the subtlety of strength be taught
 The value of an armour finely wrought
 And weapons highly tempered? Thus of yore
 Did Christendom extend from shore to shore,
 By soul with soul in blest collision brought.
 Why fear the conflict upon Scripture ground,
 If athletes to its truth alike consent,
 And to the spouse of Christ continue real?
 The energy of faith is not yet spent,
 And many guerdon-truths may yet be found
 By hearts empanoplied in burnished steel.

"COGITO, ERGO SUM."

I HARDLY dare to say as much, Descartes;
 I hardly dare to say "I am" like thee
 "Because I think." For what is it to be?
 Can I have being while in every part,
 Seen or unseen, I deviate and start
 Upon a new existence? Swift as flee Moments, I change. E'en my identity
 Might yet be lost through some abysmal art.
 I rather on the great "I Am" depend,
 Nor for myself substantial being claim.
 From him I sprung, in him shall be my end,
 If e'er I end. He always is the same—
 I never. 'Tis enough for me to tend Toward being, he my only life and aim.

IGNORANCE OF SCRIPTURE.

ABYSMAL ignorance of the word of God!
 Oh, tell it not in Gath, nor publish it
 In Askelon's streets, for it is most unfit
 For clergy and the flocks which to their rod Resort for pastoral succor. Can the clod
 Yield any herb so pleasant to be bit,
 Or any by which sense and soul are knit
 So wholesomely together? Not thus trod
 The shepherds of old time, who ranged the hills
 And valleys and fair pastures of the Word,
 Like Christians of Berea, night and day.
 Ah, me! how many wander from this way,
 And feed their hearts on daintiness absurd,
 And quench their thirst from turbid, tainted rills!

CONTINUOUS REVELATION.

You think God's revelation at an end?
 It never ends; no, never. Every mind
 Which graciously he visits to unblind,
 Beholds a new apocalypse extend
 And likeliest to himself of all mankind
 Sees otherwise, and, in his soul combined,
 Pictures in other shapes and colors blend.
 In none the heavenly vision was the same
 Precisely with the visions seen before;
 To none the gentle Breath creative came,
 Dispensing the same measure of the store
 Of gifts, but was in each a kindling flame
 Of light on light—of God known more and more.

IS FAITH OPPOSED TO REASON?

WHAT is the faith the Lord of thee requireth?
 To close with that which reason doth repel?
 No process so insane the truth inspireth,
 The hackney'd answer is as false as hell.
 Faith is the mind's assent to what, if well
 Considered, is as clear as heart desireth—
 More reasonable than the tongue can tell—
 The very fact to which thy hope aspireth.
 Faith could not be if Reason's voice said nay.
 Faith is not difficult, but winged with ease;
 Perplexing doubts are scattered off her way
 By Reason's self, who sweeps as with a breeze
 The cumbrous mists that round the objects lay,
 Till faith their form with calm observance sees.

THE SPIRITUAL WEALD.

O LORD, I seek Thee in another field
 Which erst Thou hadst not opened to my view.
 It is from eyes of unbelief concealed,
 It is to eyes of faith as plain and true
 As any solid thing sense pierces through—
 The spiritual body's boundless weald,
 Where unto thirst thirst's slaking showers accrue
 And seven-sealed scrolls prophetic are unsealed.
 The portal of that weald we call the grave;
 For, as at noonday in the glowing skies
 No star adorns the heavenly architrave,
 The soul is dim until its daylight dies.
 Go down, dear sun of life, beneath the wave,
 And in thy place unnumbered suns shall rise!

THE SPIRIT-BODY AND THE GLORIFIED BODY ONE.

WHEN Grace has rolled back Nature's swollen tide,
 And spread the waters of salvation o'er
 The renovated soul from shore to shore,
 The Spirit-body is the glorified.
 The glory is the supplement supplied
 To that ethereal covering which before
 And after death* increases more and more
 In likeness to the form of Him Who died
 To ransom human nature from its sin.
 And he who lives and dies estranged from grace
 Is ever less and less like Him Whose face,
 Once marred, is now refulgent in a place
 Of spiritual brightness. Oh, the race,
 That end in being like the Lord, to win.

THOSE who are forgetful of the conditions on which alone truth can advance in the world, consider any disturbance of their cherished opinions an unmitigated evil; they do not like the labor of a re-examination of the grounds of their present positions. They seem unaware that everything in the Bible is not yet known that is worth knowing; nor that many things in that Book, most worthy of our earnest investigation, are as yet only partially understood.

* "After" Resurrection: "after," made alive again.—EDITOR OF BIBLE EXAMINER.

TWO SIDES TO THE QUESTION.

It is an undoubted truth that opposite views may be taken of almost any question. Hence it is important that all inquirers after truth should see that they do not allow theories previously adopted to sway their minds so as to make it impossible for them to abandon such, however palpably shown they are errors. Some, from the mere fear of being thought changeable, or bringing reproach on themselves for confessing an error, have remained fast in it all their days, thus becoming mere dwarfs in knowledge.

Let us all, then, in seeking for truth, conclude it is no worse to contradict our former selves than to contradict or controvert the theories of others. We are no more infallible than they; and why not be as willing to take shame to ourselves, if it be a shame not to know everything, for our past ignorance or errors, as to attempt to pour it on others for a similar misfortune? The first step toward advancement in knowledge is humility. The proud man is stationary, and changes not; he is too wise in his own conceit to think he can be taught beyond his past or present knowledge, and he does not wish to be "given to change." Oh, no, that is too mortifying!

There are certain great facts which stand out in the Bible which must and will hold their place in spite of all efforts to remove them. In the first place: "God has made of one blood all nations of men," etc.—Acts. xvii. 26. This includes the entire race of Adam, or all men. Second: Jesus Christ did, by the grace of God, taste death for every man: He "gave himself a ransom for all."—1 Tim. ii. 5, and Heb. ii. 9. Third: He gave command that his Gospel should be preached "to every creature."—Mark xvi. 15. Here is no exception of any man. If there were any of the race for whom Christ did not die, then there could be no Gospel for them; and to preach it to such would be to proclaim a lie. Christ, who is "the Truth," could not have commanded the proclamation of an untruth. Hence, there is no man nor class of men but what there is a Gospel for them; a Gospel that they can believe without believing a lie; else they could not be "damned"—condemned for not believing it, and this Gospel would bring them salvation by faith. The race is all of "one blood," and Christ partook of that; so that, if any are by natural generation "the serpent's children," Christ must have also been the same. This cannot be admitted for a moment. Hence, no man can be such a child by natural birth.

Again: If Christ partook of the "one blood," and "tasted death for every man," then all men were in God's plan of mercy and all were "given to" Christ; for God gave him "power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as the Father had given him."—John xvii. 2. "All flesh" embraces all men, unless an exception is manifestly made; and Christ "gave himself a ransom for all." If this proves that all men will ultimately "be saved," so be it. "To the law and the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them."—Isa. viii. 20.

If all are to be raised from the dead whom the Father hath given to Christ, then no man will be left in death; but the fact that a man is raised from the dead is not proof that he cannot die again, or experience a "second" death. Such an assumption is contradicted by facts. A number were made alive from the dead both under the Old and New Testaments. The fact is, it depends, first, on the will of God in the matter; and second, it depends whether they are raised from the dead because they are "worthy" of eternal life.

As Christ has had "power over all flesh given to him" by the Father, so "The Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment to the Son."—John v. 22. This being true, we must look for the law or principle by which that judgment is to be conducted. This is laid down in the commission given by Christ to his apostles: "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature: he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned"—condemned.—Mark xvi. 15, 16.

To suppose that a part of the race included in this commission, as "every" man is, are at the same time debarred the possibility of receiving any benefit from it, either because they never can hear the message, or are the natural "seed of the serpent," though men, is irreconcilable with the principles of an honest administration of government, or of truth in the offer of mercy, which it was impossible ever to have secured.

Will Christ, as a righteous judge, ever condemn any man to death for not being or doing that which it never was possible for him to be or do? To my mind, such a supposition is impossible. Until it can be shown that there are some of the descendants of Eve who are not called men, and that Christ did not "taste death for every man," I am compelled to teach that the gospel of God's love in Christ is for "every man;" and that it has been or will be proclaimed to "every creature" in a way and manner which shall enable them to secure life everlasting, unless they knowingly and wilfully reject such offer.—Ed.

LETTERS AND EXTRACTS.

FROM EDWIN PHELPS.

BRO. STORRS: I sent the following communication to the World's Crisis in May last, with a request to publish it or immediately return it to me. It has neither been published nor returned. Five weeks have elapsed since I sent it.

Westfield, Mass., June 9, 1878.

"THE LITTLE HORN."

Were it not a subject of more serious consideration, it would be amusing to notice the conflicting expositions of the "little horn" of Daniel. In the World's Crisis of April 3, 1878, was a response to H. K. Choate's call for an explanation of Dan. viii. 8-12, by L. T. Cunningham, in which he says: "These several great features of this 'little horn,' as given in its prophetic sketch, perfectly agree with the history of Rome as a dual power; and they agree with no other power that has ever existed, or ever will exist again under heaven; and we challenge the most rigid scrutiny by any one to point out any essential defect in the application that we have made thus far that Rome is this little horn."

1. In reply I will ask, How it could be in the latter time of the four kingdoms of Grecia that this "little horn" came up, if Rome is the "little horn," when the "stone" is to smite the "image" upon the feet and toes and break in pieces the iron, brass, silver and the gold at the same time? Daniel says, also, that the "little horn" came up among the ten or divided state of the Roman kingdom and plucked up three of the ten by the roots.—Dan. vii. 8. This "little horn" does not become great until the dissolution of the fourth or Roman power. Christ says: "When a strong man armed keepeth his palace, his goods are in peace: but when a stronger than he shall come upon him and overcome him, he taketh from him all his armour wherein he trusted, and divideth his spoils." Paul said this was after Rome became great; that there must come a "falling away first" before that man of sin could be revealed—"who opposeth and exalteth himself."—2 Thess. ii. 3, 4.

2. The writer says: "This horn magnified (or was arrogant) against the Prince of the Host, for Christ was put to death by its authority." How does this compare with Paul's explanation? The writer in the Crisis says: "And from him (Rome) the daily was taken away, and the place of his sanctuary was cast down." "This," he says, "is an important statement; but it agrees perfectly with the history of Rome as a dual power, for Rome was both pagan and papal; and the pagan element called 'the daily' was certainly taken away from Rome." "This," he says, "was when a corrupt Christian element in the empire gained the ascendancy and put down the pagan element." Here he makes this "little horn," that "exalts himself above all that is called God," turn his armor against himself. Christ says, "Every city or house divided against itself shall not stand." "And if Satan cast out Satan, he is divided against himself, how shall then his kingdom stand?"

Daniel says: "Yea, he magnified himself even to the Prince (Christ) of the Host, and (from him, mar.) (the prince) the daily was taken away, and the place of his (Christ's) sanctuary was cast down." "And an host was given him" (the beast) "against the daily by reason of transgression" (or falling away from the truth), "and it cast down the truth to the ground." He says again: "The place of his sanctuary (that) was cast down" relates to temples for pagan worship . . . which were converted into places of Christian worship." Thus he makes this "little horn" a good Christian. He further says: "A literal rendering of verse 12 reads thus: 'And a host was given over the daily in transgression,' etc. This refers to the suppression of paganism by the Christian hosts taking the sword in transgression of the laws of Christ."

Anti-age-to-come Adventists have a peculiar way of suiting prophecy to any condition, if it serves their purpose. In his closing-up remarks he says: "The powers seen in the vision are called the daily, and the transgression of desolation, and both combined tread under foot the sanctuary and the host for 2,300 years." We would like to have him give his authority for this statement. There is no Bible or history to prove it. Every attempt to fix dates by assuming the 2,300 days, (evening-morning, mar.) to be years, has failed and will fail to the end.

"God moves in a mysterious way His wonders to perform."

And when his time comes for the revelation of this "little-horn" power, then "they that dwell on the earth shall wonder, whose names were not written in the book of life from the foundation of the world, when they behold the beast that was and is not, and yet is."

FROM ELDER JOHN FOORE.

BRO. STORRS: Many thanks for the glorious truths I have learned through the BIBLE EXAMINER by the editor, Bros. Bishop, Dunn and others. The EXAMINER has made the Bible a new book, it seems to me. What once was an entire mystery to me is now clear. I used to think the Bible contradicted itself. I thought there were two classes of Scripture at variance with each other—and so there were with the view a great many brethren held, especially that this age ends all probation, and that all who do not secure eternal life here will die in a hopeless state, or that God will burn up everybody except a few adventists—such as believe in the sleep of the dead, the kingdom to be set up on the earth, and have been baptized into the Christ after they believed all these.

Now, I would call attention to several portions of Scripture: 1 Tim. ix. 11, "This is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptance: for therefore we both labor and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, especially of those who believe. These things command and teach."

1 Tim. ii. 3-6, "For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour, who will have all men to be saved and to come unto the knowledge of the truth. For there is one God and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all to be testified in due time."

1 John ii. 1, 2, "My little children, these things write I unto you, that ye sin not: but if any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous; and He is the propitiation for our sins: and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world."

Now, when I see so many go down to dust without ever hearing of Christ, I feel as if some of the brethren either do not read the Bible or do not desire to know the truth, as plain as the Scriptures are with regard to the blessing of all nations through Abraham and his seed. Gen. xxii. 18—God's oath and covenant to father Abraham and his seed. The present time is only the special call for the one seed in which "all families, all nations, all kindreds" shall be blessed. But the blessing, in its fulness, will not begin while Abraham is sleeping in the cave of Machpelah; not till Christ, the Head, and his "Body," the true Church, come together by the resurrection from the dead, which will be at the second advent of Christ.

May we be faithful till our Lord and Master returns "from heaven" (Phil. iii. 20, 21), that we "may be accounted worthy to stand before the Son of man."—Luke xxi. 36.

FROM GEORGE L. HART.

BRO. STORRS: I am sorry to find the EXAMINER is embarrassed for the lack of funds. I have enjoyed the reading of its pages, though differing somewhat in our views. The glorious doctrine of the ages, of the triumphant scheme of the Lord to fill our world with immortal fruit is absorbing, indeed.

I should like it if we had more time to spare to consider more than we do the promised glory. But we are poor, and labor we must until the Lord changes our lot. His blessed will be done! I feel in the bright beyond I shall have a share in the kingdom if I prove true. Oh! how few love to talk of these things! We are slandered and our motives impugned; but the Lord blesses us with his Holy Spirit. I trust I am led by that Spirit into truth. The triumphant work of Zion, as a polity, in its suffering and glorified work is being made more and more plain. I was led, not long since, to visit the City—the "Bride"—as Esdras was commanded; not in literality, of course; but, as John saw it, in the spirit in prospect, in its glory; so may we by hearing and seeing.

Oh! what language that expresses in these glowing colors and gems the structure of the government of Jehovah; whose Son Jesus, the chief Captain of the Host which has been trodden down so long, will be the central Light of this suffering creation; and the thought that it is so near when the triumph will begin is blessed. Truly, then, the golden avenue, with continued life, shall be accessible to all that will come; and more, the river of immortality, proceeding from the throne of God and the Lamb.

I have, I think, seen the true interpretation of the golden symbol throughout the Bible and its effect, if we are where it affects us. We have asked the Lord to lead us, and one by one we have it given—holiness is the only avenue to life—the gateway of pearl; the gem that man's art cannot increase in value; only in its golden settings, the righteousness of God through Jesus, the Anointed. He gave all he had, and purchased it to adorn his Bride, that she also might be a pure City of refuge to the lost and erring ones of the left of the nations that shall bring to the holy mountain in Palestina's new-made Paradise an offering to the Lord.

The tradition of the antediluvian worshippers of gathering upon the mount, probably the Zion hill, emblem of the polity that is to come, is suggestive. I have found an old work in English, all extracts from the ancients, and written ninety-nine years ago, all about the Pyramid also; and while much seems imagination, yet the language is like the Scripture of God.

But the golden highway in the future, upon which the saved or ransomed walked, is what we are now most anxious about. Gold is the standard of values; so is holiness: God accepts us only as the pure gold is seen. Vessels of dishonor are used in the court and outside. But the Tabernacle within is honored with pure gold, especially the "Holy of Holies," that portion of the Sanctuary yet to appear on earth in its age to come. Now, even this first appointment, the place of the night, the candlestick apartment, is furnished with this precious metal: "Holiness in all things." But just over the Jordan we expect to see the Glory of the Day: no night, therefore no need of the candle: the worldly house dissolved—taken down, abolished, and salvation continued in the immortal house or sanctuary, in its own place, the land of Judah: the ark and cherubims, the working element evermore, until all is subdued.

The seventh trumpet gives us the open temple, the ark in its last act. Oh, how soon shall we, as in the passover at Jordan, behold the river of the nations' wrath divide, that the people may pass with the ark of God, the only thing that carries life for Israel—even the Saviour! Then shall we know in full, and the rebuke be taken away; and power to preach in demonstration will be given, and God's own ordained ones will preach; and such as are stumbling-blocks will be removed.

Then will be known why we were, in this age, left to suffer and die, that, like our Captain, we may know how to succor those who are tempted. The golden way of holiness is to have means to continue life. The veil will be removed which has been spread over all nations.—Isa. xxv. 7. The nations have been only in the candlestick-light. Then the Glory of God will go forth over all the earth—redemption eternal, JEHOVAH'S plan to finish Creation.

FROM MRS. I. A. BERTHOLF.

BRO. STORRS: Three years ago last February I was very sick, and during my convalescence I heard that Bro. S. W. Bishop had an article in the BIBLE EXAMINER stating his belief in "The Ages to Come." Father had taken the BIBLE EXAMINER for years; and I remember picking one up, a long time ago, and trying to get interested in it, but could not. The Lord had not anointed my eyes with eye-salve. However, I had great respect for Bro. Bishop and his opinions; so I thought I would read what he had to say on the subject, as I was curious to know what could convert him to so strange a doctrine as I had heard the ages to come represented to be. I began by reading his article, and read that number through. I then procured the whole volume, and became deeply interested in Bro. Henry Dunn's "Destiny of the Human Race"; and from that time to this I have read every number issued with unabated interest, and am firmly established in the belief of the ages to come. I resolved then to become a Christian. I did not believe in joining any Church but the Divine, invisible one; and time glided along with me and my acquaintances as usual. I dreaded to be thought peculiar; and so, when, with my worldly friends, never spoke of religious matters, but could converse with believers, and liked to do so whenever we met.

I feel that the past three years have been wasted, as far as my growth in grace is concerned, and that hiding one's light under a bushel is very wicked. Also, that a mere belief in the truth without a vital union with Christ, our LIFE-GIVER, will effect an entrance for no one into the kingdom. I now publicly (and shall privately whenever opportunity occurs) confess Christ as my Saviour, and only hope for a future life. I also believe in the close proximity of the Second Advent, and that Christ and his Bride will reign on the earth through the "endless succession of ages." That I may become a faithful servant of the King of kings and keep myself unspotted from the world is my earnest prayer.

EDITORIAL NOTICES.

THE BIBLE EXAMINER.—By the kindness of friends at Bishop Hill, Ill., I am enabled to issue this number of the EXAMINER nearly on time. Many thanks to them for the generous aid given.

One number more completes this volume. As yet means are not in possession to meet the expense, but trust they will be. The EXAMINER will continue to be issued monthly, if the Lord pleases to give health and means. It is the intention of the EDITOR to go on with Vol. XXIII, commencing October next. I trust all its friends will rally at once to its support. Let me know at the earliest moment what you intend to do for its continuance.

TO DELINQUENT SUBSCRIBERS, ONCE MORE.—There are over sixty who have neither paid for this volume of the EXAMINER or sent an apology for not doing it. This does not include those to whom it is sent gratis—a class of about thirty. With the next number this volume closes. The deficiency arising from delinquents is seriously felt in settling our account at the end of the volume; and if no payment is made and no apology received, their names must cease to stand on our mail-book at the end of this volume. To send the EXAMINER to subscribers and ourself pay the postage—as I am obliged to do—and receive neither a remittance nor an apology, can hardly be expected to be continued, if the magazine is to live. To such of them as send me three dollars before October next, I will cancel past indebtedness and credit them in full for Vol. XXIII. Please respond in some way, that I may know on what to depend.

TO THOSE WHO RECEIVE THE EXAMINER GRATIS.—It has been a pleasure to send this magazine gratis to poor friends who are not able to pay anything. I am wholly dependent upon others for the means to supply such; and with most of them I am unacquainted personally. If any of them desire the EXAMINER continued, let them inform me and state their circumstances, otherwise it may be sent no more. The greatest economy is necessary to sustain this magazine.

THE present volume of the EXAMINER will be put in neat, plain binding as soon as the next number is issued. Price, $2 per volume. In plain morocco, with gilt edges, $3.25. Sent in either case free of postage. Those who desire a copy will please let the EDITOR know immediately, if they wish to make sure of it. See also advertisement for previous volumes. ED.

The Bible Examiner is a Monthly Magazine. Terms, $2.00 per year, in advance.

Subscribers' Names should be written very plain. Do not neglect this. It is utterly impossible sometimes to decipher names, and mistakes must occur in consequence. As to their Address, give simply the name of the Post-office and State.

AN AGREEABLE SURPRISE.

JUST as the EXAMINER for July went to press our friend, the Swedish Minister, Bro. Jonas Olson, with his wife, from Bishop Hill, Illinois, called on my family, having traveled eleven hundred miles to visit us. The interview, of four days, was one of the most agreeable character. Bro. Olson left his native country 30 years ago, having twice been fined a hundred dollars for reading the Bible in company with others. He sought an asylum from such persecution in America with many more of his countrymen. Eleven hundred came in all at that time. He has passed through many trials, but out of them the Lord has delivered him or sustained him in them. He is now seventy-five years old, but is strong and resolute in his purposes for doing good. He has been one of the firm supporters of the BIBLE EXAMINER, and is deeply interested in its prosperity.

Bro. Bishop was with us a day or two during the time Bro. Olson was present, and enjoyed the interview much.

I praise the Lord that he put it in our aged brother's heart to make us this visit; and I am thankful to learn that he and his wife arrived safely home (1100 miles) in "fifty hours after parting with us in Brooklyn." The Lord bless and reward them for all their kindness to me and my family. May we meet again. ED.

A CURIOUS MARRIAGE.

ENGLAND and Turkey have accomplished a clandestine union, and Turkey has given her husband the Island of Cyprus for taking her to his bosom and promising her protection in her Asiatic possessions against all enemies! A heavy responsibility for England, truly; and a great sacrifice for Turkey, because it is an admission of her utter helplessness and a sure premonition of her entire loss of Palestine. Yet it will facilitate the return of the Jews to their ancient inheritance, and shows that the prophetic time has arrived when Jerusalem shall be no longer "trodden down of the Gentiles." England is now virtually ruler of Palestine and the valley of the Euphrates, and the Jews from all nations will soon be seen flocking to their old home; and Israel—or the Anglo-Saxons—will not be long behind their brethren of Judah in re-peopling the land of their fathers; and it will be seen that God's word does "not return void," and that "Ephraim shall not envy Judah, and Judah shall not vex Ephraim" (Isa. xi. 13); and that the fanciful idea of "conditional prophecy" was the offspring of "blindness in part" which "happened" to some professed expositors in relation to God's purposes in regard to his ancient people, Judah and Israel: "For, lo, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will bring again the captivity of my people Israel and Judah, saith the Lord: and I will cause them to return to the land that I gave to their fathers, and they shall possess it."—Jer. xxx. 3. "And the whole valley of the dead bodies and the ashes, and all the fields unto the Brook of Kidron, unto the corner of the horse-gate toward the east, shall be holy unto the Lord; it shall not be plucked up nor thrown down any more for ever."—Jer. xxxi. 40. "Conditional prophecy," is it? The man who affirms it is will see cause to repent of such a mistake ere long; and may he be forgiven.

On the union of England and Turkey I copy the following remarks by the editor of the Restitution, July 17th. ED.

"England and Turkey have made a treaty altogether disconnected with the matters discussed by the Berlin Congress. By the terms of this compact England stipulates to maintain the Asiatic dominions of the Sultan in their integrity, and to defend them against all invasions. To render this protectorate effectual the immediate occupation of Cyprus was granted to England to be at once placed under her military control. The possession of this island also places the entire land of Palestine and the important valley of the Euphrates in the power of England. To maintain and perpetuate this ascendancy, a line of railway is to be constructed. Asiatic Turkey is divided into fifteen provinces. The Sultan is to appoint the governor of each, which appointment is, in every instance, to be approved by the Queen. Certain express provisions have been made concerning Jerusalem and the holy places, and while the interests of the Greek and Latin churches are carefully guarded, the immunities of the Hebrew inhabitants of the Holy City and its surrounding precincts are fully secured. This placing of the Holy Land under English protection not only improves the condition of the Jews residing there, but it also makes Palestine a desirable residence for the oppressed Jews of Russia, Poland, the Danubian principalities, and all other lands where their political and religious rights are denied them; and doubtless multitudes will, in consequence of this protectorate, leave those countries that grievously trample upon their rights and seek an asylum in the home of their fathers. As the long period for the sanctuary to be trodden under foot draws near its termination, Divine Providence mysteriously prepares the way for the complete fulfilment of the prophetic Word. As European Turkey is carved up into independent principalities and dependencies for the other great Powers, England grasps the lion's share in Asiatic Turkey. It will be demonstrated in the immediate future that England is destined to occupy a foremost place in the readjustment of affairs connected with the Eastern question. As the Crescent disappears from the political heavens we hail the rising of Israel's Star as the precursor of the Sun of Righteousness and dawning of the day of God."

TRUTH ADVANCING.

A GENTLEMAN living in the southern part of Illinois has written me as follows:

"DEAR SIR: I have recently been much interested in the doctrines taught in your magazine, the BIBLE EXAMINER, by reading Elder Blain's work—Hope for our Race. My mother had sent me a copy of this book some years ago, and it had lain upon my library shelves all this time unnoticed, and I may add despised; for my thoughts regarding it were that it was the offspring of a diseased mind and had no foundation in Scripture, for I had some way gotten an inkling of its purpose. But I never read it—passing it by time and again unnoticed.

"One Sabbath day recently I picked it up, and scanning it over carelessly commenced reading Mr. Dunn's letter to Mr. Constable, which caught my eye. His fine, clear style pleased me, and I soon found myself deeply interested, and read the book through before dropping it. It seemed as though the morning had just dawned upon God's Word to me, and I saw God's purposes revealed in a new and glorious light, of which I had never dreamed, when I laid the book down. I am glad indeed that I read the book. I wrote at once to Elder Blain (who is an old friend of my mother) asking for more light on the subject. He sent me two copies of the EXAMINER and some tracts, which I have read eagerly. He sent me also your pamphlet upon God's promise to Abraham, which I have also read.

"I am still anxious for more light, and am now reading my Bible with very different ideas from those I formerly had in regard to it. These new thoughts are gradually crystalizing into convictions, and I feel myself already unable and unwilling to go back to my former conceptions of God's purposes toward our race.

"Will you be kind enough to let me know if it is possible to procure any of Mr. Dunn's works? To have them complete would be to possess a great treasure. He was surely a remarkable man, and I love him for his grand words and his fearless promulgation of the truth as he learned it from God's Word. If it is at all possible to secure his complete works I would sacrifice much to obtain them."

EDITOR'S REMARKS.

I regret that I am unable to give this friend the information he desires in regard to the possibility of obtaining the works he so much desires. But his letter is so cheering that he must pardon me for giving so large a share of it in the EXAMINER to cheer and comfort others; though I did not feel justified in attaching his name to the letter lest he might disapprove of my liberty with a private communication. Before I had received his letter I had prepared the following article:

"THE UNPREACHED GOSPEL."

UNDER the above title Henry Dunn published a pamphlet of 47 pages nearly 15 years since. That issue was only a sort of synopsis of a larger work. I saw it only once—ten years ago—and then rejected it, as many have since, without really understanding his position. It passed entirely out of mind, and I thought no more of it till after I had issued my "VINDICATION," seven years ago. Then I found myself, to my surprise, occupying nearly the same ground as Mr. Dunn.

As some persons have spoken out recently, as well as in time past, against his views, I feel constrained to say I think that they misunderstand Mr. Dunn; for I am not willing to conclude they would misrepresent him willfully. They seem to think he teaches that the Gospel was never preached at all! Whereas he maintained that a part of it only is now preached and that another part is "unpreached": that part he calls attention to as neglected, or not preached. The subject of his remarks is specially founded on the language of the Apostle, 1 Tim. iv. 10: "For therefore we both labor and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, specially of those that believe."

Here are two classes of the saved: 1. "All men"; 2. "Those that believe." The latter have a special salvation—i. e., they are to be the "Royal Priesthood."—1 Pet. ii. 9. Chosen to teach and bless "all men."

The preaching of the Gospel for many centuries past has only been a divided Gospel—i. e., it has been only for believers in the present life; while "all" other "men" are left to utter and hopeless ruin. They reject the idea that "the living God is the Saviour of all men" in any other sense than that of a "Preserver"; even in this sense their theory is as war.

Mr. Dunn maintained that the "specially" saved are designed of God to teach, bless and be the medium through which "all men" should ultimately be brought to the knowledge of the "only true God and Jesus Christ."—John xvii. But who among professed Christians have for generations past preached this Gospel? It has been an "unpreached Gospel." It is time it was revived and proclaimed to "all men"; and, praise the Lord, it will be, in spite of all opposition from whatever quarter it may come.

I propose to republish Mr. Dunn's pamphlet in the next volume of the BIBLE EXAMINER, the Lord willing. I will print a thousand copies extra of the EXAMINER containing it for distribution, if funds are furnished me; $25, or something more, will be needed for that purpose. I am persuaded much good would be done by such an issue; nothing could be better at this time.

EDITOR.

MAN'S ORIGIN AND NATURE.

THE notion that man, by creation, is possessed of an immortal entity called soul, and that he was created holy originally, is the foundation of nearly all the theological errors and superstitions that have bewildered, blinded and made infidels of a large part of Christendom, or those where this corrupt theology has been promulgated.

The account of man's creation, as given by Moses, is very simple and easy of comprehension; and, when duly considered, commends itself as the only rational account of man's origin and nature; especially when we gaze on the facts in man's death or disorganization.

Man's origin is the same as that of any other of the animal creation. Compare Gen. ii. 7 and 19: "The Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground." . . . "And out of the ground the Lord God formed every beast of the field, and every fowl of the air."

Thus, it appears the origin of man is precisely the same as that of other living creatures on the earth. The only real difference is this: Man's organization made him capable of a higher intellectual development than any other of the animal creation; and for this reason he was placed at the head of all the others, and to have "dominion over" them.

As to holiness, there is no evidence in the Mosaic account that man was in possession of any such quality more than other animals. "God saw everything that he had made, and, behold, it was very good."—Gen. i. 31. All were alike good, but not a word of the holiness of any of them. Holiness is not a creation—it cannot be created—but it is a development. As such it can only be produced in a created being by trial. In order to its development there must be law to which the creature is required to yield obedience; and there must be intelligence sufficient to comprehend that law, without which no law can have any claim to active obedience. Where such intellectual capacity does not exist—whatever the nature of the life in possession—there can be no claim for moral obedience, and hence neither holiness nor sin has any existence in that being—the thing is impossible.

Man, of all the animal creation, alone, so far as we know, had intellectual capacity sufficient to understand law, requirement or prohibition—addressed to mind; or a capacity to determine from words addressed to his understanding what his course of conduct should be. This capacity was the basis or foundation for the development of a moral character above that of a mere animal. But such development could not be made without a law addressed to man's intellect; and that law must be adapted to his understanding or comprehension. As yet he is but an animal, and can only be approached as an animal man. Hence the law must relate to the action of his animal nature. In harmony with this fact we find his Creator thus approaching him, having provided for the new formed creature "every tree that is pleasant to the sight and good for food." He placed man in the midst of these delights and bid him regale himself without restriction, with one exception. That one exception constituted the law—a law the highest of which man's nature was then capable, and yet the most trifling that it was possible to give. This law was addressed to man's intelligence, and related to the regulation of his animal appetites; or was addressed to him as an animal, such as he really was.

Hence he was tested, or tried as an animal for the development of a moral character; which trial, if man obeyed his Creator, would have raised him above a mere animal—or above the government of animal appetites—and would have constituted him holy. It would have developed a mind having a supreme regard to his Maker's will. This is holiness. Such a development would have—if persevered in—proved him worthy of continued life; hence would have secured him access to the "tree of life," and he would have "lived forever."

But a contrary development would unfit him for life by making him out of harmony with the Creator, preferring his own will to that of God's; hence the propriety of its being distinctly stated to the man that if he did show himself determined to make his own will supreme he would "surely die"—discord under the government of God could not be tolerated. Everything that has life must come into harmony with God, or discord be eternal. Hence, when Adam developed the fact that he chose to give the supremacy to himself, or to his animal being, rather than to his Creator, he, in fact, chose death rather than renounce animal gratification. Thus Adam had "life and death set before" him. He chose the latter—fell under his animal nature, and shared the fate of all other animals; but death was just as much more to be dreaded by him as his intellect was greater than theirs. Not, however, because he had any sufferings to endure "beyond the grave," for his Creator made no such communication to him. It was "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." So far as we have any inspired authority, such was to be the end of the animal man.

In the whole account man is spoken of, treated as, and his destiny decided as a unit: not a part mortal and a part immortal. Such a position is a pure, unfounded, unscriptural and mischievous assumption, and has filled Christendom with superstition, ghost-worshipers, worshiping the dead, spirit-rappers, doctrines of demons and infidelity; all the natural result and offspring of corrupting the Word of God in relation to man's origin, nature and destiny.

It will be seen that men are still dealt with as units, and as animal beings; naturally subject to mortality, corruption and death; the animal or flesh is to be mortified—made to keep its place as a servant, while the will of God is to be supreme, and the animal be made to give way wherever it sets up a plea opposed to the will of God as revealed in his Word of truth. Those who thus act during their probationary state are temples of the Holy Spirit, which dwelleth in them, and whereby they are sealed unto the day of redemption. See 1 Cor. vi. 19; 2 Tim. i. 14; Eph. iv. 30. "If the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you."—Rom. viii. 11.

The great work of redemption is to redeem or deliver men from sin—the dominion of the flesh or animal nature, and from corruption or death. To puzzle men with metaphysical and theological notions about immaterialism, immortal souls, undying souls, half alive and half dead, part in the grave and a part in heaven, or hell, or purgatory, and all such anti-scriptural fancies, is to "shut up the kingdom of heaven against men" by bewildering their minds and making the impression that religion is all fancy, about which the priest alone has any concern; and in the final result to land men in utter indifference to all religion. Shall men continue to be thus deceived by traditions? Ed.

THE ANNIHILATION OF THE WICKED.

"It is satisfactory to the wicked. One young man, dissipated and profligate, said, 'That doctrine just suits me.' And so it is. If the impenitent could really believe it, their impenitence would become a fixed fact. Could they but persuade themselves that they could continue in a life of dissipation and pleasure here, and then be blotted out of existence, they would scoff at the Bible and religion and give themselves up to lives of unbridled wickedness. Those who promulgate this doctrine lay a flattering unction to the souls of the wicked, and encourage them to continue in lives of impenitence and rebellion against God."—B.

THIS objection is made up of two parts: 1st, The effect of the doctrine on the wicked; and, 2d, The censure of those who preach it. Let us look at each part by itself. "B." says, "It is satisfactory to the wicked." What proof has he given of this assumption? "One young man said, 'That doctrine just suits me.'" But "B." forgets that it is by the mouth of at least "two or three witnesses" every word is to be proved; yet he is satisfied with one. And that one may never have learned anything of the doctrine spoken of, except what he had heard by the misrepresentations of its enemies. Quite probable "B." had "garbled" the doctrine in giving the "young man" an idea of it, which drew out the expression spoken of. But suppose this young man had a correct idea of the doctrine and expressed himself as "B." says—what then? Does that prove the doctrine false, and not calculated to lead men to repentance? By no means. I have known intelligent persons who had rejected Christianity altogether from the representations of God, his character and designs by such men as "B.", who have been brought to acknowledge its truths, and been led to renounce sin and consecrate themselves to the service of God, and are now ministers of the gospel by means of the very doctrine which "B." says "if" they "could believe, their impenitence would become a fixed fact." Thus "B." is convicted of a false assumption.

Some of the dissipated may continue impenitent under the preaching of this doctrine; and what doctrine will not be abused or perverted by such characters? Does the doctrine of the natural immortality of the soul and endless torments lead all such to repentance? And do not "B." and his school teach that the punishment of the wicked is postponed to a future life and in another world? Has such a doctrine no tendency to encourage men in sin? If "B." says No, a greater than he has said, "Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil."—Eccl. viii. 11. Does that prove the doctrine of judgment and punishment future is calculated to lead men "to continue in a life of dissipation and pleasure here"? The fact is, men of corrupt minds may abuse any truth; and some hold the truth in unrighteousness. "B.", then, should show, not by assumptions and mere declamation, that the doctrine, "all the wicked will God destroy" (Psa. cxlv. 20), is a doctrine "satisfactory to the wicked," and calculated to lead them to continue in sin and "scoff at the Bible and religion." I rather think the doctrine of inherent immortality and endless sin and suffering is that which hardens men in sin and leads them to "scoff at the Bible and religion." Many cases might be adduced where such is the result of his theory to "one" of his showing led to such a course by the doctrine of "the annihilation of the finally wicked." The question, however, is not settled in this way. It is a question of, What does the Bible teach? Whether sinners are pleased or displeased with the doctrine presented settles nothing of its truth or falsehood; but what saith the Lord? That point determined, if sinners abuse his mercy and take liberty to continue in sin on that account, the teachers of that truth are not responsible for their stupidity and love of sensual gratification rather than eternal life and immortality. The truth will be a "savor of life unto life" to some, while it is a "savor of death unto death" to others. The fault in the latter case is not chargeable to the truth, but to men's perverting that truth and refusing obedience to its claims.

Multitudes who profess to believe the theory "B." advocates "give themselves up to lives of unbridled wickedness." His views, therefore, are not a sovereign remedy for sin and wickedness. So far from it, the probability is that the very "young man" of whom he speaks had become confirmed in his "dissipated and profligate" course under the preaching of "endless misery." It is not to be wondered at, then, that a "young man" lost in evil habits, and feeling that his case was hopeless, should say, "That doctrine just suits me." Unhappy youth! He had doubtless been driven to despair of the mercy of God by the savage representations of his Maker's character that "B." and his school had given him; and one ray of light thrown upon his mind, that God did not design eternally to torment him, did, doubtless, remove a burden from his heart, and in that sense did "just suit" him; and if anything on earth could melt his heart, such a discovery of the character of God contrasted with the hardening effects of the endless misery theory must have moved him to an effort to overcome his evil propensities and "lay hold on eternal life." Possibly it had that effect, for "B." seems not to have stopped to inquire in what sense the "young man" used the phrase, "just suits me," whether to encourage himself in sin, or as inspiring him with hope in God's mercy, which he never could have had under the horrible doctrine of endless sin and suffering. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, we may fairly conclude he had a hope, inspired in his heart by this milder view of the character of his Creator, that even he, wicked as he felt himself to be, might find mercy; while the savage theory of "B." had driven him to despair that had made him reckless of his character and doom.

on truth to affirm it. It is only by a misrepresentation of the doctrine, such as "B." and others of his faith are guilty of that the doctrine will lead to such a result, except in cases where no doctrine would affect the heart to lead the sinner to repentance. "The goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance," saith an apostle.—Rom. ii. 4. If that will not do it, men will go on, under any theory, to "treasure up wrath against the day of wrath."

I repel, then, the charge that "those who promulgate this doctrine lay a flattering unction to the souls of the wicked," etc. It is not so. "The Lord preserveth all them that love him, but all the wicked will he destroy," is the testimony of inspiration; and "the wicked shall perish: the enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of lambs: they shall consume; into smoke shall they consume away."—See Psa. cxlv. 20 and xxxvii. 20. Such Bible testimony is not to be set aside by the mere declamation of such men as "B." The encouragement to continue in sin belongs to his theory, by representing God as a most merciless tyrant, who, having brought men into being without their knowledge or consent, is determined for the sins of this short life to perpetuate that being or existence, without interruption and without end, in the most unutterable and unmitigated anguish, and without hope! Such a representation of God is more fitting the savageism of heathenism than the character of the most merciful and compassionate God of the Bible, who saith, "Say unto them, As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live: turn ye, turn ye from your evil ways; for why will ye die?"—Ezek. xxxiii. 11. "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."—John iii. 16.

Thus the appeal to men is based on their love of life and God's love to them, and not on the savageism of endless torture and woe; which latter idea is well calculated to beget hatred to God and dislike for his service now; hence is almost universally, where it is proclaimed and believed, followed with a present neglect or contempt for his service, and procrastination in relation to the things of religion till just as they are "going to die"; and then a profession of submission often takes place merely to escape the savageism of the God they are taught claims their homage, without which they are to be the eternal objects of his "fiery indignation" and "incensed fury."

A MEDITATION.

"I will delight myself in thy statutes: I will not forget thy word." That is my resolve. For never can I cease to feel, O blessed teacher, how precious thy testimonies have been unto me. Never can I forget the "joy unspeakable and full of glory" which I have again and again experienced in meditating on thy truth.

How full is thy Word of the wisdom on which a soul can live! How often has it, like Aaron's rod, "brought forth buds, and bloomed blossoms, and yielded almonds" to me, when I have sat down to it as if it were but "a dry stick"! How often has my needy soul found in it help, and comfort, and new life! How often has it "found me" when I expected it not! How often has it excited hopes and yearnings that belong to another and better world!

I will get me then alone. I will go up into the mountain. I will seek to commune with my God through the thoughts he has given me for food, for strength and for consolation. So shall I find the living water that alone satisfies, yet quickens divine thirst in the human soul. So shall I be fed, too, with heavenly manna, and be solaced by strains of sweet welcome and richest music. Never can I seek in vain in that "vast and many chambered storehouse."

Scripture is itself a world—a spiritual world to the opened eye. There may the pilgrim find a guide, the feeble a staff, the perplexed a star, and the lost ones the "Good Shepherd," who is ever willing to bring them home on his shoulders, though the way be long and weary, and the feet of the wanderers wounded and bleeding.

Blessed Saviour, reveal thyself to me in the sacred page. Lift me above doubt and dread; for I cannot live in uncertainty, and "fear hath torments." Give me "words for my inmost thoughts; songs for my joy; utterances for my hidden griefs; and pleadings for my shame and feebleness." The more I study in this school of thine, the more dear may its lessons become; the fresher its beauties; the more life-giving its light. There may I find "the eternal I AM, the everliving Word," of whom all the elect, from the archangel before the throne to the poorest wrestler with the Spirit "untill the breaking of the day," are but the faint and fainter echoes. There, glad and satisfied, may I banquet thankfully, till I sit down at the table of my Lord, and drink with him the new wine in the kingdom of the Father. So let it be, Amen and Amen.

PROPHECY.

OUR Lord commanded to "Search the Scriptures," which at that time embraced only the Old Testament, thus stamping them with divine authority; and to them both he and his disciples made all their appeals. And Paul said to Timothy: "From a child thou hast known the Holy Scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus."—2 Tim. iii. 15.

Peter saith: "We have a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well to take heed," etc. "For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man: but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost."—2 Peter. i. 21.

Such testimonies show that the prophecies of the Old Testament are not to be frittered away, or spoken of as if of little or no consequence, nor called "conditional."

Thus much in regard to my view of the authority and importance of the Old Testament prophecies. But I now design to speak specially of a New Testament prophecy. It is that found in Luke xxi. 23-36.

In this portion of Scripture our Lord speaks of things future relating to the Jews, their city, the Gentiles, signs to be witnessed, his own second coming, the redemption of his people, and concludes with solemn admonitions and cautions. To these things we "do well to take heed." A large portion of what our Lord here utters in prophecy has since become history. The fulfilment of so large a part makes it certain that whatever may remain unfulfilled will assuredly come to pass. This prophecy, in the part accomplished, is demonstration of the truth and divinity of our Lord's claim to be the Messiah, and establishes the truth of revelation beyond any attempt to overthrow it; and infidelity is as powerless for evil, to a sincere inquirer after truth, as the foaming waves dashing against the rocks of Gibraltar. Said the Saviour, "There shall be great distress in the land and wrath upon this people"—the Jews. Did it not happen exactly as prophesied? Will any one pretend to deny but that unparalleled distress fell upon that people? Let them read the history of the Jews, particularly from the time Jerusalem was "compassed about with armies," in A.D. 67, to the siege and fall of the fortress of Masada, A.D. 74.

"They," the Jews, "shall fall by the edge of the sword"; that is, in war, many of them; not all. Hundreds of thousands of them did thus fall. The remainder of them were "led away captive into all nations;" thus the prophecy has had an exact fulfilment; and the Jews are a standing and perpetual monument that Jesus, whom their nation abhorred and rejected, is in truth the Messiah of whom Moses and the prophets spake. They bear an unwilling testimony to this great gospel declaration that Jesus of Nazareth was approved of God and is the anointed Saviour. But the prophecy goes on to say: "Jerusalem shall be trodden down [i. e., be made subject to, or be under the government] of the Gentiles [i. e., other nations, as distinguished from the Jews], until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." So it has come to pass. From the days of the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans no Jew has held power or authority there, and much of the time has not been permitted even to approach the city; or, if there at all, only in the most abject condition. "The times of the Gentiles," of course, is an appointed time, indicated in some other prophecy, most likely in the Book of Daniel; but of that I shall not now inquire; it is sufficient for us to know that the time of Gentile rule over Jerusalem has its bounds beyond which it cannot pass. Our Lord next proceeds to give signs which were to indicate to the watchful and sincerely inquiring mind that this treading under foot was about to terminate. These are as follows:

Luke xxi. 25, 26—"And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring. Men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth; for the powers of heaven shall be shaken."

The signs in the sun, called in other places the sun being darkened, are supposed by some to have had a fulfilment in the dark day of 1780. I cannot, with present light, assent to that view. The darkening of the sun on that day was not on the prophetic land at all. It was confined mostly, if not wholly, to the United States, and was witnessed only by a small part even of these. The phenomena, or signs, according to the analogy of prophecy, must appear in the prophetic earth or land. This, at least, embraced only the old Roman empire, which was in its imperial glory when the prophecy was uttered. If, then, these on truth to affirm it. It is only by a misrepresentation of the doctrine, such as "B." and others of his faith are guilty of that the doctrine will lead to such a result, except in cases where no doctrine would affect the heart to lead the sinner to repentance. "The goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance," saith an apostle.—Rom. ii. 4. If that will not do it, men will go on, under any theory, to "treasure up wrath against the day of wrath."

I repel, then, the charge that "those who promulgate this doctrine lay a flattering unction to the souls of the wicked," etc. It is not so. "The Lord preserveth all them that love him, but all the wicked will he destroy," is the testimony of inspiration; and "the wicked shall perish: the enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of lambs: they shall consume; into smoke shall they consume away."—See Psa. cxlv. 20 and xxxvii. 20. Such Bible testimony is not to be set aside by the mere declamation of such men as "B." The encouragement to continue in sin belongs to his theory, by representing God as a most merciless tyrant, who, having brought men into being without their knowledge or consent, is determined for the sins of this short life to perpetuate that being or existence, without interruption and without end, in the most unutterable and unmitigated anguish, and without hope! Such a representation of God is more fitting the savageism of heathenism than the character of the most merciful and compassionate God of the Bible, who saith, "Say unto them, As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live: turn ye, turn ye from your evil ways; for why will ye die?"—Ezek. xxxiii. 11. "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."—John iii. 16.

PROPHECY.

OUR Lord commanded to "Search the Scriptures," which at that time embraced only the Old Testament, thus stamping them with divine authority; and to them both he and his disciples made all their appeals. And Paul said to Timothy: "From a child thou hast known the Holy Scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus."—2 Tim. iii. 15.

Such testimonies show that the prophecies of the Old Testament are not to be frittered away, or spoken of as if of little or no consequence, nor called "conditional."

Thus much in regard to my view of the authority and importance of the Old Testament prophecies. But I now design to speak specially of a New Testament prophecy. It is that found in Luke xxi. 23-36.

In this portion of Scripture our Lord speaks of things future relating to the Jews, their city, the Gentiles, signs to be witnessed, his own second coming, the redemption of his people, and concludes with solemn admonitions and cautions. To these things we "do well to take heed." A large portion of what our Lord here utters in prophecy has since become history. The fulfilment of so large a part makes it certain that whatever may remain unfulfilled will assuredly come to pass. This prophecy, in the part accomplished, is demonstration of the truth and divinity of our Lord's claim to be the Messiah, and establishes the truth of revelation beyond any attempt to overthrow it; and infidelity is as powerless for evil, to a sincere inquirer after truth, as the foaming waves dashing against the rocks of Gibraltar. Said the Saviour, "There shall be great distress in the land and wrath upon this people"—the Jews. Did it not happen exactly as prophesied? Will any one pretend to deny but that unparalleled distress fell upon that people? Let them read the history of the Jews, particularly from the time Jerusalem was "compassed about with armies," in A.D. 67, to the siege and fall of the fortress of Masada, A.D. 74.

"They," the Jews, "shall fall by the edge of the sword"; that is, in war, many of them; not all. Hundreds of thousands of them did thus fall. The remainder of them were "led away captive into all nations;" thus the prophecy has had an exact fulfilment; and the Jews are a standing and perpetual monument that Jesus, whom their nation abhorred and rejected, is in truth the Messiah of whom Moses and the prophets spake. They bear an unwilling testimony to this great gospel declaration that Jesus of Nazareth was approved of God and is the anointed Saviour. But the prophecy goes on to say: "Jerusalem shall be trodden down [i. e., be made subject to, or be under the government] of the Gentiles [i. e., other nations, as distinguished from the Jews], until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." So it has come to pass. From the days of the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans no Jew has held power or authority there, and much of the time has not been permitted even to approach the city; or, if there at all, only in the most abject condition. "The times of the Gentiles," of course, is an appointed time, indicated in some other prophecy, most likely in the Book of Daniel; but of that I shall not now inquire; it is sufficient for us to know that the time of Gentile rule over Jerusalem has its bounds beyond which it cannot pass. Our Lord next proceeds to give signs which were to indicate to the watchful and sincerely inquiring mind that this treading under foot was about to terminate. These are as follows:

Luke xxi. 25, 26—"And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring. Men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth; for the powers of heaven shall be shaken."

The signs in the sun, called in other places the sun being darkened, are supposed by some to have had a fulfilment in the dark day of 1780. I cannot, with present light, assent to that view. The darkening of the sun on that day was not on the prophetic land at all. It was confined mostly, if not wholly, to the United States, and was witnessed only by a small part even of these. The phenomena, or signs, according to the analogy of prophecy, must appear in the prophetic earth or land. This, at least, embraced only the old Roman empire, which was in its imperial glory when the prophecy was uttered. If, then, these signs in the sun and moon are to be witnessed in those literal orbs, I am compelled to the belief that they are future. I suggest, however, a different interpretation, which, if not correct, is at least very remarkable.

We learn from Gen. i. 14-18 that the lights in the firmament of heaven were not only to divide the day from the night, but "for signs"; and that the sun was "to rule the day," and the moon and stars "to rule the night." Hence, in very early times the people of God used them as signs of authority and dominion. Thus we find Jacob interpreting Joseph's dream of the sun, moon and eleven stars making obeisance to him as an indication that the father, mother and their other sons were to do him homage, or become subject to Joseph. Whence this conclusion but from the well-known fact that these heavenly bodies were signs of power and authority? The sun was the sign or symbol of the highest authority which, in the case before us, pointed out Jacob, the head and supreme ruler of his house or tribe. The moon denoted the next in authority, viz., the mother of the family; then came the stars—the sons or rulers of an inferior class. This use of the sun, moon and stars is seen throughout the Jewish prophets, and we may, therefore, conclude such was the design of our Lord in the text before us.—Luke xxi.

I now proceed to an inquiry as to what ruling powers are denoted by these luminaries in this prophecy. I conclude we are to look for them in the Roman empire; and that which most naturally presents itself as symbolized by the sun is the imperial power of Rome, which was holding its sway at the time the prophecy before us was uttered. That the sun is used as a symbol of that power by the "faithful and true witness" (Rev. viii. 12) is admitted, so far as I know, by all commentators. This point established, then, in symbolical language, the darkening of the sun, or signs in the sun, will signify signs of its decay and extinction. Centuries ago there were signs of the decay of imperial Rome, but its extinction did not occur till the present century. That power was removed by Constantine to Constantinople. There it continued till 1453, when, in the Eastern empire, it gave place to the moon power, of which I shall soon speak. Before the imperial power was displaced in the East it had been restored in the West by Charlemagne, A.D. 800. In the Western Roman empire it continued down to the days of Napoleon Bonaparte. The earliest date that can be given for its extinction is 1806, when Bonaparte overthrew the Emperor of Germany, or Austria, in whom resided this power at that time. It may, however, be doubted whether that time is the proper point at which to date its extinction, as Napoleon claimed and exercised this power as "the successor of the Cæsars." If, then, it was continued in him, as seems most likely, it was not finally extinguished till the battle of Waterloo, 1815, which sealed the fate of Bonaparte and put an end forever to the imperial Roman power. The attempt of Napoleon III. to revive it was a miserable failure.

If this view of the subject be the true one, we have the first and most prominent sign of the times of the Gentiles being near an end directly before us and in our generation. Let it not be forgotten that the signs given us in this prophecy were to be marks of the end of Jerusalem's bondage to other nations, and the signal of the near approach and reign of David's Son on David's throne.

I now proceed to inquire after the power symbolized by "the moon." Let it be remembered it must be found in the old Roman earth, or land; and it must be second in magnitude to the Imperial. Thus situated, I am at no loss to designate the power, viz., the Mohammedan. It is remarkable that "Crescent"—the increasing moon—is the standard of that power; and further, that this power has held possession of Jerusalem ever since A. D. 636, with the exception of about one century that it was in the hands of the Crusaders. This power waxed stronger and stronger for a long period; but within the last century it has given "signs" of waning—and, what is remarkable, in about six years after the extinction of the Roman imperial power, in 1815, the Mohammedan, or Ottoman power began to wane and fall with a rapidity that made even her enemies afraid. From the commencement of the Greek revolution, 1821, a series of calamities fell upon this moon power that marked her certain and speedy downfall. She has lately given "signs" of being "turned to blood," or of having her light as a ruling power extinguished. Here, then, is another sign of the end of "the times of the Gentiles," and of the establishment of the kingdom of God.

Having thus prepared the way, I can have no hesitation in saying that the various monarchies of Europe are the powers symbolized by "the stars." Just prior to the times of the Gentiles ending, and the establishment of the kingdom of God on earth under the reign of David's Son on the throne of his father, there would be "signs in the stars"—or indications of these lesser monarchies being extinguished. Here I need hardly enter into any details. The convulsions in Europe, commencing in 1848, though they have seemed at times to be at an end, proclaim, with a trumpet tongue, that this part of the prophecy is being fulfilled before our eyes, which leaves us in no doubt as to the point in earth's history which we now occupy; and the recent events in "the East" go to confirm this view of the subject: though the powers who have been agitated on the difficulties that have arisen may fancy they have settled affairs that relate to the "moon" power and the stability of the strength of the "stars," or the governments of the other powers, so that they can say, "Peace and safety" (1 Thess. v. 3), it may indicate that "sudden destruction shall come upon them, and they shall not escape."

THE SECOND ADVENT.

REAL DIFFICULTIES.

THE first is the declaration made by our Lord in these words—"Ye shall not have gone over the cities of Israel till the Son of man be come." The second is like unto it—"Verily I say unto you, there be some standing here which [owing to lengthened life] shall not taste of death till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom." How ought these words to be interpreted?

So far as I know, the advocates of the premillennial advent, of whom the late Dean Alford was a distinguished one, say, like their adversaries, that the passages in question refer to the destruction of Jerusalem, that event being regarded as typical of the final coming of the Lord; that in the passages quoted "Christ refers to the full manifestation of his kingdom by the annihilation of the Jewish polity." I cannot, however, but feel that this is a forced interpretation, and little better than a mere fancy, for it is quite unauthorized by Scripture. There the fall of Jerusalem is never spoken of either as a "coming" of Christ, or as typical of that event.

Nor, as a fact, did the fall of that city lead to the "full manifestation of the kingdom," either among Jews or Gentiles. All that it led to was the rapid development of errors and corruptions which prepared the way for the manifestation of the mystery of iniquity.

The Lord Jesus, in the twenty-fourth chapter of Matthew, does indeed predict the ruin of Jerusalem before that generation had quite passed away, and he speaks at the same time of his second advent. But he never connects the two events, or regards the one as typical of the other. His object rather seems to be to prevent the confusion of the two; to warn the disciples against the supposition—a very natural one—that the passing away of the Jewish dispensation was an indication that the end of all things was at hand.

The notion that the fall of Jerusalem was a coming of Christ would never, I am satisfied, have been entertained for a moment, had not the difficulty of interpreting the texts now under our notice pressed heavily on commentators.

Further, "what does this interpretation involve?" "what does it necessarily lead to?" Clearly this: If, in the instances referred to, the coming of the Lord in the glory of his Father with the holy angels may be understood figuratively, or "spiritually" as it is termed, the same principle in interpretation must, in common consistency, be applied to every text which speaks of the coming of Christ. And this has been done until the expectation of Christ's actual return in the clouds of heaven has all but died out.

Nothing to my mind can be clearer than that the first Christians, in these passages, understood the Lord to speak of his own actual Advent. The Thessalonians, in particular, were so persuaded of the imminence of that event, that Paul was obliged to warn them against being led into the error of supposing they might with impunity neglect present duty. Nevertheless they continued, like the apostle himself, and in common with the whole primitive Church, to dwell on "the coming" as their great hope, and they all died firmly believing that a few years would bring it about. Yet the Saviour came not, nor is he come yet, although eighteen hundred years have passed away.

May not, however, these difficulties be removed, if it can be shown, as I think it may, that the translation of the verses quoted is defective; that the words, "Till the Son of man be come," and the phrase, "shall not taste of death," ought to be read thus: the first, "Till the Son of man may come," and the second, may not taste of death—uncertainty being in both cases implied?

I accept this reading, partly because it is admitted by scholars that "in the Greek subjunctive there is ever lurking some sort of indeterminateness or contingency—that the subjunctive mood implies contingency ;"* and partly because it removes the painful idea that our Lord predicted anything of which he was ignorant, and which, therefore, did not come to pass.

The whole difficulty vanishes if only we are permitted to read his words as implying contingency, for they then simply associate uncertainty as to time with certainty as to the event. And they teach further the duty of Christians in relation to "the coming" to be always watchful and always waiting for it.

The same remark applies to another text which has been the subject of much controversy: "This generation† shall not pass till these things be fulfilled," words which are immediately followed by a declaration that "of that day and hour [exact or approximate time] knoweth no man, no, not the angels of heaven."

What we have always to keep in mind is that "the times and the seasons" God has reserved; a truth which, had it been remembered, would have preserved us from a host of idle speculations regarding the dates given in the Apocalypse, dates which are obviously given not to reveal what God has concealed, but to teach us that all things will come in their appointed order.—Ibid.

TIME OF THE ADVENT.

Nothing startles a careful observer more than the discovery of the fact that, in the eyes of all the Old Testament seers, the humiliation and the glorification of Messiah on the earth seem to touch each other. His advent is always regarded as the immediate harbinger of the world's subjection. Not a hint is given of delay; not a suspicion seems to have entered

* "The subjunctive, says Donaldson was originally a determinate tense like the future, and signified the probable occurrence of something after the time of speaking." Elsewhere (p. 172) he freely renders the subjunctive didō I am likely to give. "In practice this determinable probability becomes an indeterminate contingency of whatever kind, to be gathered from context and circumstances." See Introd. to Rotherham's New Testament, newly translated.—Bagster.

† It is needless to go into the controversy which has arisen as to the precise meaning of the word genea. It certainly seems to be used somewhat vaguely, as, e. g., Matt. xvii. 17, where our Lord speaks of his disciples as a "faithless and perverse generation." He could not there mean that they were such, as distinguished from any previous generation of men. Nor have we any reason to suppose that the Pharisees of that day were "a generation of vipers" in any sense which marked them out as worse than their predecessors. If we, colloquially speaking, say of the people around us, "They are a perverse generation," we do not mean to imply that those who lived thirty or fifty years before them were not so.

their minds that eighteen hundred years and more of struggle and persecution should intervene, at the end of which five-sixths of the human race should be found even historically unacquainted with the fact of Christ's existence.

Who can wonder then that the apostles should have expected the glory of Messiah to follow immediately on his humiliation, and ask, even at the last moment, "Wilt thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?" Who can wonder that, after the ascension of their Lord, both they and their followers should, for some years, have lived in daily expectation of his second and glorious coming in the clouds of heaven?

And yet they might have avoided the error if they had been mindful of the Lord's teaching when he sat upon the Mount of Olives and answered their question, "What shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" They ought to have remembered that while he was yet with them he said, "The end is not yet;" the "Gospel of the kingdom" must first be "preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations," and "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." But they understood not these things, for they were as yet hidden from their eyes.

It was not, probably, till Paul received, by special revelation, a knowledge of "the mystery which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men," that just views began to prevail relative to the true character of the dispensation under which they were placed.

Scripture distinctly teaches that the day and the hour of the Lord's coming is intentionally, and therefore effectually, hidden from mortal eye; but this is no reason for asserting either that he may be expected to-day or to-morrow, or, on the other hand, that he is not likely to come for five hundred or a thousand years.

It may or may not be true that the world is a very young world; but it is singular that while this opinion largely prevails, not a few thoughtful men have come to the conclusion that it is ere long likely to die of old age—that the race, in short, will soon die out. Robertson (of Brighton), in one of his sermons, says: "The wisest thinkers tell us that there are already on the globe traces of a demonstration that THE HUMAN RACE is drawing to its close. Each of the great human families has had its day—its infancy, its manhood, its decline. The two last races that have not been tried are on the stage of earth doing their work now.

There is no other to succeed them. The time is near when the bones of the last human being will be given to the dust. It is certain that before very long the race must be extinct." Dr. Arnold, when lecturing in Oxford, after taking a survey of modern history, was asked whether there were, in the existing resources of the nations of mankind, any materials for a new epoch, distinct from those which have gone before. And he answered, None. Dean Stanley, meditating on this conclusion, which he does not dispute, observes: "We cannot hesitate to say that if the Christian Church be drawing to its end, or if it continue to its end with no other objects than those which it has hitherto sought, it will end with its acknowledged resources confessedly undeveloped, its finest hopes of usefulness almost untried and unattempted. It will have been like an ungenial spring, cut short in full view of the summer—a stately vessel, wrecked within the very sight of shore."

True it is that new empires are arising, new powers developing, new hopes springing up; that commerce is uniting nations too long severed by their mistakes; and that physical science is extending its benefits on every side, imparting to multitudes that material comfort without which moral growth is hopeless.

But it is equally true, as Archbishop Trench says in his University sermons, that while "there are gains in some directions, these are too surely compensated by losses in others; just as the sea, which advances upon one coast, recedes upon another. If vast regions are being subdued to the uses of civilized man, yet others, which were once the seat of civilization and of all the arts of life, are now desolate wildernesses, wandered over by wild beasts or wilder men." "How many," he adds, "were confident, and not further back than a few years, that the era of wasting wars and bloody battles had forever passed away; that railways and commerce, and men's better understanding of their material interests, had rendered these henceforward impossible! so that they met with a smile of superior scorn any suggestion that the root of bitterness, out of which such mischiefs grew, was still in the heart of man; and lo! as it were in very irony of these premature proclamations of a peace which was no peace, huger multitudes of men have never met to do the work of Cain—never has the mother earth drunk deeper of the blood of her children, violently slain, than during the last decade of the world's history."

While, therefore, I place no reliance whatever either on my own or on any other man's interpretation of dates, I am far from regarding such numbers as are given us in Scripture to be unimportant. They may conceal rather than reveal the precise periods they are supposed to mark out; but they at least teach us this great lesson—that all the events of this dispensation have their limits fixed by God; that the time is short; that therefore nothing can justify us in saying that the world is yet in its infancy, or in protesting against "dreaming" of the coming of Christ at least during ~~this~~ <sup>the</sup> or the next century." I may be quite wrong, and therefore I wish to speak modestly, but I am fully persuaded that by far the most probable interpretation of events leads to the conclusion that the days of the "mystery of iniquity" are fast drawing to a close, and that this is coming about in connection with an order of events little thought of.—"Reasons for Hope."

THE SIGN.

Men will, of course, differ as to the degree of importance which ought to be attached to the fact that under all previous dispensations, as well as under our own, a visible sign has preceded each of those great changes which have, so to speak, hitherto formed the stepping-stones of the Divine economy. Such was the building of the ark to the men of the old world: it was a sign or superhuman warning of the coming deluge. Such were the signs and wonders in the land of Egypt, both to Pharaoh and to Israel. Only after miraculous witness to the truth of the Divine message was judgment poured out upon that devoted land. The first advent of Christ was announced by a heavenly host, and by a meteor pointing out the place of his birth. The miracles wrought, whether by prophets or apostles, were signs both for them that believed and for them that believed not, "God bearing them witness with signs and wonders." Jerusalem fell not until, in the words of Josephus, "fearful sights and great signs from heaven" had given abundant warning of its coming doom. And, if I read Scripture aright, not till some great sign again appears will Christ come to take vengeance on his enemies and to bless and save his friends.

The QUESTION of the disciples to our Lord on the mount was not only, "When shall these things be?" but, "What shall be the sign of thy coming, and [as they supposed] of the end of the world?" or, as it is expressed by Mark, "What shall be the sign when all these things shall be fulfilled?" The REPLY (for the Lord does not object to answer this question), so far as it can be separated from those portions of the discourse which refer to the approaching destruction of Jerusalem, and from those which indicate a lengthened course of preparatory events, is to this effect: After (or rather, in connection with) the darkening of the sun and moon, the falling of the stars and the shaking of the powers of heaven "shall appear the sign of the Son of man."

That the darkening of the heavenly bodies is sometimes used by the prophets poetically and figuratively to indicate approaching calamities is certain. Isaiah, Ezekiel, Amos and Joel all make use of this particular imagery. Isaiah describes a period of distinguished blessing and prosperity by saying, "The light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun, and the light of the sun shall be sevenfold, as the light of seven days." But it does not thence follow that familiar language may not, in narrative, be used colloquially to describe an actual event as it will appear to those who witness it. By far the most natural interpretation of our Lord's words is to understand by them the breaking in of the supernatural upon the ordinary course of things by a sign, visible in heaven, of such surpassing glory that it will, by its superior brightness, darken the sun and make the stars appear as if they were falling to the earth. At this great sight all the inhabitants of the earth, filled with terror, will mourn. A similar meaning must, I think, be attached to the language of Joel, as quoted by St. Peter, and to that of Luke when he says: "There shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth [apparently as a consequence thereof] distress of nations with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth;" also to that of the Apocalypse, both in the first chapter and in the sixth. I can scarcely conceive of a more graphic picture of what would appear to spectators, were some great sign to be seen in heaven, than that which is given in the Book of Revelation: "The sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood; and the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs when she is shaken of a mighty wind. And the heaven departed as a scroll when it is rolled together; and every mountain and island were moved out of their places."

This interpretation is borne out by the universal dismay which is depicted, and occasioned apparently by a spectacle so terrible, that all classes, from the monarch to the slave, hide in dens and caves of the earth to avoid the sight; a conviction so intense that the wrath of the Lamb is about to be poured out, that the very rocks and mountains are by a bold image personified, and entreated by the terror-stricken criminals to fall upon them, and to hide them from the face of him that sitteth upon the throne.

What permanent effect would be produced on mankind by such a sign I cannot say. In each case this would depend entirely on the moral condition of the man. After the withdrawal of the sight (for it would probably be of short continuance) the skeptic would doubtless satisfy himself with learned observations about unexplained phenomena. Rome would perceive in it God's threatenings against democracy, and a clear indication that Christ was about to appear on behalf of "his vicar." Blasphemers would only blaspheme the more. True Christians would in that day have their eyes opened. Now multitudes are to be found who "love the Lord," but do not "wait for his appearing." Then this state of mind will cease to be possible. The sign, given in forbearing mercy, will meet the case of those who, like the doubting apostle of old, are ever exclaiming, "Except I shall see in his hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the print of the nails, and thrust my hand into his side, I will not believe." Yet will it not be unaccompanied by the gentle rebuke, "Because thou hast seen, thou hast believed: blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed." Wickedness would be intensified by the sign and godliness would be deepened. The forces of good as well as of evil would draw their ranks closer; borderers would be obliged to choose their side; and love or hate, in relation to God, would be either enhanced or embittered.

While, therefore, I am quite clear as to the unscripturalness of any expectation of the return of the Redeemer before the full and complete development of the last form of Antichrist, and do not therefore anticipate Christ's coming either to-morrow or very soon, I hold firmly to the warrantable character of a hope to see "the sign of the Son of man in heaven" any day; and I do so for the following reasons:

(1) Because I observe that under all previous dispensations, as well as under our own, a visible sign has commonly, if not invariably, indicated the approach of each of those great changes which form, so to speak, the stepping-stones of the Divine economy, and because Scripture seems to teach that some time will elapse between the sign and the actual coming of the Lord.

(2) Because the imagery in which the revelation of this sign is clothed, whether in the gospels or in the Apocalypse, is precisely such as we might expect to be used in describing a supernatural appearance in the sky, so terrible and glorious as to darken the heavenly bodies, and to fill the inhabitants of the earth with terror.

(3) Because I hold, with Archbishop Trenchard and many others, that Scripture plainly teaches that our world is not travelling on to a perfect order; that the law of progress is not constantly working; that it is folly to say, "Peace, when there is no peace;" that we do but indulge in idle illusions when we imagine that any of the moral forces now at work in the world will bring about that new and glorious birth to which we all agree it is one day to arrive; but that, on the contrary, the close of this dispensation will be in all but universal apostasy, in blood and in fire.

(4) Because the signs of the times, so far as they are to be seen in the world, all indicate the approach of the end; whether they be read in prophetic Scripture, in the growth of an atheistic materialism, in the birth of new and gigantic superstitions, or in the remarkable tendency of all modern discovery and thought to favor a universal empire, should the attempt to realize floating desires of this character ever be made by any man who might reasonably claim to be regarded as a representative of his age.

(5) Because of the rapid spread of skepticism in the Church, occasioning doubt as to the value of large portions of the Bible, feeble beliefs in relation to Divine truth generally, and an increasing disposition to say, in relation to the second advent, "Where is the promise of his coming?"

(6) Because of the strange misconceptions which now prevail as to the true idea of Christianity; the consequent narrowness of our popular theology; the gradual obliteration of all important distinctions between the Church and the world; the denial of any general "redemption," or redemption through Christ; and, as an effect thereof, the belief that the salvation of the world depends on the faith and service of the Church.

(7) Because I can find no reason whatever for supposing that Scripture leads us to expect that any prediction remains to be accomplished before we have a right to expect "the sign of the Son of man in heaven"; because I believe that all interpretations of ancient prophecy which support the notion of the universal triumph of the Gospel under the present dispensation are utterly groundless; and finally, because the tendency of "waiting" and "watching" for the Lord is to promote piety in the heart and "moderation" in the life; to favor the growth of a heavenly-minded superiority to the poor ambitions of earth; and to lead to the happy enjoyment of that peculiarly Christian hope which, in all apostolic teaching, takes the place of death and the grave, whether regarded as a warning to the thoughtless or a motive to the godly. Without, therefore, assuming to have proved anything—for, as I have already said, the purposes of prophecy forbid demonstration—I have, I think, said enough to redeem from folly, and perhaps to justify as wisdom, the habit of daily realizing the blessed thought, "The Lord is at hand." Happy shall we be if the expectation leads to our "moderation" in relation to earthly desires becoming obvious unto all men.—Ibid.

THE MARRIAGE OF THE LAMB.

BY ELDER S. W. BISHOP.

No. II.

THERE must be something more than a mere flourish of words or figure of speech indicated in the statement of the Son of God that there shall a time come when he, the heavenly Bridegroom, shall claim his espoused bride and they shall be married. If we apply the language used as is indicated by the choice of the illustrative matrimonial union, all is plain. Let us look at that which is chosen as the resemblance. The first perfect pattern given is the union of the first Adam with his bride. There was one important consideration in the forming of this union. That purpose is revealed in the following language used by their Creator to the first pair: "And God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth."—Gen. i. 28. This purpose has never been changed nor this commandment rescinded by divine disposal, and all efforts to neutralize it have brought their own punishment on all those who sin against the laws of life, which are the laws of God.

The world would never have been peopled if God had not given Adam "an help meet for him." God designed that the earth should be peopled, and he therefore provided the means. Whatever else Adam may have done, he did nothing whatever toward the accomplishment of this great design till his bride was prepared for and given to him. When she was given to Adam she was exactly adapted to an equal union with her husband for the carrying out of the one great design for which they were both created "in the image of God." Everything else alongside of this one great purpose could be reckoned in importance only as a help to the producing of that one great effect. It did not matter so much what other circumstances might occur in the life of that first pair; the one great culminating point that God designed should be reached is, the earth shall be filled through the fruitfulness of this pair. God took the woman from the side of the man that it might be literally true that they twain are "one flesh." He did not take the woman from his head, that she might by that selection suppose that he intended her as his ruler; neither did he take her from his feet, to indicate that she should be downtrodden; but he took her from his side, indicating by the act that they twain, when God joins them together, are "one flesh."

Adam the first was a type of Christ. This is plainly taught in the Scriptures. See Rom. v. 14. Prof. Murdock translates this verse as follows: "Yet death reigned from Adam until Moses, even over those who had not sinned after the likeness of the transgression of the command by Adam, who was the type of him who was to come." This typical arrangement concerns the matter under consideration, viz., the peopling or the filling of the earth. As in the type, so also in antitype: there must be a bridegroom and a bride. They must both be fully qualified, adapted, prepared for the accomplishment of the work to which they are called by the divine appointment. Until both are fully fitted to the work, that work cannot be done. The bridegroom cannot accomplish it alone. The marriage must first take place, then the work of replenishing the earth begins. Here is where the Christian world is unconditionally mistaken. It is no part of the work of this or of past ages to people the earth with a holy race, to evangelize the world, or to bless the nations. "All that work lies beyond the present age. Everything that the first Adam and his bride have done in the past in themselves, or in after generations in their offspring—yea, all that has been done by the second Adam up to the present time, and all that will be done to the end of this age by all parties concerned, is only preparatory to the final work that is to be accomplished by the heavenly Bridegroom and his Bride after they are made "one" (immortal) flesh; after the marriage of the Lamb to his immortalized bride is an accomplished fact.

How often we have heard the text quoted and applied to the Church in this age that reads, "And the Spirit and the bride say, Come."—Rev. xxii. 17. This is a mistake. The Church is not now a bride. She is only espoused now. She is not yet presented or given away. Her presentation is when the Bridegroom comes. "The bridegroom came, and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage."—Matt. xxv. 10.

"Knowing that he which raised up the Lord Jesus shall raise up us also by Jesus, and shall present us with you."—2 Cor. iv. 4.

"Now unto him that is able to keep you from falling, and to present you faultless before the throne of his glory with exceeding joy, to God above, our Saviour, through Jesus Christ our Lord, be glory, majesty, power and authority, both now and throughout all the ages. Amen."—Jude, 24, 25. EM. DIA. When the Church is thus presented she is a virgin; she is not yet married. She is a chaste virgin. 2 Cor. xi. 2—"For I have espoused you to one husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ."

I have proved conclusively, in a previous article, that the marriage cannot take place this side of the coming of Christ. I affirm that the Bridegroom and Bride cannot be "one flesh" while the one is immortal and the other mortal. The Church must be made immortal before she can be married to her already immortalized spouse. Rev. xxii. 17 does not, therefore, belong in this age, but will become a universal proclamation beyond the marriage supper of the Lamb, and it will not be unfruitful in its glorious results. It will result in the accomplishment of all that was contemplated in the plan that was set forth in the figure, the union of the first pair in Eden, and will at last people the earth with a race who will walk in humble, perfect obedience to the law that shall "go forth out of Zion," and "the world of the Lord from Jerusalem."

Then all nations shall come and worship before God.—Rev. xv. 4. Then the nations shall walk in the light of the city of God.—Ch. xxi. 24.

Then the great multitude which no man could number, of all nations and kindreds, and people and tongues, will stand before the throne clothed in white robes, and palms in their hands; and they will cry, saying, Salvation to our God which sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb. And all the angels will join in the closing anthem of praise, saying, AMEN: blessing, and glory, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and honor, and power, and might be unto our God for the ages of the ages, when they see the mass of the race redeemed to an endless life.

Oh, what scenes are just before us! What wonderful events are about to transpire! Is it not consoling to know that we are to participate in these wondrous scenes? Yea, we are to be fully identified with, to act a first part in, the most sublime of those glorious events that shall thrill angelic minds with wonder, love and praise. All this to those spotless ones who shall make up the Bride of Christ. What matter if we suffer here—suffer because of our blessed hope and faith; suffer by being cast out by our fellows; suffer by hunger and want; suffer by persecution and scorn: we will not mind it much, for already we can see glimpses of the dawning of the eternal ages. Yes, there are sure indications of the coming of the heavenly Bridegroom to welcome us to the marriage feast. We feel the assurance of the Spirit of God, coupled with a life wholly devoted to him, that we have on the wedding garment, and soon these troubles “on every side” will all be lost in the flood of the “eternal weight of glory” that will be wrought out for us by these momentary, these light afflictions. We will endure all things yet a little longer, and then ALL THINGS will be ours. AMEN, and AMEN.

“CONDITIONAL IMMORTALITY.”

THE Bible teaching on this important subject is rapidly gaining ground in Europe. The Rainbow says:

In Switzerland, where the Calvinistic Malakoff has again and again been compelled to lower its flag at the summons of free thought, intolerance has still its cardinals and neoplatonism its lovers. Dr. Petavel, our distinguished friend and ally (he will pardon us for so terming him), whose praise should be in all the churches, and would be if the churches had but the wit to think for themselves, has still to fight a Sisyphean battle with the well-drilled captains of theology. It is true, he has repeatedly snapped their weapons in twain and cast them to the ground; but the weapons, though broken, are still good enough to harass a noble enemy withal, or, at least, to flourish in the sight of uninitiated spectators. Meanwhile, the true investigators of nature's secrets, the philosophers by pre-eminence, are not Dr. Petavel's opponents; and it is with reference to them that he opens his third campaign in the Revue Theologique of last year—the Essay, like its predecessors, bearing the title of “Conditional Immortality.” After a complimentary allusion to L'Encyclopedie des sciences religieuses, Dr. Petavel proceeds as follows—[in some few parts our translation is abbreviated and summarized]:

“We may say, at starting, that Conditional Immortality has awakened hardly any hostility in the philosophical camp. M. Renouvier, the leader of French criticism, so far from denouncing our point of view, has given it his hearty accord, while the Editor of the Critique Philosophique, in his preliminary adjustment of the terms of debate, lays down, first, that the eschatology of Messieurs Lambert and Petavel is in perfect harmony with the condition which bases immortality, not upon the indestructible nature of the living substance, but upon the moral right in the direction of progress, and upon the inevitable action of conscience as postulated by that right, and secondly, that M. Petavel's treatment of the question, as one of exegesis, is abundantly justified if we keep in mind the place which the dogma of resurrection held both in Judaism and in primitive Christianity as the necessary condition of future life—a dogma which waxed weaker and weaker in proportion as the apostolic age receded from view and the idea of natural immortality gathered force.”*

“A modern doctrine which alarms many believers is that of ascending evolution, the triumphant progress of which might place the name of Darwin by the side of those of Galileo and Newton. We do not say that the system has yet enlisted the unanimous assent of the learned, but, even though it should, conditional immortality will remain calmly undisturbed. Nay, ought we not rather to say that it will be recognized as the appropriate culmination of the system, and that the relation of science to revelation will be ratified accordingly? Such is the view also as set forth by Professor Goldwin Smith, of Oxford, in Macmillan's Magazine for January, 1877. The doctrine of evolution, he contends, does not banish from the action of a creating God the intervention of a formative influence in the various stages of his work. Darwinism, he adds, is consistent with itself in assigning to development a possible future as no less reasonable than a well-attested past. If man has passed successively, along with matter, from an inorganic to an organic state, from the condition of the animal to that of the savage, and eventually to that of civilized life, why should he not advance to the transfiguration and immortalization of his being? The arrest of finality is at war with the instinct which refuses to regard nature as stationary. So, in theology, where the law of transformation is distinctly traceable, the best conditions survive; those which resist the law of progress perish. We would all like to be candidates of immortality; but he that sins voluntarily shuts himself out; the unregenerate will be the mastodons of the moral world; and God's election will be seen to be no other than a natural election where liberty has had ample play. These remarks, it is true, point to races rather than to individuals; yet, to many minds, they may furnish a physiological argument in favor of personal survival after death."

[But leaving evolution to take care of itself, and abstaining for the present from Scripture authority, M. Petavel proceeds, on the basis of what he calls 'Universal Analogy,' to ascertain the conditions of immortality by first apprehending the conditions of man's existence. This is largely dwelt upon; and, though we grieve to compress the thoughts of so luminous a writer, our remaining extracts must necessarily be fragmentary.—Ed. of Rainbow.]

"Seeing that the creation of man is a supreme good, his destruction cannot but be regarded as a superlative evil. Satan, as the type of evil, is, therefore, called by our Lord a man-slayer or a murderer. Evil, voluntarily committed, takes the name of sin, and is fatal to the conditions of the moral creature with himself, with God and with the world. To attempt to live in the violation of these fixed conditions is an insolent and foolish experiment. The law of progress being given, sin lies in the refusal to develop the higher elements of his nature, namely, reason and the religious sentiment. It is at this point that man commences suicide; he is falling back to animalism—a process not inaptly set forth by the mediæval artists when they equipped Satan with cloven feet, a caudal extremity and the horns of a goat. The penalty moreover, is in exact agreement with the evil wrought; sin chastises itself and slays the sinner. This law, to which the ancients gave the name of Nemesis, has been thus expanded by that father of orthodoxy, Athanasius, in his treatise on the Word made flesh."

"'Transgression,' says he, 'has caused man to fall backward toward his natural state, replunging him by a gradual destruction into that condition of nonentity where creation first found him. Now, this is quite just; for his natural state was simply one of non existence, and he would never have been summoned into existence but for the presence and the good-will of the Word. Is it not, therefore, right that immortality should be refused to that man who refuses to know God and marches toward nonentity? For, in truth, evil has no substantial existence; it is only good, which positively exists, proceeding, as it does, from God. But the sinner having now become the prey of a dissolving power, and being mortal by his nature, remains dead and destroyed.' Athanasius then proceeds to exhibit what he regards as the great aim of the Incarnation, namely, to save man from relapsing into nonentity, and to render him immortal by renewing the divine image within him. Not less explicitly is the same view of the subject presented by Irenæus in the second century, by Nemesius in the fifth, and also by all the apostolic fathers and by the greater part of the apologist fathers."

"Indeed, so conformable is this conception to the very nature of things that it occasionally crops out even in the writings of those who dispute the position. In the recent florid work of M. Rougemont, for example, we have the following passage: 'That spirit which has resigned itself to the soft seductions of the flesh vegetates in a mortal impotence which would issue in its death and annihilation if it were not indestructible.' (Un mystère de la Passion, p. 397.) Nay, but this non-proven indestructibility, does it not seem to start into view at the end of his sentence, as the Deus ex machina, just to snatch from the author his rights as a logician?"

"Jealous for the conservation and restoration of his cherished creature, man, the paternal solicitude of the Creator has placed pain in the sombre passage leading to death. Pain is thus the vigilant sentinel warning him of danger; but the sinner, loth to accuse himself, curses that as evil which he ought rather to regard as the shepherd's staff reclaiming the wandering sheep."

"Pain always indicates the presence of evil. It is the commencement of death; and shows that destruction, either partial or total, is in course of accomplishment. But being in its essence symptomatic and preventive, it disappears either when recovery is complete, or as soon as the malady becomes hopeless. Sismondi, in his journal, tells us of an officer of his acquaintance, Major Besançon, who, at the battle of Wagram, was struck down by a sabre blow. For two hours, with a lacerated head, he rolled beneath the horses' feet; but, says he, the real sense of pain only commenced when he found himself in the tent and under the surgeon's hands. And Sismondi then adds: Providence has provided fainting as the relief of tragic agonies; and we hardly suffer acutely till we have the fortitude to suffer ; that is to say, till recovery having set in, we make a struggle with ourselves to keep alive."—(Fragments de son Journal, 73.)

"And thus we may regard the office which suffering fulfills in the teachings of Revelation. Noteworthy is the fact that prolonged sufferings are quite foreign to Old Testament legislation. No state-executioner ever appears. Neither question by torture, nor impalement, dungeons, racks, nor wheels, nor any other of the odious punishments which have disgraced ancient and modern civilization, find their equivalent in the Sinitic code. Crucifixion we know to have been of Roman origin ; whereas in the Jewish punishment of stoning, the very first blow was directed to shatter the criminal's chest. In sacrifices, where the victim represents the sinner, if the execution were prolonged, the sacrifice was rejected ; and to this hour, if the smallest unnecessary pain result from the use of a defective weapon, the flesh is forbidden to the faithful. Even the burning of the victim was no symbol of suffering, for it came after immolation ; it rather set forth the annihilation which threatened the incorrigible offender. The flood, the fire, the sword—these have, in turn, overtaken the men of Noah's time, the inhabitants of Sodom and the abandoned Canaanites. Their fate was terrible, but it lasted not. Nothing can be more prompt than the thunderbolt ; and has not the thunderbolt, from time immemorial, symbolized the vengeance of heaven ? As Clement of Alexandria has said, 'Even chastisement reflects the Divine goodness ; for its primary design is to save the sinner ; and this failing, it issues in dissolution when salvation is no longer possible. The pity of the Great Parent, whose tender mercies are over all his works, is thus seen to occupy a domain from which traditional dogma and popular credulity have long time excluded it.'"

"But," contends Prof. Bonifas, 'chastisement implies suffering ; and suffering is not only an incentive to amendment, it is also a reparation due to God and to the majesty of law.' For our part, we can discover neither a rational nor a biblical basis for this worship of pain. It is an idolatry and a superstition fetched from Buddhism and Fetishism through a Romanist channel. To torture a murderer is surely not the means of restoring his victim to life. We will meet the chastising rod with resignation. We will strive above all things to merit it no longer. But worship it we will not. Do you seek to discover a veritable sanction of a broken law ? See it, then, amply guaranteed in the unvarying covenant which sin makes with death, either partial or total. It is not written, 'The soul that sinneth shall suffer.' It is written, 'The soul that sinneth shall die,' death with all its fearful accessories, if you will ; but, after all, death is the sentence ; and the eternal silences will render to violated law the homage worthy of its eternal majesty. The crime which set the law at defiance has expired with the criminal. Dead is the serpent, dead the venom. The law, adequately avenged, survives and triumphs."

"It is now time that against the traditional doctrine we array the biblical dogma of immortality for the just and gradual destruction for the impenitent. But it prompts to suicide, says one. And the capital punishment of death, we rejoin, does this prompt to suicide ? If so, it is at least one of the arguments which the partisans for the abolition of capital punishment have altogether lost sight of. Who ever heard of reasoning such as the following : There are men who kill themselves ; consequently capital punishment has no alarms, and we must replace it by prolonged agonies ? No, on the contrary, it is because capital punishment appears to them too terribly severe that Victor Hugo, in The Last Day of a Condemned, and other philanthropists, have urged its suppression. Death staring us in the face withers the stoutest heart ; how much more, then, the prospect of the second death, which, to the horrors of physical dissolution adds those of a dark unknown !

"Do you tell us of suicide committed in pure gayety of heart, or from a thirst for oblivion ? Ah ! but before this point be reached there must have come over the victim a moral derangement or a deluge of woes. It is as true now as when the Epistle to the Hebrews was written, that the fear of death holds mankind in bondage. And frightful as death is, the second death will be doubly so. Only take care to exhibit it in its true colors. Show it to be at once logical, natural, manifest, inevitable, irremediable, infamous. Picture it in all its anguish, its loathsomeness, its rendings asunder, its terrors—as the most calamitous mischance that can possibly overtake a man ; as the loss of every good thing and the very consummation of evil. Some daring spirits, perchance, may cast defiance at it all, but the mass of your auditors will reflect and share your honest alarms.

"There are cases of mental aberration ; there are also cases of moral aberration—sons of perdition, whom the eloquence even of Jesus could not save ; consciences seared and souls so far sunk in corruption that the very instinct of self-preservation seemed to exhale. At the same time, erratic manifestations of the will are present to attest the entire liberty of the human soul. Against such excesses no teaching exists which can offer an effectual restraint; and God permits suicide to take place in a spiritual sense as well as in a physical. He permits it, and he punishes it, not by eternal torments, but by the second death. Your body, said the apostle, is the temple of the Holy Spirit; but mark the alternative, 'Whoso destroyeth this temple, him will God destroy.'

"Possessing to the full all the beneficial agencies of the traditional scheme of Christianity, Conditional Immortality superadds a yet more potential influence. Life in Christ, love of the good, the beautiful and the true, the everlasting rapture of communion with God and his saints, the splendors of heaven, the pangs of Gehenna, everything which the most lively imagination can conceive short of the inconceivable infinite—to all these chords Conditional Immortality gives vibration. Sundry discordances meanwhile are banished from her keyboard, to be replaced by new-found harmonies.

"The ambassador of Conditional Immortality lingers by the pillow of the dying man whose furious blasphemies or whose sneers have discarded the traditional dogma; and having to some extent restored calmness, he thus addresses him: My friend, it is not my God who thus exasperates thee. Do but listen to the voice of affection. He loves thee now, and will love thee to the end, do what thou wilt. Thou mayest repel him, but hate him thou canst not with any show of reason. Death is not his work, supposing that he has no existence; but he does exist; and Jesus, his living image, reveals to thee in his own person a love divine without reserve. More than thyself, before thyself, and for thyself he hath suffered. God never chastises but with regret. He was under no obligation to impart thy present life. He now makes you the gratuitous offer of a better. If thou preferrest annihilation, he will respect thy liberty. If the prospect of eternal death be attractive, I will not dispute the sole consolation of thy misery. My tears will flow without offending thee. I shall cease to speak; but remember, that so long as a pulsation of life or a glimmer of personal conscience remain within thee, so long will the arms of the Heavenly Father be open to welcome thee—open will be the source of his life, open all the treasures with which he may yet enrich thee.

"If there are sinners whom an appeal such as this urges to suicide, they can belong, we imagine, only to the perishing class signalized in 2 Cor. ii. 15, for whom, says the apostle, the Gospel has but an odor of death. But this is no reason why we should refrain from preaching that Gospel. In fine, we declare that for our part we hold eternal life to be the sublimest good, eternal death the direst woe, and sin, the parent of death, the most revolting of all objects. What more need be said? The imagination cannot rationally take up a stronger position.

"In its aspect toward the converted sinner Conditional Immortality possesses a force which may be pronounced unique, carrying as it does the doctrine of the irreparability of evil. The traditional dogma is unphilosophic. It ignores gradations by attributing to faith the magical virtue of neutralizing all the consequences of evil. Salvation is either everything or it is nothing. In the case of a transgressor whose whole life has been the prey of his passions, let him at the last moment repent; and then not only is his lot among the saved (which is true enough), but it is equivalent to the lot of the man whose entire career has been one of struggle and prayer. Pardon thus becomes impunity; and following it out to the end, ritualism completes the fatal scheme by contravening all justice. A sacramental formula will save from Gehenna; a donation or a bequest to the Church will abridge the term of purgatory. Constantine may stain his hands in the blood of his offspring; for the baptism which he reserves for his last hour will give him space for repentance.

"Now, the biblical principle of life shatters these abuses. Sin is felt to be a gangrene—a dissolving fire—involving necessarily some amount of damage, some destruction, total or partial, local or general. You may arrest the action of the fire, or you may re-construct the ruined edifice; but you will never be able to say that damage or loss has not accrued. The healed cancer still leaves a lasting cicatrice. Greatly to have sinned is greatly to have suffered loss. Little sin—little loss. But in either case the loss is irreparable and eternal.

"This stern truth, without quenching grace, leaves room for justice. On each believer it bestows salvation, but it is a salvation in accordance with the works of each. It consoles us without steeping us in dangerous illusions. It holds in morals the adjusting power which the representation of minorities occupies in politics. It opposes to the passions of the sinner who fancies himself converted, and yet is but half so, a barrier all unknown to the traditional scheme. Thus to pour light on the irreparable nature of sin—is this to negative the terrible reality; is this to imperil the force of its conviction?

“It has been asserted by a writer in Le Témoignage that, viewed from our standpoint, the divinity of Jesus Christ may as well be dismissed. That writer is entirely mistaken. It is just here that the hope of our immortality reposes; the divinity of Jesus Christ being a far more essential element in our view than in that of the traditional scheme. For, in fact, while it is just possible to conceive of the self-sacrifice of some man or angel sufficing to quench our lasting woes and to procure healing for our souls and bodies, it is not possible to conceive of the communication of endless life to a perishing creature as other than the prerogative of him who alone hath immortality. If, therefore, we derive from Jesus this eternal life, Jesus can be to us no other than God manifested in the flesh. According to the biblical view of Conditional Immortality, there is no life of any kind apart from the Eternal Word of which Jesus is the incarnation. This creative Word animates at the same time that it enlightens every man that cometh into the world. Unconverted sinners apprehend only the twilight of Christ who is the Sun of souls but as yet below their horizon. To us Jesus is not only a somewhat, he is everything; and that strength of his which penetrates us becomes the most sustaining proof of his divinity.

“Prolonged reflection makes it more and more apparent that Conditional Immortality, no longer hostile to evangelical teaching, only reanimates it with youthful vigor. Among the primitive dogmas select one of the most discredited, namely, that of predestination. Who preaches it now, either in Calvin’s city or in Scotland? A forced immortality, irrevocably consigning evil doers to endless suffering, has stamped it with a hateful character. Eliminate this error, and election stands forth simply as the liberty exercised by the Divine Being in the distribution of his gifts—a like liberty reigning throughout nature, where none complain of a benefactor’s choice. Unequal portions indeed are indispensable for that variety which embellishes the universe. If the prerogatives conferred by God must needs become motives of jealousy, it had been better to limit creation to a single and unique individual. His bounty attaches infinite wealth to the right use of his gifts; but he will banish from his universe those who ungratefully refuse to accept the position assigned them; or rather, let us say, he will eventually leave them to the fatal consequences of their folly. Thus the predestination of the wicked can consist only in the determined will of the Creator not to force eternal existence on those who obstinately rush on death; and the predestination of the righteous will be the determined will and the promise to give eternal life to those who, by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory, honor and incorruption. These immutable designs leave untouched the liberty of the man—intelligent worm as he is, going and coming at will, in the narrow compass of his frail dwelling-place.

“Our task might here terminate had we no other adversary than the traditional doctrine; but possibly, under its flag, we may yet be assailed; in which case we are ready to launch anew the forces which have already reduced it to silence in England. In that country it may now be said to be standing at bay, unable to make any aggressive action in arrest of the second and third editions of Mr. Edward White’s book, or of the fifty thousand copies of a propagandist pamphlet. [Report of Meeting at Cannon Street.] We recently heard that the Primitive Methodists remain almost the sole defenders of eternal agonies. But lo! a new Proteus. The traditional dogma, when too hard pressed, suddenly transforms itself into Universalism. Without suspecting it, the orthodox teacher finds himself an Origenist. To us, indeed, the transition from the traditional dogma to Origenism appears no better than escaping from Charybdis to fall into Scylla. It is like abandoning the crumbling citadel only to take refuge in the ditch.”

PARDON IN ETERNITY.

BY ELDER N. H. PALMER.

THE so-called law of works was established for the innocent. Its first principle is, “The man which doeth these things shall live by them.”—Rom. x. 5.

“The law of faith,” which is but another name for the “Gospel of God,” was established for the benefit of sinners. It is couched in the Covenant of Grace, and is a permanent part of the Divine government, running parallel through eternity with the law of works. Its first principle is, “If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved.”—Rom. x. 9.

Faith is here shown to be essential to human salvation. In order to secure it the Covenant of Grace provides that God shall send preachers of the Gospel to all that be saved, that they may hear it, believe it and call upon God, whether they be Jews having a revelation or Greeks having none.—Rom. x. 12-15.

In reference to the doctrine of the "knowledge of salvation by the remission of sins," we must distinctly bear in mind that the atonement, or the redeeming work of Christ, affords the only governmental reason we know of on which the Divine Governor acts in pardoning all that are of a pardonable character, at any time, even in the life to come.

To apply these principles we will now propose this question: Can the heathen, who have absolutely no definite information about Christ and the atonement, be pardoned and saved in the world to come? We reply, Yes; they can be saved with as much propriety as infants in Christendom can. Both are subjects of the atonement; the Spirit is no respecter of persons, and the absence of faith in both is from like causes. From the nature of the glorious Gospel it is adapted alike to all ages—the old and the young; and all conditions—the deplorably blind and the enlightened. Upon this foundation the Divine Sovereign continues to offer pardon and acceptance to all—"the ends of the earth"—whether they are in a condition to hear it or not, in that sense in which "faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God."

We observe, as one of the principal benefits of Christ's redeeming work, that the Spirit quickens all who have a natural capacity to be influenced by spiritual truths and moral motives; and this we call spiritual life. We find ample evidence of this spiritual life in the moral conduct of the heathen nations; yet they evince a lack of spiritual truth and motive for developing aright and perfecting their vitalized faculties.

They need divine light, truth, law, motive, assistance; they want a divine religion and its regenerating influence. In Christendom where the Gospel is preached it fully proclaims the love of God and the grace of Christ for sinners, and offers a full and free pardon to all who will come to God by him. In them that hear the Spirit works the love of the truth, bows the will in submission to God, becomes in them the witness of adoption, and they are thus seen to be of that character to which the Divine Governor promises pardon and salvation. Now that self-same Spirit is in the world convincing all men of "sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment." If the Spirit will (and who can or dare say he will not?) so far impart to a heathen's heart a love of truth, so far as he knows it, and the disposition to do unto others as he would have them do unto him, has he not, substantially, that character to which God has proposed pardon and salvation?

This moral qualification of the heart in every case forms a pardonable character, and in every instance prepares the heart to agree to and accept of pardon, as soon as he hears of Christ and his work, barely and purely on account of the atonement, and just as it is offered by the Divine Governor, whether in this life or in the world to come.

This is in perfect harmony with the declaration—"There is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved."—Acts iv. 12. Because that name is given and preached in the world whether men hear of it or not, and if the hearts of men are prepared for it, as was Cornelius, they will consent as he did to be pardoned upon Gospel conditions as soon as they hear the name of Jesus and apprehend his grace. If the event of natural death should put the hearing and the acceptance in abeyance for a time, is the purpose of God defeated thereby? and is he who has begun a good work in them not able to perform it? A foundation for faith in Christ is laid in the human heart by the Holy Spirit; and faith, as a principle of action, is either actual or latent in all men, and is not destroyed by death, but only by bringing the mind into such a state of nonconformity with the actual or the possible of true virtue, as results from great sensuality and moral corruption—from great wickedness of life!

We are wont to be much straitened in our views respecting the grace of the Gospel, limiting the Almighty to our own measures.

It is difficult in our hearts to encompass a Gospel that proclaims the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of men, and pledges to every one the forgiveness of sins on condition of reformation, obedience and trust; that offers to man's weakness the aid of an Almighty Spirit; assures them of the loving presence of "a Divinity that shapes their ends," that "underneath are the everlasting arms," lifting them up till they can take hold on the Infinite, and till the Spirit infuses into the soul an energy that new-shapes their whole external and social life.

He whose eyes are opened sees in this world the evidence of a divine, impartial Force that knows no caste or sex, and that seeks no aristocracy, but deposits its holiest trust even with the ignorant, the simple and the social outcast, and seeks to mould the world into its own lovely image and likeness.

The Gospel with its living Spirit reveals to honest and unperverted souls the supremacy of truth, and inspires a love of it which is stronger than death. Its grace is not confined to forms nor symbols, but flows through all forms and methods, giving them at times a new and surprising efficiency; and the love of God and of his truth is often found to exist in souls before the conscious existence of what we persist in calling "a saving faith."

We have all along tried to treat this subject in the light of Peter's sermon to Israel, Acts, Chap. 3. "Repent ye and be converted," now, "and he shall send Jesus Christ which before was preached unto you," and "your sins may be blotted out when times of refreshing shall come from his presence," and at "the times of restitution of all things."

DEFINITE TIME FOR THE SECOND ADVENT.

I HAVE often in the past thirty years expressed my mind decidedly against the idea that any prophetic period in the Bible gives the day, month, or year of the second advent of Christ. I have not felt disposed to denounce those who have held and promulgated an opposite view; yet I have felt grieved that any should bewilder themselves and others with labor to establish the idea that the exact time is revealed in the prophetic numbers for the advent of our Lord "from heaven," being fully persuaded that such efforts are labor lost, and will most assuredly end in disappointment to all concerned in them, if not ultimately leading them to undervalue the Scriptures themselves, from these repeated failures in searching for definite time.

I have ever endeavored to treat all kindly who were honestly believing in such a view of time; but with the light I have received, since such a movement in 1844, it would have been presumption in me to have taken any part in attempting to prove that any prophetic period in the Bible gives the definite time of Christ's return from heaven. If any think otherwise, I do not object to their expressing their opinion in the matter, provided it is done without making it a test of being prepared to meet our Redeemer on his return.

That prophetic periods give us the time of events which bring us near the advent, I have never doubted. I rejoice in all the light that can be shed on that subject. But it seems some persons cannot look at the prophetic periods without starting some definite time for the advent itself. That I consider a great mistake and an evil, as it tends to weaken confidence in all prophecy, and leads some to follow fancy and feeling rather than the word itself. Those who have been leaders in these movements ought to have learned wisdom by their repeated failures. Some have, but others continue to assume they have found new data, and rush on as confident and as positive as if they had never failed! Alas, for the sheep who are fed by such shepherds! For one, I have no faith in such a course, and have had no sympathy in the latest effort in that direction; but have treated them with kindness, hoping that they would see, when their definite time should pass, that it is better not to seem to contradict the Saviour when he says, "Watch therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh;" and again, "Take ye heed, watch and pray: for ye know not when the time is." —Matt. xxv. 13, and Mark xiii. 33.

It is a settled fact, with me, that the Saviour will never come at any time fixed upon from the prophetic periods. The sooner, therefore, an end is made of this waste of time and money to find out by those periods the exact time of the event, the better it will be for the cause of Truth.

Let all remember it is love for the appearing of Jesus Christ that will constitute us heirs of life when he comes, and not the love or knowledge of the exact time of the event. Saith an apostle, "Though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge; and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not love, I am nothing." But nowhere does the Bible make the knowledge of the exact time—hour, day, month, or year—a condition of life eternal to any man; nor the profession of such knowledge a proof of being among "the wise," in respect to the second advent.

Let us all watch and pray, and be always in that state of mind, and in that employment that we would rejoice to have our Lord come.

So shall we be accepted of him in that day. "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly." Ed.

THE SEVEN CHURCHES.

BY H. BRITTAIN.

II.—SMYRNA.

SMYRNA. This church carries its meaning openly. (S)myr(na), myrrh, or bitterness. Myrrh was used for embalming the dead. Let us read Rev. iii. 8 to 11, and then note the expression. "These things saith the first and the last, which was dead and is alive,"—with the after one saith to the Church, "fear none of those things which thou shalt suffer—be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life." The surpassing grace of the mention of his death when pointing to their's in his cause, and then the leading away to his own resurrection, and their's also. He was faithful unto death—so must they also be. "Be ye followers of me, as dear children."

The reign of unity in the Ephesian assembly is now followed by the reign of persecution against the Smyranean assembly. To this assembly belongs the honor of being the first Gentile assembly persecuted. Its trials were within and without. There were those who blasphemed, who said they were Jews, but were not, but were of the synagogue of Satan.

How fallen the Jews had become! The words of him who had mourned over their rejection of the Lord's prophets are now seen in realization. "Behold, your house is left unto you desolate."—Matt. xxiii. 37 to 39. The habitation had become empty, swept and garnished for the adversary of God. The Jews became foremost in the persecution of this church at Smyrna. The proof of this is to be found in the epistle which this church sent from Smyrna to its fellow churches. Among its martyrs the venerable Polycarp, disciple of John the beloved, found a place and a name which yet liveth and speaketh.

Its trials were without. "Behold the devil shall cast some of you into prison, that ye may be tried; and ye shall have tribulation ten days." The opponent of the Christ, who had offered to him all the kingdoms of the habitable—the prince of the power of the air—now brings sorrow and trial to the followers of the Christ. As the Master had borne his trials unto death, so also did they. The sincerity of their works was proved by the rich fruits which their lives bore amidst the tribulation which the Roman power brought to bear upon them, energized as it was by Satan.

To this particular church a special period was assigned—ten days of persecution. Maitland, in his work, The Apostle's School of Prophetic Interpretation, pp. 142 to 144, gives sufficient evidence to satisfy an unbiassed mind as to the limited period in which the Smyrniote, including Polycarp, suffered the fierce rage of their opponents. The persecution, once began, was not confined to Smyrna. Wherever Christians were to be found, there was persecution found also. For near 250 years the storm raged. The work began by the Son of God was too deeply rooted in the truth; and his followers were too nigh him to permit of either the work or the workers to be uprooted by any assailing power, either of Satan or of man. Until the edict of Milan, A. D. 312, the record of the assembly of Christ is one of trial and of death.

The first death was all that could be inflicted on them. The safety lay in the reward set before them. "He that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death."

Thus, the Smyranean period: the period in which the persecution of the followers of Christ is the prominent mark or sign, followed the Ephesian period.

Can we connect it with our own land? Yes. By A. D. 209, Tertullian testifies that "those parts of Britain into which the Roman arms had never penetrated, were become subject to Christ." Its isolated position preserved Britain from the fiery trials that ever and anon passed over the Roman Empire, among the Christian Churches, doubtless offering, as many have well surmised, a refuge to many from the continuous persecutions of the Roman Emperors. However the Church in Britain did not pass unscathed. Diocletian made a last savage attempt to crush out of existence the followers of Christ. It was the last, and, among his victims is ranked the name of the first British martyr of whom we have any record, Alban, of Verulamium, which town is named St. Albans to this day. The second phase passes away. "He that hath an ear let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the Churches."

SOLILOQUY.

BY MRS. S. M. JUDSON.

WE are standing upon the verge of Eden restored; no sighs shall be wafted on the air of that clime; no moans shall be heard amid the rich notes of heaven's holy anthems; no destructive storm-clouds shall hover o'er those glorified fields of earth; no death shall enter the Paradise of God. Peace, eternal peace, and purity, is stamped upon every object in the Eden restored—the pearly gates, the golden streets, are all the work of him who never errs. The new Jerusalem, the glory-crowned city, emits forth the chrystal waters of eternal life, from underneath its throne, and on either side, the tree of life puts forth its "leaf" of healing power. The saints of the most high will come from the east, the west, the north, the south and be seated with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in that blest abode. Yea, his loved ones will all meet on the glory-crowned plain of Eden restored; the angels too, the bright messengers of his presence, will be there to join in anthems of praise for immortality and eternal life. "Then the sacred throng, that have come up through great tribulation and washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb, will swell the anthem louder still. No more shall earth's tyrants sway the scepter of oppression over them; no more shall the throbbing heart of humanity ache beneath oppression's unholy law, for "all the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before thee."—Psa. xxii. 27, 28. Truly, this is the age of ages, and Jesus, the Son, the rightful heir, receives the diadem of royalty. Thus we see the triumph of God. The golden head of Babylon is no more. The silver breast of Medo-Persia is in the past, and the brazen Greece no longer leads her victorious armies to the field of slaughter, and Rome, poor Rome, slumbers beneath her seven hills. The new earth shines forth in majestic beauty, and the nations of the earth learn that the God of the Bible is the God of Love.

Courage, pilgrim, let the burden
That is pressing on thy heart
Yield to his divine assurance,
Bid the weight of care depart.
Look above; the same forever
Is thy Maker, faithful, true,
And to day (his love unchanging),
As before, doth care for you.
Yet a little longer, pilgrim,
Struggle on, and there is rest;
Freed from temptation's power,
Thou shalt be supremely blest.
'Tis a warfare fierce and long
Till this mortal life is done,
Yet press on a little longer,
And the victory will be won.

IS THE IDENTITY LOST IN DEATH?

A CORRESPONDENT writes me: "I heard a sermon on the immortality of the soul, in which the preacher dwelt for some time on the point, If men die as a whole, then their identity would be lost; therefore, the righteous would have to be re-created." He asks if I cannot "give a condensed note of" my "views on that point."

I can. Such preachers "do err, not knowing the Scriptures, nor the power of God." If David could say, "I am fearfully and wonderfully made, . . . Thine eyes did see my substance, yet being imperfect: and in thy book all my members were written, which in continuance"—yomeem, days—"were fashioned, when as yet there was none of them."—Psa. cxxxix. 14-16. Surely a Christian may say, Though men die as a whole, their identity would not "be lost": the identity is just as safe and secure in God's hands after death—if he pleases to preserve it—as before we came into life at first. Calling it a re-creation does not frighten me; nor does the cry of "absurd" or "impossible"; for I have learned "what God has promised he is able also to perform"; and he needs no scholastic dabbblers, with their inventions of worldly wisdom, to help him bring "again into existence" (Septuagint of Job xiv. 14.) those who "shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, even the resurrection from the dead."—Luke xx. 35. It is really sickening to hear men who profess to believe God is infinite in wisdom and power talk as if they knew what he cannot do. They seem to think they must help him out of difficulty by furnishing a soul of some sort that does not or cannot die; so that infinite knowledge and power need not be overtaken to preserve the "identity." Alas! by worldly wisdom men never did and never will find out God. God has pledged himself to raise "the dead," and that is enough. If they were not "dead as a whole," then "as a whole" they need no resurrection and cannot have one. The identity of the righteous is that of members of Christ's body, and their life is hid in him, and when Christ, who is their life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory. See Col. iii. 3, 4.

As to men who have died without the knowledge of "the only true God and Jesus Christ," whom "God sent into the world, not to destroy men's lives, but to save them"—(see Luke ix. 56 and John xvii. 2, 3), such will also be subjects of the resurrection from the dead, though not at the same time with such as "cannot die any more"; but their identity will be preserved, and in God's "due time" they will "come again into existence" and be taught the truth; for "God our Saviour will have all men to be saved" from death, "and to come unto the knowledge of the truth" (1 Tim. ii. 3, 4); and God has "given Christ power over all flesh" for this purpose, that all men may be brought into perfect knowledge of God's love for the world; so great that he gave his Son for their redemption, as says the apostle, "For, as by the offence of one (Adam) judgment came upon all men to condemnation (to death), even so by the righteousness of one (Christ, the second Adam) the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life."—Rom. v. 18.

"Christ has abolished (annulled, abrogated) death" (2 Tim. 1-10); so that none of the race can be held in that death which came by Adam; it is to be utterly destroyed. Without this a vast majority of the human race would utterly perish without ever having had an opportunity to secure the benefits contemplated in God's plan in creation and redemption. But every "creature shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption," to which they were "made subject, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected them in hope."—Rom. viii. 20, 21.

There is hope for the whole race of living again from the dead in some of "the ages to come"; and they will not rise in utter despair, as some teach. No; there is no resurrection but of mercy and good-will to men, that each one, being "delivered from the bondage of corruption" brought on all through the offence of Adam, shall have a full and perfect opportunity to secure an endless life through Jesus Christ. If, then, they "sin wilfully," by rejecting him as their Redeemer and Lord, their utter and hopeless ruin follows; because there is "no other sacrifice for sin."—Heb. x. Their identity was restored, but now "ceases forever."—Psalms xlix. 8. Ed.

THE TRUE VINE AND ITS BRANCHES.

WHAT a beautiful symbol of the connection between Christ and true believers we have in the parable of the vine.—John xv. Jesus said, "I am the true vine." In the 5th verse, "I am the vine, and ye are the branches." Do we realize the full import of these words? Speaking of himself as "the true vine" indicates that there are others which are wild. Now, we know that by nature we are not branches of this true vine; we are branches of a wild one. In other words, we are branches or members of the family of Adam, which, by departing from the restraining influences of God's holy law, and running into all kinds of sin, has become wild and unfruitful, or incapable of bringing forth any good fruit in its present state. How, then, do we become branches of the true vine? In Romans, chap. xi., the apostle speaks of two olive trees, one which is good, and one which is wild by nature, and shows that branches of the wild olive are "grafted" into the good tree. In the grafting process the husbandman takes branches of the same kind as the tree, although one is wild and the other is not. We, as branches, are of the same kind, in being of flesh and blood, as was Christ.

Let us look at the process. In severing the branches from their natural stem, the pruning knife is required, and where the knife is used it indicates pain, sharp cutting pain. Who among us has not experienced this, in being severed by the great Husbandman, Jehovah, from all that was formerly dear to us? Old hopes, old associations have had to be given up, and all that was natural to us, before we were in a fit state to be grafted into Christ. And all this is a sharp cutting process, which cuts to the heart, but yet it is something which must be done, and must be borne, before we can be united to that vine which is contrary to nature. But the husbandman does not cut and wound more than is necessary; he is careful not to hurt and wound the branch in a manner which would damage it in the future and prevent its bearing fruit. So it is with our heavenly Father. He does not cut and wound in such a manner as that those wounds shall remain open and let out the spiritual life from the branches, after being united to Christ.

Again, in grafting into a vine, the husbandman must cut open its side, and so wound that, or there can be no union between them; and this again gives pain and suffering, although not more than is necessary, but for all that it is very acute. In wounding or cutting the side of the vine, it allows the sap or the blood to flow; but the husbandman will insert the branch, and bind up the wound as soon as possible, so that the sap may flow into the inserted branch instead of escaping. So with Christ, there could have been no union with him for us had he not been wounded. He was wounded for our transgression, and by his stripes we are healed. The wounding of Christ and bruising him for our iniquities, caused agony most intense. He was thrust through the side with a spear, and the blood came out, and it is only in consequence of his blood being shed that we can be brought into union with him, but after three days he was healed of his wound, so that his branches might be partakers of his life-giving power. And as with the branch of the vine, so with the true believer. When old associations and hopes and friendships have been cast off, the mind is not left an empty void, but new hopes and friendships with higher aspirations come in, which so far exceed the old that the sorrow and pain are but momentary, and are lost in the contemplation of what then lies before him. The believer can then see that the past was a barren and unfruitful life; but now, drawing his life and strength and vigor from Christ, so long as he abides in him, the future will not be unfruitful, but will be a joy to himself and a blessing to others, as the fruit-bearing branch which has become united to a good tree.

But there is another side to this figure which must not be overlooked. It is only by abiding in the good tree that the branch can bear good fruit, and it is only by abiding in Christ that the believer can bring forth fruit.

"If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered; and men gather them, and cast them into the fire, and they are burned." How true is this, that if the believer does not daily draw strength and nourishment from the wholesome words of the Lord Jesus, he becomes a barren and unfruitful branch. And let these words sound in our ears: "Every branch in me that beareth not fruit, he taketh away." But on the contrary: "Every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit." As it is with the branches of a vine, all do not bear the same quantity of fruit; so it is with the believers in Christ. And where is the branch that can say it has brought forth as much fruit as possible? Nowhere. But we do see that some bear more than others. So, then, the weaker ones may see that there is a higher standard to which they have not yet attained, and those that bring forth more fruit may see that purging is necessary that they may bring forth still more. Then let none complain when they are being purged, but see to it that the purifying process does not produce spiritual death in their case, but greater vigor, and make them more Christlike and more fruitful than before; for Christ himself has said, "Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit." Let none be discouraged because their place is not at the top of the vine, for all branches of the vine cannot occupy the most prominent place; but some of those which are in a modest position bear more fruit than some which are more conspicuous.

Let everyone remember that becoming branches of the true vine does not ensure ever remaining there. As the branches may be exposed to wind and storm, they may, by having grown into a somewhat isolated position, and having to depend to some extent on their own strength, succumb to the fury of the storm, and be broken off. So may we, if we do not keep close by the stem to which we are united, and rely upon that for strength and shelter, we may succumb to the storms of life, and eventually be broken off as unfruitful branches. Let us always remember that our becoming grafted into the true vine cost too much pain and sorrow on our part, and too much suffering on the part of our Saviour, to lightly sever such a hallowed connection. But let us hold fast to the word of life, the only source of strength, and by the strength which we derive from it, endeavor to bring forth more and more fruit, which shall redound to the glory and honor of our heavenly Father. —M. WHEELER, in the London Messenger.

THE FUTURE OF GREECE.

BY H. BRITTAIN.

IN this vision of the he-goat the king of Grecia, long before his existence, has his great power described—his sudden death—and the uprising of four kingdoms as a consequence in the place of his one kingdom. Then follows a description of a little horn, or king of fierce countenance, in the latter time of their kingdom, or, as stated in the 17th and 19th verses, at the time of the end; for the vision is to or at the time of the end. Is there any proof that the time of the end has met with any fulfilment in the history of the past?

The he-goat being the king of Grecia, and the four horns four kingdoms which sprang up in his stead, it follows that the territory belonging to the one king and then to the four kingdoms is also the same territory from which the little horn or king is to come out; or this king will spring out of the territory which was enclosed within the limits of the ancient Grecian empire.

If the visions of the image, the ten-horned fourth beast and the ram and he-goat, be carefully studied and compared, the following conclusion I think will be obtained.

The little horn will spring out of that portion of the Roman empire previously possessed by the four kingdoms which sprang out of the ancient Grecian empire. As the end approaches, those mighty forces which have affected empires and races so enduringly will again lift themselves up in their ancient seats for a final effort to obtain the supremacy of the human race. The roots of commerce, learning and skill lie in the East, and in the East must they be laid bare. What so likely then, as one of the first signs, as that Greece should again claim to be heard among the nations; to be reinstated in somewhat of its old position? The elements are already in existence—a kingdom, religion and desire among its present people for enlargement. Are not Greek villages scattered now among the Turkish territory? The hour will soon be, and then the man will appear.

The prophet Zechariah (chap. ix. 13-16) thus speaks to us: "When I have bent Judah for me, filled the bow with Ephraim, and raised up thy sons, O Zion, against thy sons, O Greece, and made thee as the sword of a mighty man, and the Lord shall be seen over them and His arrow shall go forth as the lightning; the Lord of hosts shall defend them; and the Lord their God shall save them in that day as the stock of His people; for they shall be as the stones of a crown, lifted up, as an ensign upon His land."

The name Greece (or Javan) will be found in Isaiah lxvi. 19; Ezek. xxvii. 13-19; Dan. viii. 21, x. 20, xi. 2, and is applied to the country known as Greece. And we find, in this ninth chapter of Zechariah, "sons of Zion" arrayed against "sons of Greece"; the Lord of hosts interfering as of old. His right hand and His marvelous arm gaining for His people the victory.

I know of no evidence that can be produced that will prove fulfilment of this prophecy. If not, what a future, near also it may be, awaits Greece! Arrayed in opposition to Jehovah! Note that, as Ephraim and Zion and Judah are joined together in 13th verse, so also, in 9th and 10th verses, Zion, Jerusalem and Ephraim are in unison. The same who came riding in lowly state into Jerusalem, as described in the 9th verse, is the same who, in the 10th verse, is to speak peace unto the heathen; and His dominion—from sea to sea and from the river to the ends of the earth. From the time He rode into Jerusalem to the time when chariot and horse disappear from Ephraim and Jerusalem, and peace is established by His power and will, Judah and Ephraim are scattered among the nations. As their punishment has been of a double character, so their restoration will be of a double character. (Compare Jeremiah xvi. 18 with Isaiah lxi. 7.)

The declaration, it will be perceived, runs thus: "Even to-day do I declare I will render double unto thee;" the term "to-day" carrying with it comfort to all who wait for the consolation of Israel. The promise given during the first restoration from the Babylonish captivity carries the understanding heart forward to the great restoration of ALL ISRAEL to the service of the living God, the present promise united with the future hope. But when shall this be? "When I have bent Judah for me, filled the bow with Ephraim, and raised up thy sons, O Zion, against thy sons, O Greece." But this "when" is still future.

The prophet Isaiah (lxvi. 19) says, after mentioning the gathering of all nations and tongues together: "I will send those that escape of them unto the nations, to Tarshish.

Pul, and Lud, that draw the bow, to Tubal and Javan." But "Javan" is the same Hebrew word rendered "Greece" elsewhere, and is evidently in this passage classed with those nations who are arrayed against the Lord. Javan may be written Ivan or Yvan. The founder of the Russian power was Ivan of Moscow. The head of the Russian power is the head of the Greek Church. But the Russian is the Meshech or Muscovite or Moscow power mentioned by Ezekiel (chap. xxxviii). Serious thoughts are caused by these combinations of truth. So also is Togarmah (Turkey) by the same prophet (Ezek. xxxviii). Russia, Turkey and Greece, as well as others, all united at the last! History repeats itself. Men have tried to do without God in times past, but failed. As it was, so it will be.

THE ALABASTER BOX OF OINTMENT.

"And being in Bethany in the house of Simon the leper, as he sat at meat, there came a woman having an alabaster box of ointment of spikenard very precious; and she brake the box, and poured it on his head. And there were some that had indignation within themselves, and said, Why was this waste of the ointment made? For it might have been sold for more than three hundred pence, and have been given to the poor. And they murmured against her. And Jesus said, Let her alone; why trouble ye her? she hath wrought a good work on me. For ye have the poor with you always, and whensoever ye will ye may do them good: but me ye have not always. She hath done what she could: she is come aforehand to anoint my body to the burying. Verily I say unto you, Whosoever this gospel shall be preached throughout the whole world, this also that she hath done shall be spoken of for a memorial of her."—Mark xiv. 3-9. Read also Matthew xxvi. 6-13.

THERE were at least two, some think three, occasions when women showed their love to our Lord in the manner related here. It is not my intention at present, however, to enter on the consideration of such points.

There are three parties in the description before us who claim our attention—Jesus, the woman, and those who were indignant at her prodigality.

First: Jesus, the guest of a man named Simon the leper—no doubt cured of his leprosy, probably by Jesus himself.

Second: A woman enters the room while the company sat at meat, having an alabaster box of very precious ointment in her hand, and she breaks the box open and pours the ointment on the head of Jesus. It is no uncommon thing in the East for a person to enter a house uninvited, during meals, take a seat apart from the table, and even join in the conversation. This woman does not seem to have spoken a word, but, silently coming up behind the Lord while he reclined at table, she poured the costly ointment on his head.

Third: Some of the company—Matt. xxvi. 8 tells us they were disciples of Jesus—were indignant at the woman's profuseness, "and said, Why was this waste of the ointment made? For it might have been sold for more than three hundred pence (£9 7s. 6d.) and given to the poor."

We should, in judging of the complaint, remember that the woman might have used the ointment for her own adornment; and probably had she done so they would have found no fault with her, but, on the contrary, might have defended her action on the ground that she had a right to do what she liked with her own, and that it was nobody's business, etc. Instances of such accusations and defense sometimes happen in our day. Very mindful of the poor, when they see money spent for the Lord's sake, the same parties are lavish of expenditure in the adornment of their own persons with glittering ornaments and costly attire. The Lord, however, did not find fault with the woman; but commended her action, and predicted for her a world-wide fame. "Verily I say unto you, Whosoever this gospel shall be preached throughout the whole world, this also that she hath done shall be spoken of for a memorial of her."

Yet Jesus cared much for the poor. While he defended the woman for her generous action to himself, he reminded the fault-finders that they had ample opportunities of helping the poor, "You have the poor with you always, and whensoever you will ye may do them good." He preached the gospel to the poor, and exhorted that the guests at their feasts should be "the poor, the maimed, the lame and the blind"—those who are ill able to provide feasts for themselves or return the invitations. Can the absence of this class from our "parties" be pleasing to the Lord?

The Lord cared far more for the poor than they who found fault with the woman. Yet he defended her action in anointing his head with the costly oil. He knew her heart—he appreciated the motive. She had done it for the Master's glory.

Do we never feel toward the Lord as this woman did? It was not food she gave, nor water to refresh his weary feet, nor clothing to protect him from the winter's cold, but costly ointment to adorn his head. She did it for the Master's glory! But what can we do for him who is seated "higher than the heavens"? We can "tell of his mighty love—mighty to save." The world knows him not; and many who do love him know not half what we know of the riches of his glory. The character of God our Father is grossly misunderstood and misrepresented; so also is that of his Son, our Lord. We can honor the Lord by telling what holy prophets and apostles have spoken of him. We can do so by the press and living voice. All cannot write or speak for the public eye and ear; but some can do this, and the rest can help them with encouraging sympathy and prayer and willing contributions to pay necessary expense.

We may seek to disseminate the gospel, as we understand it, from various motives.

First: To increase the number of our associates. This is indeed very desirable to all of us; for there are few encouragements that have a more cheering effect than to be associated with a goodly company of kindred spirits and to see others continually joining our ranks. Few can be more susceptible of this influence than the writer of these lines. Yet this motive, however strong and warrantable, is different from that of acting "for the Master's glory." It is, indeed, acting for our own glory, and, in character, essentially the same as that which moves to action the various political and ecclesiastical parties around us; and it is astonishing to witness the amount of self-sacrifice that men are constantly making for the increase and strength of their party or denomination. It is possible for us to be zealous in publishing the doctrines of Christ and his apostles through such a motive without thinking of the honor of our Lord.

Second: Again, we may be moved to disseminate the gospel of Christ that sinners may be saved. This is a truly right motive, because in harmony with that which moved Jehovah to send his only begotten Son into the world. Our Lord himself declared that he came to seek and to save the lost. The Apostle Paul declares his intense anxiety that "by any means he might save some." Truly, the consideration that the great mass of the population of our country is on the broad way that leads to destruction may well stir us up to call their attention to the means of escape. Still we may do so out of pure pity for the sinner, without any view to the Master's glory.

Third: But in addition to these motives we may, and we ought to make known the truth as it is in Jesus for the honor of his name. This is the highest motive we possibly can have, and it is powerful at all times. Keeping this out of sight, we are apt to become discouraged and to cease from effort to bear witness for God and his Son. The response is so poor; our message is not listened to, or, if heard, is treated as an idle tale. We are apt to feel our efforts are of no use; men seem bent on destruction, and we feel often inclined to let them alone. With the higher motive before our minds, we would never grow faint; whether men will hear or forbear, we would not cease to speak of the goodness and mercy of God in Christ Jesus. And knowing that his truth is perverted, and his purposes regarding our race misunderstood, and loving him who first loved us, let us bear witness for him continually, and by all means, till he appear in his glory, and, in his own person, vindicate and claim the honor of his name.—W. LAING, in The Messenger.

LETTERS AND EXTRACTS.

FROM GEORGE L. HART.

BRO. STORRS: I have been seeking to know more of the truth; and, as the Pyramid was being considered, I became interested in those measurements commencing at the exodus of Israel from Egypt. A very remarkable connection, allowing the Pyramid inches to be correct, is found in Josephus. He gives us 1130 years from the building of the temple to its destruction in A.D. 70 by Titus. Eleven hundred and thirty years and odd months, which would carry us into A.D. From the 1131 years deduct 70, and we have 1061 years to the birth of the Saviour. In 1 Kings vi. 1 we find in the 480th year after they came out from the land of Egypt Solomon began the foundations of the temple; add the year of the exode and we have 481 years, which, added to 1061, give us exactly 1542 years to the birth of Christ, which is the duration of the Mosaic dispensation according to the Pyramid measurement of inches for years. A careful examination of Bible history shows that Josephus is correct for the 1130 years of the time, at least.

Blessed be the Lord who so guideth us into light! Amidst the shades of surrounding skepticism we have a witness. Are we not just being tried to test our faithfulness? have not our disappointments purified and made white the waiting Bride—separating the truth from error, until we begin to apprehend? Yes; only take hold of the glorious plan of the mystery hidden to the lost of Israel, broken and yet to be healed when from "Zion, the perfection of beauty," the "Deliverer shall come and turn ungodliness from Jacob." It is too cruel, for such as have the means to do, that the light of the EXAMINER should become obscured by lack of funds; but the cry of the sectarian adventists is now, above all others, heard warning against Bro. Storrs and his magazine. We know a little of that spirit that characterized many in the endeavor to silence our aged brother; but we can see that wilful ignorance is vice, and that those who suppose they are rich may be poor and naked when the bridal morn shall come. How many talk of the coming of Jesus who show no fruit of such a faith—just as uncharitable as ever; the time even set just far enough away so that excuse to continue in worldliness is apparent? We can see how that excuse may exist if darkness has not been dispelled by truth's pure light—the Word of God. It is remarkable how some will trample over and destroy the Prophetic word, and the "conditional prophecy," as they call it, is superabundant. Aye, nearly all but that, to Gentile believers, now is vain. But none are so blind as those that will not see. The Bridegroom is coming; surely he is at the door. Are we looking up? We have an illustration of this figure in the story of one lost in the forests, where so many cross-paths had been worn that it seemed impossible to tell which was right by the ground track; but when the road was first cut through the trees were cut away, so that the light from above appeared, and a road in the sky appeared by which the traveler was able to continue. So is the prophetic word sure until the day-dawn and the phosphor of morning appears. The road was cut long ago, but the track below has had too many wild beasts treading upon it to have the earthly tradition plain; but the heavenly, by the Spirit, is yet remaining. Job and Isaiah saw the holy avenue. No vulture's eye, though it may be very sharp to see dead carcasses, could see the glory; no ravenous beast to watch along to prey upon the helpless, as priest-craft has ever done. Itself must be supported if the innocent die! But "light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart."

Who cannot see that the cloud, like the hand, is enlarging yonder? Eastern horizon lights with the prophetic glow; the bundles of tares in the land of Jacob are being gathered; the kingdom must be cleansed and the armies that are gathering will ere long do all His will: the tribes are being raised up, "Thy destroyers and they that made thee waste shall go forth of thee. Lift up thine eyes round about; behold all these gather themselves and come to thee! As I live, saith the Lord, thou shalt clothe thee with them all as an ornament and bind them on thee as a bride doeth. For thy waste and desolate places and the land of thy destruction shall be too narrow by reason of the inhabitants, and they that swallowed thee up shall be far away."—Isa. xlix. The oath of God is here to perform. No "conditional prophecy," but the Gentiles shall "bring the preserved of Israel to their own border." I expect to be there with the elect by this ordained method, even if skeptics laugh; even "Adventists." The "going-to-heaven" theory, we believe, is soon to be ventilated, and the heathen theory of a "melted globe," and many of the monstrous ideas so sensual that it may at once be seen, by the light of truth, as error, and man will, ere long, be known as he is; the sins of a lifetime appear in all but those that have been washed in the blood of the Lamb. We must have our mind so pure that we are ready at all times to have a world gaze upon every wish and will. Yes, and Christ also; and if we would think how every thought is manifest even now, how careful we should be! "Blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked and they see his shame." Earth may shake with the whirlwind of the angry nations; yet, as David said, "Say to the heathen, The Lord reigneth; the earth shall be established that it shall not be moved."

Silently earth now awaiteth the closing drama of her kings:

From Europa's mountain summit hear the voice of Judah's angel rings,

"Stop those four destroying angels; hold the tempest of those wings!"

See at the altar, where Jew and Christian martyrs cried,
The peer of England's lords standing; will his will be now denied?

Smoking incense is ascending; faith of Israel long;
Prayers of saints, of all ages, rise before the golden throne.

See the fire to earth descending, where the Papal hierarch reigned;

Deliverance to Judah's captives; Christian martyrs cry,
"Amen!"

Fire of everlasting ages cleansing earth from all sin;
Ceasing not its burning until Justice reigns supreme.
Desolate, despised Zion; Canaanites within thee stand—
Fearfulness will soon surprise them; they shall not see the land:

They despise thee, in thy watching, seeking only gain—
Oppression's hand, sectarian bribery looking bold in sins;

Hide behind the ragged boulders when the strife begins.
But the ark of rest and comfort bearing thee above the flood,

Even where the Master sitteth, giving manna—Life of God!

Brethren, the EXAMINER will be continued if we all do our duty. Give up all non-essentials for the truth. "The Judge standeth at the door."

Yours, in truth and Christian love,

GEORGE L. HART.

East Bridgeport, Conn, July, 1878.

J. S. HATCH, Crawfordsville, Ind., writes: I am very poor in this world's goods, but am rich in faith. I am unable to pay for my papers, as I wish I was. I was very happy in reading your article on "Election"; it opened to my mind the subject in a new light, and I have preached it in several places and it gives general satisfaction. It is stripped of all that hateful aspect as presented by the old Calvinistic doctrine; and, in the words of John, "God is love." That could not be true if the old theory is true. I returned from Kentucky in June; was in that State forty-two days; had some good meetings. I am very thankful for the EXAMINER and for your sending it so long. Yours, in love of truth.

D. PARMELEE, Washington Territory, July 15, writes: I feel that the BIBLE EXAMINER ought to be better sustained. I would not forget your long labor of love in battling for the truth. I rejoiced much in reading the last EXAMINER. I seemed to have a better understanding of what was written,—more joyful in hope, more familiar with our Father in heaven and the great pleasure He has in blessing the world. Yours, in the blessed hope.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.

Bro. Parmelee is 70 years old, or more, I think. He has been for the last thirty years one of my best friends, and has aided me in years past in my darkest days financially, and his heart and hands are still open. He has been for several years far away on the Pacific coast. May the Lord preserve him from all evil in these times of trouble!

AGNES R. GODDARD, Illinois, writes: I cannot well do without the BIBLE EXAMINER, as there is not one person in the place where I live that holds the ages-to-come views. I belong to the Methodist Episcopal Church, but I have no sectarianism in my heart; therefore I am considered fanatic or insane. Yours, in hope of the coming of the Lord Jesus and the restitution of all things, or the ages upon ages of glory and of life purchased by our Redeemer's blood.

JOHN B. MCINTYRE, Western New York, writes: Through the generosity of a friend I have been a reader of your EXAMINER for a year or more. It has opened up many new ideas to me, and led me to ask, "Have all been going astray, and are all the Churches teaching false doctrine?" It would seem so; for the more I have examined the doctrine of the immortality of the soul the more I am convinced it is not according to the Scriptures. You have thrown much light on it in the state of the dead, and cleared up many passages which were dark to me before. I find that in the eyes of orthodoxy one who does not believe in the immortality of the soul is considered worse than a heathen. Please send me the EXAMINER; I wish the articles on the state of the dead entire.

LUCY E. WATSON, writing from Pittsfield, N. H., says: My mother prizes the EXAMINER next to her Bible; and my sister would not part with it at all. They love to read and compare Scripture with Scripture. I am more interested in it than any other periodical, for it shows God to be a God of love and justice. I am glad the Lord showed me light on his Word; for it does not seem to me that with my nature I could love a being that I thought would torment me eternally. If I served such a being it would be a slavish fear; but when I saw that He loved me and gave his Son to die for my salvation, my heart was won, and, with the apostle, I feel that the love of God constraineth me, for truly "I love Him because He first loved me." Oh, what a wonderful plan is that of redemption! With the poet I can say, "Wonderful Saviour!" And the more we know of Him the better we shall love him and the more faithfully we shall serve Him. It is my prayer that I may keep all of His commands; for when the faithful of every age and clime are gathered, I do want to be found with those that have clean hands and a pure heart. Pray for me that I may be all ready to hail the Master when He comes.

FROM ELDER N. H. PALMER.

BRO. STORRS: Vol. XXII. of the EXAMINER is nearly completed, and as this may be the last I shall write till the time shall expire, permit me to say it is always full of interest, energy and point, and unflaggingly maintains its advanced position. Among the agencies that are now so terribly shaking the elements of the religious world it occupies no inconsiderable part; and when it will have ceased to stir it may be that, as the wintry forces have prepared the earth for fruitfulness, that it may crown the year with gladness, so the present agitation may be succeeded by the spring-time of a new moral world, whose sun shall no more go down, and where none shall say, "I am sick!" Shall I be there? This is my expectation and my desire. Then I may be permitted personally to greet you and to grasp the kind hand that has ministered to my necessities, and that has directed and supported me amid the darkness and afflictions of this life. But ere this bliss is ours we must pass our change. God has this season blessed me with an increase of strength, and I have been able to assist my children in their crop. My wife has been very feeble this season. May God continue to bless you and yours, and as your days so may your strength be!

Your much obliged brother in Christ.

Dalton, Ga., July 6, 1878.

ELDER J. LEWIS, Grafton, Ill., writes, June 10th: This day is my 78th birthday. I never was more thankful and happy than now in hope of living to see the Redeemer come to reign on David's throne. Praise the Lord for the light that is shining in the sure Word of prophecy. I know not how to express my gratitude to our Father in heaven for the BIBLE EXAMINER. May it and its Editor live till the LIFE-GIVER comes!

K. S. PETTIBONE, Grand Rapids, Mich., writes: Take good care of thyself a little longer. Time is not far distant when the EXAMINER will not be needed in its present form. Until then we cannot very well do without it. Great Britain taking possession of Cyprus is going to dry up the Euphrates and make way for "the Kings of the East." The treading down of Jerusalem is about to be brought to the ending. Then, "when we see all these things in the past, look up, for your redemption draweth nigh." Oh, happy day! Christ is coming to reign and redeem all the Father gave him.

L. J. WILCOX, Mass., writes: Feeling and knowing that you have the truth, I send you this ($—), hoping it will help a little to spread the glorious truth which is so soon to be realized by the righteous.

Some men are zealous for truth, provided it be truth brought to light by themselves.

Each part of our nature should be duly controlled, and kept within its own proper province; and the whole "brought into subjection to Christ," and dedicated to Him. But there is no real Christian humility—though there be debasement—in renouncing the exercise of human reason, to follow the dictates of human feeling. The Apostle's precept is, "in malice be ye children, but in understanding be men."

EDITORIAL NOTICES.

SPECIAL.—To subscribers of two or more years' standing, who have paid up to the end of this volume, the EXAMINER will be continued, unless they inform me immediately that they wish a discontinuance.

To subscribers who have taken only the volume now closed the EXAMINER will not be continued, unless they give notice by a remittance, or otherwise, of their desire to continue.

Single subscribers who have paid only one dollar for the volume now closed will no longer receive the EXAMINER unless they remit two dollars; in which case they shall have the next volume without further charge.

Subscribers who have not paid anything on this volume shall have their past indebtedness cancelled and receive the next volume if they remit three dollars soon.

Subscribers who have taken the EXAMINER in "Clubs" should renew immediately if they wish to continue it in that manner.

TO THOSE WHO RECEIVE THE EXAMINER GRATIS.—It has been a pleasure to send this magazine gratis to poor friends who are not able to pay anything. I am wholly dependent upon others for the means to supply such; and with most of them I am unacquainted personally. If any of them desire the EXAMINER continued, let them inform me and state their circumstances, otherwise it may be sent no more. The greatest economy is necessary to sustain this magazine.

Any paying subscriber who has failed to receive a number of this volume shall have it supplied if I am informed soon.

Any person wishing either volume of the EXAMINER in sheets—that is, unbound—shall have it on the receipt of one dollar. The volumes that I can supply are 18, 19, 20, 21 and 22; only a few, however, of volume 20.

BOUND VOLUMES.—The BIBLE EXAMINER bound can now be furnished at $2 per volume in neat, plain binding; in morocco, with gilt edges, $3.25. Volumes 18, 19, 20, 21 and 22 can be had of me at the prices named per volume.

REMITTANCES.—In these times of theft and robbery no one should venture money by mail except by a "Postal Money Order," if you can get one. If that cannot be done have your letter "Registered" at the office where mailed. Even then its safety depends on the honesty of the officials who take charge of the letter. It is, perhaps, just as safe to send small sums in a letter, carefully sealed and properly directed, without registering as with.

The next best thing to a "Postal Money Order" in remitting money is a Draft on some Banking House in New York City, payable to me or my order. GEO. STORRS.

The Bible Examiner is a Monthly Magazine. Terms, $2.00 per year, in advance.

Subscribers' Names should be written very plain. Do not neglect this. It is utterly impossible sometimes to decipher names, and mistakes must occur in consequence. As to their Address, give simply the name of the Post-office and State.

Let all Correspondents be careful to address me as follows:

GEO. STORRS,
72 Hicks Street,
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

All "Postal Money Orders" sent me should be drawn on Brooklyn, N. Y.

To Clubs the BIBLE EXAMINER will be supplied on the followings terms:

Two copies, to one address,	$3.
Four " " "	5.
Ten " " "	10.

The ten may be divided and sent to the address of two persons, if desired. The prices fixed above are expected to be paid in advance and the money sent at the risk of the subscribers.

VOL. XXII.

NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER, 1878.

No. 12.

THE BIBLE EXAMINER AND ITS EDITOR.

THIS periodical was commenced in 1842. Geo. Storrs had been a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church from 1825 to 1840, and filled some of the first appointments in the Conference of which he was a member, but withdrew from said Church in 1840, because his liberty to teach and labor according to his convictions of truth could not be allowed in his relation to that Church.

From 1840 to the present time he has never been connected with any humanly organized body called a "Church," because he would not be trammelled in his search for truth. For five years he published occasionally the BIBLE EXAMINER till 1847; then it became a regular monthly, with an interval of two and a half years, till the fall of 1863, when its influence had been so extensive that its friends called for a weekly paper, and invited Geo. Storrs to become its Editor. To comply with this request he suspended the EXAMINER, and for eight years acted as Editor of the weekly. At the end of that time, or in 1871, he had advanced doctrinally to his present position in regard to the purposes of God respecting the human race. Those called "The Board of Managers" of the weekly paper refused to allow him to publish his advanced views in their periodical; as a consequence, Mr. Storrs withdrew altogether from their service and connection, and revived the BIBLE EXAMINER in September, 1871.

In the No. for October, or No. 2 of Vol. XVI., the following short article appeared :

"WHAT THEY SAY. —It is said, 'The Board of Managers should have control of the Editor; for, what if the Editor should become a Universalist?' To this we simply reply, What if the Board of Managers should all, or a majority, 'become Universalists,' or something worse? which is quite as likely as the other; at any rate, it is not impossible. But the plea is a sectarian one. It amounts to just this: 'Our Editor must publish what we now believe and be sure to give us no advanced ideas; thus contravening the words of Jesus: 'Every scribe instructed into the kingdom of heaven is like a householder, which bringeth forth out of his treasures things new and old.'—Matt. xiii. 52.

"He cannot sustain the BIBLE EXAMINER: he has no funds.' So say some of our late associates. Well, we know that as truly as they do; but we have ventured on the Lord in times past, when we 'had no funds,' and have found that the 'gold and silver are the Lord's.'

"We confess ourself a poor man, so far as personal funds are concerned; but we adopt the language of Paul: 'As sorrowful, yet always rejoicing; as poor, yet making many rich; as having nothing, and yet possessing all things.' We have a 'Father' who has the 'funds' and knows how to use them. We shall ask him to give us just as much as he sees best for us and his cause, and he will do it."

Thus the Editor testified his belief that, "It is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in man: it is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in princes."—Psa. cxviii. 8, 9. Nor has he been disappointed. Though he revived this magazine without any financial means of his own, our covenant God has opened the way for its continuance for the past seven years, nor suffered the work to cease for lack of financial aid. For this the Editor gives thanks to our Heavenly Father, and to such as have had it put into their hearts to help on the work, which he has never doubted he was called of God to do. Blessed be his name forever! Though the cloud sometimes looked dark, the light has broken through. "Praise ye the Lord." The names of the helpers might be given; but it is certain they have not helped "to be seen of men." Our Father in heaven will reward them "in due time."

With this number the EXAMINER closes Vol. XXII., or the seventh since its revival in 1871. All its friends will be rejoiced to know it is free from debt, except the debt of gratitude due to our covenant God and to such as have helped to bring about this result.

Vol. XXIII. will be commenced next month, and the Editor trusts will be sustained as the previous ones have been. Please respond to this announcement without delay.

THE JEW AND THE ANTICHRIST; OR, LORD BEACONSFIELD'S POLICY.

BEACONSFIELD is a Jew—formerly known as “Disraeli”—Prime Minister of England, and also a “novel” writer.

Much has been said of the policy of this British lord, who stands next to the Queen in the English Government. That he is a “schemer” no one need doubt; but I am only now to speak of his policy or “scheme” to unite three religious bodies, viz., the Romish, the Greek and the Anglican, in one body, making Jerusalem the seat of power for it. I need not go into the particulars of this scheme, so much has been published in both secular and religious periodicals on the subject; it is, briefly, to unite these nominal churches into one, with the Romish Pope for the first head, he to be succeeded by a Pope chosen from the Greek division, next from the Anglican, giving (the united body) Palestine into their hands to govern; all the European powers guaranteeing the security of that government. That would constitute the Papal government a “beast” in Scripture language and fulfil the prophecy of Rev. xvii. 17, which speaks of some rulers who will “agree, and give their kingdom unto the beast until the words of God shall be fulfilled.” This she beast would, when seated in Jerusalem, with the uncontrolled power over Palestine, be ruler over the kings who had given such power into her hands. But I design now only to show briefly how matters look to me if the scheme is carried out.

Lord Beaconsfield is said to be a “Christian.” It may be so; but his scheme does not look to me of that character; it rather savors the speedy advent of “The Antichrist,” which is yet to be developed. I said, months ago, it was my conviction that the Pope would yet have his seat in Jerusalem, and would claim to be the true Christ; and that the Jews would accept him as such and form a league with him; then the words of our Redeemer would have a fulfilment, viz.: “I am come in my Father’s name, and ye receive me not; if another shall come in his own name, HIM ye will receive.”—John v: 43.

This prophecy of the conduct of the Jews at a future period will have its fulfilment before the true Christ “appears in his glory”; and, as I believe, is about to take place. If Beaconsfield’s scheme succeeds, he will probably be the first to “bow the knee” to the Pope as their long-looked-for Messiah; and the apostle’s language will have a fulfilment, viz.: “Who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God or that is worshiped; so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God showing himself that he is God.” This Paul calls “That Man of sin” to “be revealed, the Son of perdition.”—2 Thess. ii: 3, 4.

The league to be formed with that power would be, probably, for seven years; but in the midst of that time would be broken and the Jews reap the bitter fruits of their unbelief in the true Christ, and of having accepted one who came “in his own name,” claiming the title of “God upon earth”; a title once before claimed by a Pope.

The Jews will return to Palestine; but it will be in unbelief of the truth of Jesus as the Christ, and they will accept “The Antichrist” and suffer terribly thereby; and when their sufferings are at their height the true Christ will appear; and then will the prophecy of Zechariah xii. be fulfilled; and God “will pour upon the house of David, and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the spirit of grace and of supplications; and they shall look upon ME whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn for HIM, as one mourneth for his only son, and shall be in bitterness for HIM, as one that is in bitterness for his first-born. In that day shall there be a great mourning in Jerusalem, as the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddon. And the land shall mourn, every family apart,” etc.—Vs. 10-14.

I have thrown out these suggestions for the consideration of the thoughtful ones who are watching for “the signs of the times,” and leave the subject for the present. EDITOR.

AN APPEAL FOR THE BIBLE EXAMINER.

BY ELDER S. W. BISHOP.

BRO. STORRS: As we near the close of another volume of our dear BIBLE EXAMINER I feel very thankful to our loving Father first, and to our dear brethren and sisters also, that through God’s preserving care, goodness and mercy, the great message of peace on earth and good-will to our race has been borne to the scattered ones another year. There are a few of our brethren, whose names I am not at liberty to call, who have put their shoulders to the wheel with a will; a few who, if they had withheld their support, unless God had raised up others to fill their places, must have doomed our dearly loved, and most highly-prized EXAMINER to cease its visits of comfort and cheer to those who read with hungry souls its words of glorious truth. I feel impressed to write what I know hundreds would say if they would speak their minds in this public manner, and say it perhaps much better than I can say it, but certainly not more sincerely from the heart, to our dear brethren who have stood up so nobly and so kindly by the side of our venerable Editor, your deeds of love, and your manifest regard for the good of the holy cause of truth in which we are all so earnestly and so lovingly engaged, are fully appreciated, and many hearts go out in thanksgiving that by giving your means the table has up to now been furnished with the rich repast that comes monthly to our homes; and while they thank God, and you, for the good things that have come to us all in the past through the medium of our monthly preacher, we all are earnestly praying that our Father will still move, by this mighty power, on your hearts and on the hearts of all, that your offerings may continue to be consecrated on the altar of God and truth till the dawning of the eternal ages, which dawning cannot be far away.

There are, to my mind, clear indications that stirring events will soon transpire in the land promised to Abraham and his Seed that will convince all who are walking in the light of truth that we shall very soon be "called to the marriage supper of the Lamb."

I am full of courage that our dear brother Storrs, who has devoted all the energies of a long life to pioneer work in the great cause of truth and right, will live to see the last great step forward vindicated, and that most fully, at the glorious appearing of Him who is "the way, the truth and the life." It is the most earnest desire of every reader of the EXAMINER that his life, health and strength may be so preserved that he will continue to minister in holy things through our medium of thought, as its Editor, till Jesus comes and calls us to enter on a more exalted, more glorious and a far more effectual work of holy ministration, that will continue all along the endless years of the eternal ages. Let us all, dear brethren and sisters, as far as we can, endeavor to lighten the burden that rests upon Bro. Storrs; lighten it by speaking words of cheer, words so kind as to make him feel and know that the warmest sympathies of all our people are fully his; and not in word only, but especially in deeds, tell him that we feel that his arduous labors for more than half a century have not been in vain in the Lord. Let every son and daughter of the Lord Almighty who reads this number of the EXAMINER, decide at once that, by the will of God, our magazine shall live and prosper till the last day of the present age.

If this decision is fully made in the fear of God, and with a reliance upon divine help, there will be no difficulty attending the effort to make it live and prosper.

There is not an individual that has read the EXAMINER since its last revival, but would feel sad indeed if they supposed that it would stop for lack of means. All we need is for every one of us to make this feeling practical by sending the means necessary to make the enterprise a success. Don't let your sympathies, or your money be turned into channels of doubtful disputations; but make all tell for the good of the one great cause in which we are engaged. When you send money send it in a way that it will go safe. Evil persons have stolen sums of money designed for the EXAMINER. In love to the household of God.

West Meriden, Conn., August, 1878.

TOO NARROW VIEWS.

SOME "age to come" friends seem to be almost as much alarmed at some of my views as are the opponents of a future age. What is the matter? They are quite willing the promise and oath of God should have its fulfillment in those "left of the nations" after the second advent; but seem quite unwilling that it should cover the millions on millions who have in the past lived and died in utter ignorance of God's mercy and love in providing a remedy for the perishing in the seed of the woman who is to bruise the serpent's head and destroy the works of the devil, i. e., all works of evil introduced by the one transgression of Adam; the main one of which is death. Death, which has come on unnumbered millions who have died in ignorance of God's remedy, these friends seem to suppose shuts them out from the benefit of the Edenic promise, confirmed by an oath to Abraham.

Saith Paul, "He must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet."—1 Cor. xv. 25. This must, of course, refer to his mediatorial reign, for "He shall sit and rule upon his throne and he shall be a Priest upon his throne."—Zech. vi. 13. To put "all enemies under his feet" certainly does not imply that all enemies will be destroyed in the sense of being killed or annihilated. There is one enemy that will be so destroyed, that is death; which Paul calls "the last enemy"; this destruction annuls the power of that death which came into the world by "one man's sin;" so that no descendant of Adam can now be held in that death except by a personal and wilful rejection of the Deliverer.

To put under a Conqueror's feet, was not to kill them. The expression is taken from the ancient custom of conquerors putting their feet on their vanquished and prostrate enemies, to signify their total defeat and subordination to the power of the victor, and is used by the apostle to represent a like subjection of all enemies to Christ and under his reign of conquest, which commences at his second advent. It is not an act of triumph over dead enemies, nor by killing living ones, but of subjection to his government and rule.

Are we to suppose that this subjection relates only to such as may be left alive after the second advent? Why then add, "The last enemy shall be destroyed—death?" All enemies are put under his feet—are subjected to him—but "The last enemy (introduced by Adam's sin) shall be destroyed," viz., "death." That destruction shows that the "Adamic death," as some call it, holds none of the race, of necessity; no death can hold any man in its dominion unless it is the result of his own wilful rejection of the LIFE-GIVER; and such rejection cannot take place till that LIFE-GIVER has first been proclaimed to him.

How does the idea of the subjection of the "left of the nations" after the advent make good the Edenic and Abrahamic promise, and the testimony of Paul that all enemies shall be put under his feet? Can it in truth be said that Christ has thus subjected them if all the myriads who have lived and died in ignorance of the Deliverer between the creation and "the age to come" are never to hear of him and death is never to be destroyed? Christ came "to destroy the works of the devil" (1 John iii. 8); and death is the main work of the evil which afflicts the race; and that Adamic "death shall be destroyed"; and it shall never be said that any man remains in death or is dead because Adam sinned. "The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father."—Ezek. xviii. 20. "The soul that sinneth it shall die."—Verse 4.

The perfect work of Christ, the second Adam, will be accomplished when he has bruised the serpent's head—eradicated all the evil from the race which the first Adam brought upon it, and every man, woman and child of that race has been placed in as good and favorable a condition as Adam was at creation; yea, they shall be placed in a more favorable condition, for "Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound."—Rom. v. 20.

The great DELIVERER will perform no such stinted work as Adventists and Life believers generally teach and preach; their views in these matters are only a modified form of the old heresy of eternal torment of all who do not now believe in the Christ, whether they have ever heard of him or not. Such views are quite too narrow for the heart filled with the knowledge and love of God. ED.

THE "NON-RESURRECTION" THEORY.

THAT theory is simply this, viz.: "No one of Adam's race will ever be revived from the dead except those who have formed a spiritual union with Christ, by faith, in this present life or prior to death." Of necessity this view excludes from a future life all adults who never heard of Christ, however unavoidable their ignorance, and all those who die in infancy or prior to a capacity to exercise faith.

Such is that theory. Is it true? I once thought it was, and know on what basis it stands. It is the result of a misunderstanding of the character and government of God, brought into life by the absurd idea, almost universal in Christendom, that the entire race will have a resurrection from the dead; but the unregenerate only to suffer a hopeless punishment with no possibility of mercy ever being extended to any of them. Such an idea was so revolting to the sense of an enlightened and kind heart, that many were led to another theory less so, and far more honorable to the CREATOR and his government. It gave relief from the horrible idea of a useless and hopeless torture of helpless creatures in the world to come.

The theory was sustained by many plausible explanations of texts of Scripture; but it never did and never can make a harmony of the Bible, as a whole, nor vindicate the government of a CREATOR, infinite in wisdom, knowledge, power, justice and love. To suppose such a BEING should of his own will bring into existence such a race as the human family, and profess love to them all so great as to give his only begotten Son for "the world," and that Son gave "himself a ransom for all"—"taste death for every man"—and yet only a very few ever to have any knowledge of these facts or any benefit of them because of unavoidable circumstances, over which most of the race never had any control, and were no more accountable for them than for their birth into this world: I say, to suppose such a system of administration could exist by the will of a CREATOR, possessed of the perfections above named, is a tax on credulity too great long to be submitted to; nor can it be accounted for that any should continue involved in such a theory, except the fact that men having moved from a previous revolting theory and feeling a rest in the new idea, and having, as they think, defended their present theory against the attacks of opposers, they settle down in the thought that no improvement can go beyond their stand-point.

Such a thought is an unfortunate one, because it assumes an infallibility that precludes a growth in knowledge, and must result in a sectarian spirit which destroys true Christian fellowship, and prevents a maturity in knowledge, grace and love, so important to a meetness for the kingdom of God, or to constitute them "joint heirs with Christ" to that kingly inheritance.

The advocates of the non-resurrection theory, or, as they call it, "No Life out of Christ," make John vi. one of their strongholds; perhaps it ought to be said their strongest in defense of their position. On this chapter they insist on a very literal understanding of the language in certain verses, and insist that because Jesus says of the believer, "I will raise him up at the last day," all others are excluded from any revival into life for any purpose whatever. Their argument on that chapter has passed with themselves as unanswered and unanswerable; but a critical examination of the chapter as a whole will most likely shake the confidence of those who earnestly desire truth for the truth's sake, and who do not wish to sustain a theory at all hazards.

This chapter opens with a description of Jesus' compassion on a "great multitude" who came to hear his teaching, and because of his healing the "diseased." He fed this multitude by a miracle that astonished his own disciples. The multitude, when they had seen the miracle that Jesus had done, said, "This is of a truth that prophet that should come into the world;" and it seems they were disposed to "take him by force to make him a king," but Jesus seeing this "departed again into a mountain himself alone." This fact disproves an oft-repeated assertion that Jesus would have had the throne of David at his first advent if the Jews had received him. No, he refuses to accept it at that advent, for the plain reason the prophetic time had not arrived for that event, and it was not his Father's will to give it to him till he had first made "his soul an offering for sin."—Isa. liii: 10.

During the dark night which followed Jesus' retreat to the mountain alone He came to his disciples walking on a boisterous sea. The people who had seen the miracle of the multitudes fed sought for him in vain on this side the sea, took shipping and went over to Capernaum seeking him; and when they had found him the conversation took place so much relied on to prove that only believers who have a spiritual union with Christ will ever be raised from the dead. Almost at the first of that interview Jesus said, "The bread of God is he which cometh down from heaven and giveth life to the world." . . . "I am the bread of life."—Verses 33-35.

Here is a broad assertion of life to all men; not to a few only, which few are to have life in a "special" sense; for "The living God is the Saviour of all men, *special*ly of those that believe."—1 Tim. iv. 10. Here is the same distinction that Jesus makes in John vi. He says, "I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me."—Ver. 38.

The next two verses express a truth which has been only in part understood. It is not to be supposed they are mere tautology. The first great truth is thus expressed: "This is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again (en) in the last day." Who has the Father given to Christ? Answer: "Thou hast given him power over all flesh."—John xvii. 2. "Jesus Christ gave himself a ransom for all"—"tasted death for every man," and "hath abolished death"; hence, death cannot hold a soul of man by any binding power in itself; and so far as death came by Adam it is annulled by Christ, and this is "the Father's will" that Christ should "destroy" that "death," so that no man is lost by or in consequence of it. In this sense Christ had given him by his Father the entire race; and by that death he will not lose a single one of them; but will "raise it (the race) up again in the last day." "This," he tells us, "is the Father's will." Thus briefly is stated the Father's will concerning the race, or "all men," for whom "Christ gave himself a ransom."

To suppose that our Lord, in John vi., taught the doctrine that none would ever have a revival from death except such as had formed a spiritual union with him previous to dying is to say he contradicts his own statement in the preceding chapter, where he says, "All that are in the graves shall hear his voice and come forth," etc. To teach, in the very next discourse, that only a few shall "come forth," sets his consistency in a light not very favorable; for he not only would contradict himself, but contradict the testimony of God by the prophet Hosea, which reads, "I will ransom them from the power of the grave (sheol): I will redeem them from death: O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave, I will be thy destruction: repentance shall be hid from mine eyes."—xiii. 14. Nor will Christ's work ever have anything like a completion till he has "destroyed" this "last enemy—death" (1 Cor. xv. 26), which came into the world by the sin of "one man," Adam; and it will be destroyed by "one man," Christ. Thus will the serpent's head be bruised, or "the works of the devil be destroyed." This salvation from the death by Adam is universal; and is that embraced in the apostle's declaration that the "living God is the Saviour of all men." But there is a special salvation. This is something more or far greater than a mere living again from the dead. Of this greater salvation our Lord speaks in the next verse, John vi. 40.

The previous verse presents Christ, by "the Father's will," as "the Saviour of all men;" this verse presents him, by the same will, as a "special Saviour" of those who "see the Son and believe on him." The difference in the two verses is marked and palpable. Verse 39 teaches the deliverance of all men from the death to which they were subjected by the act of another and not by their own sins. The 40th verse teaches that such as have or do see the Son and believe on him will have a permanent or everlasting life by their resurrection; while verse 39 gives no such assurance to the mass of the raised ones; but their final destiny is to be decided after they "see the Son." If then they "believe on him," they live on and have access to the tree of life (Rev. xxii. 2) and live forever, as Adam would have done if he had had continued access to that tree.—Gen. iii. 22.

"Are they to be converted, or be led to believe, by sight?" some will inquire. I answer—Yes; why not? Were none ever converted by sight? Did any of the apostles believe in Jesus without seeing him? Nay, did they not all refuse to believe in his resurrection till they had seen him? And poor Thomas was determined he would not believe unless he could not only see him but thrust his hand into his side and put his finger into the wounds in his hands. This unbelieving disciple had the privilege of doing all that he demanded; then he believed. Now mark Jesus' language to Thomas after he believed: "Because thou hast seen Me, thou hast believed; blessed are they that have not seen, and have believed."—John xx. 29.

From this language it seems that it is more blessed to believe without seeing Jesus than with it; yet it is indicated in the text (John vi. 40) that no man will have a final condemnation for unbelief till he has seen Jesus. The Saviour saith "every one that seeth the Son, and believeth on him," etc. Seeing him is one of the methods God in his love uses to produce faith; though, as a general rule, those will have a greater blessing who believe without sight. Peter speaking of such, says: "Whom having not seen ye love; in whom, though now ye see him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory; receiving the end of your faith, the salvation of your souls."—1 Peter i. 8, 9. Such persons receive a present salvation—they find Christ a "special" Saviour, and are assured their resurrection at the last day will be to a deathless state—to immortality, eternal life.

Others, or the mass of the race, will be raised up in the last day, but not immortal: they shall see Jesus; for "every eye shall see him."—Rev. i. 7. Then, also, "he that seeth the Son and believeth on him" will live on "forever," like as Adam would have done if he had been obedient; not by being made so that they "cannot die any more," but by access to the tree of life. They are not "sons of God by the resurrection," but are blessed under the government of "the sons of God," whose "manifestation" they had "waited for" (Rom. viii. 19), though unconscious of the precise method of their deliverance till it is accomplished. Then "the groaning creation" will see the manifold wisdom and love of God in having "subjected it to vanity," though, on their part, "not willingly, but by reason of him who subjected the same in hope."

In the matter of being converted by seeing, I might also have spoken of the case of Saul of Tarsus. He calls himself "the chief of sinners"; but he "saw the Lord Jesus," and was thereby convinced of his wickedness and immediately abandoned it. He tells us, "I obtained mercy, because I did it ignorantly" (that is, blasphemed and persecuted), "in unbelief." "Howbeit for this cause I obtained mercy, that in me first Jesus Christ might show forth all long-suffering for a pattern to them which should hereafter believe on him to life everlasting."—1 Tim. i. 13-16. Do any doubt Paul's veracity? Then he anticipated a salvation by the sight of Jesus of other sinners after the "pattern" of his own conversion, manifesting the "all long-suffering" of the glorified Jesus. Such "a pattern is useless if this short life with all the unavoidable ignorance attending it is to fix the mass of the race in eternal death, for none have ever yet been converted after the "pattern" of Paul's conversion; but there will be. See Zech. xii. 6-10.

THE APOCALYPSE.

PRELIMINARY.

"ALL Scripture is given by inspiration of God"; and the Apocalypse of John, "the majestic image of a high and stately tragedy, shutting up and intermingling her solemn scenes and acts with a seven-fold chorus of hallelujahs and harping symphonies, celebrating in glorious and lofty hymns the throne and equipage of God's almightiness, and what he works, and what he suffers to be wrought with high providence in his Church," is surely no exception. It is profitable—

I. For the confirmation of faith, by the evidence its prophecies afford of the Divine prescience being engaged in its composition. The history of the rise and fall of the papal Antichrist is in itself an invaluable addition to the volume of evidence by which the sacred writings are sustained.

II. It illustrates the sovereignty of God in the disposal of all things relating to his Church. Here the eternal purposes of God are seen moving on undisturbed, without any interference with the free agency of the creature. The pride and passion, the ambitious schemes and execrable atrocities of ten thousand times ten thousand rational but guilty creatures, independent of each other and freed from compulsory influence, are beheld wonderfully harmonizing with the prayers and efforts of the multitudes of the redeemed in bringing about the exact fulfilment of prophecy; all tending, as if by some law more subtle and mysterious than that of gravitation, at the exact hour, to the exact point at which from all eternity Jehovah has resolved they should arrive.

III. It exalts Christ. To the divinity of the Saviour it bears unceasing testimony. The man Christ Jesus is again and again seen invested with the glory of the Godhead: at one time he appears as the High Priest of his people; at another he is identified with the Alpha and Omega, King of kings, and Lord of lords, receiving the prayers and praises of all the intelligent universe.

IV. It asserts the doctrine of the Atonement. The slain Lamb—the "sea of glass" spread before the throne—the robes washed white in blood, all indicate the unfailing value of that sacrifice which was once offered for sin, and cry in language which cannot be mistaken that "without shedding of blood there is no remission."

V. It is a word of warning. It opens with solemn messages from Christ; it indicates throughout all vengeance as proceeding from a rejected Saviour; and in the concluding intimation which it affords of an antichrist yet to come, and a falling away greater than any that has yet desolated the Church, it teaches us to mingle with our joy at the nearer approach of the Saviour a holy fear and jealousy lest there should be in us or in our schemes anything which, in future, may develop itself as the deadly enemy of Christ and of his truth. We know not how soon the mystery of iniquity may begin to work.

With these great practical results before us, as reasonably to be expected from a careful and prayerful study of the book of Revelation, let us fly the region of political excitement before we venture to meditate on this splendid prophecy. The newspaper and the annual register, with their imperfect detail of the transactions of a day or a year, are ill fitted to expound the progress of his purposes, with whom "one day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day."—Editor of the "Following After Truth."

THE REVELATION.

The Apocalypse of St. John presents what may almost be termed a prophetic history of the fortunes of the Church during the period that is to intervene between the first and second advents of the Redeemer.

If, as seems most probable, the dispensation under which we live is only one of grace to the Gentiles, and not final; if it be a dispensation the peculiar and lengthened character of which was completely concealed from the Old Testament prophets; if the only indications of the future of Christianity in the world, prior to this apostolic revelation, were to be found in our Lord's discourse on the Mount of Olives; and if our era is to be followed by another, called "the dispensation of the fulness of times," then, as it appears to me, light is thrown on the purposes of the Apocalypse, which, if rightly used, may serve to give us at least some clue to its interpretation.

For then it but takes up and expands in prophetic outline the hints which lie scattered in the writings of the apostle Paul, and illustrates more at large the prophetic discourse of the Saviour on the Mount of Olives; its purpose being, not, as some would tell us, to conceal the future until time, the great interpreter, should expound its meaning, but to make known to the children of men future events just so far and no farther than such a revelation may be necessary to prepare Christians for their approach, and to preserve them from the errors and dangers into which they are likely to fall if they take up the notion that no further changes await the Church, but that it is to go on "conquering and to conquer," until all nations are subdued to the Redeemer.

The Apocalypse thus becomes to the Christian what Old Testament prophecy was to the Jew—a "light," though "shining in a dark place," and a fresh illustration of the inspired declaration, "Surely the Lord God will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets." Regarded thus, its prophecy becomes as much the interpreter of ecclesiastical history as ecclesiastical history is the interpreter of prophecy; yet in each case testing the moral condition of those to whom it is presented, and becoming silent or eloquent according as that condition may be. To the flippant, the skeptical and the prejudiced prophecy is dumb; to the froward it shows itself froward; to the lowly and meek alone is it comfort and strength.

If this view be a true one, what we have to look for in the book of Revelation is, first, additional prophetic intimations regarding the Church of a character harmonizing with, and corresponding in order and significance to, the declarations of the Lord; and, secondly, such references to the history and character of the "mystery of iniquity" as were likely to be useful in warning men of its approaches, and in delivering them from its seductions.

And this is precisely what we do find enshrined in the magnificent imagery of St. John.

We are not here about to enter on the dangers incident to minute interpretation; yet we cannot refrain from drawing attention to at least the general outline of this splendid prophecy in its relation to the latter days, in order to show—whether dimly or clearly we say not—that it shadows forth a course of events to the character and order of which it is well that we should "take heed."

Under the figure of the unfolding of seven successive sheets of a pictorial roll, each presenting hieroglyphic symbols, we note, first, a representation of the early and peaceful conquests of the Gospel under the emblem of a kingly rider on a white horse; next, the bloody persecutions to which its followers were to be exposed represented by a shedder of blood on a red horse; then gloom and decay under the emblems of famine; then mortal sickness and dissolution under the figure of Death on the pale or ghastly horse.

Such are the first four seals, which are distinguished from those that follow by two peculiarities: first, by the introduction of a war horse, which is, in Scripture, everywhere the symbol of military power, and here probably of the Roman Empire—the field on which the work goes on. Secondly, a rider, which we presume must, in each case, be regarded as a personification of the prevailing or ruling influence of the period represented. For we regard "the seals" in each case as representing eras. It is arbitrary beyond measure to make, as some do, the first seal to symbolize an era—that of the Church's peaceful prosperity, and the sixth seal an event—whether that event be, in the estimation of such expositors, the overthrow of paganism in the Roman Empire or the day of judgment.

The fifth seal seems to indicate a period of martyrdom—not at the hands of the pagan power of Rome, for the war horse now disappears, but for "the Word of God and for the testimony." Apparently, therefore, it is persecution for upholding the teachings of the Bible and for witnessing to its supreme authority.

The sixth shadows forth a time of overthrow and universal change under the figure of a raging whirlwind; ending, not with the coming, but with "the sign of the Son of man in heaven."

The seventh seal, preceded (under the sixth) by the sealing of the elect, is obviously the era of judgments and of miracle, ending with the declaration that "the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ."

So far—as we should have anticipated—we have a course of prediction illustrating that of the Lord as recorded in the twenty-fourth chapter of St. Matthew.

But now a new series of visions commences, and in them we trace the rise, progress and fall, first of the "mystery of iniquity," and then of the "man of sin," spoken of by Paul and Peter.

The Church, under the image of a woman pregnant with the kingly rule of Christ, cherishes, as the early Christians did, the false expectation that the reign of the Redeemer would immediately begin; that Christ would immediately come; that Christians would now be kings on earth; and that universal empire would be the dower of the new faith. For the realization of this hope the woman cries to God, as one "travailing in birth and pained to be delivered." Here we have the first rudiment of the apostasy.

Instead, however, of this expectation finding a fulfilment, a persecuting power appears under the emblem of a seven-headed dragon, while the hope of rule over all nations (the new-born kingly child) is withdrawn to heaven until the fullness of time shall come. The true Church, in consequence of increasing corruption, now flees into the wilderness (becomes an invisible church), and is there fed of God. In the meantime a long struggle ends in the downfall of paganism; and then "a flood" (of barbarians) having failed to sweep away the Church, in consequence of "the earth" (the worldly admixture of Christianity and paganism which then had rule) helping "the woman" by receiving into her bosom the barbaric hosts, the enmity of Satan centres on the spiritual few "which keep the commandments of God and have the testimony of Jesus Christ."

The "mystery of iniquity" is now briefly foreshadowed under the figure of a seven-headed mystic beast (or power) rising out of the flood of waters (the incursions of the barbarians), crowned, and bearing the name of blasphemy; it receives royal power; it is wounded to death (by Mohammedan incursions), yet wonderfully healed; it claims and secures universal homage; it talks boastfully and blasphemously; it overcomes all opposition; it falls by the hands of its own children (as it may be now doing), and is succeeded by a new form of evil—the man of sin—another power, coming up like a lamb, but (soon) speaking like a dragon; attaining universal empire; supported by evil spirits, deceiving by false miracles and reviving the outward form (the image) of the former beast; persecuting to the death; and embodied in an individual.

Divine judgments now approach. The "harvest" (of saints) is gathered in by the heavenly reaper, and the "vintage" (of wrath) is trodden. The seven last plagues (vials of wrath), corresponding to the seven trumpets and following judgments, are poured out; the ruin of both the foregoing forms of Antichrist follows; and then, after severe judgments on opposers, Satan is bound, the "first resurrection" is accomplished and the martyrs are seen on thrones, but whether on earth or in the invisible world is not stated. After a given period Satan is loosed and a rebellion takes place, which ends in the destruction of the rebels by fire from heaven, and the casting of the devil, the beast, and the false prophet into the burning lake.

The great judgment day now approaches. All the dead stand before God; Death and Hades are no more; the unwritten in the book of life are cast into the fire; the New Jerusalem descends from heaven, and the elect dwell there with Christ forever.

A striking symbolic description of "the bride, the Lamb's wife," is then given under the figure of a glorious city, and "saved nations," not in the city—into which nothing can enter that defileth—but walking "in the light of it," and healed by the leaves of a tree growing within it, unite with the "kings of the earth" (whoever they may be) in "bringing glory and honor" into it. With warnings and exhortations the book concludes.

The result is a conviction that it is intended to depict, at least in outline, the leading events and general character of this dispensation; that it is intended to be to us what Old Testament prophecy was to the Jew—clear in outline, obscure as to dates and details; that our insight into its meaning will depend upon our freedom from preconceived notions, and on the amount of moral sympathy we may have with the Divine purposes; and that so far from its study being either unprofitable or unpractical, it is eminently adapted to lessen in our eyes the force of this world's attractions; to strengthen bright and blessed hopes of future usefulness as well as joy; and to enable us to discern, through all the dark mysteries of God's government, the sunshine that reigns behind and the glory that shall never be eclipsed.—"Destiny of the Race."

THE ANTICHRIST.

The Antichrist, which St Paul denominates the "man of sin" and "son of perdition"—the "adversary to all that is called God"—is clearly a person quite distinct from the false Christs spoken of by our Lord, from the antichrists of St. John's epistles, and from that form of evil described in the Epistle to the Thessalonians as the "mystery of iniquity" then working. He is evidently an individual, not to be revealed until the time of, or rather till after the time of the "falling away" (apostasias.)

The peculiar characteristics of this "man of sin," as distinguished from the Papal apostasy, are that he succeeds it in order of time; that he bears a pretended resemblance to the Saviour—he has "horns like a lamb"—sitting in the temple of God as absolute ruler, and there "showing himself that he is God"; that he is a counterfeit Messiah, called the false prophet from his opposition to our Lord, who is the prophet (ô prophète); and that he is a persecutor. It is this Antichrist who is to combine the forces of infidelity and superstition, and to persecute, even unto death, all faithful believers, "until Christ himself again appears, to vindicate the cause of truth and liberty and religion."

With regard to the approach of this last Antichrist, it may be enough to say that, after making all possible deductions from statements which may be supposed to represent only the opinions of an individual or a party, enough remains to prove to every candid mind, first, that pantheistic socialism prevails to a very great extent throughout Europe; and secondly, that it is steadily spreading among the youth of the various countries of the Continent.

If this state of things should continue, and ever become general, society will one day inevitably become disorganized and anarchical, in which case nothing remains for the world but a Conqueror. In such a state of society there is no escape from the rule of one man governing by a force in harmony with the opinions and delusions of the age.

Further, as pantheism, like Buddhism, involves the worship of the human intellect, regarding it as a divine thing though diffused among many persons, it must have, in one form or other, its Grand Lama—its central manifestation. And safely may it be asserted that whenever men, forsaking God, the living and the true, for self-worship, so far impoverish themselves as to need such a centre and governor, Satan will take care that he shall appear upon the scene. Such, in all probability, will be the Antichrist of the last days. Again we shall have, as if in mockery of truth, a priest upon a throne.

Rejecting the Christian doctrine that "He in whom the priesthood of the universe rests is the Son of God, that he took human nature, united it to God, endued it with that spirit which dwelt without measure in himself, and made it the head of many members, through each of which, so long as it abides in him, the same life-blood is transmitted," the pantheist (having a true and deep feeling that there must be a centre, or that there can be no fellowship) is obliged first to assume the centre, and then to demand for it implicit faith. What can he do, but endow a human being like himself with divine attributes, call him a God, and bow down before his false and fraudulent priesthood?

It has already been observed that the dominion of Antichrist will be marked by a revival, not indeed of the Papacy, but of its image, by which I understand its priestly system centering as hitherto in a personal head at Rome; and it is equally clear that his end will be in Palestine.

In looking for the probable agency by which these things may be accomplished in an age of anarchy and infidelity, the mind involuntarily turns toward the Jesuit, who, although everywhere denounced as the enemy of progress, the great foe of liberty, is always seen riding on the common wave. What precise part "the Society of Jesus" may take in the commotions of the future it would be folly to predict; but this at least is certain—the Jesuits will not die for Rome papal! Mr. Isaac Taylor, in his Life of Loyola puts this very forcibly:

"Jesuitism," he says, "may outlive Romanism; or it may be wholly severed from it, and yet may live and grow. Often as the society has been seen prostrate at the foot of the sovereign Pontiff, venting itself in vehement professions of loyalty, it has in fact always hung loose upon ecclesiastical Catholicism, and has shown itself to be organically independent, living by its own sap, drawn from the soil by its own root and fibres. Jesuitism has its own purposes to secure, and its own law of self-preservation; and should the day come when it could not save both itself and the Church, or could save herself only by conspiring against her, its past history would warrant the belief that the Papacy might, at such a conjuncture, fall—set upon by its own friends, and with Cæsar's last words on its lips, while it looks to 'the society.'"

"The sole aim of Jesuitism is the accomplishment of a grand, universal, all-grasping absolutism, like that which it is predicted will be realized by the Antichrist of the last days. It intends nothing that is partial or circumscribed; its very purport is universality; it is absolutism carried out until it has embraced the human family, and has brought every human spirit under its toils. While the monastery was, for the most part, the asylum of men whose withdrawal from the duties and service of active life seldom involved any very serious loss to the world, the Jesuit Institute is framed for no purpose more evidently than that of sifting the mass of society, so that it may take to itself the choicest samples of energy, intelligence, and devotedness.

"It would be by no means difficult to sketch the outlines of a new faith well adapted to the prevailing notions and habits of Continental communities. Such a faith would retain everything belonging to Romanism that is sensuous and imaginative; everything of costume and ceremonial that does not offend good taste or draw upon itself sarcasm; it would retain, moreover, a shadowy, though not a dogmatic, orthodoxy; it might perhaps permit a Nicene profession to be 'sung,' but would never allow it to be 'said.' In a rude age the Church, always wise in her day, became flagrantly polytheistic; in a philosophic, or rather a scientific age the same Church, equally wise, will become pantheistic."

My own conviction has long been that the period of the sixth seal will be a time of shaking among the nations, of universal change, of great dismay; that the fountains of the great deep of civil and ecclesiastical rule are then to be broken up; the society is to be resolved into its original elements, and that this state of solution will be a period of great terror.

Popery, as it now exists, will go into captivity—that is, get into disrepute; it is to be eventually slain by the same sword (the civil power) by means of which it had persecuted the saints, but it will only make way for its revival in a new and more malignant form, as the fitting instrument of the last Antichrist. —Delta, on the Revelation.

THE MILLENNIUM.

In noticing this period, the first thing to be observed is its introduction by what it is called "the first resurrection." St. Paul seems to refer to this when, writing to the Philippians, he says: "If by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead."

Is it possible to imagine that the apostle only refers here to that resurrection which is common to all? Is it reasonable indeed to separate this from what has been said to the Thessalonians about that prior judgment of saints which is to take place before the rest of the dead are raised, and which is so closely associated with their taking part in the judgment of the world; a judgement which is not to decide whether they (the saints) are Christ's or not, but to allot to them rewards or deprivations, "according to their works"? It seems impossible to doubt that the resurrection to which St. Paul aspired was one which implied, to him, the reception of the unfading crown.

Alford remarks justly that Scripture assures us of two resurrections; the first, of the dead in Christ, to meet him and to reign with him, and hold judgment over the world; the second, of all the dead, to be judged according to their works. In this he agrees with Olshausen and Stier.

The "dead in Christ," then, being all "raised," and the living saints "changed," the "rest of the dead," we are told, live not again until the thousand years are finished." In the meantime we have every reason to suppose the occupations of earth will go on as usual, the severity of human probation being, however, modified by the binding of Satan, and by the consequent absence of his temptations. The result—for a brief reference to the end of this period informs us of it—is, that, notwithstanding the absence of superhuman seduction, the enmity of the unrenewed heart remains the same, and, consequently, when Satan is again loosed, those who remain unconverted—"the nations"—are deceived as readily as ever, and, vainly supposing they can destroy the saints, are themselves destroyed by fire which comes down from God out of heaven. The objection sometimes made to this view is, that since Satan's temptations are the chief cause of man's ruin, the binding of the great enemy will be all but equivalent to the cessation of moral evil. But this is unreasonable. Such a notion supposes that man has no native tendency to self-will and to departure from God; that he is, in fact, never "drawn away of his own lust, and enticed"—a doctrine utterly opposed to the Bible. Far from probable is it, as has been suggested by Mr. Birks, that "the moral purpose of the binding of Satan is specially intended to destroy this secret delusion by which men excuse their sins; and to bring out in full relief the fact that man is prone to forsake God, even without any external temptation."

We fully admit that the moral trial of man will, under the circumstances supposed, be much less severe than it now is. We imagine that God intends it should be so. The race now is for a kingly crown—the prize of a high calling in Christ Jesus; for this is the day of the ingathering of the Church; and the struggle is, unquestionably, a fearful one—hopeless, indeed, but for the great Captain under whom we fight. The race then will be simply for the ordinary privileges of a divine citizenship for the Church, before the Millennium, is complete with its Lord—the probation, therefore, is reduced accordingly.

We regard the Millennial period then—from all that is revealed about it—to be neither more nor less than the appointed period during which Christ rules the world as a conqueror, and with "the rod of iron." It is the period when all outward and violent manifestations of wickedness are to be repressed by force; but there is nothing whatever to show that it is a period during which the world is inhabited exclusively or mainly by renewed men. On the contrary, the readiness with which "the nations" (evidently put for the great masses of mankind) listen to the seductions of Satan the moment he is loosed but too plainly indicates that their hearts were not given to God.

We do not mean to exclude moral and spiritual influences, but simply to say that the "binding of Satan" implies mainly repression; the absolute hindrance, not only of persecution, but of rapine and violence—the putting down of all war, whether between individuals or nations. In that day will men cast their "idols of silver" and their "idols of gold, which they had made each one for himself to worship, to the moles and to the bats." But it will be under the influence of terror; not as a consequence of their conversion, but "for fear of the Lord, and for the glory of his majesty, when he ariseth to shake terribly the earth." Then will the peoples "beat their swords into plough-shares, and their spears into pruning-hooks." Then will the universal peace that prevails justify the language of the prophet, "The wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid, and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together." But again we say, this will come to pass, not because all men have come under the influence of the Gospel, but because the Lord will then reprove iniquity by smiting "the earth with the rod of his mouth," and "with the breath of his lips" slaying the wicked.

From the testimony of Scripture we cannot but conclude that the Millennium is the season when Christ is to rule "in the midst of his enemies;" that it forms the intermediate link between this dispensation and the resurrection; and that it should be regarded as winding up the mediatorial economy, and being the immediate precursor of the last judgment.

Solemn indeed is the thought (whatever view we may take of details) that, as a fact, we ourselves are this moment living in the midst of an undeveloped scheme; that amid all the activities and ambitions of the world it is hasting to its end; and happy indeed is he who, pausing amid the many occupations and excitements of daily life, takes time to remember that whatever may be the nature or the extent of the differences that exist among Christian men relative to the time or the manner in which these great events will occur, their certainty is scarcely a matter of dispute.—"Destiny of the Race."

ORDER OF EVENTS.

The events which take place before the "coming" of the Lord are recorded in the Apocalypse in the following order, viz.: (1)

The development of the last Antichrist and a consequent bloody persecution. (2) The "sealing," or separation of what would seem to be elect Jews. (3) The appearance before God of the martyrs of the last "great tribulation." (4) The general preaching of the Gospel as a testimony by persecuted saints, symbolized by the flight of the angel. The advent and slaughter of the witnesses. Then follows the "coming" of the Lord and the rapture of the Church; leading to the judgments of heaven being poured out upon Antichrist and his adherents.—Ibid.

"THINGS WHICH MUST SHORTLY COME TO PASS."

REVELATION I. 1.

NOT more important is readiness for the rapture of "those who are alive and remain," than for the departure hence of those who sleep in death, when viewed in the light of the first resurrection. If, "in the place where the tree falleth there it shall lie" in resurrection, and "the dead know not anything," for "there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave whither we go," so that change in our state Godward there can be none between death and resurrection, then is it all-important to live in readiness that we may die in readiness, and so share a glorious part in the first resurrection. If this be not so, we fail to understand the earnestness expressed by the apostle (Phil. iii. 8, 11): "I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but dung, that I may win Christ, and be found in him; that I may know him, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, being made conformable unto his death, if by any means I might attain unto the resurrection from among the dead." (See Emphatic Diaglott). Why, if the apostle entertained the thought of growth and development between death and resurrection, was he concerned to finish his course with joy? But life ending here was to him a finished course, and hence his exultant song in departing: "I am not ashamed, for I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day. For I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give to me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing."—2 Tim. i. 12; iv. 6, 7, 8.

From all which we see the faith of the apostle transferring his hope from the present moment of suffering and death to that day when in resurrection he, together with all who love the appearing, should receive the overcomer's crown.

Whereupon we conclude that not more surely will the changed ones be an election from among the righteous living than that the first resurrection will be an election from among the righteous dead. Hence we read, "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection," which, to our understanding, reads, "He that hath part in the first resurrection is especially blessed and holy." True it is that every believer is blessed and holy in proportion to the spirit of faith that is in him; but faith is a grace of degree, and only that degree which giveth the victory over the world comprises the blessedness and holiness here commended, and constitutes its possessors overcomers. After the same manner are they pronounced specially blessed who are called to the marriage supper of the Lamb. (See Rev. xix. 9.)

The Apostle to the Hebrews, in speaking of the rest, or keeping of Sabbath to the people of God, suggests a possibility of coming short of it, and however the rest of faith may here be implied, the rest of millennial glory, the creation's Sabbath, the seventh thousand years of its history, is the rest here spoken of "that remaineth to the people of God."—Heb. iv. 9. And if these words inspire hope, not less do those teach wholesome fear where we read "Take heed, brethren, lest; Exhort one another, daily, lest; We are made partakers of Christ (that is, of his glory) if; Let us therefore fear, lest; Let us labor therefore to enter into that rest, lest." Indeed, the whole tenor of these third and fourth chapters of the Epistle to the Hebrews suggests possibility of failure and gives warning against it. Not of final salvation, but of the prize of our high and holy calling, a part with him in his kingdom and glory. Here also we come to see a fullness of meaning in the words: "If we be dead with him, we shall also live with him; if we suffer, we shall also reign with him," and "The dead in Christ shall rise first." Now the dead in Christ are those who have lived in Christ; but do all believers live in Christ? All the believers living and dying in the faith of Christ shall rise to live eternally with him, but the object of the present inquiry is that order of rising and living with Christ which will ensure reigning with him. Every queen shares the throne with the king, and their time of crowning is one. So we read the Bride is to share the throne with the Bridegroom when he shall come in his own glory and his Father's.—Rev. iii. 21. But only if we be dead with him now shall we live with him then; only if we suffer with him now shall we reign with him then; "for, if we believe not, he abideth faithful, he cannot deny himself." So persuaded were the believers in the early Church of this truth that, with a view to reigning with Christ, martyrdom was even coveted and sought rather than avoided. Not necessarily, however, need overcomers be martyrs of the order described in Heb. xi. 35–38; but those who have carried a cross for Christ, those who have put off the old man with his deeds, have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts, have suffered shame and disrepute for the truth's sake, having bought the truth at great cost, and refused to sell it again even to recover a lost reputation with the world or their brethren. Such as, being cast out for the truth's sake, having found consolation in the words understood by so few: "Your brethren that hated you, and that cast you out for my name's sake, said, Let the Lord be glorified; but he shall appear to your joy, and they shall be ashamed" (Isa. lxvi. 5); for the same thing that has been going on from the beginning continues still, and shall to the end.

But it may yet be asked by some, Upon what special Scriptures do you rely for a first resurrection? We answer, first, upon the apostle's anxiety already quoted from Phil. iii. 11, noting especially the right reading, "from among the dead;" second, his language to the Thessalonians, 1 Ep. iv. 16; and third, John's testimony in Rev. xx. 5, 6, than which we can conceive of nothing more definite; and this we must consider part and parcel of the first thing that shall shortly come to pass, seeing that the change of the living and the raising of the dead are to happen simultaneously, in the twinkling of an eye, the briefest point of time that can be expressed—and for participation in either of which readiness is enjoined.

Then Abel, the first to lose his life for righteousness; and Enoch, the seventh from Adam, who walked with God, and was not, for God took him as a type of all who should on that account become translated that they should not see death; together with all the happy succession of witnesses, down to the saint who latest fell asleep, wakened from their long sleep of death and, together with those who are alive and remain, will be caught away to meet the Lord in the air. We will here just hazard the expression of a thought we have entertained for years on this matter, for which we have indeed no express revelation, but which in the very nature of things appears to us not only feasible, but likely; that, whenever the time draws near—say within a year, two, or three—the Lord may spare his loved ones the pain of dying by detaining them on the earth to partake at length in the rapture of the living and the changed saints. Where he has seen an earnest (perhaps life-long) looking and longing for his appearing, coupled with a hope to escape the last enemy, we think it not improbable that his love toward them may be shown after this order; and surely the thought that such might be should prove an additional incentive to entertain the lively hope and expectation.

But some will say, Does not Romans viii. 17 say, "If children then heirs, heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ"? What more than new birth is needed? Yes; but it adds, "If so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together." And just before it says, "They that are in the flesh cannot please God, but as many as are led by the Spirit of God they are the sons of God." Observe, too, that all sons are not heirs. Abraham, the father of the faithful, "had two sons, the one by a bondmaid, the other by a free woman; but he who was of the bondwoman was born after the flesh, but he of the free woman was by promise; which things are an allegory." In Abram's household Eliezer was heir for a while—Gen. xv. 3—until Ishmael was born. Then Ishmael was heir until Isaac was born, and Sarah is found saying, "Cast out this bondwoman and her son, for the son of this bondwoman shall not be heir."—Gen. xxi. 10. Eliezer was a faithful servant, and had reward according to her service doubtless, but no part in the inheritance which was to come by promise. Ishmael was a son, and although cast out at first with only bread and water, the prayer of faith was not unanswered; he became a nation, twelve princes his sons came to be, having towns and castles according to their nations; but no part in the inheritance which was to come by promise. And why? Because the children of promise are counted for the seed. First, the inheritance is given to Abraham by promise (Gen. xii. 7), and then a seed is given to him by promise (Gen. xv. 5), a promised inheritance for a promised seed. And who are the children of promise? Those who, seeing the promised inheritance afar off, are persuaded of the promises, and embrace them, and confess that they are strangers and pilgrims on the earth, and they that say such things declare plainly that they seek a country. Those who, walking in the steps of the faith of their father Abraham, become Isaacs—offered ones—and Israels, as princes to have power with God and with men to prevail. The promise was to Abraham and those of his seed who should walk in the steps of his faith. Not the Ishmaels who mock—and let any of our readers who see not with us, and are disposed to treat lightly, if not to ridicule, our hope, beware how they class themselves with the mocker of Isaac—not the Esaus who love sport in the field, and take to themselves many wives of the daughters of Canaan and Heth; and, weary in the pursuit of pleasure, despise their birth-right and sell it for a mess of pottage. But the Isaacs who are offered ones, whose habit of life is to pitch their tent by the well Lahai-roi (Thou God seest me!) and build their altar and call upon the name of the Lord in the land wherein they are strangers (Gen. xxvi. 25). And the Jacobs, too, who, after sending their flocks and herds, their wives and children across the brook, are left alone with God to gain the name of Israel. Abraham, the man of faith, could afford to give Lot his choice of country, knowing that, wherever he went, he would build his altar and call upon the name of the Lord, whether his neighbors approved of it or not. But Lot, the man of sense—albeit he was a righteous man—chose the well-watered plains, pitched his tent toward Sodom, and presently was found in Sodom, which well-nigh cost him his life; and, as it was, his sun went down behind a cloud. Will he share in the first resurrection? We think not. For then it will be shown to whom the present mess of pottage has been more than the future glory of a kingdom, who has brought the blind and the lame and the halt—what could be spared—for sacrifice; and who has placed his all upon the altar that the Lord might take what pleased him, who has given grudgingly to the Lord his tenth; and who, giving heed to the words of the apostle: "Be not deceived, God is not mocked; whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap," And again, "He which soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly, and he which soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully," having learned that not theirs only, but their own selves must be given to the Lord.

That the Epistle of James was written to the Church is apparent from the frequent repetition of the term "My brethren." But can we for a moment think that those among them who needed such sharp reproof and solemn warning as the fourth chapter and the first six verses of the fifth chapter present, if they died as they lived when thus addressed by the apostles—can we think that such will share a glorious part in the first resurrection? If we mistake not, we have known the believers who have so lived and so died for aught the world or their brethren have known to the contrary.

And, without indulging too censorious a spirit, we think we know, alas, too many to whom the complaints made to the Churches in Asia might be well repeated in the Churches of Europe or America. For, let it not be overlooked nor forgotten that to one class in the Churches it is said, "I have somewhat against thee, because thou hast left thy first love; remember, therefore, from whence thou art fallen and repent." And again, "Repent, or I will come unto thee quickly and fight against them with the sword of my mouth." And again, "Be watchful and strengthen the things that are ready to die, for I have not found thy works perfect before God; remember, therefore, how thou hast received, and hold fast, and repent." "If, therefore, thou shalt not watch, I will come on thee as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour I will come upon thee." (What evidence we have in this that these messages to the Churches of Asia were written for all time!) And again, to some who were neither cold nor hot, "I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire that thou mayest be rich, and white raiment that thou mayest be clothed, and that the shame of thy nakedness do not appear."

While to another class in the same Churches it is said: "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God." And again: "He that overcometh and keepeth my works unto the end, to him I will give power over the nations." And again: "He that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment, and I will confess his name before my Father, and before the angels." And again: "He that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God, and I will write upon him my new name." And again: "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame and am set down with my Father in his throne."

Those that have wandered out of the way of understanding (although believers, and found in Church association to the end of their days) shall remain in the congregation of the dead, while those that continue in the way of understanding to the end shall share in the first resurrection. When those shall arise from the dead, and what their portion then shall be, we must reserve for a future paper; but to this distinction of classes in the Church of the past we call attention as bearing upon resurrection, and in the Church of the present as bearing upon the change at his coming.

But it is time we passed on to the second of the "Things that must shortly come to pass," viz.: "The great tribulation wherein many shall be purified and made white and tried, but the wicked will do wickedly, and none of the wicked shall understand, but the wise shall understand."—Daniel xii. 10.

We have seen the foolish virgins "shut out," which to our understanding means, in the case of the dead—not raised—in the case of the living—not changed—but left behind to seek what sooner they ought to have found, "oil in their vessels with their lamps." Some will doubtless seek it at once by "going to them that sell," having recourse to means of grace ordinary and extraordinary, turning to the Lord with weeping and supplication, repentance and confession, crying, "Lord, Lord, open to us," hoping that he might grant them a second rapture. But no, the door is shut, that day of grace is past, that degree of acceptance and approval is lost; but they may yet attain unto the second degree if then they keep the faith, and overcome the beast, his image, his mark, and the number of his name, which must then presently rise out of the sea of trouble, called the tribulation the great one. Then will be better understood than hitherto Luke xxi. 36: "Watch ye, therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man." Their brethren comprising the little flock, or flock of little ones, the flock of slaughter, that have gone up, have been accounted worthy to escape, and will be then standing before the Son of man in his revealed glory. Those who have had their life for the most part in the earth must remain on the earth, while those who have found their life in him and lived it shall be caught away to meet him, having, it may be, seen this to be the hope of their calling, and followed after it, if they might apprehend that for which they had been apprehended of Christ Jesus, and so pressed toward the mark for the prize of their high calling of God in Christ Jesus, even to sit down with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob as the bride of Christ at the marriage supper of the Lamb.—N. Controversy, though always an evil in itself, is sometimes a necessary evil.

THOUGHTS ON NOAH.

OF the many things "written aforetime for our learning," the history and character of Noah are certainly not the least instructive.

After the lamentable end of that state of pristine bliss which had obtained in Eden, a process of gradual yet rapid moral deterioration set in and spread until the whole human family had come under its baneful influence, and this was the state of matters about the time Noah was born. At this period, "the earth also was corrupt before God, and the earth was filled with violence. And God looked upon the earth, and behold, it was corrupt; for all flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth."—Gen. vi. 11 and 12.

In the midst of this wide-spread moral depravity, however, stands out one figure dissimilar to all the rest. "Noah found grace in the eyes of the Lord. Noah was a just man and perfect in his generations, and Noah walked with God" (vi. 8, 9).

Now herein is conspicuous his faithfulness or faith, the trait for which the Scriptures hold him up to us as an ensample to be imitated, and in the last cited passage is contained a eulogy on his character of no mean merit. Ponder shortly on the circumstances in which he found himself. "Iron sharpeneth iron: so a man sharpeneth the face of his friend," is a principal recognized by all. Where one is situated among companions of a kindred spirit there is an incitement to continue in one's course through their example and influence; in fact, one so circumstanced has little incitement to act otherwise than his associates act. How was it with Noah? Not only was he utterly devoid of all human sympathy and example to spur him on to a life of holiness, but he was, on the contrary, surrounded by a wicked and profligate generation, steeped in iniquity, whose very thoughts and imaginations were continually evil, given up wholly to every lust and violence, and who no doubt would, by every means in their power, try to seduce from his allegiance the patriarch, who was not the only one who feared God and did his will with a pure heart. The presence of this man must have been a standing rebuke to them; his customs and morals were so different from and so superior to theirs that, galled by his position, they would try everything to corrupt and undermine his standing.

Now, considering that all his surroundings were calculated to have the effect desired by his enemies, is it not wonderful and no mean measure of praise which is awarded him: "He was a just man and perfect in his generations; Noah walked with God"? Two references (Ezekiel xiv. 14 and 20) will show in what estimation this trait of righteous Noah was held by God himself, and we think no one will dispute that his character deserved it.

Now, what a lesson is here for us! We are in no way so extremely situated as was Noah. We are not beset at every turn or tempted from rectitude on every side as he was; we have the solace of one another's company and exhortation. We may indeed walk uprightly and still in large measure pull with the stream; for, in these days, conforming to the manners of those around us is not always equivalent to a deviation from the path of duty. True, there are many many things which seek to allure us into sin, and we would not underestimate their power; but they are few in comparison with the persistent attacks of the enemy which Noah had to withstand; therefore is there the less excuse for us if we fall away. But with greater privileges than he had, let us take courage from the noble example of Noah, and make all the more bold a stand for the truth and the right—for the God of righteousness. Let us, therefore, be faithful to the command, "Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from all iniquity," and exercise ourselves unto godliness in the midst of a godless generation.

Now, to take another view of the patriarch's faithfulness. We find him in that roll of men of strong faith in Heb. xi. (verse 7). "By faith, Noah, being warned of God of things not seen as yet, moved with fear, prepared an ark to the saving of his house; by the which he condemned the world, and became heir of the righteousness which is by faith." Now when God foretold to him the flood, he virtually imposed on him a condition of salvation in giving him instructions to build the ark. As yet such an event as the deluge appeared very improbable, nothing similar had before occurred in human experience, the things were as yet unseen: yet Noah believed God, the proof of which was his building of the ark; fear was excited in him by the divine warning—he believed, therefore he obeyed.

We may rightly imagine that while Noah was engaged on his gigantic work, the bystanders would ridicule his useless labor, the report would go abroad as to his foolish employment, and many, no doubt, would come to see with their own eyes the daily toil of this (in their eyes) madman. And when he warned them of impending judgment, adjuring them to flee from approaching wrath, did they not receive it all as an idle tale? What mockings and railleries, what witty jests would it not be his lot to listen to and to bear with? Yet in spite of these taunts, his faith in the word of Jehovah remained steadfast; he was convinced of the reality of those things not yet seen: all the scoffs of the licentious multitude shook not his confidence, and when the "things not seen" emerged from the region of prophecy into that of historical fact, this his faith saved him. His enemies and revilers, on the other hand, now found to their cost the penalty of slighting the Divine warning; now they were forced to feel that there were other realities beyond those to which they had given credence and had so attached themselves.

Now, want of faith of the type of Noah appears to me to be one of the besetting evils of the present day. Men are now so fond of criticising the Almighty and his doings, rejecting at the same time as unworthy of belief everything beyond the domain of their experience, or beyond their comprehension, as if, forsooth, either were so extensive that they are the only tribunal before which everything must be brought, ere it can be stamped or recognized as worthy of the name of truth. If we point our fellow mortals to God's revealed truth and show them his merciful plan of redemption from sin through the blood of Christ shed for us, and the proffered gift of immortality to perishing men through his rising from the dead, we are told that it is not reasonable to believe in the divine inspiration or the Scriptures, or the atonement effected through the sacrifice of Christ, and the blessings held out to us they treat as old wives' fables. They have advanced beyond such things—superstitions, they call them—and now place their faith either in what they call "rational religion" (thereby implying, of course, that to believe the doctrines before mentioned would not be rational), or in the presumed teachings of science founded on investigation into nature.

It is indeed hard to get one nowadays to place implicit reliance on the unseen, and therefore to a certain extent, unknown and mysterious, but none the less true and rational. Our Lord, however, leads us to anticipate a repetition of the faithfulness and godlessness of Noah's time; "As the days of Noe were, so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be. For as in the days that were before the flood, they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark, and knew not until the flood came and took them all away, so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be," etc.—Matthew xxiv. 37-39. Cast your eyes around and say whether things are not ripening into a state such as it is here predicted shall immediately precede the advent of our Lord. Careless, ease-loving, lovers of pleasure, lovers of self more than lovers of God, are not such the characteristics of the present day, forced on one's notice as palpably as if at every turn there were shrines in the thoroughfares to the god of self? And while this is so, men are lulled into that (as it shall prove to many) fatal dream, "my Lord delayeth His coming," the majority seeming to think little of this event, or mentally putting it off to a yet remote period. What can be more striking than the utter absence, in the calculations for the future, not only of political but also of religious bodies, of any consideration of an abrupt ending of all their schemes by the sudden appearance of Him who has purchased the earth with His own blood? Plans are laid down for all time to come, but the coming kingdom and its king seem not to weigh much in their balances. Thus are they lured on to their destruction, for it shall be that "when they say, Peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them as travail upon a woman with child; and they shall not escape."—1. Thes. v. 3.

Now, all this springs out of unbelief in one form or another. Had Noah doubted, and deferred the construction of the ark on the plea that he did not understand how the world could be flooded—it was a physical impossibility—or what was the use of the deluge, if the earth was corrupt, could it not be purified in some other way? or if he had refused to believe the word of the Lord till he knew somewhat more of the method of its accomplishment, would he have been saved? Nay, verily, but while he still doubted the waters would have been upon him, and he should have perished as the rest. Yet would he have been as much justified in being skeptical then as any are now excused in withholding belief in the Word of God. Nay, I advance a step further, and make bold to say that in these latter days we can far less palliate such skepticism, because it is in our day pre-eminently that, side by side with rank unbelief in the Divine origin of the Bible, its authorship has been most abundantly and incontestably vindicated. Many circumstances which for ages lay hid, and which indeed it required the slow march of centuries to develop, have now been unveiled to the eyes of the whole world, putting to the rout modern skepticism. What of Nineveh? What of Petra? Let them tell their testimony to the credibility of this volume. Fifty years ago, more or less, these places were unknown, and skeptics, ever willing to use a tool against the beloved book, boldly asserted that the whole Bible history of them was apocryphal, for such places had never existed! Where is the skeptic who would dare take the same ground now? What, too, of the giant cities of Bashan (Deut. iii.) only recently discovered? In fact who can withstand the silent but overwhelming testimony of the whole land of Israel? The Book has been put through the fire, but from day to day evidence accumulates that it is indeed the Word of our God.

That spirit which withholds acceptance of or belief in a thing until every nook and cranny has been examined is not of faith; nor, on the other hand, is faith necessarily a blind, unreasoning belief in everything presented to one. But our faith rests on a good and solid basis, the word of the Eternal; like Paul, we know in whom we have trusted. Oh, then for more of the faith of Noah, that simple trust and obedience as a child, which he exhibited, for assuredly in following his example we shall not be put to shame, but shall save our own souls, when faith shall have its fruition in the verities of the future life, and thus shall we most honor Him who is faithful and true. But not only have we in our day, as there were in Noah's, the unbelieving in the simple sense of the word, but we have also the ungodly, wicked and profligate. Oh, that a word could awaken these! Oh, that they would consider that once in similar circumstances men were warned of impending destruction, but giving no heed, they were cut off! And now men are again warned of wrath approaching, but all heed not the voice. "For this they willingly are ignorant of, that by the word of God the heavens were of old, and the earth standing out of the water and in the water; whereby the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished; but the heavens and the earth, which are now, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men."—2 Peter iii. 5-7.

The limits of an article prevents reference to many points suggested by Noah's history, but one I shall notice shortly in conclusion. The preservation of the patriarch when he alone, out of all mankind was found righteous, and when the earth was filled with violence, is a very remarkable and a ground of strong encouragement and consolation to us. Scarcely could man be placed in a situation of greater danger, yet not a hair of his head was touched and he was saved out of the midst of his enemies. This was the Lord's doing, the work of Him who changeth not; still He shall show

Himself to be "the hope (place or harbor of refuge) of His people."—Joel iii. 16. There shall be a burning up of chaff e'er the inauguration of a new era, but although the two may grow together just now, He shall be careful to separate the wheat from the chaff and from the tares, that it may not share in their doom. If we are His, then blessed are we, for we can take to ourselves this comfort, "The foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal. The Lord knoweth them that are His."—2 Timothy ii. 19.—Selected.

THE GREAT WARFARE BETWEEN TRUTH AND ERROR.

DIVINE REVELATION AND HUMAN TRADITIONS.

"Ye are bought with a price; be ye not the servants of men."—1st. Cor., vii. 23.

THIS mental and spiritual conflict is not confined to one or two sections of the professed Church of Christ, but prevails almost universally, and will doubtless increase with the progress of Scriptural knowledge. The glorious end, however, of perfect peace will not be realized until the Prince of Peace shall return again to make all things new, or until "the Lord shall be king over all the earth."—Zech. xiv. 9.

The spirit of intolerance and persecution was lamentably displayed in the Presbyterian Church of Canada about twenty-five or thirty years ago in the case of the Rev. Mr. Peden, of Amherstburg, an intelligent and devout minister of that denomination, and has been of late in the case of the Rev. Mr. Macdonnell, of Toronto. In the course of his ministry Mr. Peden discovered the truth that "Christ died for all men" (1 Tim. ii. 5, 6; 1 John ii. 2), while the teaching of the Confession of Faith was that he died only for the Elect; and he faithfully followed the counsel of God and taught this important truth. For this he was arraigned, tried as a heretic, condemned and excommunicated from that Church! When brought before the Synod for trial, in Toronto, the good man, with Bible in hand, meekly stood up to make his defense, but was told by the Moderator, "Mr. Peden, you are not to be tried by the Bible, but by the Confession of Faith!" In vain did this servant of God refer to the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament as his guide, which, by the Confession of Faith itself, are declared to be "the only rule of faith and manners"; yet he was ignominiously excluded from the body! The spirit of this decision was virtually that of the Romish Inquisition, while the Word of God was virtually ignored and Christ dishonored in the person of one of his brethren. (John xv. 20, 21.)

The late case of Mr. Macdonnell, of Toronto, although not terminating in exclusion, comes within the same category. The unscriptural dogma found in "The Confession of Faith," concerning the eternal torment of the finally impenitent, he, in common with multitudes of the most intelligent and devout expounders of God's Word, repudiated, while he freely accepted the teaching of that Word concerning "the eternity of the future punishment of the wicked." His persecutors in the Presbytery and General Assembly labored long and tenaciously to force him into the mould of the heathen dogma of "eternal torment," but, failing in this, they finally accepted his views as expressed in his last communication of May 1, 1877, which were in reality the same as in his first, delivered about a year before. He then stated that the language of the Confession, "eternal torment," he set aside as unscriptural, but received with reverence the testimony of God as found in Matt. xxv. 46: "These shall go away into everlasting punishment." To the sincere and intelligent student of the Bible, the correct understanding of this language depends upon the answer to the question, "What is the punishment God has pronounced against sin?" It is "Thou shalt surely die."—Gen. ii. 17. "The wages of sin is death."—Rom. vi. 23. Ordinary intelligence and sincerity will receive this language as literal, theologians too generally and unwarrantably make it figurative. The eminent philosopher, John Locke, in his work on "The Reasonableness of Christianity," referring to this subject, remarks: "By death some men understand endless torments in hell-fire; but it seems a strange way of understanding a law which requires the plainest and directest words that by death should be meant eternal life in misery!" Can any one be supposed to mean by a law which says for felony thou shalt surely die—not that he shall lose his life, but be kept in exquisite and perpetual torment? And would any one think himself fairly dealt with who was so used? The late eminent minister of the Presbyterian Church, Dr. Norman Macleod, thus characterizes the heathenism involved in our modern orthodoxy: "The common notion of the punishment of hell-fire, and for all eternity; the punishment of all those who have not been elected, and have for Adam's sin been justly left dead without an atonement; the atonement itself as explained by hyper-Calvinists; the utter impossibility of any teaching or salvation after death (how we may not see); these, and the whole complicated system of sacerdotalism and popery, seem to me a thousand times doomed." This heathen dogma of eternal misery springs from the assumed essential immortality of our race, but there is not to be found in the Word of God a single passage to uphold the opinion. It forms also the basis for the most ruinous delusions—viz., the fiction of the Romish purgatory and the destructive errors of spiritualism. Matthew Henry, in his Commentary on Gen. iii. 19, says: "God entrusted Adam with a spark of immortality; he foolishly blew it out by sin." Thomas Scott says: "Adam forfeited the blessing of immortality." Were the sinner deathless his misery would necessarily be perpetual; but it is not so, for after resurrection and judgment there is the awful suffering of a second death to the incorrigible rejector of the Gospel, from which there is no revealed promise of a resurrection. (See Malachi iv. 1.)

IMMORTALITY AS TAUGHT IN THE BIBLE.

The following series of facts are presented from the Bible for the consideration of every sincere lover of truth:

First, the Apostle Paul is the only writer in the whole Bible who makes use of the words "Immortal" or "Immortality." Second, he never applies it to sinners. Third, he never applies it to the righteous or wicked in this world. Fourth, he never applies it to men's souls at all, either before or after death. Fifth, he speaks of it as an attribute of the King Eternal. (1 Tim. i. 17.) Sixth, he is only the possessor of it. (1 Tim. vi. 16.) Seventh, he presents it as an object which men are to seek after by patient continuance in well doing. (Rom. ii. 7.) Eighth, he speaks of it as revealed or brought to light, not in heathen philosophy, but in the Gospel of the Son of God. (2 Tim. i. 10.) Ninth, he defines the period when it shall be "put on" by the saints of God, and fixes it at the Resurrection, when Christ, who is our life, shall appear. (1 Cor. xv. 51-54.) Tenth, therefore he never taught the immortality of the soul as it is now taught; and hence, when he declared that sinners should be destroyed, or perish, or die, or be burned or devoured by fire, he did so without any "mental reservation," or "theological definition"—in other words, "that he said what he meant, and meant what he said."

The Confession of Faith and orthodox creeds generally ignore these facts. We need not, therefore, be surprised at the prevalence of error concerning the future state of man. Neither may we be surprised at the tenacity with which cultivated but mentally creed-fettered theologians and teachers cling to the assumed dogma of natural or essential immortality, for it ministers to the pride of position—the temptation of the Adversary, who said, “Ye shall not surely die.” . . . “Ye shall be as gods.”

If language has any meaning, that contained in Genesis iii. 22-24 demonstrates that sinful man is not immortal. It declares that God “placed cherubims and a flaming sword which turned every way to keep the way of the tree of life,” lest man, “should put forth his hand and take also of that tree, and eat, and live for ever.” The love and pity of God thus guarded his creature from being immortal in sin and misery, but the means of obtaining eternal life, or immortality, are brought to light through the gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. There is no immortality for man aside from scriptural holiness, which springs from a living faith in Jesus. (Rom. ii. 7.) “He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life.”—I. John v. 12.

THE EVILS WHICH SPRING FROM AUTHORITATIVE HUMAN CREEDS.

The honest but often erroneous opinions of good, uninspired men are, as a gem, crystallized in creeds, confessions or articles of faith. Error is thus consolidated and perpetuated, being handed down from generation to generation as precious authoritative expositions of the Divine Word; but practically, in every case of church discipline, they take the place of the Word of God and invalidate its authority. It becomes, therefore, an all-important question for every lover of truth to inquire whether the Bible gives any sanction whatever for imposing an authoritative creed upon any religious community? Although we may search the inspired Scriptures with scrupulous care, we will not find either precept or example for imposing any authoritative synopsis of doctrines upon the early churches of Christ. All creeds are, therefore, but a weak and unwise invention of man, to secure unity of opinion. They assume that progress in Scriptural knowledge is impossible, although required as an important duty on the part of every believer, and thus present an impediment to the free and salutary investigation of Divine truth. They are, in reality, only human expedients to uphold denominational tenets and interests. The Word of God, however, is not given merely to sustain the power and authority of religious teachers and church courts, but to make all men, “the common people,” and even children (2 Tim. iii. 15), “Wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus.”

The conditions prescribed by apostolic teaching in order to be recognized as a Christian were not belief in any system of doctrines, such as we find embodied in our orthodox creeds, but simply “repentance toward God and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ,” followed by a life of consistent obedience, “walking worthy of the vocation” wherewith they were called. Entire unity of opinion, aimed at by creeds, is both impossible and undesirable. We admire not only the living beauty, but also the variety in the physical creation; then why not in the moral and spiritual?

The case of Mr. Macdonnell, of Toronto, has brought these questions prominently before the public, and it is well they should be investigated in the light of divine revelation. Prof. George Paxton Young, of the University of Toronto, referring to this case in a published letter, remarks: “The subscription to the Confession of Faith which is required as a condition of ordination in the Presbyterian Church of Canada is by no means understood to imply that all the ministers in that Church believe every doctrinal statement contained in the Confession.” . . . “It is no longer understood to be necessary.” At the late General Council in Edinburgh, Professor Milligan, of Aberdeen, also expressed his objection to sign the Confession of Faith with all its minute definitions.

Mr. Macdonnell acted under this conviction when ordained, and when questioned as to his belief in the doctrines of the “Confession,” it is said, answered: “Yes, with qualifications expressed in the Confession of Faith itself, chap. 31, paragraphs 3rd and 4th.”

Chapter 31st, paragraph 3rd declares: “It belongs to Synods and Councils, ministerially, to determine controversies of faith, etc., etc., ‘if consonant with the Word of God.’” Paragraph 4th declares: “All Synods and Councils since the apostolic times, whether general, or particular, may err, and many have erred: therefore, they are not to be made the rule of faith and practice, but to be used as a help to both.” This advice is, in reality, “follow the infallible light of the Word of God, not the dubious counsel of the Confession,” which therefore may with propriety be set aside as a dark relic of the past. We want no Taper with the light of the Sun.

The principal barrier to the progress of religious truth among its avowed teachers, and the abrogation of stereotyped error, is office, with its emoluments, its restraints and fears. "The fear of man bringeth a snare, but whoso putteth his trust in the Lord shall be safe." Proverbs xxix. 25.

In Scotland there is considerable agitation over the proposed revision of the Westminster Confession of Faith. The Rev. Mr. Macrae, of Greenock, made a severe attack on the way in which the Confession sets forth the doctrines of predestination and everlasting burning in the fires of hell. He said that "for the non-elect, young or old, it has no fate but the unending and unspeakable torments of hell. I ask the fathers of this Presbytery to say honestly if this is the theology they preach?"

He also affirmed that the Confession of a Church (so far as its theology is concerned) is the expression of its knowledge of God. If our knowledge advances, so should our Creed; and I commit no one else when I express my belief that our own Confession demands revision to make it an honest expression of our faith and a fair representation of what we now believe the Scriptures to teach. Some are for letting things alone. Some would have peace at any price, forgetting the Scripture that says, "First pure" and only then "Peaceable." Some say, "Why should we have disturbance?" If you or any one else cannot endorse the Westminster standards, why not leave the Church? My answer is that the Church is not based on the Westminster standards, but on the Word of God. I entered the Church and remain in the Church while I may, because it professes to be a Church of God, and I believe in God; because it professes to be a Church of Christ, and I believe in Christ; because it professes to be a Church of the Bible, and I believe in the Bible. The formula of our Church points to the Bible (not to the Confession) as the supreme rule of faith and practice. . . . Truth in all ages is the same, but not our acquaintance with it. God is the same, but we are called to grow in our knowledge of him. . . . Let us not be afraid of change, if it be in the interests of honesty and truth. Let us not dishonor God by supposing that his cause has no chance if it keep not the shelter of the Westminster standards.

LITERAL FULFILMENT OF PROPHECY.

MORE than thirty years ago, in studying the Word of God, I adopted the view of the literal fulfilment of prophecy; and no efforts of spiritualizers, nor labored arguments to prove prophecy conditional, have ever caused me for a moment to waver in my position from the first. I have for near forty years maintained that Judah and Israel would be restored to the land of Palestine and become one nation, as in the days of Solomon and David his father.

Now that day is dawning. The day-star is rising. The events in the East show that God is moving for the literal fulfilment of the prophetic utterances of the prophets whom he raised up to proclaim his purposes two and three thousand years ago. The following exhibition of prophetic utterances were, in substance, published by me many years since, and I repeat them now.

Let it be recollected that whatever may be said of the return of Judah or the Jews from Babylon, Israel, or the ten tribes, never did return from their captivity in Assyria.

See Jer. xxiii. 5-8: "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous Branch, and a King shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In his days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely: and this is his name whereby he shall be called THE LORD OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS! Therefore, behold the days come, saith the Lord, that they shall no more say, The Lord liveth which brought up the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt; but, The Lord liveth, which brought up and which led the seed of the house of Israel out of the north country, and from all the countries whither I have driven them; and they shall dwell in their own land." Here is a prophecy, so far as it respects the "reign" of that "King" and "Judah and Israel," which never has had a fulfilment. Faith says it must have its literal accomplishment; but unbelief will doubtless seek some other course to hide its want of confidence in God's disposition or ability to do what it cannot see how it is to be effected.

Again, Jer. xvi. 15, 16: "But, the Lord liveth, that brought up the children of Israel from the land of the north, and from all the lands whither he had driven them; and I will bring them again into their land that I gave unto their fathers. Behold, I will send for many fishers, saith the Lord, and they shall fish them; and after will I send for many hunters, and they shall hunt them from every mountain, and from every hill, and out of the holes in the rocks." The days never have "come" yet when this has been said, or could have been said, with truth. It remains then to be fulfilled. Also Jer. xxx. 3, 4: "For, lo, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will bring again the captivity of my people Israel and Judah, saith the Lord; and I will cause them to return to the land that I gave to their fathers, and they shall possess it. And these are the words that the Lord spake concerning Israel and concerning Judah." Here the prophecy is very particular to mark both nations. Again, verse 10: "Therefore fear thou not, O my servant Jacob, saith the Lord; neither be dismayed, O Israel: for, lo, I will save thee from afar, and thy seed from the land of their captivity; and Jacob shall return, and shall be in rest and be quiet, and none shall make him afraid." Also vs. 18-20, "Thus saith the Lord; Behold, I will bring again the captivity of Jacob's tents, and have mercy on his dwelling-places; and the city shall be builded upon her own heap, and the palace shall remain after the manner thereof. And out of them shall proceed thanksgiving and the voice of them that make merry: and I will multiply them, and they shall not be few; I will also glorify them, and they shall not be small. Their children shall also be as aforetime, and their congregation shall be established before me, and I will punish all that oppress them." This cannot apply to anything that has ever yet been done for them. Their "palace" built after the captivity in Babylon did not "remain."

Again, Jer. xxxi. 4-8: "Again I will build thee, and thou shalt be built, O virgin of Israel: thou shalt again be adorned with thy tabrets, and shalt go forth in the dances of them that make merry. Thou shalt yet plant vines upon the mountains of Samaria; the planters shall plant, and shall eat them as common things. For there shall be a day that the watchmen upon the Mount Ephraim shall cry, Arise ye, and let us go up to Zion unto the Lord our God. For thus saith the Lord; Sing with gladness for Jacob, and shout among the chief of the nations: publish ye, praise ye, and say, O Lord, save thy people, the remnant of Israel. Behold I will bring them from the north country, and gather them from the coasts of the earth, and with them the blind and the lame, the woman with child and her that travaileth with child together: a great company shall return thither." Samaria belonged to the ten tribes or nation of Israel. They have never since that prophecy was uttered "planted vines upon the mountains of Samaria"; but the day shall come when they will do it. This gathering is not of the immortal saints, for, "They shall come with weeping, and with supplications will I lead them: I will cause them to walk by the rivers of waters in a straight way, wherein they shall not stumble: for I am a father to Israel, and Ephraim is my first-born." That is not the way the immortal saints are to be gathered; they are to be "caught up, to meet the Lord in the air": and this will be with shouting, not "weeping." I would here remark that "Ephraim" is a general name for the ten tribes, of which it was the principal, chief, or "first."

Once more, Jer. xxxiii. 7: "And I will cause the captivity of Judah and the captivity of Israel to return, and will build them as at the first." This language is too explicit to be misunderstood. Here are "Judah and Israel," and they are not only to "return" but to be "built as at the first." That never has been done; and it cannot be applied to the gathering of Christians into the new earth, or anywhere else. It can, therefore, only have a fulfilment, as the language clearly shows, in the building again of Judah and Israel into one nation.

Let us look at Zeph. iii. 13, 19, 20: "The remnant of Israel shall not do iniquity, nor speak lies; neither shall a deceitful tongue be found in their mouth; for they shall feed and lie down, and none shall make them afraid. Behold, at that time I will undo all that afflict thee: and I will save her that halteth, and gather her that was driven out; and I will get them praise and fame in every land where they have been put to shame. At that time will I bring you again, even in the time that I gather you: for I will make you a name and a praise among all people of the earth, when I turn back your captivity before your eyes, saith the Lord." Compare this with Amos ix. 14, 15: "And I will bring again the captivity of my people of Israel, and they shall build the waste cities, and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards, and drink the wine thereof; they shall also make gardens and eat the fruit of them. And I will plant them upon their land, and they shall no more be pulled out of their land, which I have given them, saith the Lord thy God."

Let us now turn to Isa. xi. 11-16; a portion of Scripture on which as much labor has been expended to remove it out of the way of a literal return of Judah and Israel as Bunyan represents was done to fill up the "slough of despond" to prevent Christians from falling into it, and with as little effect; for there stands Isa. xi. still, ever in the way of "spiritualism," or no "restoration of Judah and Israel," and the "conditional prophecy" advocates. In fact, the more attempts that are made to fill up this "slough" of spiritualizers the more visible it becomes—the more clearly it appears that all attempts to explain it, except in a literal manner, as relating to Judah and Israel, are vain and futile.

"And it shall come to pass in that day, that the Lord shall set his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people, which shall be left, from Assyria [there was where the tribes were carried, and where a 'remnant' of them are found at this day], and from Egypt, and from Pathros, and from Cush, and from Elam, and from Shinar, and from Hamath, and from the islands of the sea. And he shall set up an ensign for the nations, and shall assemble the outcasts of Israel [a phrase which always, I believe, means the ten tribes; they were called 'outcasts,' not 'dispersed,' as Judah was: these outcasts are to be 'assembled'] and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth." From everywhere that they have been scattered. "The envy also of Ephraim shall depart, and the adversaries of Judah shall be cut off; Ephraim shall not envy Judah, and Judah shall not vex Ephraim." Let it be remembered that the two nations, Judah and Ephraim, before the captivity and carrying away of the latter to Assyria, were almost always at war. This spirit of strife is to cease when their restoration occurs. "They shall fly (implying swiftness) upon the shoulders (or borders, as the original signifies) of the Philistines toward the west. They shall spoil them of the East together." As Israel spoiled the Egyptians when recovered the first time from captivity, so when "the Lord shall set his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people, which shall be left from Assyria," "they shall spoil them of the East." "They shall lay their hand upon Edom and Moab; and the children of Ammon shall obey them." It is a little remarkable that these are the same countries that "escape out of the hand" of the "overflowing king."—Daniel xi. 40-41. Having escaped the judgment from that king, their minds may be prepared to aid Israel at that time. "And the Lord shall utterly destroy the tongue of Egyptian sea; and with his mighty wind shall he shake his hand over the river, and shall smite it in the seven streams, and make men go over dry-shod. And there shall be an highway for the remnant of his people which shall be left from Assyria, like as it was to Israel in the day that he came up out of the land of Egypt." Mark the language—"the remnant—from Assyria:" from there, especially, there will be a gathering. What is meant by "the tongue of the Egyptian sea" the event must, perhaps, determine. It may mean one of the forks of the Red Sea, or the entire sea itself. "The river," I think, is the river Euphrates, which will then be literally smitten at or near its several mouths. It is said the original will admit of this translation—"Shall shake his hand over the river and smite it into seven streams." If so, it seems the meaning is, that in that day God will make the river Euphrates the means of watering and refreshing what is now the "desert" of Arabia, which, in that day, is to be made "like the garden of the Lord." See Isa. li. 3. That desert is included in the territory given to the posterity of Jacob. See Gen. xv. 18, and Ex. xxxiii. 31. In this view all is harmony, beauty, order, and God-like. In any other view all is fancy, unsatisfying and confusion

GOD'S PURPOSE BY A FIRST-BORN.

By a first-born it was God's purpose to bless and save the later-born. This fact is the substance of the Gospel; but, like all God's secrets, comes out by degrees—not all at once. It is scarcely to be discerned at first, though contained in the promise of the bruising the head of the serpent evil by the woman's seed (Gen. ii. 15), but it shines more clearly in the promise and oath of God to Abraham, confirmed to Isaac and Jacob, "In thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed" (Gen. xxii. 16-18, xxvi. 3-4, xxviii. 14), and the seed, in whom all the families of the earth are to be blessed, is distinct from and must be blessed prior to its blessing others, or becoming a blessing according to God's purpose. The blessing is to come on all families of the earth "in due time" (1. Tim. ii. 6), which is God's time, and which he has kept and still keeps "in his own power" (Acts i. 7), but shall be made manifest ultimately in the best way to the very letter of the promise.

This purpose of blessing all the families of the earth by a first-born is further revealed and confirmed in the law of the first-fruits and the first-born (Rom. xi. 16), though here the veil of type and shadow hides from most persons the face of Moses. But in Christ the purpose is unveiled, and the mystery by the first-born to save others is, by the Holy Spirit, made more fully manifest. Christ, says the apostle, is the promised seed (Gal. iii. 16); the first-born (Col. i. 18); and in and through him blessings shall flow down on the later-born.

Christ, as Paul shows, is first-born in a double sense. He is first-born from above, first out of life, for he is the only-begotten Son of God, begotten of the Father before all worlds; "the first-born of every creature," for by him were all things created which are in heaven and which are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers; all things were created by him and for him, and he is before all things, and by him all things consist."—Col. i. 15-17. He is more than this, for he is also "first-born from the dead," first out of death, "that in all things he might have the pre-eminence" (Col. i. 18), and it is in this relation, as first-born from the dead, that he is Head of the Church and first-fruits of the creature. All things are indeed of God, but it is no less true also that all things are by man, as it is written, "since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead."—1 Cor. xv. 21. Therefore, as by one first-born death came into the world, so by another first-born shall death be overthrown. Herein is love indeed, that the whole remedy for sin shall come through man, even as the sin did. Thus, not only is there salvation for man, but by man, for the Son of God is also Son of man; who by a birth in the flesh has come in to our lot, that by another birth out of the grave he might also be the first-born from the dead; and it is in virtue of this relation that he fulfils for us all those offices which are included in the word Redeemer.

What does the law of Moses teach us of this first-born from the dead? Be it observed, it is ever the first-born from the grave that the law speaks of, and therefore the woman's, not the man's, first-born, "the male which first openeth the womb" (Numb. iii. 12-13), who might also, though not necessarily, be the father's first-born. For the law, as made for sinners only (1 Tim. i. 9), needed not to speak of the first-born as proceeding out of God, but as only of the first-born as raised up by him out of the grave and barren womb of this present fallen and unclean nature.

According to the law, the first-born had the right (though it might be lost) of being priest and king—that is, of interceding for and ruling over their younger brethren; and on him devolved the duty of Goel or Redeemer, to redeem a brother who had waxen poor and sold himself unto a stranger; to avenge his blood, to raise up seed to the dead; and to redeem the inheritance if at any time it was lost or alienated.—Lev. xxv. 47, 48. To sustain these duties God gave him a double portion.—Deut. xxi. 17. Does not Christ fulfil these particulars? First out of the grave, that "barren womb, which cries, give, give."—Prov. xxx. 15, 16. He is the first-born through whom the blessing reaches us. In this respect no Christian doubts that God's purpose is by the first-born from the dead to bless and save a later-born.

Those who, like Abraham, in the present and past ages have become by faith "joint heirs with Christ" (Rom. viii. 17) are also of the first-born or first-fruits; and when Christ and his body are glorified together, and thus the head and body are perfected, it is most manifest; it is then that the blessing of "all the families of the earth" commences in its perfection, and "later-born" may be expected to share in the blessing of the offices belonging to the first-born as set forth in the types and shadows of the law. The righteous "shall shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father" (Matt. xiii. 43), and shine on "multitudes which no man can number."—Rev. vii. 9. The work of the first-born will then be understood.—Selected.

LETTERS AND EXTRACTS.

FROM POLLY G. PITTS.

BRO. STORRS: I am truly glad in the Lord, and have been growing so for some time, and I had been praying that the BIBLE EXAMINER for August might be filled with the living truth as it is in Jesus. And now it is received. Oh, how glad it has made me! and I can truly feel the truth of the saying, "Light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart." And it was the grace of God, through our Lord Jesus Christ, that sowed the light and the gladness. I bless God for furnishing you with the contents of the EXAMINER. The article, "A Curious Marriage," rejoiced my heart greatly, so that I had to exclaim while reading it, "Bless the Lord! yes, Bless the Lord forever!" Thanks be to His glorious name for the light that it threw on His blessed Word and on our past experience, and far ahead, even to the day of God. Oh, how blessed to live now and see the goodness of the Lord, and to see His purposes ripening every hour, throwing a glorious light on the near coming of our Lord and the great restitution of all things, spoken of by all the holy prophets since the ages began! Oh, bless the Lord! "They that be planted in the house of the Lord shall," yes, shall "flourish in the courts of our God; they shall bring forth fruit in old age; their leaf shall be green." Again, Bless the Lord! But are there not powerful sufferings, trials and chastenings, till we often feel, like Job, to exclaim, "As for my hope, who shall see it?" Yes, I know it well. But the Captain of our salvation was made perfect through sufferings. And "if we suffer with Him, we shall reign with Him." Like Paul, I reckon the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed in us." Oh, may the gracious God, by His Spirit and Word, help us to know assuredly that we do suffer with Christ; that our sufferings are like His; and know assuredly that we are or have been planted in the house of the Lord, and the fruit that we bring forth is unto holiness!

Looking at the startling news of England's espousing the cause of Turkey, for a moment I was surprised that she should take such a responsibility on her. Bless the Lord, it was but for a moment; to me the hand of the Lord was in it; to me it was an overwhelming evidence that the Anglo-Saxons are Israel. And God is opening wide the way for the return of Judah, or Jews, to their own land. Oh! who would not be glad to live now that has any interest in God or his Christ, or his eternal, immutable promises in his holy Word, or his kingdom that is to come when his will is done on earth as it is in heaven? Yes, who? If what God is now doing in the world does not make our hope like an anchor to our souls, that is embedded in Christ Jesus, the Rock of ages, and increase our faith in God and his Word, we have reason to fear.

I have been looking for many years at things transpiring in the East, especially since I began to look for our Lord to come the second time. I have been astonished at the position that England has taken, at times, since the war began in Turkey. But I feel that our God rules in the kingdoms of men, and that he appointeth over them whomsoever he will. England waited till she saw that Russia had gained the day—was triumphant, and Turkey, like a wilful, whipped child, unable to help itself; and by espousing its cause she has secured to herself a splendid broad way to her Indian possessions, and almost supreme power over Asiatic Turkey. When I look at these things and the short work the Lord is doing in the earth, I can but rejoice. Just look at Isaiah, xlix. After speaking of whom and by whom and for whom God's great plan of salvation is consummated, the prophet in glowing words of comfort tells what God is going to do for Zion. And He is now doing it before our eyes. Verse 11: "And I will make all my mountains a way and my highways shall be exalted. Behold, these shall come from far; and, lo, these from the north and west, and these from the land of Sinim." Who shall come? Let us see. "Sing, O heavens, and be joyful, O earth; and break forth into singing, O mountains; for the Lord hath comforted his people, and will (future time) have mercy on his afflicted." Amen, so be it. "But Zion said, The Lord hath forsaken me, and my Lord hath forgotten me." Oh, the condescension of our God, who in love and mercy reasons thus with his suffering, erring children! "Can a woman forget her sucking child, that she should not have compassion on the son of her womb? Yea, they may forget, yet will I not forget thee. Behold"—i. e., look, see, give attention, hear what thy God saith—"Behold, I have graven thee upon the palms of my hands; thy walls are continually before me. Thy children shall make haste; thy destroyers and they that made thee waste shall go forth of thee." Bless the Lord, the heavy tread of the Gentile foot is being lifted, growing lighter every day. "Lift up thine eyes round about and behold; all these gather themselves together and come" (who shall come? Ans. The children) "to thee. As I live, saith the Lord, thou (Zion) shalt surely clothe thee with them all as with an ornament, and bind them on thee as a bride doeth." Oh, how abundantly willing is our God to show unto the heirs of glory and all that flee unto him for refuge the immutability of his word, to confirm it with an oath? Do I believe it? Yes, with all my being.

The prophet goes on to say: "For thy waste and thy desolate places, and the land of thy destruction, shall even now be too narrow by reason of the inhabitants, and they that swallowed thee up shall be far away. The children which thou shalt have after thou hast lost the others shall say again in thine ears, The place is too strait for me; give place to me that I may dwell. Then thou shalt say in thine heart, Who hath begotten me these, seeing I had lost my children, and am desolate, a captive, removing to and fro? and who hath brought up these? Behold, I was left alone; these, where had they been?" Oh, let us bless God for the glorious answer to "Where had they been?" "Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I will lift up my hand to the Gentiles, and set up my standard to the people; and they shall bring thy sons in their arms, and thy daughters shall be carried upon their shoulders. And kings shall be thy nursing fathers, and their queens thy nursing mothers." Oh, say not that God is not doing a great work in the world to-day, and fulfilling his promises to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob! Who would have thought six months ago that the Queen of England would hold a sceptre (in one sense) in Palestine to-day, or in Asiatic Turkey? Is not her word law as much as the Sultan's, especially in the appointment of the governors over the fifteen provinces? No doubt she will be a motherly queen and the oppressed will feel her influence. Yes, they are all ready to come. The gold is ready, the silver and the cattle upon a thousand hills are the Lord's. How soon could our God fill Palestine till they would say: "Give place for us to dwell;" it is too narrow! A thousand prophecies crowd each other for development, and soon the land may be covered with villages without bars or gates, and dwellers dwelling at ease; and Russia only have time before she "thinks an evil thought" to gather up her scattered implements of war, go home and get ready for the great battle of Armageddon. Yes, as a result of the evil thought, "come from her north quarters a great company with thee, a mighty army as a cloud to cover the land in these last or latter days. Yes, O Gog, our God will bring thee against the land of Israel, and thou shalt fall upon the mountains of Israel; thou and all thy bands, and the many people that are with thee, for he (our God) will give thee unto the ravenous birds of every sort, and to the beasts of the field, to be devoured. I will call for a sword against him throughout all my mountains, saith the Lord God; every man's sword shall be against his brother. And I will plead against him with pestilence and with blood; and I will rain upon him, and upon his bands, and the many people that are with him, an overflowing rain, and great hailstones, fire and brimstone. Thus will I magnify myself, and sanctify myself; and I will be known" (bless the Lord, whom to know aright is life eternal) "in the eyes of many nations, and they shall know that I am the LORD. So will I make my holy name known in the midst of my people Israel; and I will not let them pollute my holy name any more" (Amen, glory to our God): "and the heathens or Gentiles shall know that I am the LORD, the Holy One of Israel." The knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea. For this bless the Lord, O my soul.

Dear brethren, truly our God is making his Church the espoused to Christ, the pillar and ground of the truth. I say, he is making it the light of the world and the salt of the earth. Let no one say, again, that the wise shall not understand; for they shall understand what our God is doing, so that they can truly lift up their heads and rejoice, "knowing" that their redemption draws nigh. Oh, let us begin anew the battle of the Lord, dear brethren, knowing that our God can save by a few as well as by many; and by the weak things of the world as by the mighty. I think God will assuredly hold up the EXAMINER, for it is his own instrument to spread the light on his word; and he will put it into the heart of his people to hold it up, for they are his sword and his battle-axe.

Your sister in the Lord, hoping, watching, waiting, God grant that it may be patiently, for our Lord.

Fredericksburg, Iowa, Aug. 16, 1878.

RECEIPT OF VARIOUS WORKS.—My friend JAMES LESSLIE, Esq., of Toronto, Canada, will accept my thanks for a pamphlet, entitled "The Regal Advent and the Resurrection of the Past," a Sermon, by Rev. Thomas Rattray, of Toronto. Brother Lesslie says of the author: "Formerly a minister among the Wesleyans, but now unconnected with any denomination, he is a devoted Christian and a firm believer in and advocate of Conditional Immortality. His pamphlet broaches a new theory as to the Second Advent and the resurrection of the righteous."

I have not had time to examine it before the issue of the September EXAMINER.

JOHN CHARLES EARLE, B.A., of London, Eng., will please accept my thanks for the works of his recently received, viz.: "THE SPIRITUAL BODY," a book of 200 pages; a pamphlet of forty-five pages, entitled "The Forty Days; or, Christ between His Resurrection and Ascension"; also another of similar form and size, entitled "The Master's Field: A Series of Sonnets."

If life and health are granted me and the BIBLE EXAMINER continues to live, my intention is to give these works an examination and suitable notice hereafter.

Mr. EARLE's letter accompanying these works is necessarily laid over for future consideration.

DEATH YET REIGNS.—THOMAS J. HARRIS, of Harrisburg, Pa., fell asleep in death August 10th.

This brother was with us, at my house, at the Passover, or "Lord's Supper," in April last, having come near 200 miles for that purpose. I am not informed as to his age, but think it was 80 years, if not more. He was one of my long-tried friends. For near 40 years I have had intercourse with him. He was a quiet and sincere Christian, and a true friend to me. I trust he "sleeps in Jesus" and will awake at His voice on our Lord's return "from heaven."—Phil. iii : 20.—

EDITORIAL NOTICES.

PAMPHLETS.—The question may be asked, Why do you not advertise your pamphlets as in times past? I answer, Because I have not the means to publish them. Pecuniarily they never were of any help to me. I had for years been accumulating stereotype plates to the cost of near or quite a thousand dollars' worth. With the exception of the ones for the "DIVINE DISPENSATIONS" and the small tracts, they had been kept in the "safety vault" of John J. Reed, who had done most of the printing with them. Some two years since Mr. Reed died. As the business was still carried on by another man I supposed my plates were safe. It was some months before I had occasion to use them; then not one of them could be found: a total sweep had been made of the entire lot, and I could find no trace of them; so I have to suffer the loss of all and cannot furnish any more.

"The DIVINE DISPENSATIONS" I can still furnish, but shall be under the necessity of advancing the price to 15 cents per copy; $1.25 per dozen.

REMITTANCES.—In these times of theft and robbery no one should venture money by mail except by a "Postal Money Order," if you can get one. If that cannot be done have your letter "Registered" at the office where mailed. Even then its safety depends on the honesty of the officials who take charge of the letter. It is, perhaps, just as safe to send small sums in a letter, carefully sealed and properly directed, without registering as with.

The next best thing to a "Postal Money Order" in remitting money is a Draft on some Banking House in New York City, payable to me or my order. GEO. STORRS.

THE BIBLE EXAMINER.

SEVEN years have now passed since this Magazine was revived from an eight years' slumber, and revived for the express purpose of vindicating the character and government of the CREATOR and REDEEMER in his administration over the human family. That one object the EDITOR has endeavored to keep constantly in view. How far he may have succeeded or failed others may determine: he knows what his object has been. He has endeavored to avoid all uncharitable feelings and expressions toward such as differ from his views of the subject, while he has presented his own faithfully and fearlessly, regardless of consequences to himself. He thanks those who have stood by him in the conflict, and trusts they will be abundantly rewarded by our Father in heaven, whose honor and glory may we ever seek in all we do or say.

As to the character of the work designed to be accomplished by this Magazine, the EDITOR, in addressing its "friends" a year ago, made the following remarks and here repeats them, hoping they may make a deep and lasting impression on all our minds, and stimulate us to continued exertions in the great and glorious work our God and Redeemer has intrusted us to do for the promotion of his cause, and the consolation of sincere souls that have been overwhelmed by the awful representations of the Divine character and government over the children of men.

The light we seek on the character and government of "Our Father in heaven" is, indeed, only to be found in the Bible. In the periodicals of all sects and parties the light we look for is excluded, or only shines through thick veils.

We wish to know what is God's purpose concerning the race—the world—that he "so loved" that he "gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." Did he intend that vast millions should perish without the knowledge of his love, and without any opportunity to accept the benefits to be derived from it? If so—and nearly all Christendom virtually maintain that the Creator did so determine—then what becomes of truth, honesty, or any other attribute said to belong to God, who made us, and who is said to give his Son to be "the propitiation for the sins of the whole world"? 1 John ii. 2. What becomes of his "Oath" to Abraham, that in him "and his seed all families, nations and kindreds of the earth shall be blessed"? Yea, what becomes of that God who swore by himself, "I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth"? if he so ordereth his administration of the Government of "the world" that innumerable millions die without any knowledge of "the only true God and Jesus Christ," whom he "sent into the world to be the Light of the world."

To impute such an administration to the CREATOR, which makes his "ways unequal," and his testimony of "love to the world" a palpable falsehood, is "Atheism" itself: though we may pray for such teachers, "Father forgive them, for they know not what they do."

Shall the first and chief periodical in America that spoke and still speaks out boldly on this question be compelled to suffer and be crippled for want of funds, after having lived so long in spite of all the attempts of falsehood and misrepresentation to strangle it? It must not be, and it will not be if God is on its side, as hitherto he has been, beyond a doubt in my mind. But if he says, "Thy work is done for this Age," I hope to respond, Amen: but give me a part in the glorious work of "the ages to come."
GEO. STORRS.

AN APPEAL FOR THE BIBLE EXAMINER.

BY A RECENT CONVERT TO ITS TEACHING.*

BRO. STORRS: Permit me to say a few words upon a subject very near and dear to the hearts of all your readers—the continued publication of the BIBLE EXAMINER. I am sure every one to whom it comes monthly as a welcome visitor, bringing comfort, instruction, exhortation and, above all, ever-enlarging views of God's love and mercy toward our fallen race, would joyfully sacrifice much to maintain it. But many who love and prize it are denied privilege of aiding it beyond payment of the subscription price; while others cannot do even that. As there is no organized Society to support it, and no advertisements to create a revenue for it (and it is purer and more independent without either), we who love it, and are able, must see that it is maintained. Let the strong bear the burdens of the weak; let the young and vigorous see that the aged, infirm and poor of God's flock are not denied this comfort and joy in their declining years. Surely the Elect of this dispensation should gladly make this sacrifice.

Since my introduction to the EXAMINER (so recent and sudden) I have noticed that not only its EDITOR but many of its contributors and supporters are far advanced in years; and this fact has caused me to feel at times like a young and impulsive traveller who has come unexpectedly upon a camp of aged and reverend pilgrims bound heavenward; and I wonder at the providence which impelled me forward from the caravan of the orthodox, toiling on so slowly in the fixed twilight of traditional belief, into this goodly company of patriarchs, who have journeyed so far into the land of truth that the bright rays of its rising sun are warming their hearts and lighting up their pathway. Surely I, and such as I, should rejoice and be sincerely thankful for this blessed deliverance. And while we enjoy companionship with the wise, and learn lessons of wisdom and prudence from their experience, we should gladly take from their shoulders the burdens they carry and cheer their hearts with words of hope and love.

Let us all, then, make it a matter of duty and of conscience to aid Brother Storrs in his work, holding up his hands by substantial contributions, as the Lord may prosper us.

LUKE XX. 36 CONSIDERED.

THE opponents of the view that the "Promise and oath of God" secures the preaching of the "Gospel to every creature," suppose that the above text is a refutation of my position. Say they, "It cannot be preached to those who have died without the knowledge of it, unless they are raised from the dead; and Luke xx. 36 affirms such cannot die any more, and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection. Hence, all the resurrected are immortal."

A careful examination of the text and context may serve to lessen confidence in its supposed teaching in relation to a future life. That there are at least two resurrections of dead ones seems clearly taught in Rev. xx., and more or less clearly taught in many other passages of Scripture. But Luke xx. relates mainly to the "first resurrection," or the resurrection of the saints who have become such in this life. The case put by the Sadducees supposes all the persons presented by them were righteous, because they had strictly conformed to the law; and hence, if there is any resurrection, marriages must take place; and whose wife of the seven husbands shall she be?

Our Lord manifestly accepts their supposition that the whole eight persons were righteous, or of "the just;" and hence would come into that class in "the resurrection of the just." Luke xiv. 14. That resurrection occurs at the second advent of Jesus, at the end of this age: at which time none but "the just" will be revived from the dead; such of the dead and they only, as will "be counted worthy to obtain that (aionos) age"—the next age following the present—the age of "the kingdom of God," or personal reign of Christ on earth, with his saints made immortal, and sitting with him on his throne. Rev. ii. 26, 27; iii. 21; v. 9, 10; and xx. 4. The "thousand years" in the text last mentioned, whether literal or symbolical, gives the duration of the next age to follow "the resurrection of the just."

Saith our Lord to the Sadducees, "The children of this (aionos) age marry and are given in marriage: but they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that (aionos) age, and the resurrection from (ek-out from) the dead, neither marry nor are given in marriage: neither can they die any more; for they are . . . the children of God, being the children of the resurrection."

Our Lord then shows that Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are samples of the persons who shall be accounted worthy to obtain that honorable and distinctive resurrection, pertaining to the next aionos age. All such will "sit on thrones" and "reign with Christ the thousand years: but the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. Rev. xx. 4, 5.

Thus Luke xx. and Rev. xx. throw light on each other; and both together show the nature and order of the resurrection. "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: on such the second death hath no power, ["they cannot die any more" Luke xx.]; "they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him the thousand years" (Rev. xx. 6, and ii. 11.), and "shall not be hurt of the second death."

The whole character and structure of these portions of scripture show that there are two resurrections: the "first" embracing only such as have obtained, in this life, a worthiness to be made undying by a resurrection, and to be associated with Christ in his reign and glory; while others will be left to a later resurrection and be liable to the second death, and will experience it if they wilfully reject the LIFE-GIVER when he is clearly offered for their acceptance.

No one of the human race will be raised from the dead in a hopeless condition, or in a worse condition than that he was in before his death. All resurrection is of grace, and not of wrath. The "first" resurrection, among other things, is a preparation to bless the subjects of the future one; so that none shall finally become subjects of "the second death" for lack of knowledge or instruction which shall enable them to become worthy to have access to the "tree of life and live forever."

On the subject of the genuineness of the text (Rev. xx. 5) I have not dared to doubt since publishing the article of Prof. C. F. Hudson, a short time before his death, though I had previously thought it an interpolation; but, when convinced of an error, I abandon it; and "GEO. STORRS" is no more in my way of doing so than any other man. Truth, and not our past theories, is what every Christian's heart will seek, if actuated simply by the love of truth. The fear of reproach if we give up former positions, or modify them, is an unworthy motive of action and shows that we "love the praise of men more than the praise of God." John xii. 43.

ED.

DOES THE SPIRIT LIVE WHEN MAN IS DEAD?

I NEVER expect to satisfy those who, like the Sadducees, think a resurrection impossible because they cannot comprehend "how the dead" are "raised up." As to the state the spirit of man is in while dead it is in vain to speculate; and we can know nothing about it further than God has been pleased to make known. The offence with our opponents is, that we maintain the dead are unconscious—that there is "no knowledge in sheol"—the state of the dead.

This is what strikes the death-blow to their natural immortal-soul theory.

The idea that because consciousness may cease in this present state and yet the spirit be alive, therefore the spirit may be alive, though unconscious, after the man is dead, is not well founded. A fact is undeniable. While the man is alive the signs of life are evident; but when the man is dead there is no sign of life, and therefore no evidence of the spirit being exempt from death; to pass beyond that point, looking for life still existing, is to launch into an unknown land. That the identity of the man is maintained by the power of his Creator I have never doubted, and have always contended. But that life is essential to maintain that identity is what lacks proof. And to assume that if the life of the entire man is suspended God cannot restore the same life, is a palpable denial of the resurrection of the dead; it is an error that originates in "ignorance of the Scriptures and the power of God." It has been said that the identity of the body depends not upon the same particles of matter of which the body was composed, but "upon organization." The same identical organization must of necessity, when made alive, develop the same identical mind, and we have no occasion to suppose the mind or spirit had been kept alive to re-inhabit a house built for it. Not to philosophize about this matter, I regard the objection that if the whole man dies, then to resurrect would be to create anew, which cannot be the same thing, just as I would the objection of an unbeliever in the days of Abraham who might have said to that Patriarch when about to offer up his son as a burnt-offering—"Abraham, if you thus sacrifice your son, the promise of a multitudinous posterity through him can never be realized; for if God raise him up from the dead as you say, it will not be your Isaac—it will only be one like him; and you can never know certain that it is Isaac that God promised should 'come forth out of thine own bowels;' surely it will not be that Isaac, and God's promise will fail after all."

The truth is, unbelief is never satisfied, and never can be. All we have to enquire is, What has God said? Has he said he will raise the dead? Has he told us that any part of man is exempt from death? Has he said, that in order to enable him to raise the dead, man must be only half dead? If so, there is to be only half a resurrection; for that which is not dead cannot be raised to life.

The expression "breath of lives" (Gen. ii. 7) is not expressive of a "double life." The original is ha'yim, and is the same in Gen. vii.

22, where, in speaking of the death by the flood, "of fowl, of cattle, beasts and every creeping thing, and every man," it is added, "all in whose nostrils was the breath of ha'yim." The expression (Gen. ii. 7), therefore, imports nothing more than that man was made to live by the same breath which was common to fowls, beasts and creeping things. It was the breath of all lives, or of every living creature as well as man. Many examples of this truth might be urged from the Scriptures, but I think this is sufficient.

As to the text, Job xxxiv. 14-15, I think it is God's Spirit, and God's breath that is there spoken of. In the previous chapter, verse 4, Elihu had said, "The Spirit of God hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty hath given me life"; thus showing how we are created and by what means man lives. Then, in the same discourse, he says, "If he (God) set his heart upon man, if he (God) gather unto himself his spirit and his breath," [by which man was "made" and had "life," what would be the result]? "all flesh shall perish together and man shall turn again unto dust." That would be man's destiny if God withdrew his spirit and breath from man. This text, therefore, I regard as decidedly against the idea of a "double life" in man. The same explanation is applicable to Isa. xlii. 5, as to that by Elihu.

The text (Zech. xii. 1) has a rational exposition without resorting to the preposterous idea that there is a man within the man formed of the dust of the ground, or a distinct entity, called spirit or soul. The Mosaic account of man's creation gives no countenance to such an idea.

The term "spirit," Zech. xii. 1, is ruach. Turn to Prov. xxix. 11, and we find the same word translated mind: "A fool uttereth all his mind—ruach—but a wise man keepeth it till afterward." Does a fool utter—yotso, bring out—all his internal entity when he speaks? Again: God saith, Hab. i. 11, of the Chaldean—"Then shall his mind—ruach—change?" Did the Chaldean's "second" or internal "entity" change?

To assume that the mind—ruach—is a distinct entity, and so constituted as to form a second man, which may live independent of the man formed of the dust of the ground, is an unfounded assumption.

The text (Zech. xii. 1) means no more than that God formed an intelligent being with mind—a mind of a higher order than other animals.

The text (Job xxxii. 8) expresses the fact that there is a spirit—ruach—mind "in man," in consequence of which he is capable of receiving "the inspiration of the Almighty," and so obtain "understanding"; but proves nothing of a distinct entity or real being in man called a spirit. The very idea, to me, is a palpable absurdity. Man is man, and not two men. This notion has filled the theological world with confusion. "The spirit of man within him" is the mind, and not an entity. "Our spirit," with which "the Spirit bears witness," is our mind. "Understanding and knowledge are ascribed to" man as man. If there is in us an entity, called a spirit, that is capable of receiving "understanding and knowledge" independent of our organization, let it be proved. It never has been proved, though it has been and still is often assumed. Again I say, man is man—he is a unit; when, therefore, it is said, "the Spirit beareth witness with our spirit," it is but saying, that its testimony is in agreement with our own consciousness of the fact.

The text Eccl. iii. 21, taken with its context, proves that men and beasts "all have one breath"—ruach—spirit, or breath, "so that man hath [in death] no pre-eminence above a beast, . . . all go to one place." Surely, in the very next verse he does not contradict himself! A foolish man might, but a man wise as Solomon did not do it; hence he did not affirm (verse 21) what is so often alleged, viz.: that man's spirit goes up and a beast's down at death? No; the verse is an affirmation of the truth of what he had just said, "Man hath no pre-eminence above a beast" [in death]; "all go to one place." He then challenges any man to produce the knowledge in evidence that the spirit of the one goeth upward and the other downward at death. The verse is a question and challenge. "Who knoweth the reverse of what I have just stated?" That this is the sense is obvious from the context, and also from the 9th chapter, where he affirms "there is no knowledge in sheol"—in the state of the dead.

On Eccl. xii. 7, the same remarks are applicable that I have made on Job xxxiv. 14-15. "The Spirit" may be understood of the Spirit of God, by which man was made of the dust of the ground, which, when God resumes or withdraws to himself, "who gave it," man shall return to the dust as he was. I am further confirmed in this view from the language of Solomon in Eccl. viii. 8, "No man hath power over the spirit to retain the spirit . . . in the day of death." Here the man is one and the Spirit is another. The man cannot control the Spirit. It leaves the man—God withdraws his Spirit—man dies; and unless God again “sendeth forth” his “Spirit,” they will remain dead.—See Psa. civ. 29 30.

“Her spirit came again,” Luke viii. 55, evidently means no more than the spirit of life; i. e., she revived. In this sense the term spirit is often used. Thus it is said of Samson, when he was fainting with thirst, Jud. xv. 19, “when he had drunk his spirit came again, and he revived.” Also, 1 Saml. xxx. 12, it is said of a man who was found faint in the field, that they made him drink water and gave him figs and raisins to eat, “and when he had eaten his spirit came again to him:” i. e., his vitality or vital energy was restored. So in Luke viii. 55, Jesus said, “Maid, arise,” and her vital energy returned and she arose straightway.

The “grain of wheat,” 1 Cor. xv. 36, 37, to my mind, teaches an actual death; and that whole chapter is a clear statement of no future life without a resurrection; and that the first Adam was not spiritual, (verse 46), but was of the earth, earthy (v. 47), and such are they also who are only of the first Adam (v. 48). I do not question but what there is a “germ” from which God will bring up the resurrection man; but admitting that to be a fact, it does not prove that germ is a living spirit; it is quite as likely the germ is to be found in some portion of the bodily organization, which the power and omniscience of God preserves till the time it shall come forth at the call of the Son of God, quickened once more by the life-giving Spirit of God.

“Your life is hid with Christ in God,” Col. iii. 4, has no bearing on the subject to favor the view of the spirit of man being alive when the man is dead, as I can see. Paul was addressing Christians who were living; not talking about “disembodied spirits.” The life of these living saints, to whom he wrote, was then “hid with Christ in God”; hence, he adds, “When Christ, who is our life”—the author of that life of which he spake—“shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory.” Christ never did—and we have no authority for supposing he ever will—appear a “disembodied spirit.” The Christian’s life spoken of in this text is clearly that eternal life of which Christ is the author, and which he is coming again to bestow on those who now “die unto sin.” This “life exists when the” man is dead, who dies united to Christ. To say, simply, it “exists when the body is dead,” it seems to me falls short of the truth.

To say “these spirits will God bring with him”—Christ is not speaking as the oracles of God. God brought Christ “from the dead” (Heb. xiii. 20), and Paul assures the Thessalonians that so certain as “Jesus died and rose again, even so them also that sleep in Jesus will God bring with him”—from the dead, of course; for that was the place from which “God brought that great Shepherd of the sheep.” The apostle teaches us that this work is a work of resurrection; for, saith he, “the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God, and the dead in Christ [not the alive] shall rise first, then we who are alive, and remain—unto the coming of the Lord—shall be caught up together with them [the resurrected ones] to meet the Lord in the air.” Their spirits did not come down from heaven with Christ; but the dead saints are “brought again from the dead” at the voice of Christ and by the power of that Eternal Spirit which brought Christ from thence. Thus, when Christ returns from heaven, “whether we wake or sleep,” i. e., dead or living, then shall “we live together with him;” i. e., when he returns—not before; for the life spoken of is eternal life—“Christ dieth no more,” and “they who are accounted worthy to attain that age, and the resurrection from the dead, cannot die any more.” Luke xx. 35, 36; Rom. vi. 9; 1 Thess. iv. 14, 16, 17.

Having said this much on the subject suggested, I leave it for each one to satisfy his own mind as to what is truth on the topic; feeling assured that nothing is gained to the cause of truth by an admission of a spirit entity in man, and those who do it will find our opponents will give them no rest by such admissions. They will find it is only an apology for their unbelief and lack of knowledge of the power of God; and it will be used by them to push the admission that the spirit lives when men are dead, to an acknowledgment that it is also conscious. I could very easily believe the latter if admitting the first. But I firmly believe the man is dead; in other words, the entire life of the man is suspended; and if there is no resurrection there is no future life.

WHAT IS DEATH?

CRUDEN, in his Concordance, under the word Death, thus expounds its meaning, and the nature of the curse which Adam has transmitted to his posterity:

“Death,” he says, “signifies the separation of the soul from the body—this is temporal death. A separation of soul and body from God’s favor in this life, which is the state of all unregenerated and unrenewed persons, who are without the light of knowledge, and the quickening power of grace—this is spiritual death. The perpetual separation of the whole man from God's heavenly presence and glory, to be tormented forever with the devil and his angels—this is the second death, or eternal death. To all these kinds of death Adam made himself and his posterity liable by transgressing the commandment of God in eating the forbidden fruit."

This strange and unnatural definition of the Scripture word death, is that which is generally held by modern Christian teachers. Can such extravagances fail to shock the understandings of an intelligent and truth-seeking people? Who can be surprised that such teaching should furnish a theme for the severest sarcasm of the skeptic, and enable him to point the finger of scorn at the Christian profession? If the above be the definition of the Scripture term death, then it must be applied, to be consistent, to other passages where this word occurs. "We see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honor that he, by the grace of God, should taste death for every man."—Heb. ii. 9.

According therefore to the definition given by Cruden, Christ must have suffered this threefold death. 1. Temporal Death, or the separation of soul and body. 2. Spiritual Death, or the separation of the whole nature from God's favor in this life. 3. Eternal Death, or the perpetual separation of the whole man from God, to be tormented forever with the devil and his angels! Can any one believe that Christ suffered this? Of course not; not even the "orthodox" believe this, though in consistency they should. They urge a commutation theory to remove their difficulty.

In the following passage the word death occurs three times. "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; and deliver them who through fear of death were all their life-time subject to bondage."—Heb. ii. 14, 15.

Now the common sense principle of interpretation requires us to understand that the death mankind feared, the death the devil had the power of, and the death which Christ died, are all the same. If, therefore, it is the threefold death which satan had the power of, and mankind feared, Christ must have suffered this threefold death. But this would have made redemption impossible, because one element in this death is eternal torment in a state of perpetual banishment from God!

Modern theologians and Scripture are as much at variance, on this topic, as their theology is at variance with common sense. The passage just quoted, moreover, obliges the conclusion that death in the apostolic age, and prior to that period, had no such mystic sense as that which now has the accredited seal of popular theology, viz.: a separation of the conscious and immortal soul from the unconscious body; that, on the contrary, it was regarded as a complete and dreaded dominion over the entire conscious humanity, which blasted the hopes, froze the energies, and broke the spirit of the race so far as no clearly defined views of a future life by resurrection were possessed. Under such circumstances its melancholy anticipation sat like an incubus upon the life-loving heart of humanity—it was a "bondage" which clung with dismal and oppressive tenacity to them all their life-time, and from which they could only be effectually delivered by a sure and certain hope of resurrection from the dead, through the resurrection of Christ. Surely, it was the fear of this all-engulfing death, not of the threefold death of modern theology, which begat the "bondage" of which the text speaks. ED.

IMMORTALITY as an offered benefit, through Jesus Christ, is the most powerful motive to a life of holiness and devotion to God that can be thought of. This motive the notion of inherent immortality entirely removes from man, and thus deprives him of a mighty influence for good. This consideration writes condemnation on the popular view of immortality, and makes it justly chargeable with being the betrayer and destroyer of men. It wrests from their hands the most powerful engine that infinite wisdom has provided to lead men to "seek for honor, glory, immortality, eternal life." Can any reflecting mind believe that God is the author of a doctrine whose legitimate result is to abrogate all the promises of an endless life? Can we believe that God has sworn by himself that he has "no pleasure in the death of the wicked," and yet has so constituted man that his death is an impossibility? What mockery thus to address man, if he is, by his constitution, deathless. Let the truth be proclaimed that deathlessness is an object to be secured and that it can only be secured through Jesus; and hence a union with him is essential to this end, which end is only arrived at by having our "fruit unto holiness." Such is God's order to arrive at immortality. Let men beware of all attempts to "climb up" some other way to an endless life. ED.

GOSPEL BENEFITS.

BY THE EDITOR OF "BIBLE EXAMINER."

"God will render to every man according to his deeds: to them who by patient continuance in well doing seek for glory and honor and immortality, eternal life."—Rom. ii. 6. 7.

My object in the remarks I make upon this text will be to examine the nature or character of this cluster of benefits presented for our attainment, and then point out the means by which we may make them our own.

I. THE NATURE OR CHARACTER OF THE BENEFITS PRESENTED IN OUR TEXT.

1. "Glory."—Greek, Doxan. The term glory is one often used, and generally includes the ideas of excellence and happiness, or something splendid connected with much enjoyment. As the glory spoken of in the text is something to be obtained in the future, and after effort on our part in the present time, it is worth while to endeavor to get as clear a conception of it as may be.

I regard it as that "change," of which the Scriptures speak, to be experienced by the saints at the second advent of Christ. Or, in other words, that change to be wrought at the resurrection from among the dead, viz., the resurrection of the just. Paul informs us, 1 Cor. xv. 43, "They are sown in dishonor, they arise in glory."—Syriac.

The present state of man is one of dishonor, because one of corruption. Great pains are now taken to adorn our persons—to make ourselves look beautiful, i. e., glorious. But after all the labor and toil, corruption prevails—the most beautiful form and countenance is changed, its appearance becomes offensive, and we willingly lay it away from our sight. "They are sown in dishonor." But the followers of Christ will be raised in glory.

How shall we obtain an idea of the glory to be attained? Paul informs us, Phil. iii. 21, that "Our LIFE-GIVER, the Lord Jesus Christ," will come "from heaven," and that then he shall change our vile body (or, body of our abasement—Syriac) that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body (or, the body of his glory—Syriac). But how can we get an idea of that glory which Jesus possesses? Paul has, in this text, given us the pattern of the glory, and Peter shall give us the clue to its full discovery.—2 Peter i. 16–18. Peter says—"We have not followed cunningly devised fables when we made known to you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eye-witnesses of his majesty; for he received from God the Father honor and glory, when there came such a voice to him from the excellent glory, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; and this voice which came from heaven we heard when we were with him in the holy mount." Another eye-witness of the same manifestation, viz., John, says: "We beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father."—John i. 14.

Let us now turn to the manifestations of that glory as recorded by Matthew, chapter xvii. 1: "Jesus taketh Peter, James and John, his brother, and bringeth them up into a high mountain apart, and was transfigured before them (Syriac, was changed before them), and his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light." Here, in this vision, was the manifestation of "his glorious body," like unto which Paul tells us "our vile bodies shall" be "changed" when Christ "comes from heaven." Surely here is glory enough to satisfy our largest desires. The sight of it, in vision, made Peter say, "Lord, it is good for us to be here." Oh, how satisfying the sight, and how much more so the realization, when "vision" will be swallowed up in the reality! Such is the glory presented as one of the benefits of the gospel of Jesus Christ.

2. "Honor"—Greek, Timeen. "A state of honor, dignity; a distinguished mark of favor." Such is the state to which the followers of Christ are to be exalted. "A Royal Priesthood"; to be "kings and priests unto God and the Lamb," to "reign on the earth and over the nations." This is what Christ has promised those who obey him; and the Scriptures everywhere confirm the same thing. "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me on my throne, even as I also overcame and am set down with my Father on his throne."—Rev. iii. 21. Christ's own throne is "the throne of his father David," which Jehovah has sworn to give him, and which will be bestowed upon him when the judgment is executed, or in process of execution upon the "fourth" dynasty of rulers on earth, symbolized by a "dreadful and terrible beast." That beast is to be slain—the body of rulers overthrown and destroyed; then one is seen coming in the "clouds of heaven" who is "like the Son of man;" and he "came to the Ancient of days, . . . and there was given him dominion and glory and a kingdom, that all people, nations and tongues shall serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall be not destroyed."—Dan. vii. 13, 14. This dominion and kingdom is that in which Christ has promised his followers a share; and "judgment" is to be "given to the saints of the Most High" when the time has come "that the saints possess the kingdom," verse 22; then "the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom (or, the greatness of the kings—Septuagint), under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him." Verse 27.

Such is the royal honor presented to our faith as one of the grand motives to a right course of action in our present state of trial. Men are amazingly influenced by what they call "a sense of honor"; and to occupy some important post of trust where their honor can be conspicuous is the ambition of many minds. No sacrifice, no suffering, no effort is spared, if they have evidence of the possibility of attaining the desired eminence. What an honor, in their estimation, to be President of the United States, though the term of office is a few short years, and though they may die before even that short period terminates; while the honor proffered the followers of Christ is an honor never to pass away nor to be changed into other hands, or to cease by death, as we shall shortly see. Let us suppose that all the honor ever possessed by kings, emperors, governors and presidents could be concentrated on one man, and that his life could be prolonged to a period equal to the combined years that have been occupied by the entire race of Adam; even then in splendor and duration it would fall infinitely short of that of one saint who shall become a king in the empire of Jesus Christ! Let, then, the men of earth, or worldly men, seek their dying honors, which so soon fade away; the Christian has a "far more exceeding," even "an eternal weight of honor," reserved in store, soon to be conferred upon him if found possessing the required characteristics. Here, then, is motive sufficient to stimulate the most desponding child of God. Take courage, brother; you are shortly to wear a kingly crown, and wear it forever and ever. Lift up thy head, then, and faint not at any trials or sufferings you may be called to endure now.

3. "Immortality"—Greek, Aphtharsian, "Incorruptibility"; a state opposed to our present state, which is corruptible, mortal, dying. This incorruptible state proffered in my text is essential to confirm us in the glory and honor previously noticed. Without this that glory might fade away—that honor might have an end. With this they are both made eternal.

The apostle here clearly shows that men are not possessed of immortality by creation or birth; and he shows also that it is a favor to be conferred on those only who pursue a defined course. He had stated in the previous chapter that "men professing themselves wise became fools, and changed the glory of the uncorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man," etc. Little did he then know of the folly which was to be developed in after times by an attempt to make it appear that man is incorruptible, like God. Such "changing the truth of God into a lie," by which "the creature" is "worshiped and served more than the Creator," remained to be developed as the Man of Sin should begin to be manifested. Now men affirm that they are "immortal"—incorruptible, like God! True, they admit their bodies will die, but the essential man, they affirm, is "immortal, and can never die," thus making "void the word through their tradition."

Man is not inherently immortal or incorruptible, in whole or in part. Not one solitary text in the Bible affirms any such thing, but the reverse. Let that fact satisfy the believer in the Scriptures. Immortality is a gift, dependent on the will of the giver—God—and on the action of him who shall partake of it. Paul informs us when it will be conferred and how, viz., "At the last trump," and by "the resurrection," for, saith he, "the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible"—aphtharsian; the same word employed in our text. "So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory."—1 Cor. xv. 52-54. And this victory, which "God giveth," is "through our Lord Jesus Christ." Here is the true source of immortality and the time when it will be attained. Let all remember this, and lay aside that pride which possesses men's hearts from a fancied notion of inherent immortality.

4. "Eternal life," zoe aionion—"life eternal." This is the climax of the whole, and securing the whole. What corruptible, dying man most of all needs is life—an unending life. That is here promised to such as accept the conditions of the offered benefit.

I understand life here, in its most obvious sense of conscious being—or that state of being appropriate to a sentient creature—a being that has the faculty of perception. To give to the term life a figurative sense without a shadow of reason, except that which originates in the traditions of men who affirm that all men, irrespective of moral character, are in possession of existence that shall never end, I regard as a corruption of the word of God—a making void the testimony of the faithful and true Witness, who saith, "I am come that they might have life," John x. 10; and who furthermore declares, "I am the way, the truth, and the life," John xiv. 6; all of which is confirmed by John, who saith, "He that believeth not God hath made him a liar, because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son; and this is the record that God hath given unto us eternal life, and this life is in his Son"; not in ourselves, as the theory of man's natural and essential immortality affirms it to be. "He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life."—1 John v. 11, 12.

To suppose that the inspired authors of the Bible almost uniformly speak in figurative language when presenting the great crowning benefit of the work and mediation of the Son of God is a position of fearful presumption and an unfounded assumption. If the Holy Spirit, who inspired holy men to speak, had intended happiness, as the natural immortal-soul theorists maintain, as the crowning blessing, it would have been equally easy to have used the terms makarioi, makarismos, as Paul does, Rom. vi. 6, 7, 8, 9, where these words are translated "blessed" and "blessedness," and have the proper signification of happy and happiness. But zoe is the emphatic term selected by the Holy Spirit as expressive of that glorious reward God has promised to those who obey him. This fact is sufficient to condemn forever the perversion resorted to in keeping up the theory that man is an immortal being. Man is a dying, corruptible creature; God offers him eternal zoe life; not merely makarismos—happiness; though, having eternal life, he will be eternally happy—that follows as a matter of course.

Let learned and unlearned perverters of the testimony of the Spirit of God cease making "God a liar" by saying he does not mean zoe, but makarismos, when he uniformly employs the former term in presenting the great climax of proffered benefits for the encouragement of dying men, and to stimulate them to suffer, if need be, even unto death now, that they may attain unto zoe aionion—"life eternal." Let the simplicity in which the gospel approaches us with its offered benefits stand in all its purity and plainness, and darken no longer the counsel of God by perverting his word and making them void by traditions. Life—eternal life—to live forever—not die any more, is the grand theme with which the gospel salutes our ears. Joyful sound to dying men! Let them heed it.

Having presented, as clearly as my limits will allow, the glorious cluster of benefits presented by our text, I proceed to notice,

II. THE MEANS BY WHICH WE MAKE THE BENEFITS OUR OWN.

This I shall do only so far as suggested by the text. That teaches us they are to be sought for, and informs us how to seek for them.

1. We must "seek for" them. Men do not seek for that which they have already in possession. Immortality, equally with the glory and honor, is in the future, and is to be attained only by those who seek for it. The idea of the original is, to acquire by labor or work. It is not an idle wish that will give us possession of those glorious benefits, but earnest application, which leads us to notice,

2. How we are to seek for them. (1) By "well-doing." It is not all doing that will give us a title; it is a specific kind of effort; it is working "the work of God," or that which he has assigned to us, and not the work which our fancy or imagination has pictured out. The first step in the work is "to believe on him whom God hath sent," viz., Jesus—John vi. 29. Believing on him he becomes the source of that energy by which we labor; he becomes the pattern after which we are to labor, and by which all our work is to be tested. This makes faith not that unmeaning and indefinite matter which seems to characterize much of the theology of the religionists of the age. Their faith is, in fact, a do-nothing faith; a faith which gives them license to live as they list, or according to their worldly desires. It includes little of daily self-denial and study to possess the mind of Christ—walking as he also walked—who spent his life in doing good, and for the joy that was set before him endured the cross—or death by crucifixion—despising the shame. A religion whose greatest study is to be respectable, and to make an appearance that shall divest it of reproach, is not the religion of Jesus the Messiah. His heart was set on doing good to men, not as the cant is—"to their souls"; but to men as men. Their present wants and sufferings moved his compassionate heart, and invariably called forth his exertions for their relief. His life was spent in doing good. Let us, in like manner, labor to benefit men by instructing them and ministering to their necessities, both of body and mind. Only in this way can we be engaged in "well-doing," or doing the work God demands of us, and to which the proffered benefits are promised.

(2) There must be a "continuance in well-doing." It is not doing well now and then, or under some exciting sermon or missionary speech, when talent is enlisted to force out, as it were, action? No; a dead body may show signs of life under the action of a galvanic battery, but the life-principle must have a permanent existence in the man who works the work that God requires and will accept; and such a principle continues its life-motions in well doing.

(3) But there must be a "patient continuance in well-doing" to secure the proffered benefits—a disposition of mind that does not faint at discouragements, nor cease efforts because left to struggle alone. The idea conveyed by the original is that of "remaining or staying behind when others have departed." It imports that there are discouragements—that most have passed on in their pursuits of profit, pleasure or sensual gratification, and no longer heed the calls of injured or suffering humanity; then he who is seeking for glory and honor and immortality, eternal life, remains behind to do good, even though left of all, and though tempted with the strong current that has passed him to join in their pursuits. Yes, though he may be ridiculed as being over-scrupulous, and too nice in his discriminations, he heeds the voice of God which falls on his ear above the foaming waves that rush by him, and hearing that voice he remains behind the multitude to do the work of God, that he may be Christ-like, and so attain the proffered glory. Worldly-minded professed Christians and sensualists may count him a fool, but he has learned "if any man will be wise" he is to "become a fool that he may be wise." "Patience" characterizes his course, and he has the approbation of God, which outweighs all the censures of men. Shortly will he be exalted to this promised inheritance he has so earnestly and perseveringly sought for.

We see that there is an ample motive set before us to induce any thoughtful and reflective mind to lead a Christ-like life. If this motive fails I can conceive no other which would be effectual. The exhaustless storehouse of God is opened before our minds, and we are permitted to gaze on glory, honor, immortality and endless life to arouse us to patient continuance in well-doing. "Glory" that is unending—"honor" that is "unfading"—incorruptibility, "immortality" never to be succeeded by corruption—a life to the utmost bound of which thought can never fly, because it is absolutely boundless! Oh, what a prize is here! Stop, poor, dying, care-worn and disappointed man: stop and contemplate this boon which high Heaven offers for your acceptance! What are all the sensual enjoyments after which you now pant? What are the honors and treasures of earth which now so command your energies, compared with the glory, honor, immortality, eternal life, I have endeavored to set before you on God's authority. Stop, poor disappointed worldling, stop and think on these things.

Christian, does thy zeal and activity correspond with the amazing mercy and glorious prize set before thee? Oh, how much reason have we to humble ourselves, that such amazing benefits no more command our thoughts, our time, our talents and our energies in doing the Work of God; and now, especially, when the prize is manifestly so near. A few days, or months, at most, and Christ will come "from heaven" to crown his followers with all these glorious benefits, and life's toils, trials, sufferings and woes will all be passed, and glory, honor, immortality, eternal life, be entered upon by you! Oh! how comforting, how invigorating the thought while we are yet struggling in the mighty conflict! "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly," and may we "be found of thee in peace, without spot and blameless." Amen.

THE HOPE OF THE CHURCH.

WHILE one of the Cæsars was reigning with iron force over the world a distinguished Syrian nobleman was called to Rome to receive a vassal kingdom. Before he departed to the seat of imperial honor and glory he gathered his friends and dependents and put his immense estate into their hands, allotting to each his work and promising great reward for faithful service and continual remembrance. In the midst of much weeping, and many vows and benedictions the nobleman started on his long journey. For a short time there was great labor on the estate, and many earnest prayers for the return of the master. In fact it beame marked that those who were most distinguished by conscientiousness, honesty and manliness had their deep life nourished by the prospect of his return. The brightness of his eye was upon them, the gladness of his countenance kindled them into power and animation.

It came to pass that while he tarried many long days some began to say that he never would return, and some bolder ones that he had never been here. Some said that he had forsaken the estate and it belonged to them in absolute possession—and others that he had only dreamed of a kingdom and could give no rewards. Hence, they concluded to seek power, splendor and privilege in the present, leaving the future of which they knew nothing to soothsayers and Chaldeans. In the long run they began to revile and beat each other and had alternate seasons of revelry and violence, passions of evil were let loose and blood ran freely as rain in winter. The parable is not obscure.

In the fullness of the time there appeared one who had all the moral and supernatural power to establish grandeur of a King, and he claimed the right and the power to establish the kingdom of prophecy. The unsullied sancity of his character, the wondrous majesty of his works, the profound wisdom of his teaching, the open recognition of the Father from heaven, all combined in declaring him to be the Son of God and the Prince of life. His ambassadors—forbidden to enter into any Samaritan or Gentile city—went through all the coasts of Israel with one cry, That the kingdom of God was at hand. Nigh it must have been when the King himself was present and the powers of the world to come were revealed in such affluence. The kingdom had descended upon them and the King was seeking by all the charming attractions of heaven, to gather the people under the sheltering wings of his love and his life. No one will deny a manifest change in his final aspect toward them when it became manifest that he was rejected by the nation. He taught them that they would die in their sins, that their house would be left to them desolate, and that they would never see him again until they could say, "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." Nor did he leave the early teaching without distinct and explicit correction. For, when in the midst of the triumphal procession, some began to think that the kingdom of God would immediately appear, he taught them that the noble man must go into a far country to seek for himself a kingdom and to return. Whatever differences there may be among us as to the nature of that moral dominion which he did establish, it is beyond all controversy that the kingdom which he went to receive in the far country cannot come into manifestation until his return.

The apostles and their fellow-laborers all lived and taught as if the day of the Lord and the kingdom of glory were at hand, and their most forcible and impassioned appeals have their spring and roots in such ground. It will not be denied by any one grounded in Church history that the great leading men of the early Church made the coming of our Lord and the kingdom of prophecy, as the Gospel hope, exceedingly prominent, though the interval was wide and the descent very great from the sobriety and dignity of Paul,

Peter and John, to that presentation of the truth which may be found in Irenæus, Justin Martyr and Lactantius. Such allegorists as Dionysius did mischief in confounding some simple people; but the chief ruin came when Constantine avowed himself a Christian and took the Church under his imperial wings of darkness. The divinest realities which had lived through storm and bloodshed perished in court favor, only lingering in a few solitary hearts which were not debauched by political influences. When the bishops became companions and councillors of royalty, and persecuting rage was not only arrested, but succeeded by great benefaction in the power, honor and glory of this world, they seemed to think that the sublime kingdom of prophecy had become a reality and they lived and intrigued and caballed in accordance with the growing darkness and degradation. How rapid and how appalling the corruption which followed! The constellations disappeared. One star after another went out. Sacerdotalism became intense and arrogant. Idolatry followed hard with worship of rags, relics, images and, overshadowing all, the worship of a woman. It was the morning star which was blotted out when saintly mediators and Mary substantially displaced the One Mediator. Then came transubstantiation, purgatory, indulgences, priestly celibacy and all the manifold falsehoods which gradually darkened into glooms of the middle ages. The Lutheran trumpet blast was to a large extent political, though not without gracious spiritual consequences. But the Reformation of the sixteenth century was a very partial work, and the fogs and miasma of the Pontine marshes are still heavy upon us. The Lutheran theology mainly dwelt with a present salvation, the justification of the sinner before God. One-half of the Lord's work, his redemption of nature, was almost entirely ignored. The great adoption, the manifestation of the Sons of God in their immortal beauty and sovereign power never received any earnest treatment, and that exceeding glory toward which the whole creation moves and for which every creature sighs, was scarcely in the field of contemplation. The old papal concept still seemed to rule and reign, of getting into glory one by one and enjoying in ghost condition the vision of God and the blessedness.

The volcanic storm of the French Revolution was not long in following the Lutheran revolt, and the hard black frost of German rationalism was close upon the French eruption.

Such periods of death and convulsion did not seem likely periods for the revival of any ancient hope. Yet it was really in the midst of such dread moral scenery that many devout souls began to say, as they did in Israel, "Why speak ye no word about bringing back the King?" After long bad ages of blasphemy, sin and rebuke, after a terrible night of evil dreams and evil deeds, tremendous periods of superstition and moral darkness, a cry began to arise—"Behold the bridegroom cometh. The nobleman has received the kingdom and is coming for its manifestation." When this cry went forth old passages in the document of life which had seemed without meaning began to glow with wonderful significance. They speak of waiting, watching, fasting, praying, looking and desiring; and those who began to read and understand began to rise on tiptoe with loins girded and lamps burning.

A man of some mark as a scientist takes in hand occasionally to mock us and our hope; but, alas! he has nothing to offer. He says we are all melting away into the infinite azure; hence, the professor is nothing better than the gas he plays with in the laboratory.

We do not admire the melting process nor the result. We would rather see all the orient crimsoned and glorified by the splendor of his appearing who hath life in himself and likewise the power of giving it freely as eternal possession.

On the coming of our Lord we have a few words which we trust may be profitable to all believers in the Son of God.

When the disciples were to be left as a trunk bleeding at every pore, the departing Head gave such consolation as was fitting. "Let not your heart be troubled; ye believe in God, believe also in me. In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you to myself, that where I am there ye may be also."

—John xiv. 1-3. A poor simple child, who has got somewhat muddled among divines and skeptics, says: "How sweet that reads! But is he really coming personally?" Personally! The Lord be gracious to us! In what other way could he come? It is quite possible that the apostles, notwithstanding all their explicit teaching, were straining their eyes as if they would never see him again and sobbing as if their hearts would break. "Men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? the same Jesus now taken from you will so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven."—Acts i. 10, 11. This has the ring of the true metal.

Young man—looking for the return of an absent mother who is your very ideal of grace and loveliness—do you want her back in figure and shadow? Is it a ghost or a true, sweet woman you are looking for? Wife, whose husband—long away in a foreign country—is the embodiment of all your belief and trust in the noble and heroic, in truth and tenderness, in purity and valor, is it the man you are looking for or a phantom?

Not a shadow do you desire; you have seen too many in the long separation; but you long for the true personal man in the grace and glory of his manhood.

Holy Scripture gives no countenance to gnostic dreaming. The verities of Christianity are not so much phantasmagoria or shadows on the walls of time. They are, from Incarnation to Second Advent, all great and supreme realities. Our Lord is indeed a true Person, and must be revealed as such, Son of Man and Son of God. Son of Man! the true, the perfect, the immaculate Man, the first-born of the new creation, and as such God's ideal of what humanity should be. Son of God, first-born of all creation, born in eternity as well as in time, and declared to be the Son of God with power by the resurrection from the dead; still further to be declared when he appears with the ancient name written upon him, and we see with finer vision all the clustering glories which belong to his nature and rank, to his office and his work.

It is surely Jesus the anointed that we want. We know something of the promises. A country glorified by renovation, every curse repealed, until the desert blossoms like the rose and the healing rivers run with life; a city so sacred that it needs no temple, and so bright that it needs no luminary; where the streets are shining gold and the blessed river runs from the throne of power, on the banks of which the tree of life blooms with fruit unfading; and immortal companies of saints and angels in glory beyond all speech! The accessories are all wonderful and all comely in the proportion of fine keeping. But it is the anointed and holy One for whom we sigh, as the spring, well-head and centre of all the glories. We want the One who loved us with love stronger than death, who descended so low for our recovery and washed our sins away by his precious blood, and gave us the charter of life eternal by his resurrection from the dead. The forests of eternity may be grand, the fields and rivers may be transcendent in favor and beauty undefiled; but the face of our Lord will be the true glory and charm of every landscape, and all things bright and fair will gather splendor and grace from his countenance. His face gives strength to the archangel, his voice awakens the dead, his presence secures the everlasting harmonies and the never-fading bloom.

We read some time ago an article by a learned but not a wise man, who said, concerning our Lord, "he came providentially at such a time, he came spiritually at another time, he came figuratively at another time." Such men would turn the blood of atonement into a figure, and the truth of God into a fable. We never got quit of the heartache after the infliction until we turned to a magnificent passage in Hebrews, "But now once in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself. . . . And unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation."—Heb. ix. How welcome such a clear, authentic voice from the source of authority? The dreamer may tell his dream, surely, but what is the chaff to the wheat? The word of the Lord is a fire and a hammer to break the rock in pieces.

Once in the confluence of the ages, or in the completion of the periods, he appeared to put away sin. Others, of slender human force, had tried to diminish the sum of that great burden and horror which is the shame, the anguish and the ruin; but at last there came one of Divine force, strong enough, both to put away sin and to abolish death. They may linger yet a season, but the iron has stricken into them, and in the end they will be thrust from the universe. Once he came, and in the mysterious sacrifice of love purged away our sins; and to them that look for him shall he appear a second time, apart from sin, unto the great salvation; that salvation concerning which a great Christian thinker once wrote, after he had long enjoyed the life divine in close communion with God, "Now is our salvation nearer than when we believed." The passage is exceedingly comprehensive; for, while death and judgment are declared as solemn verities, the Lord delivers his people from the fear of both. He has taken away the sin which gave death a sting, in his first appearing, and in his second appearing he comes for the glory and salvation of the ransomed; hence, judgment has no terror to those who, from mortality or death, are to shine in incorruption.

There is a passage in the letter of Paul to Titus which will repay a little consideration: "For the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world, looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ."—Chap. ii. 11-13.

When the ages or periods, which were not formless spectres of an atheistic dream, but missionaries from God, had delivered their messages and accomplished their work, there appeared the favor of God providing salvation for all men. "The day-spring from on high hath visited us, to give light to them that sit in darkness and the shadow of death." One who was waiting for the consolation of Israel said, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation, which thou hast prepared before the face of all people; a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of thy people Israel."—Luke ii. 29-32. We learn from John i. that the Logos had been, through all former ages, the light in the darkness. Lights of nature, providence or supernaturalism; lights of reason, conscience, imagination or love; lights of sun, moon or star; lights of old tradition, stone table or human constitution; there was no lamp burning in the heavens or on the earth which he had not kindled and fed with his divine fire. But the darkness apprehended it not. So the Logos, or Word of God, took human shape and appeared to men with a richer and warmer revelation. No man hath seen God at any time, but the only begotten Son from the bosom of the Father he hath declared him. Surely the life was manifested, the eternal life, that men might get into communion with God the Father and with his divine and honorable Son. It is just at this point that human records begin to glow with divine significance, that we get a true philosophy of history, and from a living centre distinguish gracious plan in the past and glorious promise in the future.

Between the two advents—the appearing in grace, and the appearing in glory—we are taught, or put under training, that we may live soberly, righteously and godly while looking for the blessed Hope. Soberly marks the dignity of men who escape from the frivolous pursuit of trifles and unrealities, to live with high purpose and resolute endeavor. Righteously determines the justice and equity which must mark all our transactions with the Jew, the Gentile, or the Church of God. Godly signifies such a flooding of the human with the divine that we become distinguished by the love which distinguishes God. We no longer look on nature and humanity with the narrow vision or half-blind eyes of the flesh, but with the large eyes of gods who are made partakers of the divine nature. Once he appeared in grace to bring us home to sin-pardoning and life-giving God, to open our eyes and turn us from darkness to light, and give us an inheritance among the sanctified. A second time he will appear with the salvation of power, that we may shine out in immortality and hear the triumphal music of the kingdom. A peculiar and disciplined people find the power, glory and blessedness for which they have been aspiring and working under divine influences and the leading of the Holy Spirit. Many things in Christianity can be, and have been vulgarised, but immortality cannot be vulgarised, it is the reality of comely proportion, of grandeur, of supreme desire. That man, with his regal intellect, his mysterious conscience, and his almost divine force of will, should inherit the same corruption as the brutes is surely a miserable ending. Such a goal has a lameness about it which revolts, as well as a horror which no language may declare.

The philosophers who, in the rejection of Christianity, lose all hope or prospect of continuance or resurrection, have for some time been trying to make the horror presentable. They miserably fail. They can only promise a grand funeral, and draperies of gold and purple as curtains round the couch of everlasting darkness. What glory is it to the dead, who can neither see nor hear, that roses should blow and nightingales sing over the graves, or the southern wind linger over sepulchres after rifling spice fields on the way? We might as well have the gloom of midnight and eclipse, the north wind howling and roaring forever, and all elemental forces of wrath and ruin making grim play with the bones and the dust of the dead. It is life and joy to know that our citizenship is in heaven, from whence we look for the divine One, who will change the body of our humiliation and fashion it like unto his own by the energy of his all-subduing power. The divine life which belongs to us is wisely veiled for a season, hid with Christ in God; but when he who is our life shall appear, then shall we also appear with him in glory.

"The Spirit and the bride say, Come." Their combined voices call the Lord back from the seat of his priesthood to the throne of his royal power. And surely the nations of the world in their inarticulate fashion call as loudly as martyrs under the altar or Church in the wilderness. They are either getting into convulsion or getting into ghastly fear, on account of the things which are coming on the earth. And he, the God-man, who once, in Palestine, spake peace to wind and wave, is the only one who can control the wilder storm which agitates a deeper sea, and bring the vessel of humanity to the shores of eternal rest.—DR. LEASK, Editor of the Rainbow.

A FEW MORE WORDS ON THEOLOGY.

I HAVE read with interest the paper "On Theology" which appeared in the Rainbow of this month. With the conclusions of the writer I am not disposed to differ. With his definition of what he justly terms "the science" of theology I do. If this be so mischievous a thing as he supposes it to be, and I am not inclined to dispute that it is so, it must be something more than "the study of divine things," whether through the intellect or through the heart; it must be something above and beyond Scripture, something human and not divine, or it could not be, under any circumstances, the source of "cruelties and horrors unspeakable."

If I were asked to define what I understand by theology I should say it is the deduction of supposed truth from revealed truth—a purely human process—and therefore necessarily mixed with defect and error. Scripture is of God. Theology is of man. It is man reasoning and dogmatising, and attempting to systematise that which God has not been pleased to reveal as a system. When the result of his reasoning and systematising is made, as it always is made, a test of the reality and rightness of a man's belief, it necessarily alters at once both the nature and the grounds of faith. Faith, says St. Paul, is believing with the heart unto righteousness. Faith, says the consistent theologian, is not only this, it is the right intellectual conception of the truth professed to be believed, which can only be arrived at by systematising what God has revealed, and so viewing each separate truth in its relation to the rest. Hence, the orthodox theologian, not content with the simple acceptance of a revealed truth as it stands in Scripture, is always restless and unhappy until he has made it fit in with that particular system which he regards as alone consistent with the moral character of God.

Dr. Angus, than whom a more competent expositor of the term can scarcely be found, defines theology as "that methodical interpretation of Scripture, the result of which is systematic divinity." The late Professor Rogers entitles it "a systematised view of the facts respecting God and our relations to him, obtained by induction of the substantial contents of Revelation." These definitions, which are given by two eminent divines, when anxious to contract the functions of theology as much as possible, are perhaps as unobjectionable as any that can be found. Both, however, speak of theology as something more and different from the mere study of Scripture. The one says it is essentially interpretation, "the methodical interpretation of Scripture." The other affirms it to be a view of facts obtained by induction, which is again the human interpretation of Scripture, and therefore fallible. Need it then excite wonder that whenever these human processes are regarded as infallible, placed side by side with divine revelation, and enforced, "cruelties and horrors unspeakable" must be the consequence—a consequence which could never follow the mere "study of divine things" through the intellect alone. Rightly, therefore, is it affirmed that, "Not until men learn to throw off the authority of human theology and to trust themselves as it were, to God and his Word alone, will bright and hopeful views take possession of their hearts."

But how is this to be brought about? For, although it is clear as daylight that Christianity is not a theology, that the Scriptures were never constructed with a view to the preparation of one, yet is it equally clear that if Christianity was planted in the world as a society rather than an individual influence, a theology is indispensable. Churches of whatever kind, the simplest as well as the most hierarchial, are necessarily founded on a theology. They could not exist without it. What are called churches in the New Testament did indeed do so, because of the miraculous conditions under which they were formed, taught and governed; but no church since the decease of the apostles has ever existed, or can by any possibility exist without a theology, by which I mean without something more than the possession of the Scriptures, without a common view expressed or understood—to borrow Professor Rogers' language—of such "facts respecting God and our relation to him as can be obtained by induction of the substantial contents of Revelation;" in other words, by a human interpretation of that which is divine.

How are we to get out of this? If theology be mischievous, churches must be also. If churches of any kind be of God, theology must be so likewise, and the only question for us to consider is whether a given theology is or is not the true Church? We must in attempting to decide this start by assuming as almost all Christians now do, with or without evidence that some form or other of Church organization, and some system or other of theology is essential to the spread and permanence of a faith which rests on the revelations of a Book singularly unadapted to the formation of any tabulated system of truth, distinguished by "almost entire absence of anything approaching to scientific accuracy," all "its statements of doctrine if we except some of the apostolic epistles, being thrown together without order or exact definition."

My own belief is that churches, like their varying theologies, are of man, and not of God; and will, therefore, before the coming of the Lord be "plucked up," like everything else that is not of God's planting. But I am open to correction, and invite remark.—H. DUNN, in the Rainbow.

ON SILENT WORSHIP.

DEVOTION, considered simply in itself, is an intercourse betwixt us and God—betwixt the supreme, self-existent, inconceivable Spirit, which formed and preserves the universe, and that particular mind with which he has animated a portion of matter upon the earth that we call man.

It is a silent act, in which the mind divests itself of outward things, flees into heaven, and pours forth all its wants, wishes, hopes, fears, guilt or pleasures into the bosom of an Almighty Friend. Although this devotion in its first stages may be a wearisome or insipid exercise, yet this arises merely from the depravity (weakness) of nature and of our passions. A little habit will overcome this reluctance. When you have fairly entered upon your journey the ways of this wisdom will be "ways of pleasantness, and all its paths peace." True devotion doubtless requires a considerable degree of abstraction from the world. Hence, modern Christians treat it as a vision: hence, many modern writers have little of its unction. But it glows in the Scriptures; it warms us in the Fathers; it burned in an Austin, and in many others of the persecuted martyrs. That we hear but little of it is not wonderful. It makes no noise in the circle of the learned or of the elegant. Under a heap of worldly cares we smother the lovely infant and will not let it breathe. Vanity, pleasure, ambition, avarice, quench the celestial fire; and these, alas! are too much the gods of mortals. Ever since the world began writers have been amusing us only with shadows of this piety instead of giving us its soul and substance. Superstition has placed it in opinions, ceremonies, austerities, pilgrimages, persecutions, an august temple or splendid imagery, which have little connection with sentiment or spirit. Enthusiasm has swelled with unnatural conceptions, and obtruded a spurious offspring on the world instead of the engaging child of Reason and of Truth, while the lukewarm have rested in a few outward duties, which have had no vigor, and, as they spring not from the heart, never enter the Temple of the Most High.

Real piety is of a very different and of a much more animated nature. It looks up to God; sees, hears, feels him in every event, in every vicissitude, in all places, in all seasons and upon all occasions. It is theory vivified by experience; it is faith substantiated by mental enjoyment; it is heaven transplanted in the human bosom; it is the radiance of the divinity warming and encircling man; it is a spiritual sense gratified by spiritual sensations. Without this all ceremonies are inefficacious; books, prayers, sacraments and meditations are but a body without life, or a statue without animation.

That man is capable of such an intercourse with his Maker there are many living witnesses to prove. Without having recourse to the visions of fanatics or the dreams of enthusiasts, it may be proved to spring from natural and philosophical causes. God is a spirit, so is the mind. Bodies can have intercourse, so can minds. When minds are in an assimilating state of purity they have union with their Maker. This was the bliss of Paradise. Sin interrupted it and holiness must restore it. To a soul thus disposed the Creator communicates himself in a manner which is as insensible to the natural eye as the falling of dews, but not less refreshing to its secret powers than that is to vegetation. The primitive saints speak of this when they are describing their transports. David felt it when he longed for God, as the hart panteth after the water brooks. St. Paul experienced it when he gloried in his tribulations. It was embodied in him when he was carried up into the third heaven and heard things impossible to be uttered. St. Stephen was filled with it when he saw the heavens opened and prayed for his murderers. By it martyrs were supported when they were stoned and sawed asunder, and until we feel it in ourselves we shall never fully know how gracious the Lord is. If you can acquire this spiritual abstraction you will at once have made your future for eternity. It will be of little moment what is your lot on earth, or what the distinguishing vicissitudes of your life; prosperity or adversity, health or sickness, honor or disgrace, a cottage or a crown, will all be so many instruments of glory. The whole creation will become a temple. Every event and every object will lead your minds to God, and in his greatness and perfections you will insensibly lose the littleness, the glare and tinsel of all human things. If I wished only to set off your persons to the greatest advantage, I would recommend this true, sublime religion. It gives a pleasing serenity to the countenance and a cheerfulness to the spirits beyond the reach of art or the power of affectation. It communicates a real transport to the mind which dissipation mimics only for a moment; a sweetness to the disposition and a lustre to the manners which all the airs of modern politeness study in vain. Easy in yourself, it will make you in perfect good humor with the world, and when you are diffusing happiness around you, you will only be dealing out the broken fragments that remain after you have eaten. This devotion, however, though essentially a silent intercourse betwixt the heart and God, yet to creatures, consisting of matter as well as mind, may be nourished by external forms. Let it strike the senses in order to awaken the imagination.—Selected.

“GOOD FRIDAY.”

[THE above-named day was kept this year (1878) as usual, by a great part of nominal Christians as the anniversary of our Saviour's crucifixion. It happened this year April 19th. The same day there appeared the following editorial in the New York Tribune, which contains so good a moral that I transfer it to the columns of the BIBLE EXAMINER for the benefit of the “lovers of this present evil world,” and as a caution to all not to imitate Judas.—ED.]

THIRTY PIECES OF SILVER.

The great sacrifice made on this day on Calvary has blotted out in our minds all other events of which it is the anniversary. Yet it is worth while for us to remember that on this same day, ages ago, died the most unfortunate of all human beings, a man on whom fell a fate so unspeakable in horror that his memory has come down through time guarded by a strange and terrible silence. It is that Hebrew, that friend and follower of Jesus, who gave him up to death. Men have shown a keen interest in dissecting the motives and characters of all other moral monsters. They have, apparently, not even curiosity about Judas. Nero and the Borgia had their analysts; even Satan himself is not without his apologists. But from this man humanity has turned away without a word. His name has become the synonym for treachery. For his sake his whole nation has been held accursed for generations.

Yet Judas, like the rest of us, was a baby once upon his mother's knee; a boy with boyish impulses and affections. There is no record of any abnormal development of vice or cruelty in him while he was the daily companion of the Lord and his friends. He had, as far as we can learn, but one besetting sin—the greed for money. He was neither sensualist, murderer nor brutal—he was a thief. He held the bag as they journeyed, and the fingerings of the few poor coins had the effect upon him of that deadly poison the touch of which kills by paralysis. He was benumbed in heart and soul. He rose up and sat down with the Spirit of all good, and he thought only of his bag. He touched every hour the Elder Brother of mankind. He saw the multitudes crowding about him, moved by a mighty faith; the blind saw, the dying were healed, and the dead brought back from the grave. The whole world stood waiting to know if this were the Saviour for whom it had tarried so many ages; and this poor creature turned his back on it all—to count his money. The man must have known he would die some day. The most vicious of us know that, and struggle madly for a vague chance of existence hereafter. Beside Judas, visible, tangible, stood the Divine Helper—the way to unending life; a word from His lips would have made certain eternity for this his follower. For thirty coins he gave up this chance forever; he put out this light which shone for him and for the world. When the Son of God hung upon the cross, when the earth shook and the sun hid its face, and the dead rose in horror from their graves, this Hebrew began to see the real value of his money. He understood now the misuse he had made of his mean life and creeping outside of the darkened city over which lay the shadow from Calvary, he put an end to it. Where he has gone no curious eye can follow. Near Jerusalem to this day is shown a ghastly gray abyss—the Potter's Field—heaped for ages with the bones of the dead. It seems fitting that the thirty pieces of silver should be thus sunk into eternal decay and corruption.

Now, there is no man living to-day so vicious that his worst enemy would accuse him of a likeness to Judas. And yet is not the Saviour alive and at work in the streets of New York this morning as then in Jerusalem? Who is the Helper now of the lame, the blind, the dying? Who calls our dead out of the grave to life again? When we go to church this morning, or sit in our own house or office, is not the spirit of all good, of honor, truth, love, the guide to sure high life beyond death, beside us, close at hand? The very miracle of the spring, the rain, the sun tell us of his presence. Since we were children, have we not heard his secret voice begging us to come to him? We are blind and deaf and indifferent to it. Why? The stocks, the fee, the invoice of goods to which we give our waking thoughts—what are they but the money which Judas made his god? We, too, carry the bag. We finger the coins greedily. Let God go on with his miracles, let the poor crowd about him; the bag is our business. We, being disciples, see that our Master is being thrust out of the Church, out of society, out of literature. We pay him formal homage in church and go out to barter honor and honesty for the thirty pieces of silver on which we have set our hopes. Judas also did not forget to kiss the Master before he betrayed him to his enemies.

THE EASTERN QUESTION SOLVED.

BY DR. EDWARD PERKINS.

First. The great dominion of territory given by Jehovah to the Patriarchs and their seed for an everlasting possession is in the possession of the seed of Esau (the Ottoman Supremacy), the twin brother of the Patriarch Jacob.

Second. The fourth kingdom in Daniel's prophecy is not applicable to Rome, but to Syria and to Turkey, Syria's descendant.

Third. That the Romans are the descendants of Ishmael, the illegitimate son of Abraham, and are the robbers of the Jews, not their protectors.—Dan. xi. 14.

Fourth. The Seventh Seal (Rev. viii.) was opened when Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, invaded Palestine and carried the Jews into captivity.

Fifth. That the four angels in that chapter represent the four universal kingdoms who should rule over Jerusalem during the indignation (Dan. viii. 19) or throughout the seventh sealing time which closes with this dispensation. These kingdoms are Babylon, Persia, Grecia and Syria.

Sixth. The falling of a great star (Rev. ix.) represents the downfall of the old Syrian Dynasty, after reigning over Jerusalem about 264 years, when Rome steps in and reigns in her stead; afterwards Turkey subverts Constantinople, regains Jerusalem and yet possesses it as the fourth universal Empire.

Seventh. The ten lost tribes of Israel, the settlers of Western Europe, never possessed the promised territories which Turkey now claims; but the great battle of Armageddon will settle the long vexed Eastern question before the inauguration of the fifth universal Empire.

Eighth. The time of the Second Advent—how known.

INTRODUCTION.—REV. xvii.

The lewd Woman of Babylon.—An Enigma.

The apostle, at the end of this chapter, says the woman here referred to is a symbol of a great popular and wicked city, which reigns over many kingdoms, nations, peoples and multitudes of tongues of different languages on the earth, and is being brought to judgment to answer for the trust, as a Trustee of God's appointment over his ancient church in Jerusalem.

This mysterious subject, which is one of very many, should be carefully examined, as it is propounded after the mode the Oriental nations penned much of their writings. Thus Samson's riddle to the Philistines is one of these remarkable embarrassments or puzzles.—Jud. xiv. 12. Another is recorded as Nathan's parable to king David (ii. Samuel xii.) and a great number of others abound throughout the Old and New Testaments; and they all contain great and important events: information of facts to individuals, to communities and nations, for weal or woe.

The inconsistent and trifling exposition never could make these dove-tailed subjects fit, any more than the base absurdity of trying to turn a lewd harlot woman into a (Roman Catholic) bachelor priest; but, by applying a harem city to the category, we would have met a harmonious result, which heretofore has always been a failure, owing to incorrect exegesis, for in nowise in the Scripture can the ten horns be applied to Roman Catholicism, or to the Romans nationally. This position I have held a long time, and still maintain, while public remonstrance remains silent.

And true it is, the mind that can follow critically these most important enigmas seeking to realise an answer, and obtain it, will, in the end, say with Mr. Cowper, "God moves in a mysterious way his wonders to perform."

THE TURKISH GOVERNMENT—THE SCARLET-COLORED BEAST.

Rev. xvii. 1, 2.—"And there came one of the seven angels which had the seven vials, and talked with me, saying unto me, come hither; I will shew unto thee the judgment of the great whore that sitteth upon many waters, with whom the kings of the earth have committed fornication, and the inhabitants of the earth have been made drunk with the wine of her fornication."

In the twelfth century, when Richard Cœur de Lion, king of England, was near the Black Sea on his tour to Palestine, standing on an eminence, and overlooking a great city, he exclaimed to his courtiers, "Constantinople holds the keys of the world." Hence, centuries before Constantinople, great kings and cities, were near located. Her impregnable situation on many waters makes her a desired locality. Constantine, Emperor of Rome, founded it, and after it had been occupied about a thousand years it was subverted by the Turks. She stands in what is known as Turkey in Europe, a territory containing 196,770 square miles; divided into ten states, with a population of nearly seventeen millions of inhabitants, besides her extensive dominions in Asia and Africa. Commencing at the Atlantic Ocean and continuing through these two continents to the Pacific Sea, she absorbs millions of miles of territory and its inhabitants.

These kings of the earth are the Sultans and kings and other subordinates under Constantinople governmental power throughout all these vast dominions (Dan. xi. 5), all worshippers of Mohammed, the Sultan of Constantinople being their chief and only prophet.

Verse 3.—"So he carried me away in the spirit into the wilderness: and I saw a woman sit upon a scarlet colored beast, full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns; and the woman was arrayed in purple and scarlet color, and decked with gold and precious stones and pearls, having a golden cup in her hand full of abominations and filthiness of her fornication."

The woman here brought to view is a representative of a great city. The question is what city is it? We answer, there is no known city on the earth that will answer every item in general comprising the whole so well as the city referred to, viz., Constantinople; and the beast on which she rides, with its colored clothing and blasphemous names, is a true symbol of the Ottoman supremacy; with all its vile, filthy vices of whoredom and fornication, blood-shedding and murder, and an indignity offered to Jehovah in their worship of prayer and praise. Furthermore, her governmental power and administration of her laws and penalties have been proverbial for cruelty, and her former pedigree for injustice has been unequalled.

The rich location of her city, with its site of seven hills denoted by the seven heads, and that under protection by her forts and waters, have been extraordinary barricades of safety. The ten horns denoting her ten states of territory in European Turkey, contiguous to her city, and tributary thereto, comprising 196,770 square miles, containing 17,000,000 of inhabitants, and are probably the clay-iron toes referred in Daniel ii., to which we shall refer in its place.

Verse 5.—“And upon her forehead was a name written, MYSTERY, BABYLON THE GREAT, THE MOTHER OF HARLOTS AND ABOMINATIONS OF THE EARTH.”

It appears from all information obtained this has been a dark passage for exegesis through Rome. Ever since the dawn of Christendom the Church has been blindfolded. At the close of the vision the apostle is informed by the angel that this woman represents a great city which is being brought to judgment, to give an account of her responsibility to God for the maladministration as the chief magistrate and governor of a great estate committed to her charge. “Babylon the Great” was written on her forehead. The Prophet Daniel, in his second chapter, in explaining the image dream says, “Four responsible nations represented by God, silver, brass and iron were appointed by God as trustees to have charge of the land of Palestine, Jerusalem, his Church and people during the seventh sealing time which commenced with Revelation, chap. viii. Babylon was the seat of government of these four responsible nations, who in succession were to rule over Judea, etc., collectively or otherwise. The first was the Chaldean, the second was the Persian, the third the Grecian, the fourth was the Syrian. These kingdoms all reigned in Babylon. The three first died in Babylon. Seleucus Nicator I. succeeded them as the fourth kingdom and reigned in Babylon, and while there built him a new city, naming it after himself, Seleucia, removing his seat of government there; very soon after Babylon was destroyed, and in the following years this Syrian seat of government had several removals, and eventually run out and became oblivious.

It is needful to keep in mind that what is recorded under the seventh seal is relative to Jerusalem and her people only, with the Gentile nations appointed to care for and protect them. Hence this mysterious city here represented by this lewd woman is this new Babylon, a resurrected city in place of old Babylon destroyed, and becomes a seat of universal empire for the fourth delegated power, which fell into the bottomless pit—a rich figure of Syria's downfall.

Verse 6.—“And I saw the woman drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus; and when I saw her I wondered with great admiration” or astonishment.

That Turkey is the subject of this prophecy, and that Constantinople is this great city is becoming questionless to thinking, reflective minds, and that their forerunner, Syria the Edomite, is severely criticised by Obadiah for Esau's persecutions and slaughter of Jacob's posterity, which took place under Antiochus Epiphanes, and the Syrian Dynasty of Kings who were the descendants of Esau when they ruled over Judea before she fell into the hands of the Romans. Likewise, up to this present time, Turkey's history abounds with direful reports of their persecutions, tortures, imprisonments and death of Christians wherever found, and all non-adherents of Mohammed, Jew or Gentile. The apostle was when he had the vision a Roman prisoner in the Isle of Patmos. But the blood of the saints and of the martyrs seemed to far transcend anything he had witnessed.

Verse 7.—“And the angel said unto me, Wherefore didst thou marvel? I will tell thee the mystery of the woman, and of the beast that carrieth her which hath the seven heads and ten horns.”

If it was such a marvelous sight to the apostle to look upon this mysterious beast and its rider, making such destructive havoc with the Church of God, that the angel explains how he may know “the mystery of the woman and the beast that carrieth her, with seven heads and ten horns,” we shall here discover that the key to this enigma was lost when Rome became the usurper over Palestine, obtaining the governing power, thus hiding the key under her own authority and dissemblance.

THE INTRODUCTION OF THE OTTOMAN POWER.

Verse 8.—“And the beast that thou sawest was, and is not, and shall ascend out of the bottomless pit and go into perdition; and they that dwell on the earth shall wonder, whose names were not written in the book of life from the foundation of the world, when they behold the beast that was, and is not, and yet is.”

In following after truth experience teaches us we must set aside all our old preconceived notions and tautology about Rome being of God's appointment, having the Scriptures committed to her charge and the founder of his Church. Although she abounds in many errors, yet she has the Scriptures and some good precepts, but the subject under consideration takes very small notice of her, viz., filling up the time of Syria's silence over Judea, a hinted recapitulation of her conduct and of her fall, as contained in Revelation xii., where her Scripture history ends. Thus, the beast that was, is the old Syrian kingdom. She is not while she lay silent in the abyss (bottomless pit). The prophet Daniel says of her, (chap. xi. 19), "He shall turn his face toward the fort of his own land, but he shall stumble and fall and not be found. About the year B. C. 64, the Syrian kingdom fell, and was lost to the world, laying (obsolete) entirely unknown during many centuries. The Revelator, in chapter ix., says he "saw a star fall from heaven unto the earth; to him was given the key of the bottomless pit, and he opened the bottomless pit." This star is a figure of a great personage or dynasty of rulers; the Restorer of the old Syrian kingdom into life: the kingdom that was and is not, and yet is. A resurrection from the bottomless pit into life, under a new cognizance—Syrio-Turkey.

THE LITTLE HORN.

Dan. vii. 7.—"After this I saw in the night visions, and behold a fourth beast, dreadful and terrible, and strong exceedingly; and it had great iron teeth; it devoured and break in pieces and stamped the residue with the feet of it; and it was diverse from all the beasts that were before it; and it had ten horns. I considered the horns, and, behold, there came up among them another little horn before whom three of the first horns were plucked up by the roots; and, behold, in this horn were eyes like the eyes of a man, and a mouth speaking great things."

The three first beasts here referred to, Babylon, Persia and Greece, differ much from the fourth beast in its form and strength and dreadful savage cruelty. What it did not need, after satisfying its own wants, it brake in pieces, destroying the remainder. And on its dreadful looking head it had ten horns; which led the prophet to contemplate their usefulness; and while so doing, he saw another little horn come up amongst them after the former ten horns were full grown and matured. This little horn, with a man's head and mouth, grows up after them and amongst them.

This monstrous beast is a symbol of the old Syrian governmental power which ruled over Judea and the Jews about 264 years, when Rome disannulled her power, and she fell as we have just considered above.

The ten horns are synonymous with the Revelator's ten horns, and with the ten clay-iron toes, which we shall consider in their place; and with the three horns plucked up by their roots, in their connection.

There is wisdom in searching and in finding on this subject, by the hills on which Constantinople is built; but much ambiguity on Rome. So when a literary person becomes lost and weary on the subject he calls there for help and information, and he obtains neither; he remains lost in disappointment and mystery.

THE SEVEN BABYLONIAN KINGS.

Verse 10.—"And there are seven kings: five are fallen and one is and the other is not yet come; and when he cometh he must continue a short space, and the beast that was and is not, even he is the eighth and is of the seventh and goeth into perdition."

The seven kings were: 1st, Babylon; 2d, Persia; 3rd, Grecia; 4th, Syria; 5th, Thrace; 6th, Macedonia; 7th, Egypt. The first four kings reigned in Babylon. The first three died there. Syria, the fourth, reigned there; and Thrace, Macedonia and Egypt received their commission in Babylon to their kingdoms at the time the four divisions of Alexander's kingdom took place. The five fallen kings were Babylon, Persia, Greece, Thrace, Egypt and one (that) is, that is Macedon, and the other (that) is not yet come is Turkey; and when he cometh he must continue a short space. That short space is five months—prophetic time; i. e., 150 years. The time commencing in the year 1299 to their final settlement in Constantinople was 154 years (the four years occupied preparing for war), when, under Mahommed II., Constantinople became the seat of the Ottoman supremacy in Europe. Thus Turkey is the eighth head or king, and is of the seventh; that is, he comes out of Syria and reigns in succession as Syria restored.

"And they that dwell on earth shall wonder whose names were not written in the book of life from the foundation of the world, when they behold the beast that was and is not, and yet is."

In Arabia, one of the Syrian colonies, after the Crusade with the Saracens had subsided, and Christianity, Judaism and Moslemism had caused much strife and tumult, with a continued disquietude under different factions, Governor Ottoman, of one of her disturbed districts, and said to be a descendant of Qquz, a Tartar Prince, did on July 27, A. D., 1299, ascend the throne at Adrianople as Ottoman I., King of Syro-Turkey. The foundation of the Ottoman supremacy, and the commencement of the 150 years.—Chap. ix. 5.

Hence, when at the coronation the Syrian population saw the flag waving in the breeze with their ensigns of royalty emblazoned thereon, there was wonder and admiration at the resurrection or restoration of their old governmental power, which Rome had, by forecasting evil devices against them, inveigled them thereof, reigning in Jerusalem and over Syria, imposing upon them heavy annual tributes. We understand by the phrase "whose names were not written in the book of life from the foundation of the world" it was neither Jew nor Christian that was interested in this wonderment, as there were no favors in view for them; the whole being a Mohammedan movement establishing an hierarchy of persecuting power.

"And here is the mind which hath wisdom." It really appears this clause was put in as a caution to the Church or to writers more generally, not to use these subjects deceitfully or incautiously. Discernment and sagacity were used undoubtedly; but prudence had hid herself. Hence so much inconsistency and division have been maintained among Christians. "The seven heads are seven mountains on which the woman sitteth."

THE TEN HORNS.

These ten horns, or nations, have no affinity with Western Europe, but are situated in European Turkey, and are known as Romelia, Bulgaria, Wallachia, Moldavia, Servia, Croatia, Bosnia, Herzegovina, Albania and Thessaly. They were subjects of Grecia many centuries before the little horn came; he came up after them, and amongst them, in what is now known as Turkey. The successors of Ottoman, the Osman family, resided in Thrace. Orchan, an abdicated Sultan, and his brother Amurath II. resided in Adrianople. Mahommed II. was born there in 1430, about 130 miles west of Constantinople, which is good evidence that they were not strangers in Europe, and for aught to the contrary they may have been descendants of old Syria, who conquered Thrace and Macedonia, and added these provinces or principalities to his dominions, and in after years recovered them under Mahommed II. in 1453.

When I penned the last few lines, I had not consulted Dan. vii. 24. The whole of this chapter is altogether in unison with Rev. xvii. on the judgment of the little horn. That these ten kings shall arise and another king shall arise after them, that should differ from Babylon, Persia and Grecia; and he should subdue three kings. This will not apply to any other kingdom but to old Syria only, which did rule over the Greeks in these ten states or principalities as long back as B. C. 70, to over 200 years.

"And the ten horns which thou sawest upon the beast, these shall hate the whore, and shall make her desolate and naked, and shall eat her flesh and burn her with fire. For God hath put it into their hearts to fulfill his will, and to agree and give their kingdom unto the beast until the word of God shall be fulfilled."

THE THREE HORNS PLUCKED UP BY THE ROOTS.

After the division of Alexander's dominions, Thrace and Macedon, the two kingdoms, a division of his first territory he reigned over before he went on his great expedition, then known as the Byzantium Greek nations, and their city of governmental power, of the same name as its capitol, was the allotment of these two nations, and may now be known on Mitchell's Atlas as Thrace and Macedon, converted into the State of Romelia, in European Turkey.

The other two divisions of Alexander's territory or dominion were Syria, called the king of the North, and Egypt, known as the king of the South. These two nations, though blood relations, were bitter enemies of each other for more than two centuries.

Soon after they were settled in their kingdoms jealousies and animosities led to war; Syria subverted Thrace and Macedonia, and ceded their territories to his crown, which plucked up these two first horns or kingdoms by their roots.

The broils and wars between Syria and Egypt continued many years, when Rome interferes, silences Syria, wars with Egypt, fights the great battle of Pharsalto, in Egypt, subduing Egypt, henceforward taking possession of all Alexander's territory occupied by these four kingdoms. Thus Syria was silenced into the abyss, and Egypt plucked up by the roots. Rome now becomes conqueror of the East, and settles in Palestine a monarchy ruled by Romans, but eventually removes her own imperial government to Thracia and settles in old Bysantium, the capitol of the old Grecian monarchy, rebuilding a new city, calling it after his own name—Constantinople.

The introduction of the governmental power of Moslem into these states, with her iron legs of discipline, was a severe blow to the Greek Church, although they were themselves very far from obeying the pure principles of the Bible. Nevertheless, the doctrines of the Mohammedist they depised, rejecting their precepts and examples, for which they were often admonished and punished; fulfilling the prophecy (Dan. ii.) that the clay-iron toes could not form a compact and strong governmental power altogether, no more than iron and clay would stick or cohere together. Hence these two religious factions passed lives of strife, hatred, punishment and war. Herzegovina, on the Adriatic, at one time was a dukedom, and for over 200 years was the battle-field or battle-ground of the contestants, all in connection or cognition of the Eastern question. Hence they, with the assistance of their great High Priest, the Czar of Russia—that is these multitudes of peoples, nations and tongues have become free from the Turkish yoke, and herself existing only by suffrage, represented as desolate and naked and burned with fire, losing its power or a division of European Turkey, partly strong and partly broken; taking away his power and dominion to consume (as by fire) and to destroy it unto the end. A large sample of the whole was the ceding of his Eastern territory to Great Britain a year ago, or in the year 1876, which is only a copy of what is to follow.

These ten horns are entirely crownless, having received no kingdom as yet. They were under Turkey, not as a confederacy. For centuries ago, as Grecian states, they were subjects to Alexander the Great before his Eastern expedition; and after his death they fell in the succession of his generals by conquests from Syria down to Turkey, and were always ruled by a federal head. In the Scripture connections of these horns they speak only of multitudes, nations and tongues, but not as kings until the ONE hour with the beast, which is nigh at hand to come.

Verse 17.—“For God hath put it into their hearts to fulfill his will, and to agree and give their kingdom unto the beast until the word of God shall be fulfilled.”

Although Turkey is down, as the cry runs abroad, she is not utterly abolished. For, in the early future, general national circumstances, by many unforeseen, may take place; among which these states or provinces will be led to make a league with the Porte, and eventually will crown them kings as his allies, for his own and their protection and safety, which is of short duration; for great disquietude and the sound of war pervades all nations.

Verse 14.—“These shall make war with the Lamb and the Lamb shall overcome them; for he is Lord of lords and King of kings.”

Only a few short years will have passed away when the two banners of these two great nations were floating over these principalities in deadly feud, warring for delivery from the iron yoke of Moselmism. Now the two banners, the crescent (Babylon) and the cross (Greece) stand together in unison, hand in hand, the insignia of royalty of the two little horns, presenting themselves in battle array against the banner of the Lamb; or, as the prophet so beautifully predicts of that day, “when I have bent Judah for me”; i. e., when the Jews are returned and settled in Jerusalem, “and Ephraim,” the Gentiles’ bow or armies “are prepared with the sons of Zion,” the Church, and Greece comes with all his mighty power against them with his aids to recover their lost principalities and kingdoms.

“Then the Lord is seen over them with the whirlwinds of the South, for he is LORD of lords and KING of kings, and they that are with him are called and chosen and faithful. The LORD of Hosts (of armies) shall defend them, and save them as the flock of his people; for as the stones of a crown shall they be lighted up as an ensign.” Henceforth a stone smites the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver and the gold, and brakes them to pieces together, and they become like the chaff of the summer threshing floors, and the wind carrieth them away that no place is found for them.

THE COMING THRONE.

BY D. T. TAYLOR.

A VACANCY. Since B. C. 588 there has been a vacant throne in our world. A kingdom of heavenly rule, a throne called the Lord’s, tumbled down, and was subverted for want of a suitable king. First, a theocracy became obsolete (1 Sam. 8:7), then a throne became perpetually vacant. Ezek. xxi. 25-27. This throne has been without a lawful occupant for 2465 years. Since Zedekiah, not another king has ruled in it. Where is the rightful King? Ans.: On God’s throne. Rev. iii: 21. Who is he? Ans.: One Jesus. He is the King in David’s line, of Israel’s stock, of Judah’s lineage and of God’s begetting. He is the sole, the only, the true heir to the vacant throne. “I will give it him,” says the Almighty. “I am David’s offspring,” replies the King. “He shall occupy David's throne," shouts the Angel. Luke i: 32. Will he do it? Who believes the promise to day? What is meant by this promise? And how and when is it to be fulfilled?

THE THRONE. From the Greek thronos we have throne—a royal word indeed. It is used sixty-one times, is rendered "seat" seven times, and "throne" fifty-four times. In every place it should be translated throne. Forty-eight times it refers to the throne of God, six times to the thrones of the elders and apostles, and three times to the throne of Satan. The throne of Jesus is referred to as "the throne of his father David," "the throne of his glory," "the throne of the Lamb," "my throne," etc. A true throne is a high, royal seat, a chair. In classical works "the throne" meant the king's estate, or dignity; it is always a seat and centre of power, and the word alone stands as a symbol and synonym of rule, authority and dominion. A princely order of angels is in Col. i. 16 termed "thrones." Compare Dan. x., where Michael and Gabriel are called princes, being celestial potentates, or archangels. Regal sovereignty and supreme power centre in the throne. It is a magnificently sounding word. It savors of dignity and splendor. Of God it is written, "His throne is in the heavens," and again, "Heaven is my throne." His is the seat and centre of absolute, unlimited power. Might and protection reign on God's throne.

THE ANCIENT THRONES. God, enthroned in heaven, was once King of Israel. 1 Sam. viii. 6, 7. This divine rule was theocratic and supreme. Deity himself reigned. Then Israel said, "Give us a king." And God "gave them a king in his anger, and took him [Saul] away in his wrath." Hosea xiii. 10, 11. Then David was divinely chosen. He was anointed as king long years previous to his taking the throne, and then again at his inauguration. He reigned forty years over an undivided nation, i. e., Israel and Judah, or "the whole house of Israel." 2 Sam. v. 5. His throne, first named in 2 Sam. iii. 10, is not described. The circumstances of its erection, kind, or quality, are not revealed. He had two capitals—Hebron first, then Zion, the city of David, afterward called Jerusalem. God proposed and decreed the perpetuity of David's throne: "Thy throne shall be established forever." 2 Sam. vii. 16; 1 Kings ii. 4; viii. 25; ix. 5; 2 Chron. vi. 16; Jer. xxxiii. 17.

As surely as are the laws and ordinances that govern the heavenly bodies, so surely some son of David in direct line shall sit on David's throne and inherit David's sovereignty.

The eternity of the throne was also pledged to David's son, Solomon. 2 Sam. vii. 13. The territory reigned over in David's day extended from Dan to Beersheba. 2 Sam. iii. 10. In Solomon's day its extent was from the river Euphrates to the border of Egypt. The rule of these two kings was not limited to the same territory, nor to the same persons. There was also a difference in the royal seat of this father and son. The thrones of David and Solomon differed in material, shape, and splendor. The two were not identical, neither were the subjects wholly identical. Nevertheless, the sovereignty was the same. Solomon was instant successor to the throne, the crown and kingdom of David. This shows that when we come to the kingdom of him who styled himself "greater than Solomon," we are not compelled to suppose he is limited to the area of territory, identical subjects, royal seat, or royal city of David and Solomon, though truly their lawful successor. Let this fact be borne in mind. The Lord made Solomon's throne "greater" than David's. 1 Kings i. 37. He will make Christ's throne greater than Solomon's. Unprecedented "royal majesty" engirded Solomon's throne; grander by far will be the throne of Jesus—the Coming Throne. 1 Chron. xix. 23-25; Matt. xxv. 31

A THRONE PLEDGED. He who had God for his father, and Mary for his mother, is sole and rightful heir to the Davidic throne. (1) A God-man was decreed for this throne. Ps. cxxxii. 11. Mark the words, "Of the fruit of thy body will I set upon thy throne." The occupant was to be the offspring of David, but he was to be God, or out from God. (2) Jesus was born and given for this object, and he alone can fulfill this decree. "The Lord God shall give him the throne of his father David." Luke i. 32. (3) The angel called David our Lord's "Father," and Jesus took the title of "the son of David." Matt. xxii. 42. He is called "the seed of David" twice, and "the son of David" fifteen times, by the sacred writers. And now, while in heaven on God's throne, Christ calls himself "the root and offspring of David." Rev. xxii. 16. He has also "the key of David." Rev. iii. 7. Post-millennialists may ignore and forget it, but Jesus never forgets his pledged heirship and sacred right to the Davidic throne. (4) It was for this purpose that Christ was resurrected. God swore with an oath to David "that of the fruit of his loins he would raise up Christ to sit on his [David's] throne," and David, "seeing this before, spake of the resurrection of Christ." Acts ii. 30-32. "This Jesus hath God raised up." For what? Answer: To sit on David's throne. Nothing but the most subtle infidelity, the most pernicious interpretation of a text, the most outrageous dealing with God's words, can erase the promise of God concerning Christ. The proof is unanswerable, and the promise absolute and imperishable.

JESUS TO-DAY. Rev. iii. 21 opens to view two thrones. Christ sits to-day and all through this age on his Father's throne. His own throne is in prospect; he is waiting for it. It is not the upper throne, the Father's throne that is promised to the overcomer; it is the coming throne, the Davidic throne, the throne of Jesus Christ. Jesus is the heir-expectant of a crown, a throne, a kingdom and dominion in our planet. At present this throne is vacated by God's decree. The royal seat is unoccupied, the King "whose right it is" has not come. For his coming the earth groans, and all faithful souls sigh and pray. The Lord yearns to come again. His coming is his own hope, it is the hope of the pious dead, it is the hope of the righteous living, it is the hope of a marred universe.—Selected.

The following article, bearing upon the duty of religious teachers in these times, is commended to the serious consideration both of teachers and hearers:

THE ENGLISH PULPIT.

2 TIM. IV. 1-5.

THE interests of truth, the honor of God and the highest welfare of the people alike demand, and at all times demand, fidelity on the part of the pulpit. But the intensity of thought which marks the present time gives unusual emphasis to the demand for faithfulness to the divine record in the case of our public teachers. Two remarkable facts which, seem at first sight irreconcilable, characterize the Sunday congregations of England. The first is that, as a rule, places of worship are more largely attended than heretofore. There is a strong desire to hear what the pulpit has to say, springing no doubt from the universal conviction that the world is nearing some extraordinary crisis, which, whatever may be the essential character or mode of development, will remove some of the landmarks of our venerable theology and introduce great changes into human thought on almost every subject.

The second fact is that this ardent wish to receive light from the accredited leaders of religious thought is not, generally speaking, gratified. The intelligent occupants of the pew—and these are far more numerous than the pulpit imagines—are tired of fine essays or eloquent orations on some sentence or half sentence, quoted from psalmist, prophet or apostle, upon which the essayist or orator builds his argument and shows what he can do in elaborating some principle or doctrine which may be both good and true in itself, but which utterly fails to shed light upon the awful and glorious realities of the impending crisis. The people want to hear what God has said concerning these last days; they wish for expositions of the divine Word, readings from the inspired prophets of both Testaments and clear unfoldings of Christ's teachings respecting his return for his Church and to his inheritance—the world. Men are wearied of theological wranglings and hair-splittings; of Calvinistic and Arminian "doctrines," of creeds and catechisms; and not before time. They want light, food, strength, the air of heaven to breathe, the will of heaven to guide. There is a deep and a true conviction on many minds that there are truths in the Bible which have not yet been brought before our congregations generally.

The fierce falsehood of eternal torments is now abandoned by most men as an intolerable horror, which has no place whatever in the Word of God.

Some men are slow of apprehension, and with a praiseworthy sense of the sacredness of what they have been taught as religious truth are reluctant to part with any notion, however incredible or awful in itself, which is supposed to be a part of "the faith." This conservative feeling springs from a good motive, and is, therefore, and so far only, worthy of respect. But it will not bear a moment's criticism; for that which is incredible or awful in itself cannot be an integral part of a system which avowedly and confessedly had its origin in the love of God to man; and the more valuable a thing is the more anxious should its friends be to keep it clean from the dust and bright from the rust which are so common in the world. The feeling which will not endure a speck of mildew on the sacred parchment, or a mob of chaffering money-changers in the Father's temple, is intellectually nobler and morally more beautiful than that which timidly shrinks from the removal of a hoary falsehood as if it were a buttress to eternal truth. Among the other false things which have darkened the story of man, a false piety has been none of the least. Intelligent loyalty is not reckless, but it is always fearless, and it does not mean to undermine the building when it puts forth a strong hand to tear away the parasites, that the marble and gold of the glorious erection may flash back the light of the noon-day sun.

But there are other men who are quick in apprehending logical results, who see as it were by inspiration, or intuition—if you prefer the word—what must be the ultimate issue of a given doctrine. A long process of reasoning is not required in their case. They can reason, and that most rigidly, but while you are slowly piling up your scholastic argument with “this” and “that” and “therefore,” they have reached the goal and are calmly sitting with folded arms smiling at your needless toil. The remarkable fact is that these men are almost always right. Careful subsequent examination proves that the conclusion reached is in harmony with Scripture. The reason is not difficult to find. The quick perception was really the effect of Scripture truth lodged in the mind, and perhaps long lodged there, although the rapid thinker may not have been conscious of the fact at the time. These are the men whose disagreeable lot it is to be misunderstood, and misrepresented, and evil spoken of in our churches. As a general rule this is what they get for heralding any great reformation, or bringing to the light of resurrection some long-buried truth, that is to say, until they die, and then the empty compliment of having been before the age is paid to their dust.

Between these two types of mind there are many intermediate links which it would be a waste of time to particularize by characteristic epithets, even if it could be done correctly. Nor is it in the least needful to attempt this, as every one knows the fact. Indeed, it is questionable whether anything short of a miracle could make all men think alike, and then it would speedily become questionable whether such a miracle could be a blessing. We are certain that it could not, and for that very reason equally certain that it will never be wrought. Heaven’s miracles contemplate infinitely higher objects than a level uniformity of thought among men, which would make conversation a sleepy absurdity, discussion an impossibility and pulpit ministration superfluous.

But does all this imply that there is any insuperable difficulty in ascertaining the meaning of Scripture respecting the nature of man, the character of God in Christ, the significance of redemption and the future of the world and the Church? No, it implies just the contrary. We have the truth of God declared to us on the points named. The lines of thought along which different minds travel in relation to these points will be different; but where there is an honest desire to accept revealed truth untarnished by the defiling touch of pagan philosophy, mediæval tradition or science falsely so called there is not the slightest doubt but that revealed truth will come home to the mind and the heart as a sublime and joyful reality. What the pulpit, therefore, has to do, ought to do and must do, if it would discharge its duty to God and man in view of the supreme crisis to which all things are tending, is clear enough. I must lay aside with holy and resolute determination the Westminster Confession of Faith, the Thirty-nine Articles of the Episcopal Church and all the other creeds of Christendom—that is to say, lay them aside, so far as the slightest idea of doctrinal AUTHORITY is concerned—and accept and teach the plain declarations of Scripture concerning life and death, the coming of Christ, the extinction of evil and the glorious future, when, in a cleansed and happy universe, without sin or sorrow, “God will be all in all.”

The question, however, may be asked, Supposing the pulpit clothed with the moral strength necessary for this fearless testimony, would the pew endure it? We reply, undoubtedly, certainly! The devout and thoughtful in our assemblies would not only “endure” this heroic surrender of mediæval dimness for cloudless apostolic light, but would exceedingly rejoice in it. This is not a supposition founded on the fact that, sooner or later, truth commends itself to all its friends but on actual experience. At first the timid and the ill-instructed—the men who “need that some one teach them again the first principles of the oracles of God”—take the alarm and depart to some congenial fold where the orthodox echoes of many generations form the pleasant lullaby of somnolent folks; but those who are alive to the responsibilities of moral life, and are consequently anxious to be living witnesses to God and his truth, will “prove all things, and hold fast to that which is good.”

Of course there are men in some of our pulpits who are mentally incapable of realizing the grandeur of an effort to return to apostolic doctrine at all hazards; men who, unconsciously to themselves, reveal the narrow limits of their vision by alluding contemptuously to the glorious truths of the second advent and immortality only in Christ; and men from whom, therefore, it is absurd to expect anything in the battle which is now being waged between truth and error. But is a fact that intelligent hearers of such men are perfectly weary of the infliction. They go to “church” or “chapel” from a mere sense of duty and to set a good example to others, but as for life or joy in the service, the thing is unknown. We say, therefore, with all emphasis, that if our ministers would become teachers and rise to the height of the great argument which the divine Book places before them; if they would throw their moral and mental strength, consecrated by the Holy Spirit, into the splendid battle for a divine immortality and the pre-millennial return of our Lord; and if, to facilitate their acquaintance with these sublime doctrines of Scripture, they would cast aside misleading formularies, they would find the best men and women of their congregations standing heartily by their side. Let the pulpit be true to God, and the pew will be true to it.—Selected.

CANON FARRAR'S PROTEST AGAINST THE POPULAR BELIEF OF DIVINE RETRIBUTION.

Extracts from a sermon preached in Westminster Abbey, Dec. 5, 1867.

WHAT the popular notion of hell is you, my brethren, are all aware. Many of us were scared with it in our childhood. It is that the moment a human being dies, at whatever age, under whatever disadvantages, his fate is sealed hopelessly and forever; and that, if he die in unrepented sin, that fate is a never-ending agony, amid physical tortures the most frightful that can be imagined; so that, when we think of the future of the human race we must conceive of a vast and burning prison in which the lost souls of millions writhe and shriek forever, tormented in a flame that never will be quenched. You have only to read the manuals—you have only to look at the pictures—of the Roman Catholics on the one hand and of Nonconformists on the other, to see that such has been and is the common belief of Christendom. . . . I know nothing so calculated to make the whole soul revolt with loathing from every doctrine of religion, as the easy complacency with which some cheerfully accept the belief that they are living and moving in the midst of millions doomed irreversibly to everlasting perdition.

If St. Paul again and again flings from him with a "God forbid" the conclusions of an apparently irresistible logic, we, surely, who have no irresistible logic of any kind against us in this matter, but only, in great part, spiritual selfishness and impenetrable tradition, do we not, in the high name of the outraged conscience—of humanity—nay, in the far higher name of the God who loves us, of the Saviour who died for us, of the Holy Spirit who enlightens us; do we not hurl from us representations so cruel of a doctrine so horrible that every nerve and fibre of our intellectual, moral and spiritual life revolts at it? Ignorance may, if it will, make a fetish of such a doctrine; Pharisaism may write it broad upon its philacteries; hatred may inscribe it instead of holiness to the Lord; instead of all the sacerdotalism in which it simulates and degrades the name of love; but here, in the presence of so many living, and in this vast mausoleum of the glorious dead—here, amid the silent memorials of the men of fame and the fathers who begat us, of whom many, though not saints, were yet noble though erring men; and whom, though they and we alike shall certainly suffer, and suffer bitterly both here and hereafter the penalty of unrepented sin, we cannot and will not think of as condemned to unutterable tortures by irreversible decrees. I repudiate these crude and ghastly travesties of the holy and awful will of God. I arraign them as mercilessly ignorant. I impeach them as a falsehood against Christ's universal and absolute redemption. I denounce them as a blasphemy against God's exceeding and eternal love. More acceptable, I am very sure, than the rigidest and most uncompromising orthodoxy of all the Pharisees who have ever judged their brethren since time began—more acceptable by far to him who, on his cross, prayed for his murderers; and who died that we might live—more acceptable, I say, than the delight which, amid a deluge of ruin, hugs the plank on which itself alone is saved, would be the noble and trembling pity which made St. Paul declare himself ready to be anathema from Christ for the sake of his brethren—which made Moses cry to God at Sinai, "Oh, this people have sinned a great sin; yet now, if thou wilt forgive their sin; and if not, blot me, I pray thee, out of thy book which thou hast written."

But I would ask you to believe, my brethren, that I speak now not with natural passion, but with most accurate theological precision, when I say that, though texts may be quoted which give prima facie plausibility to such modes of teaching, yet, to say nothing of the fact that the light and love which God Himself has kindled within us recoil from them, those texts are, in the first place, alien to the broad, unifying principles of Scripture; that, in the next place, they are founded on interpretations demonstrably groundless; and, in the third place, that, for every one so quoted, two can be adduced on the other side. There is an old, sensible, admitted rule of theology —Theologia parabolica non est demonstrativa— in other words, that phrases which belong to metaphor, to imagery, to poetry, to emotion, are not to be formulated into necessary dogmas, or crystallized into rigid creeds. If this rule be used to test them, nine-tenths of the phrases on which these views are built fall utterly to the ground. But even were it otherwise, once more, in the name of Christian light and Christian liberty—once more, in the name of Christ's promised Spirit, I protest against the ignorant tyranny of isolated texts, which has ever been the curse of Christian truth, the glory of narrow intellects, and the cause of the worst errors of the worst days of the most corrupted Church. Ignorance has engraved texts upon her sword, and oppression has carved them upon her fetters, and cruelty has tied texts about her fagots; and ignorance again has set knowledge at defiance with texts woven on her flag. Gin-drinking has been defended out of Timothy, and slavery has made a stronghold of the Epistle to Philemon. The devil, you know, can quote Scripture for his purpose, and quoted texts against Christ himself; and when St. Paul fought the great battle of Christian freedom against the curse of the law, he was anathematized with a whole Pentateuch of texts. But, my brethren, we live under the dispensation of the Holy Spirit, and our guide is the Scriptures of God in their broad outlines—the revelation of God in its glorious unity, the books of God in their eternal simplicity, read by the illumination of that Spirit of Christ which dwelleth in us except we be reprobates. . . . You must take words and you must interpret words in their proper and historical significance, not in that sense which makes them convey to you a thousand notions which did not originally belong to them.

Now, I ask you, my brethren, very solemnly, where would be the popular teachings about hell if we calmly and deliberately erased from our English Bibles the words "damnation" and "hell"? Yet I say unhesitatingly—I say, claiming the fullest right to speak with the authority of knowledge—I say, with the calmest and most unflinching sense of responsibility—I say, standing here in the sight of God and of my Saviour, those words ought not to stand any longer in our English Bibles, and that being, in our present acceptance of them, simply mistranslations, they most unquestionably will not stand in the revised version of the Bible if the revisers have understood their duty. . . . I shake off the hideous incubus of atrocious conceptions attached by false theology to the doctrine of final retribution.

P.S.—CANON FARRAR wrote to the London Guardian, in respect to misrepresentations of his views as follows: "Sir: Since many complete misrepresentations of the language and purport of a sermon which I recently preached in Westminster Abbey have found their way to public notice, I am reluctantly compelled to trespass upon your courtesy. I will, however, confine myself to the correction of one erroneous statement. To say, as these reports have done, that I "denounced the doctrine of eternal punishment," or expressed a hope that the word eternal might not appear in the revised translation, is, as most of your readers will have seen at a glance, utter nonsense. The object of my sermon was to prove that the word eternal did not necessarily connote endlessness; and at the same time to vindicate that faith in the possible effects of Christ's infinite redemption even beyond the grave, which seems to be most expressly stated in the text from which I preached (1 Peter iv. 6). Neither the Anglican nor even (I believe) the Romish Church has dogmatically decided against the permissibility of such a hope; and, as known to all students of Church history, it has been widely held in different ages, both by very eminent fathers and theologians, and by some of the holiest of the saints of God."

A CRITICISM ON H. DUNN.

BY DR. F. BRUNS.

BRO. STORRS:—Will you kindly grant me a few comments on Henry Dunn's Real Difficulties, in Vol. xxii., page 335; of our beloved BIBLE EXAMINER. I am sorry to say anything about the writings of such a learned and clear-headed scholar, one you and myself respect and honor so much.

No doubt, if the sayings and teachings of our Lord are brought in contact with "may and may not," as Bro. Dunn thought, the "yea and amen" in him are doubtful. I think the Lord referred in the first of the "real difficulties" to his transfiguration; and in the second instance to the generation which will see the wonders and signs predicted (Matt. xxiv).

My first position is backed by 1 Peter, "We saw"; and my second by "Shall not pass." So far as I understand the language, "shall" does not imply any "may or may not" in any sense. Christ knew more about his second coming in glory than we do to-day; and he knew even more about the duration of this age than Bengel, Miller and Barbor did or do to-day. I could be almost persuaded to call Bro. Dunn's comparison of Christ's knowledge in regard to his return, with the misapprehension of his disciples in this matter, a libel on our Lord. His words are "yea and amen" to me, and therefore my warm indignation. There are no real difficulties for me at all.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.

I agree with my friend in the application of the text referred to; and do not accept friend Dunn's suggestion on it; but may he not be justified in the suggestion of the word "may"; for there were some things, at least one, that Jesus did not know in his humiliation; and that "one thing" is the very thing of which Mr. Dunn was speaking, viz., the time of his second advent. Our Lord Jesus said of that event "Of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father" (Mark xiii: 32).

This looks as though the Saviour spake of his knowledge as the "Son of man" previous to his glorification. That while he was in the state of humiliation he "increased in wisdom" is affirmed (Luke ii: 52). It seems, therefore, as "the Son of man" he might not have known everything in the future; and Mr. Dunn might not be censurable in his suggestion, though we may not agree with him in making it.

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.

[LUCRETIA B. LAMB, St. Paul, Minn., is 78 years old, nearly totally blind, and depends on making rag mats for her support. It is strange how she can make them at all. She insisted on pledging $14 toward the BIBLE EXAMINER the past year and had seven copies sent to her children and friends. She paid half the amount last winter, and I neither desired nor expected any more; but a few weeks ago she sent the other $7, and a friend wrote by her dictation as follows.—ED.]

"BRO. STORRS: I have had much anxiety about obtaining the means to meet the payment of my pledge, as I have no funds. The blessed Jesus is a present help in time of need. I betook myself to him in prayer. In a way I little thought of I obtained a sale for my work, so that I can now remit to you the full amount. Why do we not always remember this stronghold? I have too often experienced its wondrous power to forget with impunity my beloved 'ISHI,' which is mine while ages roll. Angels taste not of the glory of holy 'ISHI' of the soul. That selection of Sister Pitts is a complete description of the exercises of my heart, growing stronger and deeper day by day and hour by hour. I watch and wait for the time when I shall see Jesus as he is and find in his bosom my eternal resting-place. 'Oh, to grace, how great a debtor!' What is the best return we can make? Give him our whole being. Will he accept so vile an offering? Yes, and fashion it after his most glorious body. The eye of faith is dim, but 'tis enough that Christ knows all and I shall be with him. I had hoped I should not address you in this way again, but with you behold Jesus as he is, and wear his image. But it seems we are not yet ready and must wait a little longer. I will wait patiently, for the Master knows best. Not my will but his be done; nevertheless 'I will daily stand upon the watch-tower to see what he will say unto me' His grace aiding me, I will not draw back; it will speak in the right time, and we shall find it did not tarry."

ELD. J. PARRY, Sandy Hill, N. Y., sends pay for Vol. XXIII. for himself and daughter in Iowa, and writes: "My daughter says she cannot do without the EXAMINER, and I feel much the same. We hope you will be spared to spread the truth more and more as light shines on this dark world. We are anxious to see and believe all our gracious Father has in store for us. I am nearly 84 years old and feel the infirmities of age creeping on, but my hope is in the promises of God to his people—all who love his appearing."

DAVID MCBRIDE, Indiana, writes: "I am yet alive and in my 83d year, thanks be to the Lord. I am at a loss without the BIBLE EXAMINER, for I think it a great help to enable us to comprehend with all saints what is the length and breadth, and the height and depth of the love of God in Christ Jesus our Lord for a lost world. Please send me the EXAMINER for this volume and the next."

J. M. JUDSON, Ohio, writes: "You may look for about $10 at least from our little band in Elyria. We will do all we can. God bless the BIBLE EXAMINER, and its Editor especially. Yours in hope."

WM. B. PUTNAM, of Wisconsin, aged seventy-one years, sends for ten copies of EXAMINER, Vol. xxiii., and writes: "We feel that we could not do without the EXAMINER, for it seems to be meat in due season. I am glad that I live to see this day. How comforting to those who have the faith of Abraham."

God be praised for the prospect of his seed soon possessing the gates of his enemies. The time of singing of Birds is coming, and the voice of the Turtle Dove of peace will be heard in the land. Come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly. Amen, and amen. Your aged brother, in hope of Eternal Life."

WM. LINDSAY, Michigan, sends new subscribers and writes: "I have long been trying to do something for the BIBLE EXAMINER; and am thankful for some success. I feel that I can never do too much for the abiding happiness it has brought to me; and while I am thankful to you and the dear ones who contribute to our monthly feast of fat things, may I ever remember "to give due credit to God, the giver of all blessings; and may my heavenly Father help me still more to pray, to labor, and to pay all I can for more of these God-given truths; that our path may be a shining light, is the desire of your brother in the blessed hope."

MARGARET SMITH, Maryland writes. "The BIBLE EXAMINER is all the preacher I have, and I am well satisfied with its teachings and hope it will be kept alive until the kingdom is set up; an event which, according to my faith, is not far distant.

A. McCORD, Ohio, writes: "I appreciate your efforts to promulgate the great truth that 'God is Love,' and that he will have all men come to the knowledge of the truth. I am truly thankful for a glimpse of God's purpose in 'creating all things for his own pleasure,' and that in due time he will make known to the world, through the Church, the riches of his grace, when the Church shall have become the Bride, having been made like her Head. The Lord bless and sustain you."

SALLY DILLINGHAM, of Mass., aged eighty years, writes: "The BIBLE EXAMINER is a source of comfort to me. I like it better every one I receive. I have taken it whenever published ever since 1850. At that time a brother gave me a copy of it and I felt rich in its possession. I feel the Lord to be very kind to me in my trials. I am all alone in my belief, but the Lord is with me, and I thank him for his mercies bestowed on such an unworthy creature as I feel myself to be. The EXAMINER has imparted great light to me on the Scriptures; in particular on the Old Testament. Thanks to the Lord for it. I hope the EXAMINER will be sustained. May you and yours be blessed of our heavenly Father, and your needs be supplied."

MRS. S. C. WEBSTER, of Mass., writes: "The truth 'of the Ages' is spreading. My faith is strong in God. 'His word shall not return to him void,' and so I speak it; it is my meat and drink. God bless and keep you, that you may still be able to dispense needed food to the household."

G. B. STACY, Virginia, writes: "The EXAMINER for September is at hand, and read; and, as usual, its contents were found to be rich and varied and full of the food of life. It is a pleasing and a highly satisfactory consideration that our FATHER has brought out and manifested the means of its sustenance; evidence that it is doing a good work; for he developeth, controlleth, restraineth, or withholdeth them at his own pleasure. He is working 'all things after the counsel of his own will'; and if we feel sorry that we are personally unable to give a helping hand, we nevertheless bow to our Father's will, and accept his disposition of our surroundings as those which are best suited to us, and through which he can teach us most effectually the lessons we need to learn, and pray that we may be able to comprehend the lessons he would teach us, and understand all their bearings and requirements that we may, by them, be moulded into his perfect image and likeness."

N. L. THAYER, Wisconsin, writes: "In my mind the truth seems to be gradually unfolding, so that the path of the just looks brighter and more glorious from time to time. Paul, to the Ephesians, speaks of the 'unsearchable riches of Christ'; by which I suppose he means, 'who, by searching can find out God'? But as the student of the word proceeds he is enabled to see very many of its riches in Christ. In the first place, his Father is sole owner of all worlds and the fulness thereof; and he has given his Son all power in heaven and in earth, and his kingdom and dominion shall be under the whole heaven; and the Father hath given him all the elect to reign with him. Truly, we can begin to see some of the riches of Christ. All the riches any of us have ever possessed have been liable to be taken from us: but his kingdom shall stand eternally; for of it 'there shall be no end.' He is not only rich, but of 'the increase of his government there shall be no end.' Now, friends, what would you give to be joint-heirs with him in all these possessions? The only price asked is, give up all your sins; believe on the Lord Jesus Christ; obey his commands; live to his honor and glory; overcome, as he did, and you shall sit down on his throne, among the royal, reigning, immortal family of earth. Then shall we be fully prepared to go forth to those ignorant of the truth, and say, 'Behold the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sins of the world.' My heart says, Glory and honor and power be unto him now and eternally."

M. TOMKINS, Wisconsin, writes: "I have received all the BIBLE EXAMINER, Vol. xxii., and feel thankful to God that I was prompted to send for it. I also feel grateful to you and other writers of the EXAMINER. I have found them a great help to me in understanding prophecy, especially on the 'Ages to come,' both by yourself and Mr. Dunn. It is my earnest prayer that the good Lord may give you health and strength to continue to publish the magazine."

D. J. ELLSWORTH, Connecticut, writes: "I am intensely interested in the lightening light; especially concerning the object and manner of our Lord's return. Oh, what erroneous and crude ideas most have who are even looking for and loving the Lord's appearing. I realize that I have far outstript the mass of our people; and I get it by here a little and there a little. New light is now dawning; and what we have called light in the past is much like dense fog. Our people are too fast. There is and has been a shadowy fulfilment going on in this Gentile dispensation, in the Gentile world at large; but the proper, literal fulfilment will take place after Israel and Judah's settlement in the land of Palestine, and after Babylon has been rebuilt, and in it and symbolic Babylon, Gentile pride and civilization reaches its culminating point and falls, with a terrible fall, too, in the place where it took its rise. The Napoleonic Dynasty may furnish a shadowy 'Man of Sin' to correspond with what has resulted in the past, but the 'Terrible man of Sin' that treads down Jerusalem, its Sanctuary and people, is 'The Assyrian.' 'He is the king of fierce countenance,' Daniel viii.; 'The Prince that shall come,' Dan. ix.; the 'Little Horn,' Chap. viii.; 'Second Little Horn' of Chap. xi.; 'King of Babylon and Lucifer,' of Isa. xiv.; 'The Assyrian' of Chap. x.; 'The Beast,' of Rev. xiii., with two horns."

"The grand highway of nations is soon to be built down the Euphrates Valley, and that become the garden and splendor of the world.

I have just thrown out these points, for you may live to see Adventists' interpretations go to 'the moles and to the bats.' When the bride will be taken is not in man's wisdom to specify; it may be very soon, and there may be years first; I think the latter. However, we must watch and wait, and do what our hands find to do."

S. BATTEY, Kansas, writes: "I cannot do without the BIBLE EXAMINER, as it comes laden with precious truth to cheer up the dear ones who are laboring under trials and besetments by the way, in striving to overcome all difficulties in running the race set before us, with patience, if, so be, we may attain to a 'resurrection out from among the death' and be glorified with our risen Saviour."

DEATH'S DOINGS.

"The Tyrant" still reigns. The tidings has reached me since the issue of the EXAMINER of the death of another of my aged friends, our beloved brother Charles Hope, of Abbott's Corner, P. Q., Canada, in his seventy-ninth year. He has been to me a long-tried friend, though I never saw him but once, and that seven years ago, at Springfield, Mass., in the days of my great trial, when I was obliged to leave a host of those who had been my friends, on account of my present position. Brother Hope stood by me, and has done so to the time of his death. I doubt not he "sleeps in Jesus," and will come again from "the land of the enemy." He died Sept. 3. I have no particulars in regard to it. These frequent departures of my aged friends admonishes me that my time here is short. But my life and time are in the Lord's hand, where I choose to leave them for his disposal.

EDITOR.

ELDER H. ROCKWELL fell "alseep in Jesus" in Winsted, Conn., the 9th of September. I have no particulars in regard to it, and only had the information through Sister Maltby, Bristol, Conn. She writes: "Our beloved brother in the Lord, Hiram Rockwell, is dead; aged eighty-four years. He died the 9th of September, a great sufferer; but he is released from all and rests in hope: a blessed hope." Brother Rockwell was with us at my house at the Passover, last April, though in a very feeble condition. He was a sincere lover of truth and followed it where-soever it led him. Peace to his memory.

EDITORIAL NOTICES.

THE BIBLE EXAMINER is a Monthly Magazine. Terms, $2 00 per year, in advance.

Subscribers' Names should be written very plain. Do not neglect this. It is utterly impossible sometimes to decipher names, and mistakes must occur in consequence. As to their Address, give simply the name of the Post-Office and State.

Let all Correspondents be careful to address me as follows:

GEO. STORRS,
72 Hicks Street,
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

All "Postal Money Orders" sent me should be drawn on Brooklyn, N. Y.

To Clubs the BIBLE EXAMINER will be supplied on the following terms:

Two copies to one address,	$3
Four " " "	5
Ten " " "	10

The ten may be divided and sent to the address of two persons, if desired. The prices fixed above are expected to be paid in advance and the money sent at the risk of the subscribers.

Any person wishing either volume of the EXAMINER in sheets—that is unbound—shall have it on receipt of one dollar. The volumes that I can supply are 18, 19, 20, 21, and 22; only a few, however, of volume 20.

BOUND VOLUMES.—The BIBLE EXAMINER, bound, can now be furnished at $2 per volume in neat, plain binding; in morocco, with gilt edges, $3 25. Volumes 18, 19, 20, 21, and 22 can be had of me at the prices named per volume.

PAMPHLETS.—The only one I can furnish is the "DIVINE DISPENSATIONS: or, The Divine Plan in The Government of our Race." Price, 15 cents single copy; $1 25 per dozen.

REMITTANCES.—In these times of theft and robbery no one should venture money by mail except by a "Postal Money Order," if you can get one. If that cannot be done have your letter "Registered" at the office where mailed. Even then its safety depends on the honesty of the officials who take charge of the letter. It is, perhaps, just as safe to send small sums in a letter, sealed and properly directed, without registering as with.

The next best thing to a "Postal Money Order" in remitting money is a Draft on some Banking House in New York City, payable to me or my order —GEO. STORRS.

GEO. D. WILSON, Glasgow, Scotland, will accept my thanks for the package of pamphlets and magazines he sent me a few weeks since. I hope to be able to make use of them. "BEULAH" is especially interesting.

"THE RAINBOW."—I regret the absence of that valuable magazine. None have reached me since July.—EDITOR.

MY CORRESPONDENTS will please be patient; and they will be when told I have more correspondence than funds; and many wish to express their estimation of the work in which we are all so interested, though poor in this world's goods. I shall do the best I can with my limited space and means.

THE CONFERENCE called in this City by Dr. TYNG and others, to consider the subject of the Second Personal Advent of Christ and of his reign on earth, closed too late for any remarks by me except that it was largely attended, and a good deal of interest manifested. I may say something on the aspect, as it appears to me, next month.—EDITOR.

ERRATA.—Page 57, first column, sixth line from top, read a God, instead of "by God." Also, page 56, fourth line from bottom of 2d column, after the word "Why" place (?).—ED.

LETTERS RECEIVED TO NOV. 1.

No letters are acknowledged except those containing money or some inquiry that can be answered in a few words. Such as are acknowledged will be accounted a receipt for whatever is said to be enclosed, unless I state to the contrary.

A QUESTION ANSWERED.

A FRIEND asks me, "Will you please answer this question: When death and hell are destroyed will there remain any in a state of death?"

There are two literal deaths brought to view in the Bible. The first is the death that came upon all men by Adam. The second is that which comes on no man, except by a wilful rejection of the LIFE-GIVER.

The first death will be destroyed, and there will not be any left in that state. I need now give but one text in proof of this, viz., Rom. v. 18, "As by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation [to death], even so, by the righteousness of one [CHRIST] the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life."

Just as extensive as death reigned by Adam's transgression, just so extensive will that death be destroyed, and no man will remain in that death state; and, of course, 'adees (the hell of the text), will be no more forever.

The "second death" is another matter—that is, for a personal and wilful rejection of the only "sacrifice for sin." "For if we sin wilfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth" [concerning the one sacrifice for sins] "there remaineth no more" [no other] sacrifice for sins, but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries."—Heb. x. 26, 27. Having been delivered from the death that came by Adam, and having been placed in a position to make this revived life an endless one by accepting Jesus Christ as an "offering for sins," and wilfully rejecting Him, they bring on themselves the "second death," from which the Word of God says nothing of deliverance; so far as any light is given us it is eternal.—EDITOR.

SALVATION: GOD'S PURPOSE IN RELATION TO IT.

"Who will have all men to be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth."—1 TIM. ii. 4.

THE term "saved," in general, signifies to deliver. What the nature of the deliverance is must be determined by the circumstances. It may be from dangers of any kind; it may be from enemies, temporal or spiritual; from sin; from temptations; from death, temporal, spiritual, or eternal; it may be from ignorance, or a helpless state that prevents our attainment of good that our CREATOR has prepared for his creatures. In this case it is the removal of these disabilities, etc. These uses of the terms save, saved, and salvation, it is presumed will not be questioned by any one.

Two facts are stated in the text above: 1. God "will have all men to be saved," 2. God "will have all men come to the knowledge of the truth." On these two facts rest the sum of the gospel. Without controverting the truth that the terms save, saved, etc., are used often in a restricted sense, or are applied to a deliverance which is conditional, I proceed to notice the first fact stated in the text.

(1) "God our Saviour, who will have all men to be saved." Here is a salvation which is clearly unconditional and depends alone on the will of God. It is equally clear that an ultimate or final salvation is conditional, based on the "belief of the truth" as well as through "sanctification of the Spirit."—2 Thess. ii. 13. Texts need not be multiplied on this point. The salvation in the text under consideration admits of no conditions, as we shall see; it depends entirely on the "will" of "God our Saviour; who will have all men to be saved"; not desires them to be saved: but has willed or determined they shall be saved.

The question then is, What is the nature of this salvation which is unconditional and certain? Paul answers: "As by the offense of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation" [to death]; "even so, by the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon all men unto the justification of life: for as by one man's disobedience the many [all men] were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall the many be made righteous."—Rom. v. 18, 19. That is, As all men die by one man's sin—Adam's—so by one man's righteousness—Christ's—shall all men be made alive from the dead. This revival from the dead is to all men unconditional; but a revival to immortality and eternal life is conditional. The universal revival restores all men from the death that came upon them as the result of Adam's sin. In this respect, Christ has "abolished death"—annulled it; made it void, or powerless to hold one of Adam's race. This is the salvation "God will have all men receive, irrespective of any will of their own. This will further appear as the examination of the second fact in the text proceeds.

(2) "God our Saviour, who will have all men . . . come to the knowledge of the truth." This second fact shows why God will have all men revived from the dead. How else can innumerable millions ever come to the knowledge of the truth? They have died without such knowledge; but Paul, who received his commission and his message directly from the Saviour's personal manifestation, declares, "God our Saviour will have all men come to the knowledge of the truth"; and in order to this, he "will have all men to be saved." Observe, the salvation is placed before coming to the knowledge of the truth, and in order that they shall have that knowledge; for, no man's final state is fixed till he has first had it. When I say "the salvation is placed before coming to the knowledge of the truth," I do not mean that in the order of the work all men must actually be saved or made alive from the dead before they receive that knowledge; but, that God's will to revive all men is based on the fact that in no other way can the mass of the race ever come to the knowledge of the truth, the reception or rejection of which is to determine their final state: and God's impartial "love of the world" is a pledge that "every man" shall come to the knowledge of that love in the gift of his only begotten son" to bestow life eternal on all who will receive him when known to them.

It is a fact, the gospel is to be preached "to every creature"; the gospel of God's love to the world, and of Christ as the LIFE-GIVER for all men: and until it is proclaimed to "every man," or, to each individual that individual has not his proper probation, and his final state cannot be fixed according to the gospel preached to Abraham and confirmed in Christ. Then, saith Paul, "If we sin wilfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more or no other sacrifice for sin."—Heb. x. 26. Thus the apostle keeps the two facts of the text in view, and shows that death must be abolished and all men saved from it or God's will would be defeated, and all men could not have the knowledge of the truth. But God's will shall be accomplished, and death cannot prevent it: he has taken care to see that that "last enemy shall be destroyed" (1 Cor. xv. 26), so that no man who has died in ignorance of God's love and his provisions for their ultimate redemption from sin and all its final consequences, shall fail of eternal life except by a wilful rejection of the truth when, or after, he has come to the knowledge of it.

Such is "God our Saviour's will;" and who or what can defeat his counsel, so as to make his word void? Has he not said, "My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure"?—Isa. xlv. 10.

That I have taken the correct view of the text the context shows. The apostle says: "I exhort, that first of all supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks be made for all men, . . . for this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour, who will have all men to be saved," etc.; "for there is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus; who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time."—1 Tim. ii. 1-6. Hence, the absolute necessity that all men be saved from death: else God's will that they shall "come to the knowledge of the truth," is defeated, and his "due time" will never be reached. The death by Adam is annulled, so that no man can be held by it. If held in death at all, it is because he has sinned "wilfully after that" he has received the knowledge of the truth." Such exceptions no more affect the general truth of the salvation of all men from death, than the general truth that "death passed upon all men" is affected by the translation of Enoch and Elijah or that of saints alive at Christ's return from heaven. The word all embraces the mass of the race; the exceptions are the few. Some may never be released from death, because, personally they have involved themselves in its dominion, by a wilful rejection of the DELIVERER after he was made known to them.—Ed.

WRATH AND MERCY: OR, PUNISHMENT AND FORGIVENESS.

Most religionists suppose, if the Bible speaks of wrath, inflicting punishment on the wicked, mercy to such is out of question. This is a great mistake. The Scriptures abundantly disprove such a conclusion; and the advocates of such an administration in the Divine government entirely misconceive God's method in dealing with the children of men. They overlook the fact that "God is Love," and that even wrath is in love, and designed to bring men to a sense of the evil of sin, or the consequences of disobedience to the Divine commands written or engraved in our nature by the creative hand; which laws can readily be learned by all men.

No one doubts that the violation of physical laws will be followed by punishment of wrath on the transgressor; yet the fact in a multitude of cases is learned by the experience of the wrath. See that child put his hand in that beautiful flame. Wrath is experienced immediately; but he learns a lesson that will be useful to him all his life. So of a multitude of other transgressions of physical laws; laws established by the CREATOR. But who shall accuse him of ill-will or of inflicting unnecessary pain, punishment or wrath on those who violate these laws? All his laws are established in love to the creature man with the design of educating him, by the experience of evil, for a higher state of enjoyment, such as he never could have realized but for his knowledge of evil; the contrast between good and evil makes the good a thousand times more precious than it ever could, otherwise, have been.

All laws established by our CREATOR are from the outgoings of love; and are designed for the greatest and highest good of the created. No other laws could originate from the great and inexhaustible fountain of goodness, implied in the declaration, "God is Love." Hence, all pains or penalties connected with the violation of those laws are the result of love; though expressed under the idea of "wrath," the only idea, perhaps, by which this action of love could be expressed to a finite mind; an idea, however, to a perfectly purified mind that does not convey what it feels and knows to be the fact; for such a mind can have no conception of the existence of wrath, properly speaking, in the nature of him whose whole work of creation was one of love, and designed to impart to the creatures of his power a measure of his own inexhaustible happiness.

We are now prepared to look at Scripture testimony concerning the theme chosen as the subject of this article; and, if not greatly mistaken, it may be found that wrath or punishment is not opposed to mercy or forgiveness.

The first text to which attention is called reads thus: "In my wrath I smote thee, but in my favor have I had mercy on thee."—Isa. lx. 10. Again: "For the iniquity of his covetousness was I wroth, and smote him; I hid Me, and was wroth, and he went on forwardly in the way of his heart. I have seen his ways, and will heal him; I will lead him also, and restore comforts unto him and his mourners."—Isa. lvii. 17, 18.

In both of these cases the people of Israel had been guilty of great and provoking sins, (see chapters 57 to 60 inclusive), and the prophet had said of God, "He put on the garments of vengeance for clothing, and was clad with zeal as a cloak; according to their deeds he will repay, fury to his adversaries, recompense to his enemies; to the islands he will repay recompense. So shall they fear the name of the LORD from the west, and his glory from the rising of the sun."—Isa. lx. 17, 19. Here, not only is the punishment or wrath spoken of, but the design of it is brought to view; it is to bring men to a sense of the evil of sin and to repentance for it, so that they may be forgiven; for, it is added, "The Redeemer shall come to Zion, and unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob, saith the LORD (verse 20); or, as Paul states the case, "There shall come out of Sion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob; for this is My covenant unto them when I shall take away their sins."—Rom. xi, 26, 27.

It is thus seen that God's wrath inflicted on transgressors is an act of love, to bring them and others, who may be witnesses of it to the knowledge that "the way of the transgressor is hard" (Prov. xiii. 15), and that the way of obedience or wisdom's "ways" are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace."—Prov. iii. 17.

The psalmist says, "Thou wast a God that forgavest them though Thou tookest vengeance of their inventions."—Psa. xcix. 8. It is clear that men may be punished for their sins, or the "wrath" of God may be inflicted on them, and yet they be afterward restored to the favor of God. In further proof of this see Isa. xl. "Speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem, and cry unto her that her warfare is accomplished, that her iniquity is pardoned; for she hath received of the LORD's hand double (kiphlaim, i. e., manifold) for all her sins." Yes, though men may experience wrath or punishment for their sins, here or hereafter, yet mercy may be extended to them if they do not wilfully reject it, and will accept the proffered mercy through the "One Mediator." The prophet prayed, "Oh, LORD the . . . in wrath remember mercy."—Hab. iii. 2.

Saith the LORD, "I will not contend forever, neither will I be always wroth."—lvii. 16.

Therefore, though those who "are contentious and obey not the truth, but obey unrighteousness" shall have "indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish" for their "evil doings," it does not prove they are beyond the reach of mercy. One sin, and one only, puts a man in a state which "never hath forgiveness," and makes the sinner "in danger of eternal damnation."—Mark iii. 29. And no man has authority from the Bible to limit the time when God will cease to have mercy or forgive sins. That the time is confined to this life is a human tradition and a fable.—Ed.

"LINE UPON LINE."

WHEN I find intelligent and honest men making mistakes in understanding my position, I conclude my statements are peculiarly unfortunate; or, that men in the present day are the same as in the days of the prophets, when the "Lord gave line upon line, line upon line; here a little and there a little" (Isa. xxviii. 10), that men might see and understand.

A "private" letter lies before me from a highly esteemed friend, in which he evidently does not comprehend me, or I am not as clear as one ought to be who writes intending to benefit others. A few of his statements and conclusions I propose to notice, and see if I can make myself understood, though chargeable with repetition. He says:

"The fulfilment to the letter of God's oath to Abraham is your main pillar—your stronghold; and that plainly declares that in Christ shall ALL the families of the earth be blessed. As auxiliary to this, you bring the testimony of the announcing angel of glad tidings of great joy to all people; and the declaration of Paul that Jesus gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time. Now, my dear brother, how you can hold these strong positions on the one hand, and at the same time admit some will not be benefited is a mystery to me."

To me there is no mystery about it. That man is a free and accountable agent is established by the fact that he was and is under law, connected with rewards and punishments. Such a position is proof of the possibility of a failure, or else the law is a farce and a mockery. I do not "admit some will not be benefited" by the blessing God has promised. Every soul of the human family will be benefited; but the extent of the benefit must be in harmony with man's freedom and accountability. The ultimate benefit can never be reached except man's free-will harmonizes with God's free grace; manhood cannot be destroyed by an act of the CREATOR to introduce the creature to the highest benefit; for that would be to say, God committed an error in man's creation by making him a subject of law, and now has to annul his first work, because he cannot carry out his purpose and give man the greatest blessing he had prepared for a responsible being. All blessings necessary to an ultimate possession of a higher one, have been or will be provided for by God's free grace; but they are provided for creatures who have a free will, which cannot be forced or irresistibly overpowered without destroying manhood; and thus the CREATOR destroy his own work in man's creation—man would be no longer man, but entirely another creature.

My friend goes on to say:

"I understand you to hold that every man has a God-given title to life until he personally rejects the Gospel."

If my friend had used the phrase, rejects Christ as his REDEEMER and LIFE-GIVER, instead of "the Gospel," he would have expressed my idea more clearly. He adds:

"Applying that to this age, if you mean by rejection a failure to embrace the opportunity we have in this country to search the Scriptures and obey its commands, we may well say with the apostles, 'Who then can be saved?' You and I know the Gospel is not, nor has it as yet ever been glad tidings to all, nor to one-quarter part of the people who have had an opportunity to hear. The truth is, the world is filled, so to speak, with men who do not accept or reject it; and many of them are in reality the best citizens we have; moral, upright and honest. Is the 'free gift'—the 'ransom' to be withheld from them?"

I do not say who has had an "opportunity" in "this country," or in any other, "to search the Scriptures" so as to come to a true knowledge of Christ as their REDEEMER and LIFE-GIVER, because I do not know who have, in fact, have had such opportunity. I have no doubt the number is small; much smaller than most people are aware of. From unavoidable causes the mass have been kept in ignorance of the love of God and the work of Christ. The corruption of God's truth by the "Apostacy," and the almost irresistible influence of that deception on all Christendom, and the forcing into the minds of little children the poison of that abomination, has so closed up the avenue to the minds of men, that even now when the Bible is put into their hands it is a sealed Book; and those who call themselves "Watchmen" are quite as blind as those whom they profess to teach. The measure of guilt attached to all this, I pretend not to determine. But the men of whom you speak, who have neither accepted nor rejected this gospel, have been "benefited" by what of truth that still remains in the rubbish that passes for gospel by professed teachers, and I trust will be better prepared to receive the "free gift"—the "ransom"—when God's "due time" comes for it to be "testified" to them in its purity. Then they shall know that "God," in his infinite love, "hath given unto us eternal life, and this (eternal) life is in his Son."—1 John v. 11. "This is the record"—the true record to be made known to all men, here or hereafter, "in the ages to come," Eph. ii. 7; and, when clearly made known, the acceptance or rejection of it decides man's ultimate destiny. If he accepts Christ, the Son of God, as his REDEEMER and LIFE-GIVER, he enters on eternal life; but, then, if he consciously and wilfully rejects God's free gift of life, "in His Son," all previous blessings are forfeited—his "talent," his "pound," given him for improvement, is taken from him.—Matt. xxv. 28 and Luke xix. 24

My friend closes his objections as follows:

"What is meant by the word 'families,' in the oath? Can a family be blessed unless they are all blessed in a greater or less degree? Would you consider it a 'great joy' to receive a gift for yourself and family, if you were certain it would cause the loss of one of them? I think you love all your family, consequently would reject a gift on those terms; and don't you think your heavenly Father is merciful and good to his family, as you are to yours?"

All the members of the human family are or will be "blessed in a greater or less degree": that is just what I maintain. But will they be blessed in the highest degree unless their free will improves God's free grace? I am "certain" that God's "free gift" will not "CAUSE the loss of one of the human family." No such "terms" are imposed on any of the families of the earth. Nothing but the obstinate and conscious rejection of God's love, in Christ, will "CAUSE loss" to any one. God's terms are easy, and he "willeth not the death" of any one. But if men, when fully instructed, as all will be, "WILL NOT come to Christ, that they might have life" (John v. 40), then nothing remains for them but a "certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries."—Heb. x. 27. I trust I am now understood, and have answered in "meekness," as all ought.

"GATHERING OF ISRAEL."

UNDER the above head a writer has attempted to show that all the prophecies relating to that gathering were fulfilled in the return of the Jews from Babylon, under the decrees of Syrus and Artaxerxes. One can but admire the ingenuity of the writer, and his skillfulness in keeping out of view important facts.

If it were admitted that the return from Babylon was a partial fulfilment of the prophetic utterances of the gathering of Israel, yet it would not follow that it was a perfect one, any more than the prophetic declarations concerning the Messiah were perfectly fulfilled by his coming into the world 1,800 years ago; and to argue, therefore, he will never come again. From the Old Testament how is this writer to prove there were to be two advents of Messiah? Would it not be by showing there are things spoken of him which were not fulfilled at his first advent? Could he prove it in any other way from the Hebrew Scriptures? As all those prophecies were not fulfilled by the first advent, there must be a second and greater one than the first, as the greater things spoken of Messiah are yet unfulfilled.

So it may be said, The gathering of the Jews from Babylon, if partially fulfilling the prophecies, was by no means a perfect one; and hence a greater one is certain to take place hereafter. For example: The writer above referred to attempts to show that the prophecy of Jer. xxxi. 38, was fulfilled by quoting Neh. iii. 1. Here are his words:

"The building of the city. 'Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that the city shall be built to the Lord from the tower of Hananeel unto the gate of the corner.'—Jer. xxxi. 38."

"Fulfilled. 'Then Eliashib the high priest rose up with his brethren the priests, and they builded the sheep gate; they sanctified it; even unto the tower of Meah, they sanctified it unto the tower of Hananeel.'—Neh. iii. 1. Any one that will read the entire chapter will readily see that the city was builded just as Jeremiah said it would be. And there is a perfect correspondence between Jeremiah's prophecy and Nehemiah's record of its fulfilment."

Why did this writer fear to tell the whole truth of Jeremiah's prophecy, which after describing the building of the city goes on to say—"And the whole valley of the dead bodies, and of the ashes, and all the fields unto the brook Kidron, unto the corner of the horse-gate toward the east shall be holy unto the Lord; it shall not be plucked up, nor thrown down any more for ever." Why did this Babylonist omit so important a part of this prophecy? The reader can judge: his theory is "thrown down" by it, or Jesus and history are at fault; for the city, her walls and temple, built after the return from Babylon, were "thrown down" and "not one stone left upon another," as Jesus said it should it be; and he wept over Jerusalem when he beheld its coming desolation; and that city has been "plucked up," and "thrown down" for 1800 years.

The return from Babylon theory contradicts Christ and history, and is therefore false, and, carried out to its legitimate result, denies the second advent. An appeal to the New Testament does not help their theory. Jesus says "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled"—Luke xxi. 24; and Paul says, "Blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in: and so all Israel shall be saved; as it is written [in the Old Testament], 'There shall come out of Sion a Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob; for this is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins; . . . for God hath included them all in unbelief, that he might have mercy upon all.'—Rom. xi. 25-27, 32. Gabriel is quite as explicit in his address to Mary concerning Jesus. He says, 'The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David; and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end.'—Luke i. 32, 33. Then will Jeremiah's prophecy of Jerusalem's stability be fulfilled, and the return from Babylon be seen only as faint type of the reality.

The other statements made by the writer on the question of the "gathering of Israel," by an examination, will be seen to be as utterly baseless; but it may be left to those who have access to the columns of the paper where his statements are made to show their sophistry. Even if it were admitted he is correct in his imaginary conclusions of Israel's past return, it does not fill up the prophetic chart; for Judah and Israel are to be gathered not from one nation (Babylon), but from Egypt, Pathros, Cush, Elam, Shinar, Hamath, and from the islands of the sea"—Isa. xi. 11; yea, "out of all nations"—Isa. lxvi. 29; and a king shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In His days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely. . . . Therefore, behold the days come, saith the Lord, that they shall no more say, The Lord liveth, which brought up the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt; but, the Lord liveth which brought up and which led the seed of Israel out of the north country, and from all countries whither I had driven them; and they shall dwell in their own land"—Jer. xxiii. 5-8.

Observe, these things are to be done under the reign of the King, the righteous BRANCH, who shall execute justice and judgment in the earth; and Ezekiel tells us, "Thus saith the Lord God, Behold I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen, whither they be gone, and will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land: and I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel; and one King shall be king to them all." . . . "Moreover I will make a covenant of peace with them; it shall be an everlasting covenant with them; and I will place them and multiply them, . . . and the heathen shall know that I the Lord do sanctify Israel when my sanctuary shall be in the midst of them for ever more."—Ezek. xxxvii. 16 to 28: please read the whole. Then will their city be "no more plucked up, nor thrown down," as it has been since the return from Babylon. ED.

RELIGIOUS DEPRESSION.

It is the strange truth that some of the highest of God's servants are tried with darkness on the dying bed. Theory would say, when a religious man is laid up for his last struggle, now he is alone for deep communion with God. Fact very often says, "No; now he is alone as his Master was before him, in the wilderness, to be tempted of the devil." Look at John the Baptist in imagination, and you would say, "Now his rough pilgrimage is done. He is quiet, he is out of the world, with the rapt foretaste of heaven in his soul." Look at John, in fact. He is agitated, sending to Christ, not able to rest, grim doubt wrestling with his soul, misgiving for one last black hour whether all his hope has not been delusion.

There is one thing we remark here by the way. Doubt often comes from inactivity. We cannot give the philosophy of it, but this is the fact—Christians who have nothing to do but to sit thinking of themselves, meditating, sentimentalizing (or mysticizing), are almost sure to become the prey of dark, black misgivings. John struggling in the desert needs no proof that Jesus is the Christ. John, shut up, became morbid and doubtful immediately. Brethren, all this is very marvelous. We are mysteries; but here is the history of it all—for sadness, for suffering, for misgiving, there is no remedy but stirring and doing.—Selected.

THE PROMISE AND OATH OF GOD TO ABRAHAM.—NO. I.

BY THE EDITOR OF THE "BIBLE EXAMINER."

THIS subject we consider one of the greatest importance we have ever presented to the consideration of our readers; because, if this promise and oath are equivocal, or uncertain of fulfilment, what foundation have we on which to stand in relation to any other promise supposed to be made by God? All other promises are made doubtful if this is proved of uncertain meaning. No promise of God was ever made with greater clearness or more solemnly proclaimed. To treat it, therefore, with neglect, or as if it might be explained to suit human theories, is to undermine all faith in the words of God.

HAS THIS PROMISE AND OATH EVER BEEN FULFILLED?

Let us present the subject as it appears in the Bible. God had called Abram out of his country to go into another, "unto a land that I will show thee." He then told him, "I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing: and I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee: and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed."—Gen. xii. 1-3.

After this, when Abram was ninety-nine years old, God appeared to him and said, "As for me, behold my covenant is with thee, and thou shalt be a father of many nations: neither shall thy name any more be called Abram, but thy name shall be Abraham; for a father of many nations have I made thee. . . I will establish my covenant between me and thee and thy seed after thee in their generations for an everlasting covenant," etc. After this, when God was about to overthrow Sodom and Gomorrah, he said, "Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do, seeing that Abraham shall surely become a great and mighty nation, and all the nations of the earth shall be blessed in him?"—Gen. xviii. 17, 18.

At length Isaac is born, the heir of the same promises, and, when he was grown to some years, the Lord called Abraham to go to a certain place and offer up his son Isaac "for a burnt offering." Abraham made every preparation to carry into execution this command of God. He had gone to the place pointed out, erected his altar, bound his son and laid him on it. He then stretched forth his hand and took the knife to slay his son. At this point, "the Angel of the Lord called unto him out of heaven," forbidding him to proceed any farther. Then followed a second call out of heaven saying, "By myself have I sworn, saith the Lord, for because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son: that in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea shore; and thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies; and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed; because thou hast obeyed my voice."—Gen. xxii.

This promise was renewed to Isaac (Gen. xxiv. 4) as follows, "In thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed," etc. The same was more fully confirmed to Jacob. Gen. xxviii. 14: "In thee and thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed." Thus it is seen by the language used by the Lord that all nations embraced all the families of those nations. Peter, in referring to this matter, Acts iii. 25, says, "Ye are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant which God made with our fathers, saying unto Abraham, and in thy seed shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed." Here all families of the earth are embraced. Paul also saith, "The Scripture foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed."—Gal. iii. 8. Here is no limitation—"all nations," and of course "all the families of the earth" are to be "blessed" with the gospel proclamation in order that they may be "justified by faith"; that is, by believing the message of God's love to the world, or to all the families of the earth. In order to believe it they must have it proclaimed to them. How can a man believe in that of which he has never heard? Have all the families of the earth heard of the love of God to "the world," in any age or dispensation, past or present? Certainly no man living can prove that they have, and the evidence is clearly against any such assumption. If any age could boast of such a result it is the present century in which we live; but what are the facts?

In a work of a recent date by Mr. Shimeall of New York City, who has written and preached much on prophecy, he gives the following statistics:

The aggregate population of the earth is twelve hundred and twenty-five millions. They may be divided into the following religious systems namely:

1. Of Brahminical Pagans, in Asia. 650,000,000

2. Of Mohammedans, in Asia and Africa.....	150,000,000
3. Of Pagans in a purely savage state.....	100,000,000
4. Of Jews, the kingdom of Judah, dispersed.....	14,000,000
In Christendom there are—
1. Of the Western or Romish Church.....	170,000,000
2. Of the Eastern or Greek Church.....	60,000,000
3. Of Protestants throughout the world.....	80,000,000

Total population.....1,224,000 000

He then adds: "It results from the statistics, first, that less than one-fifth of the earth's population are included within the pale of Christendom. Second, that of these latter, only about one-third bear the Protestant name. Third, computing, as we must, the real numerical strength of Protestant Christianity by the communion statistics of all the various branches of the Protestant Church, scattered over the world, they do not yield a total of over 15,000,000 of the 1,224,000,000. What a picture!"

All this, notwithstanding the promise and oath of God that in Abraham all the families of the earth shall be blessed. From facts like these, one of two things seem inevitable. First, there are ages yet to come in which the promise and oath of God will be fulfilled; or, second, that promise and oath of God does not mean what it says, and it is impossible to tell what it does mean; and so the "two immutable things, in which it is impossible for God to lie" cannot be relied on to teach what truth is. No wonder if men are made infidels under the teaching which involves the possibility of the promise and oath of God meaning something entirely different from what is expressed, or is never to be fulfilled at all.

If we put in connection with that promise and oath certain other statements of the Bible, we see not how any impartial student of Scripture can come to any other conclusion in regard to the meaning of this engagement of God to Abraham than its obvious sense. It either belongs to the past or future ages of this world's history. That it has been fulfilled in any past age or ages it is impossible for any one to prove.

Let us now look at corresponding testimony, and see if the Bible does not re-affirm the same idea of times in which all the families of the earth are to be blessed in Abraham and his seed.

Jesus was introduced into the world with this proclamation by "the angel of the Lord": "Fear not; for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people; for unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord."—Luke ii 10, 11. This is the same, in substance, as "the angel of the Lord" uttered to Abraham, when he "called to him out of heaven," Gen. xxii., after the trial in offering up his son Isaac. "All people" are announced by the angel at Jesus' birth as those who "shall be" the recipients of the "good tidings of great joy" thus proclaimed.

Again. When the child Jesus was brought into the temple at Jerusalem to be "presented to the Lord," old Simeon, full of the Holy Spirit, took the child in his arms and said, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace according to thy word: for mine eyes have seen thy salvation which thou hast prepared before the face of all people: a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of thy people Israel."—Luke ii. 28-32. "All people" have not yet seen this light in any age past; then it will have a fulfilment somewhere in the future.

John says of "the Word made flesh," "That was the true Light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world."—John i. 9. Is this not equal to saying, "All the families of the earth shall be blessed in Abraham's seed"? Take this in connection with Jesus' words, John iii. 16, "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life." If God required belief in his Son in order to the reception of eternal life, then he is pledged to have all the world, that is, "all the families of the earth," blessed with the knowledge of his love and gift. How else could they believe in his Son? To me this text, in connection with the promise and oath of God to Abraham, is demonstration that in some age "all the families of the earth" are to be blessed with the knowledge of God's love to them, and so have an opportunity to believe the good news.

Again. After his resurrection from the dead Jesus commanded his disciples, saying, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature."—Mark xvi. 15. Was not that command based on the promise and oath to Abraham? and was it not an announcement and pledge that said promise and oath should be accomplished under his superintendence? and will not he, who was the "propitiation for the sins of the whole world," fail in the work he came into the world to accomplish, if "every creature" does not in this age or "the ages to come," hear the "glad tidings" under circumstances which shall enable them to embrace or reject the offered mercy? The command was given to the apostles, and through them to the Church universal. But it has never yet been carried out. Will this age close without it being done? Certainly it will, if it is to close near the time in which we live. Does not this fact involve other ages in which the promise and oath of God, and the command of Jesus shall all find a full and perfect fulfilment? I have no doubt such will be the fact. Does it not follow that Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and all who belong to the seed promised, viz., all the true Church of Christ, must first have their resurrection from the dead, or, if alive when Christ returns from heaven, be changed to immortality?

Abraham did not receive the land God swore to give him during his natural life; therefore, you all say, he must be raised from the dead to have the promise and oath fulfilled. The Gospel has never yet been preached to "every creature." Yet the command has never been revoked and must some time be carried out: else how are men to be judged? Justified or condemned? "He that believeth and is baptised shall be saved;" or, have life; "but he that believeth not, shall be damned;" or, be condemned. Here the principle of judgment is laid down. Faith brings the life which is eternal. Unbelief is that which brings the condemnation to death eternal.

Here, then, we see the proclamation of God's love and good-will to men must be proclaimed to "every creature" before their final state is determined, or made permanent; i. e., the Gospel message is to be proclaimed to men first; and their reception or rejection of it determines their final state. The Gospel message is that by which they are to be judged. In no age or dispensation has that message ever yet been proclaimed to "every creature"; therefore future ages will be employed to carry out God's promise and oath that all the families of the earth shall be blessed in Abraham and his seed.

Again, "For there is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time."—1 Tim. ii. 5, 6. Here the fact is set forth that Christ gave himself a ransom for all "men," and that fact is to be testified in due time to all for whom he gave himself a ransom. In other words, "all the families of the earth shall be blessed" in the seed of Abraham according to the promise and oath of God. Yet again, "We see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels . . . that he by the grace of God should taste death for every man."—Heb. ii. 9. "All the families of the earth" are embraced in this language. But the beloved John says, "Jesus Christ . . . is the propitiation . . . for the sins of the whole world."—1 John, ii. 1, 2. This expression covers the whole ground—all men, all families, all nations. Still more, John adds, "We have seen and do testify that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour" (Life-giver) "of the world." "In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent his only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him. Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins."—1 John iv. 9, 10, 17.

Do not these testimonies cover the whole ground of the promise and oath of God to Abraham, that in him and his seed all the families of the earth shall be blessed? I think they do, and see no way to escape that conclusion; hence believe a time is to come in a probationary state, when the promise and oath will be carried out in all their fulness according to God's design and intention. If, then, no such universal blessing of the families of the earth has taken place in any of the past ages, there must and will be ages in the future when the promise and oath of God will be seen not to be an unmeaning pledge, but will have a fulfilment which shall justify it in all its fulness and beyond all finite conception.

I do not hesitate to admit that I believe the promise includes all those who have died without any knowledge of God's love to the world; that by some means God will, hereafter, cause all men to see the love he has had to them in giving his Son to give them eternal life. What God has promised He is able also to perform, no matter how impossible or improbable the thing may appear to finite wisdom. After God had promised Abraham that in Isaac his seed should be called, he commanded him to offer up this child of promise for a burnt-offering. Did Abraham stop to find fault and say, God cannot fulfill his promise if Isaac is to die? No, he "accounted that God was able to raise him up, even from the dead"; and his faith embraced the fact that such would be the case if Isaac died; for, "he staggered not at the promise," though all appearances were against it in that hour of the trial of his faith. Is God less able to raise all the dead to whom the blessing of Abraham and his seed has never yet appeared than he was to raise Isaac, to fulfil his promise of a multitudinous seed? We hardly come up to the Abrahamic faith in these days, though we perhaps think ourselves strong in faith; yet too many, if they cannot see just how a thing is to be done reject it, as if it were impossible for God to do it because they cannot see the process.

*In the foregoing remarks I have set forth this promise and oath as found in the Old Testament, and shown that the language of the New Testament, both in its letter and spirit, abundantly sustains the certainty of the fulfilment of the same: "In thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed."

It is important that we understand what is included in blessing. Blessings are divided into two classes, which we call antecedent and consequent. The first is given in order to enable the recipient to secure the other. Man needs and desires an endless life, but of himself he has it not, nor the means to obtain it. God, in his love to man provides the means entirely independent of man, and blesses men with those means without any effort on their part; they are presented as a free gift: without this gift man never could attain to eternal life. This blessing is antecedent to any thing performed by man. God proposes to confer on him a life without end if he will improve this blessing. This eternal life is a consequent blessing, and dependent on the improvement of the antecedent one. But in order to an improvement he must first be put in possession of the antecedent blessing; without which he cannot do anything, because he is destitute of any means with which to do.

To illustrate my meaning: God has not only given man natural life, but he has given him the earth or soil, the sun to warm it, rain to moisten it, and to man wisdom to know how to cultivate the soil, seed suitable to raise fruit for food, etc. All these are antecedent blessings, a free gift of the CREATOR. Without these blessings man, though he has life, could not produce food to sustain life. Notwithstanding these unsought and free gifts of blessings, we all see that man must improve them or he will not receive food or protract life. The product of improvement is the consequent blessing; and the man who would argue that because God had given him the antecedent blessings, therefore he need make no effort to secure consequent ones, for God is too good to withhold them seeing he has done so much entirely gratuitously—I say, such a man would be condemned by all thinking persons: blessings consequent are always dependent on improvement, or are conditional.

It is the antecedent blessings, or, those which are essential to put man in a condition to obtain eternal life by improvement, that man needs in his helpless state. These God has provided richly and freely in the Son of his love; but the provision itself would prove no blessing if never known, and no opportunity ever given to improve it. God, therefore, has pledged himself by promise and oath that "all the families of the earth shall be blessed" in Abraham and his seed, that is, they shall have those antecedent blessings which are necessary to enable them to secure eternal life; making that further blessing dependent upon improvement—or conditional.

"Faith" is the first and principal condition. "The Scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed."—Gal. iii. 8. Is he a preacher of the Gospel who does not give the same testimony, or who denies that all nations, not excepting the heathen, are to have the Gospel proclaimed to them and an opportunity to secure eternal life? "All nations" includes all the families of the earth; and "all families" includes every individual of those families; hence, Jesus said, "Preach the Gospel to every creature." That commission or command, as I have said, embraces all that the promise and oath of God to Abraham embraces, and is a pledge of the fulfilment of it; and God gave Jesus "power over all flesh that he should give eternal life to as many as" God had "given him."—John xvii. 2. "All flesh"—"all the families of the earth" then, are to have an opportunity or the means granted them to secure that eternal life. The proclamation made to them in God's provision in Jesus, his only begotten Son, "he that believeth and is baptised shall have life;" that is, "eternal life." "He that believeth not shall be condemned;" i. e., to death, or "not see life."

Our Lord thus fixes the final doom of the sinner on unbelief; which would be no sin if the individual had never heard the proclamation of a provision made for him; hence, in order to a final condemnation to death, men must have been blessed with a knowledge of God's merciful provision for them; a final rejection of that provision fixes their destiny in the dominion of death.

But the idea of a provision made, yet never proclaimed to men, and death eternal inflicted for a sin of which they never could have been guilty, is too much like the administration of a tyrant, who caused his laws to be placed so high as to make it impossible for the people to read them, and yet punish them for not conforming to them. Such an administration is not to be attributed to the God who gave his Son up unto death for us "all, to be testified in due time."—1 Tim. ii. 6. God's time is not so limited as our finite minds may suppose; and his will surely come in this age, or "the ages to come" (Eph. ii. 7), when "all the families of the earth will be blessed in Abraham and his seed"; which "seed is Christ"; and "if ye be Christ's, then are ye" also "Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise."—Gal. iii. 29. Hence, Abraham personally, and all his seed by faith, will be concerned in carrying out God's promise and oath of blessing all the families of the earth; therefore, if this present age is soon to end, other ages are inevitable to complete the work of the promise and oath.

It seems to me that Christians generally do not yet understand for what the present age was given. It was not given to "convert the world"; for God well knew it would be a wicked and corrupt age; "evil men and seducers waxing worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived" (Tim. iii. 13); and that "the time would come when" men would "not endure sound doctrine; but, after their own lusts," would "heap to themselves teachers having itching ears; and . . . turn away their ears from the truth, and be turned unto fables."—2 Tim. iv. 3, 4. Such is the history of the present age; and God foresaw that it would be so. Hence, he provided for "ages to come" (Eph. iii. 7), "that he might show the exceeding riches of his grace in his kindness toward us through Christ Jesus."

The nation of Israel having failed to become "a kingdom of priests" (Exo. xix. 6), and rejecting their King, God determined to "visit the Gentiles to take out of them a people for his name" (Acts xv. 14); a people to do the work that ancient Israel was called and set apart to do, but utterly failed by their unbelief and final rejection of God's chosen King and Leader in the work of blessing "all the families of the earth." From that time, the grand privilege of doing this work was taken from the nation of Israel, "according to the flesh," and thereafter a people taken "out of the Gentiles" were to constitute the "kingdom of priests," at the head of whom Jesus was to be placed as their King and High Priest, to carry out "God's promise and oath to Abraham," that "In thee and in thy seed all families of the earth shall be blessed."

The present age or dispensation has been, and still is, the age in which God is gathering that seed of Abraham, of whom Christ was and is the "first fruits," and preparing them for their work of blessing "all nations" and "kindreds of the earth." This dispensation, or age in which we now live, was not designed to witness the fulfilment of the promise and oath of God, but to prepare a people freed from carnal and selfish designs, earnestly desiring not only to see God's promise and oath to Abraham carried out, but, alike one to Moses by the same God, viz., "As truly as I live all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the LORD."—Numb. xiv. 21.

This age, then, so far from being the final one is only a preparatory one, to prepare men and women for the great work of blessing "all the families of the earth" in "the ages to come," of which Paul speaks. Let our hearts be enlarged, then, on the subject of God's love to "the world."

HOPE FOR JERUSALEM.

THE following extracts are taken from a thoughtful address by Canon Hoare, just published (Hatchards, Piccadilly), in which he regards the two treaties as signs of the immediate return of the Jews.

I. First, then, what do we see?

Do we not see the complete and, as far as man can judge, the final overthrow of the Ottoman Empire? The result of the Berlin Treaty is that although the form is preserved the dominant power of the Ottoman Empire is at an end.

Look first at Europe as rearranged by the Treaty of Berlin. If you compare the new map of Turkey in Europe with the map before the commencement of the war, you will find that it is not one-third of the size. Montenegro, Servia and Roumania are no longer tributary States; Bulgaria, north of the Balkans, is independent of Turkey; Bosnia and Herzegovina are virtually transferred to Austria, and a considerable portion of Thessaly is handed over to Greece. Then, again, the position of the remnant that is left is entirely changed. The remainder of Thessaly, Thrace, Macedonia, the New Roumelia and Crete are all to have their own independent administrations, so that there is nothing left under the sole power of the Turks but Constantinople itself with its immediate precincts. The power to oppress is at an end, and as far as man can judge, forever. The Ottoman was let loose from the Euphrates as a scourge on Apostate Christendom. He has done his work, though not for God's glory, and is now laid aside by the same hand that raised him up. He was appointed for a given time and a given work, but now that time is expired, that work is done, and he is wasting under his predicted doom.

But how is it in Asia? Let the treaty between the Porte and England answer the question. In that treaty, and in the letter of the Secretary of State explaining its object, there is the clear recognition of the complete defencelessness of the Turkish Empire. The treaty was made because there was no power of self-defence left in the Ottoman, or in other words, because the Euphratean flood was almost dry.

Now these are the indisputable facts of the case—the undoubted results of the two treaties; and the remarkable fact is that these results are exactly such as the students of prophecy have been predicting for many years. From one prophecy they have foretold for years that there must be a decay of the Ottoman Empire, simultaneous with the loss of the temporal power of the Pope,* and now we see their words come true. From another prophecy they have believed that the decay of the Ottoman power is represented in symbol by the drying up of the Euphratean flood, so that the Ottoman must recede from his conquests just as the waters of a flood recede from a land over which there has been an overflow,† and this is the process we are now witnessing. From Europe the waters are almost, if not entirely gone, so that Europe is practically dry. And as for Asia, the waters there have become so shallow that the Englishman, we hope, will walk through them and scarcely wet his feet. I am well aware that some people have felt a difficulty in applying the symbol of the Euphratean overflow to the Ottoman invasion, and I am quite prepared to acknowledge that there is a great uncertainty about the interpretation of all symbolic prophecies; but one thing we must all admit, that if we are right in our interpretation of the symbol, we see in these two treaties the most remarkable fulfilment of the prophecy. We see the drying up going on in our own days, under our own eyes; so that we have this day a fresh evidence conspicuous before the world of the Divine inspiration of God's holy Word, of the truth of the prophetic Scriptures, and of the sovereignty of God over the mightiest nations of the world. Sceptics may doubt and infidels may scoff, but we see that God's Word is from himself. What he has predicted, that is coming to pass; and though the time appointed has been long, we see in the great facts of our own day that the Word of God's prophecy is true.

* See Faber on the Prophecies.

† See Rome, Turkey and Palestine.

II. We may proceed, then, to consider what we may anticipate as the probable consequence of all that has taken place.

If we turn to the prophecy respecting the drying up of the Euphrates in Rev. xvi. 12, we find that it will be dried up in order that "the way of the kings of the East may be prepared." That expression, "the kings of the East," does not mean the kings now reigning in the East, but it does mean the kings who are to come up from the East; so that the full meaning of the text would be given if we were to render it, "That the way of the kings might be prepared from the East."

The same conclusion may be drawn from the words of our blessed Saviour in Luke xxi. 24: "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." These words most clearly teach us that Jerusalem is to be trodden down for a time, but for a time only, for they no less clearly imply that it will be restored when the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled. By whom, then, is Jerusalem now trodden down? Who is it that is at the present day treading down the captive city? There can be no doubt as to the answer. It is the Turk that is the treader down of Jerusalem. It is the Ottoman power that holds it under foot. It is the Euphratean flood that has overwhelmed it.

And if so, is it not an obvious conclusion that the fall of Turkey is likely to be the rise of Jerusalem, and that Turkish decay is the harbinger of the Jew's prosperity? When, therefore, we see the waste of Turkey, and witness the receding of the waters, we see in that waste the budding of the fig-tree and, as believers in God's Word, we are taught by the prophetic Scriptures to look out for the summer to burst in all its glory on Palestine.

But now turn to the treaty with Turkey, and see how it bears on the prospects of Israel. Look at it well and consider whether it may not be regarded as the budding of the Jewish fig-tree.

According to that treaty Turkey in Asia is placed under what may be termed an English protectorate, and one of the principal covenants is that England shall in future have a voice in its government. Now think for a moment of the vast importance of that part of Turkey in Asia now called Syria, and consider whether there is any plot of land on the face of the globe that is of more importance to the commerce of the world. On the southwest it reaches down to the Isthmus of Suez, through which the traffic between the Eastern and Western hemispheres is now passing, like the sand through the narrow neck of an hour.

glass. The result is, that any powerful nation holding Syria would have the power of interrupting the greater part of the trade of the world. Then on the east and north-east it is bounded by the valley of the Euphrates, which is almost certain before long to become the line of railroad from Europe to India. That country, therefore, though not much above 400 miles from north to south, commands the two great highways between the Eastern and Western hemispheres. Any powerful nation holding Syria will command both those communications between Europe and the East.

As things are now, nothing can prosper, because there is no security. If people grow a crop they cannot be confident that they will ever enjoy the fruit. If it is not plundered by the Bedouin it is too often seized by the Pasha. So that one of our missionaries writes: "The inhabitants of Palestine are becoming poorer every year. This is especially the case with the cultivators of the soil, who mostly suffer the burden of a cruel and grasping system of taxation, now doubled on account of the Russian war." But if there were a good government all would be changed. This, I trust, before many months are past, will be the blessed result of our country's use of her new treaty rights.

But we have not yet done with Syria, for there is this peculiar interest attached to it, that it is the very country which God gave to Abraham. The boundaries are almost exactly the same. Take the map of Syria and compare it with the promise originally given to Abraham. Look at Israel's title-deeds as recorded in Gen. xv. 18: "Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates." And see how this title-deed was afterwards ratified through Moses (Deut. xi. 24); the only difference being that he draws his line from east to west, and speaks of the Mediterranean as the western boundary. "Every place whereon the soles of your feet shall tread shall be yours; from the wilderness and Lebanon; from the river, the river Euphrates, even unto the uttermost sea, shall your coast be." That most important district is therefore the very district given by God to the seed of Abraham more than 3,000 years ago. It belongs, therefore, to the house of Israel. It is their own, and why should they not return? People say they would not return if they could, and I have no doubt that of a great number that is perfectly true. I have no doubt that it would be with many Jews, in respect to Palestine, just as it is with thousands of Gentiles in respect to eternal life. How many are there who have life and restoration offered them in Christ Jesus, but who are altogether indifferent to the offer? So, doubtless, it will be with multitudes of the house of Israel when the Jubilee trumpet is blown. The return may be proclaimed as that from Babylon was proclaimed in the edict of Cyrus, but none will respond but those whose spirit God will have raised. But how many are there in Russia, in Poland, in Hungary, in Roumania, in Arabia, and among God's hidden ones throughout the world who look on Palestine as the long-lost home of their fathers, and who are crying and sighing for the recovery of Jerusalem!

And why should not they hasten there as soon as Palestine is safe? They have all that is required—the capital and the enterprise. They hold the title-deeds of Palestine, and they are only strangers among the people where they are scattered. What then is to delay their return as soon as righteous government is established? It is of no use for them to go there now. If they were to take their silver and their gold with them now the probability is that they would soon lose it, through either plunder or taxation. But let England put forth her power, and establish with a strong hand a government that may be trusted, and before many months are passed we may see the fulfilment of the prophecy recorded in Isa. lx. 8, 9: "Who are these that fly as a cloud, and as the doves to their windows? Surely the isles shall wait for me, and the ships of Tarshish first, to bring thy sons from far, their silver and their gold with them, unto the name of the Lord thy God, and to the Holy One of Israel, for he hath glorified thee."

But if such should be the case, how wonderful are the times in which we live! It is 2,600 years ago since that prophecy was given by God, through Isaiah, but hitherto there has not been a sign of its fulfilment. How marvelous it would be if we, or even our children, should actually witness its accomplishment!

It is 2,500 years since Israel was outcast and 1,800 years since Judah was dispersed. During those periods the four great predicted empires have risen and fallen, but there has been no movement yet for the restoration of the Jews. On the day of the Ascension the Apostles asked when the kingdom should be restored to Israel, and the Lord Jesus answered that it was not for them to know the time. Ever since that day believers have been waiting for it, assured that it would be, but unable to calculate the date; but now, not only do we seem to be on the verge of a return, but it is perfectly clear that the way is opened for it as it has never been since the dispersion, and it seems not improbable that our own dear country may be God's chosen instrument in its accomplishment. It seems, indeed, not impossible that England, and England's Queen, may be the persons referred to in that other prophecy (Isa. xlix. 22): "Behold, I will lift up my hand to the Gentiles, and set up my standard to the people; and thy daughters shall be carried upon their shoulders. And kings shall be thy nursing fathers, and queens thy nursing mothers."—Word and Work.

THE ELECT AND THE NATIONS.

"The nations (of them that are saved) shall walk in the light of it (the New Jerusalem)."—Rev. xxi. 24.

THIS passage, it appears to me, is one of the most comforting in the whole Bible, and may in fact be said to strike the key-note of the harmony of revelation. It refers clearly to the almost forgotten, and certainly much ignored, truth—that the elect are totally distinct from the nations.

In the first place, it should be observed that the words in the above passage, which appear within brackets, are omitted in all the oldest mss.; and that, therefore, the clause should read thus: "The nations (ta ethnee) shall walk in the light of it." Alford accordingly so reads it in his New Testament, and there is, I think, little doubt that the words in question were inserted in the text by some would-be orthodox transcriber, who thought to make the Word of God more perfect by adding thereto. No doubt the nations above referred to are in one sense saved, but they are not saved in the highest sense of the word.

On the general question involved Alford observes: "The city shall be so bright as to serve for light—for sun and moon both—to the world that then is and her inhabitants; . . . for such inhabitants are clearly supposed." And again, he says, "Among the mysteries of this new earth this is set forth to us, that besides the glorified Church there shall still be dwelling on the renewed earth nations organized under kings and saved by means of the influences of the heavenly city. . . . If, then, the kings of the nations bring their glories and their treasures unto her, and if none shall enter into her that are not written in the book of life, it follows that these kings and these nations are written in the book of life. And so perhaps some light may be thrown on one of the darkest mysteries of redemption. There may be—I say it with all diffidence—those who have been saved by Christ without ever forming part of his visible organised Church."

Now here, I think, that though Alford is perfectly right as far as he goes, he does not go half so far as legitimate deduction from this passage would warrant him in doing. The fair deduction is, I think, this: that the elect—risen and glorified—are the dwellers in the New Jerusalem, while the nations are infinitely below them in glory. And, furthermore, we have every reason to suppose that "the nations" will be proportionately numerous, as compared with "the elect," as were the nations of the world in the days of Solomon as compared with Israel. The one body may be compared to the sand on the sea shore, the other to the stars of heaven. In other words, mankind as a race will be saved and permitted to exist on the new earth, while the elect will be the glorified dwellers in the New Jerusalem.

The New Jerusalem will be in the age to come what the earthly Jerusalem might have been to the nations of the present world. Indeed, for a very short time it would seem that the first Jerusalem was permitted to fulfill its mission: so much so that the kings of the earth flock unto it. In like manner in the new earth we find that the kings thereof bring their glory and honor unto "Jerusalem the golden," and learn from the true Solomon the knowledge of the Most High. As the great High Priest upon his throne, and therefore with unlimited, unquestionable, and absolutely unassailable power, our Lord will reign over the earth; while his elect—pillars, as it were, in the temple of God—will go out no more; but all who seek to know God will come to them for wisdom and guidance. That which all nations are now looking for, and which in various ways they seek to obtain—sometimes by main force and sometimes by blind groping—but always unsuccessfully, will then be found.

All history, and all our experience of life, alike prove that as a rule the masses of mankind desire to be led, and this instinct which now too often leads them to put confidence in fallible men, will then be directed aright to those who will be infallible, because, being "the spirits of just men made perfect," they will be the representatives of Christ himself.

The great declaration of Jehovah on the subject of the separation of Israel from the other nations of the earth, and that which gives us the key to the whole of his dealings with them, is that contained in Exodus

xix. 3-6: "And Moses went up to God, and the Lord called unto him out of the mountain, saying, Thus shalt thou say to the house of Jacob, and tell the children of Israel: Ye have seen what I did unto the Egyptians, and how I bare you on eagles' wings, and brought you unto myself. Now, therefore, if ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people: for all the earth is mine; and ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and an holy nation." The same is repeated in Deuteronomy vii. 6: "For thou art an holy people unto the Lord thy God: the Lord thy God hath chosen thee to be a special people unto himself, above all people that are upon the face of the earth."

Now, the great point to be noticed in all this is, that Israel was chosen simply above all nations. Other nations are not utterly cast off, cursed or neglected, because Israel is chosen; they are merely placed in a position of comparative inferiority. In other words, though Israel was separated from the rest of the world, the separation only implied superiority. In the above quoted passages it is distinctly declared that all the earth is the Lord's, and not the land of Judea only. All people, every human being that ever existed, all nations, tribes and tongues, are the work and care of God. They are all his creatures, and in him they live and move and have their being. But, in perfect accordance with all that we see of God's works, there is as distinct a gradation visible among nations as there is among individuals. Consequently some must be superior, and some inferior; but, nevertheless, all have their various positions assigned to them, and all have advantages and functions peculiar to themselves. To Israel was given the inestimable privilege of being the channel through which Divine truth was presented to the world. The descendants of Abraham were to be priests unto God; and so they were, until they mingled with the heathen and learned their works.

If we take the great promise of God to Abraham—the charter of the human race, as it has been not inaptly called—we find the same grand distinction brought out. "In thee, and in thy seed, shall all the families of the earth be blessed" (Gen. xxviii. 14); i. e., in and through the race of the true Israel, as intermediaries, shall flow the blessings of God to the whole human race. And with this distinct prophecy accords most fully the remarkable statement in Deuteronomy: "When the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance, when he separated the sons of Adam, he set the bounds of the people according to the number of the children of Israel: for the Lord's portion is his people; Jacob is the lot of His inheritance."—xxxii. 8, 9. In the lxx. we read: "He set the bounds of the nations according to the number of the angels of God." Whichever may be the true reading, the meaning would seem to be that special glory and honor, and that in respect of their leadership over the nations, was intended for the elect people of God. "This people have I formed for myself, they shall show forth my praise."—Isa. xliii. 21.

Surely, then, every unprejudiced reader must come to the conclusion that the design of the Almighty was that through Israel the knowledge of himself might be spread throughout the world. This design, like all the other designs of the Most High, though it has been deferred for a time, shall assuredly one day be brought to pass, and the true Israel shall be the real lights of the world. Man may impede, but he can never prevent the accomplishment of God's purposes in all their fullness, beauty and glory; and though to our eyes the world may seem utterly forgotten of its Maker, yet it will surely be one day seen that never for one single moment has this really been the case, but that through all the darkness, the misery and the suffering of the world the magnificent promise and oath of the Almighty to Abraham has constantly been kept in view.

Again, the wonderful and glorious declaration of the prophet Isaiah, quoted by our Lord, "My house shall be called an house of prayer for all people," implies that all the nations had a share, so to speak, in that temple. It was neither built nor designed exclusively for Israel. "Also the sons of the stranger, that join themselves to the Lord, to serve him, and to love the name of the Lord, to be his servants, every one that keepeth the Sabbath from polluting it, and taketh hold of my covenant; even them will I bring to my holy mountain and make them joyful in my house of prayer."—Isa. lvi. 6, 7. All who came to this holy house were equally with Israel, or at all events after Israel, to have a share in the privileges conferred upon the worshipers therein.

Now of this house the elect are the spiritual antitypes; the Lord Jesus himself, of course, being the chief corner-stone, "In whom all the building, fitly framed together, groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord."—Eph. ii. 21. And so St. Peter, "To whom coming as to unto a living stone, disallowed indeed of men, but chosen of God and precious, ye also, as living stones, are being built up (present tense) a spiritual house, an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ."—1 Pet. ii. 4. The temple, then, was the type or shadow of things in the heavenly places, just as Jerusalem itself was; and accordingly we have reason to anticipate that the risen saints in the new earth will occupy a place analogous to that which Israel held in the present earth in their best and brightest days. The spiritual house will surely be as truly "an house of prayer for all nations" as was the earthly house, and all nations shall see and rejoice in its light.

The holy city, New Jerusalem, will indeed be the light of the world, and shall, so to speak, form the connecting link between the new heavens and the new earth. In the first or present earth Jerusalem was in fact designed to be so; but because of the unfaithfulness of the Jews the fine gold became dim, and the light of the "city set upon a hill" became darkness. But this city shall in truth be "a burning and a shining light," never to be extinguished. Surely the images of a city set on a hill, and of a great and high mountain, imply that it is meant to be seen by all, and will be the great object of attraction in the new earth. Its exceeding height is no doubt meant to teach us that it is visible to all, and indeed cannot but be seen by all.

To every nation on the face of the earth God has given some special and definite part or office to perform. That part may not be always evident to us, but in many cases it is obvious enough. To the great Roman empire, for example, was given power and authority over the greater part of the known world, with the view apparently, that the great principles of law and order might be proclaimed and duly recognized; and though Rome abused this power, yet she so far fulfilled her mission that the civilized world has been enabled to perceive that only by obedience to law and duty can authority be properly maintained or peace lastingly secured. The division of Europe at the present day into separate and distinct kingdoms is in itself a sufficient proof of this, for they have one and all more or less learned the lesson, or at all events are learning that only by obedience to law can nations prosper.

Even so in the new earth, the nations will be organized under kings and rulers, each one having its definite sphere assigned to it. Nature will have been greatly ameliorated, still there will be room for the exercise of those habits of order and industry which have been acquired on earth.

If we may at all reason from analogy we have every ground for supposing that the new earth will be the analogue of the present. The prophet Isaiah tells us that "God created not the earth in vain, he formed it to be inhabited" (Isa. xlv. 18); and this will be equally true in principle of the new earth. It will be inhabited by men who will be just as suited and adapted to it as we are to this present world. Adam in Paradise was not freed from the necessity of work, though that work was neither severe nor toilsome. He was placed in the garden "to dress it and to keep it," and consequently work of some kind or other is not only natural but desirable for man, and I think it will be so even in the new earth.

Over the earth thus renovated and "receiving blessing of God" it will be the privilege of the elect to rule. To them—so as to be at their disposal—will flow in all the wealth, all the goodness and fatness so to speak, of the earth. They will be the guides and instructors of humanity, ready to assist and glad to give counsel and advice to all that seek their aid.

There are many indications in the announcements of the prophets that in this new earth "the nations" will require such aid and instruction; that they are not in fact equal in knowledge, in power or in nearness to God with the dwellers in the heavenly city. Among the most important of these announcements is that in Rev. xxii. 2: "The leaves of the tree are for the healing of the nations." The fruit of the tree of life is only for the elect—they, and they alone are permitted "to eat of the tree of life" (Rev. ii. 7); but the leaves are for the benefit of the nations. Surely this implies a vast difference in the status of the two classes. The use, too, of the words "kings and priests" unto God indicates a grand subdivision in the future of the subjects as distinguished from the rulers.

Every argument from analogy, also, would seem to teach us that there must be differences and gradations of rank and condition hereafter. All the elect—those who have here "made their calling and election sure"—will doubtless have direct access to their heavenly Father, but it is exceedingly doubtful whether this will be the case with the nations. The royal priesthood will apparently be the intermediaries between God and his creatures, though even between the individuals composing this priesthood there will probably be differences of rank. St. Paul tells us that "one star differeth from another star in glory"; and as he uses this fact as being illustrative of the condition of "the saints hereafter"—those who shall attain unto the first resurrection of whom alone he appears to be speaking—we are justified in concluding that everywhere there will be gradation in order and rank hereafter. The answer of our Lord to the mother of James and John seems distinctly to declare that those only for whom those positions have been prepared will sit, the one on his right hand and the other on his left, in his kingdom.

If, as many of us believe, the holy city of New Jerusalem, described in the last two chapters of Revelation, and which is not seen until the first heavens and the first earth have passed away, represents the saints, what can be the meaning of the expression "the kings of the earth," unless it refers to the rulers of "the nations" as opposed to the elect nation? Here, I think, we find the fulfilment of the well-known passage in Isaiah (xlix. 2, 3): "Kings shall be thy nursing fathers, and their queens thy nursing mothers." The promise having reference not to this earth in its present state, but to the earth renewed, glorified and reigned over by the Messiah as King of kings and Lord of lords.

The Church, as his Bride, reigns with Christ in the New Jerusalem; the kings of the earth are those who do not form any portion of that glorious number, and who come as suppliants and worshippers unto the city. How could such a term as "suppliants" be applied to the saints who are sitting down with Christ in his throne? Such an expression applied to them would obviously be without meaning. These "kings of the earth" would seem to be those who though not forming part of the elect Church, are nevertheless next in rank to that august body, and are in fact the noblest and best of earth after the saints. Edward Irving has very justly remarked that "there may be thousands of grades of glory distinguished from the glory of the elect Church." There would seem to be, in fact, in the new earth almost as great differences of rank and condition as there are in this present earth; the only difference—but how great is that difference—being that therein "dwelleth righteousness." God is then to be the King of the whole earth, and his will is to be done on earth as it is in heaven. When that shall be the case, then, and then only, will it seem how great is the dignity and glory to be given to them "whom the King delighteth to honor."—Selected

Controversy, though always an evil in itself, is sometimes a necessary evil.

WHY EVIL WAS PERMITTED.

A DIALOGUE.

[The following is from "Twelve Discussions Proving the extinction of Evil Persons and Things," by Henry Smith Warleigh, Rector of Ashchurch, Gloucester, England.—ED.]

Mr. Alford. We are now about to consider one of the most difficult questions which can engage the human mind: How sin and evil came into existence, and why they were permitted? It seems strange that a God who is infinitely wise and good, and of almighty power, should have permitted it.

Mr. Duncan. Half of the difficulty is overcome now we see that evil and suffering shall not be endless. Still the mystery is why they exist at all, even for a time. To us it would seem far better had there been nothing but holiness and happiness, and no sin and misery at all.

Mr. Warleigh. What if it should turn out that things could not have been otherwise than they are, and ought not to have been otherwise than they are? barring, indeed, that a man's perversity has made them worse than they need have been. I have a strong faith that God worketh all things according to the counsel of his own will (Eph. i. 11); that he is the One Supreme Sovereign Ruler of all things in heaven and earth, and that no arrangements could have been made better than those he determined upon, and which are in progress of final accomplishment.

A. Yes, it is very proper that our faith should receive all this. We must walk by faith.

W. The manifested character of God both in nature and grace, demand and deserve all the faith of the heart; but our intellect may see far enough into the question to consent to the faith of the heart, and say, with intelligent acquiescence, "He hath done all things well." His works cannot be improved or amended; if we had had to make the arrangement and had had sufficient wisdom we should have done as God has done.

D. Well, if you can make out that you will still further relieve my mind, and the minds of thousands of others.

W. There is much both in the Bible and in reason to lead us to suppose that when God contemplated creating anything, especially intelligent moral creatures, his design was the communication of his own happiness and the manifestation of his glory. I should think this might be taken as an axiom. In the Bible he invariably connects his glory with the good of his creatures.

A. There is no solid reason against it.

W. It is also a truth too clear to be disputed, that before he was pleased to create anything or person he knew everything which would take place in the then future. This also may be treated as an axiom by us.

A. Neither can there be any objection to that.

W. I would lay down what appears to be two other axioms; but I will call them propositions: (1) Given an all-powerful, all-wise, all-beneficent Being then creation is inevitable and intelligent creatures a necessity. (2) If the origin and temporary existence of moral and physical evil is to be absolutely prevented, the only course is not to create any intelligent beings at all. When it pleased the Divine Persons of the Godhead to take counsel together respecting the creation of man, we may, with reverence, suppose that every side of the question was considered, and every possible contingency—as we should call it—contemplated. We may reverently suppose that at last—as we should say—the matter might have been reduced to this one question: “Shall we create intelligent beings, or shall we not?” There were reasons for and against; and that we are told the Godhead sat in council would seem intended to teach us that these reasons had been fully weighed, so to speak.

D. Supposing then, it had, as we may say, been decided not to create intelligent beings, what might have been the consequences?

W. I will quote the sentiments, and some of the words of a publication of mine. If God does not create, then he must remain eternally in his own solitariness. He would be infinite in his perfections; though in such a case we would not call them attributes, for there would be none to attribute his attributes to him. He would be unknown, if not unknowable. He could not be declared; there would be none to whom he could be declared. He would, indeed, be able largely to bestow benefits; but there would be none to receive them. If he continued in his solitariness, his own essential happiness would remain to him, and perhaps remain unimpaired; but he would not have the exquisite, God-like happiness of sharing it with others; there would be none to share it with, none to enjoy it. Mentally constituted as we are, it is not possible for us to conceive of such a state of things. It would not be a state of things at all. It would be a negation, a nothingness, an absurdity.

D. I can see it would never have done for the wisdom of God to decide upon doing nothing, to be followed by such consequences as these.

W. Besides, though if he had remained alone, and none other with him, he would still be complete in his natural perfections, I would presume to ask with great reverence, whether he could be complete in his moral perfections? He has taught us that part of the completeness of moral perfections in diffusion; and he has told us to imitate him and diffuse happiness to others. This was the very point enforced by Jesus in his sermon on the Mount, when he said, “Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect.” If he had remained alone, would he have practiced what he taught, and could there have been in him that example of perfection to which Jesus refers? Goodness is not goodness unless it be communicated. Wisdom is not wisdom except it be exhibited—exhibited by its use. Goodness cannot be diffused and admired if kept in secret; nor can happiness be enjoyed if kept to one’s self. I would think of it with reverence, still more to speak of it. But if God had kept himself, so to speak, to himself, would it not have been selfishness? Is it not what he calls selfishness in us, or what St. Paul calls “living to ourselves”? Could it be different in him? He would possess an endless source of holy, happy, life-giving power, but no one to know it, no one to be the better of it! One eternal, useless blank throughout boundless space! What unsearchable riches lying idle, though capable of producing felicity and delight! What a glorious light hid under a bushel! What an eternal rust for want of use! But no; we cannot conceive—we do not wish to conceive—that of the wisdom of God, which we are taught by him to call wrong and folly in ourselves. Seeing there is such a God as our God, the creation of intelligent creatures was sure to take place.

D. It is plain, the alternative of a non-creation could not have been entertained. Creation must have taken place, and a creation, too of something more than inert matter: there must have been life and intelligence. The creation of intelligent beings is decided on, we will suppose. What then?

W. Then there is the risk of such creatures becoming sinful and rebellious; and thus the risk of making misery not happiness.

D. How so? Why should not man be created so as to be incapable of falling?

W. From the very nature of the case this could not have been done.

Mr. Burnett. Why are not all things possible with God?

W. All possible things are possible with him; but it is no derogation from his power to say he a/ cannot make a contradiction. For instance, he cannot make it both dark and light in the same spot, at the same time; and he cannot make a creature in whom it would be impossible for a change to take place. A creature cannot be created ~~by~~ God. Man can be but a creature, and he must necessarily inherit all the qualities and liabilities of a creature. Unchangeableness is an infinite attribute, and can belong only to the Unchangeable, Uncreated God, and cannot dwell in a finite being. The phrase unchangeable creature is the same as saying, an unchangeable changeable creature; an infallible fallible creature. It is a contradiction, an absurdity, an impossibility. If man be made at all, he must be liable to fall, though there may be no innate necessity for it. There must be the capability, though there need not be the inevitability.

D. I see the reasonableness of what you say, and certainly it goes far to justify the ways of God to man.

W. Nor should it be forgotten that if a creature could possess one infinite attribute he could possess all others; in fact, he would possess all others. No single nature can be infinite finite; and if a man were infallible he would also be omniscient, omnipresent, omnipotent, eternal and immortal. And yet a creature! A creature God! An originated unoriginated being! An eternal being, beginning to be! Two Gods! The uncreated original God, and the created God; both equal in all their attributes! You see what an absurdity must necessarily follow the supposition that man might have been made incapable of moral and physical evil. In the nature of things it could not be. If an intelligent being is to be made at all he must be subject to change, and as God would make him innocent any change would be from right to wrong, from good to evil. He must be liable to this risk or he must not be made at all.

D. Your conclusion is certainly inevitable.

W. Beside all this you will see, when it is put to you, that it is impossible for a being such as man to be capable of right and yet at the same time incapable of wrong.

B. That is a bold assertion. I do not see how you can maintain it.

W. I wish you would try to point out how to maintain the opposite. The effort, however, would be useless. You may make a machine to go but one way, and always in that way; but you cannot so treat an intelligent moral agent, such as man, whose goodness must be voluntary to be goodness at all. The very faculties which enable him to do the good may enable him to do the evil; and, moreover, the measure of capacity for the one is the measure of capacity for the other. A vessel will hold as much poison as nectar. If a man cannot do wrong he cannot do right. Give him no legs and he cannot, indeed, walk in the wrong road, but then neither can he walk in the right. A deaf man does not hear evil, but on that very account he does not hear good, and the blind eyes which do not see an offensive object cannot behold the beautiful one. Every intelligent creature possessing an advantage must be liable to disadvantage. There is no risk in creating inert matter. But man is not inert matter. He has mind and the power of choice, and the understanding and will which can know and choose the good may possibly choose and learn the bad.

B. But if what you say is true what guarantee has the true Christian that he shall not change and become a sinful creature again, even after he gets to heaven?

W. Every possible guarantee. Leaving alone, just now, the divine promise that he shall be kept from it, a promise not given to the unfallen Adam, I would observe that man might, in time, have acquired such integrity as never to swerve from the right, but always to choose the good and avoid the evil. God possesses, by the perfection of his nature, an infinite rectitude of will. He cannot do wrong because he will not do wrong, and human perfection is of the same kind. When, however, man was made at first he could not have had this perfection. He was not made a sinner, nor even sinful, for he was made by the holy God. "God made man upright."—Eccl. vii. 29. He was, however, necessarily made imperfect. To think otherwise would be either to suppose him incapable of improvement and progress, which is the characteristic of the lower animals, or to suppose him already perfect, which is the characteristic of God only. He was perfect, according to his nature, but not the extent to which he was able to come by cultivating his capacities, and especially by that ennobling, elevating, improving process, which is the effect of communion with the Father of Spirits. Man could not have been made otherwise than he was, even if all possible intellects, inspired by all possible benevolences, could have been called to the council of the Divine persons, when consultation was held—so to speak—respecting his composition and destiny.

D. All this certainly commends itself to the best instincts of our reason.

W. Considering, too, the nature and proved character of our beneficent Creator, have we not the best of all reasons for concluding that he made man in the very best possible way? If a better could have been devised, he would, we may be sure, have resorted to it. He could not make a mistake. He did not make man in a hurry, or without previous thought and consideration—as we should call it—nor even without consultation. No after-thought could with him improve upon the idea, though this is often the case with us. He could not be deficient in resources, and his power could be restrained—if we may so speak—only by considerations arising from prudence, wisdom and beneficence. Man was the masterpiece of all God's works, the climax of all created perfection; but absolutely to prevent all chance of evil would have been to do nothing at all, or at least not to create a moral intelligent creature, which would have been next to nothing; and then, as we have seen, the Divine resources could not have been manifested nor his happiness and glory diffused. Indeed, I will venture the assertion that things could not have been, and ought not to have been, otherwise than they are.

D. I should much like to know if any sound objection could be made to all this; for if not it throws a flood of light upon many dark thoughts which have often perplexed and grieved me, and no doubt thousands of others.

A. If it is any comfort to you, I will say that I see no objection to it; nor can I conceive there can be any. Some might contradict, but contradiction is no proof, nor indeed objection.

B. To me it is all new; I will neither assent nor dissent.

W. The perfection of a scheme for the constitution of man would be that he should be made immortal as long as he retained those qualities which bring and increase happiness, and become mortal if he should acquire those qualities which entail and increase misery.

D. Why this is the very scheme which you affirm God has actually introduced.

W. It is; and I think it ought to draw forth the admiring gratitude of all. If, in addition to this, some scheme could be devised by which, consistently with truth and order, any who became morally sick and sinful might regain their holiness, and thus, having regained their capacity for happiness, should again obtain the grace of immortality; this, surely, would be the perfection of wisdom, benevolence and love, and should draw forth universal praise and admiration.

D. Why, this is the scheme of redemption by our blessed Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ as proclaimed in his good news found in the Bible!

W. You are right; and redemption is the necessary adjunct of the creation of moral intelligent beings; so that the latter is sure sooner or later to follow the former.

A. I do not quite see that.

W. The real, true and continued welfare of intelligent beings is closely connected with and depends upon their having a correct knowledge of God. "This is life eternal, to know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent."—John xvii. 3. God can be made known to us only by his works, and by what he may be pleased to tell us about himself. His works of creation had exhibited his wisdom, power and goodness. But there were attributes not yet exhibited, such as his pity and mercy, or that pitying love which he tells us he delights to exercise.—Micah vii. 18. Now, if his intelligent creatures do not know these attributes of God, their knowledge of him will be incorrect and even erroneous, and this would be to them an element of serious deterioration, which would eventually work their misfortune, perhaps even their ruin, and this neither the wisdom nor goodness of God could allow to arise from such a cause.

[To be concluded next month.]

DR. CHALMERS ON INFIDELITY.

"THE truth of Christianity," says Dr. Chalmers, "is neither more nor less than the truth of certain facts that have been handed down to us by the testimony of reporters. Let the historical evidences on which it rests be made to pass in review, and become the subject of sober, inductive examination; let the question be decided by a patient and fair inquiry; let the enemies of our faith show the world that their infidelity rests on higher grounds than a stale invective against the jugglery of priests, or the pertinence of a flip-pant witticism; let them bring along with them the spirit of cool and candid reflection, an anxiety after truth, and a ready submission to evidence. How little do they think, as they strut along in the pride of their infidel philosophy, how little of the spirit and temper of true philosophy is in them—of the humble, cautious spirit which Bacon taught, and on which Newton rests the immortality of his genius!

"There is a puppyism in infidelity for which I have no patience. I thought that now-a-days both gentlemen and philosophers would have been ashamed of it! At the commencement of the last century one had some credit in sporting the language of unbelief and infidelity—for they were supported by the countenance of Shaftesbury and Bolingbroke, who, in addition to their being peers of the realm, had a sufficient acquaintance with their mother tongue. But infidelity, like every other fashion, has had its day; and since the masterly and triumphant defences of our English divines, it has been generally abandoned by the superior and more enlightened classes of society, and, to use the words of an Oxford Professor, 'is now rarely to be heard but in the language of blackguards.'

"I revere Christianity, not because it is the religion of my fathers—I revere it, not because it is the established religion of my country—I revere it, not because it brings to me the emoluments of office; but I revere it because it is built on the solid foundation of impregnable argument; because it has improved the world by the lessons of an ennobling morality, and because, by the animating prospects it holds out, it alleviates the sorrows of our final departure hence, and cheers the gloomy desolation of the grave."—Selected.

THE DEATH OF CHRIST.

WAS IT A UNIVERSAL OFFERING FOR SIN.

I WILL examine this subject in the light of a few passages which give an affirmative answer to this question. Paul, in Rom. v. declares that "Christ died for the ungodly," "for sinners," and that his death reconciled enemies to God. Who are the ungodly sinners and enemies—the "all men" of the twelfth verse on whom death passed? The Apostle teaches the solemn truth that death's reign is co-extensive with the race of mankind, and that all have sinned. It is plainly asserted that Christ died for all who have sinned, the all on whom death passed in consequence of Adam's fall. 1 John ii. 2, responds to the same great truth thus: "He is the propitiation . . . for the sins of the whole world. Heb. ii. 9 says, "he tasted death for every man"; and 1 John iv. 14, "the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world."

These quotations are sufficiently plain and positive to teach the doctrine of a universal offering. The "all men," the "every man," and "the whole world," are very comprehensive phrases in the connections where they stand. It seems impossible to confine the meaning of the first to only a part of the human family. By every law of language I think it embraces all the descendants of Adam of all time.

But, it may be asked why I take such pains to prove a point so commonly admitted? I answer, to make sure a conclusion which is so commonly rejected. From the time I heard the first sermon among the hills of Ohio till now the doctrine of world sin-offering has been repeated in my ears without my once thinking, until very recently, of the logical consequences. Perhaps my teachers were blissfully ignorant of the peril one step ahead—a fall into the universal salvation, or, the embracing of a doctrine which goes far toward solving the mooted problem of all ages, the existence of moral evil. I have reference to the belief that all mankind must have an opportunity to accept proffered salvation. I have been slow and cautious myself in accepting this view, and even feel now that a degree of modesty should characterize this article.

The "all men" who lived during a period of about twenty centuries prior to the Christian era were mostly ignorant of the way and plan of salvation. Whole tribes and nations, embracing fifty or sixty generations, were left without a knowledge of future life, and the conditions upon which God had offered it to any portion of the human race. The redemptive scheme was confined to the Hebrew nationality, and a few proselytes from among the heathen. Paul affirms that "Christ died for these."

Take an outlook from the first Pentecost after the Lord's ascension, and behold nearly all under the gloom of paganism, destitute of a well-grounded hope of immortality or of any terms by which the priceless boon could be secured. Thousands upon thousands would die before the heaven inspired Apostles traveling in the slow coaches of that day could reach them with the message of life. It required about forty years for these men to complete the work of their ministry, and multitudes must have passed away before they had a chance to decide their own destiny by receiving or rejecting the Gospel. But I have been told that these were only poor, worthless heathens, having no claims upon Jehovah for a share of his mercy! Ah, did Christ die for these or for the heathens living a little later? A few years decided the point forever! Made the infinite difference between them of opportunity or no opportunity!

Contemplate the condition of humanity this side of the Apostolic period, and it must be seen that the number who have had the privilege of making a choice under the light of inspired revelation, falls immensely below the number whose ears were never saluted by the charming sound of the Gospel of mercy. At the present time six hundred million grope in the midnight darkness of the various forms of the degrading Asiatic religions, two hundred millions sit in the shadow of Paganism and worship dumb idols, and I might enquire how many millions more in christianized (?) Europe are, by the priestly hierarchies of the Greek and Latin Churches, kept in ignorance of God's word by laws interdicting the use of the Bible by the common people, concerning whom it may be said they have not had a chance to accept Jesus? Will these sinful millions, dead and alive, of the past and present, have the opportunity of hearing the Gospel of salvation, enjoy the benefits of a trial under a divine system of mercy, and have a chance to develop character under the influence of whatever motives God in his goodness and wisdom may be pleased to set before them? They will, is the legitimate conclusion from the premises that Christ died for them, and that they have never heard of him, though hearing of him involves the question of their resurrection. I am obliged to accept the conclusion, from the fact that I see no way to narrow the statement that "Christ died for all." Has God sent his Son to die for all if it be true that the major part of the human family never have, and never will hear of His death? Orthodox teachers think that nearly all the heathens will share in the endless torment of the more highly favored, who may have failed to live up to the light of the Gospel. An eternity of woe for these unfortunate creatures, who walk in the dim light of nature, with no firm belief in that, to us, tremendous hereafter, with no power of conception to grasp the idea of a God back of the great Sun which lighted Egypt and Persia, or the rude Jupiter who thundered from Olympus, and with everything against them—must be cruel. I have read, somewhere, of a Roman Emperor posting his laws so high from the earth that the people could not read them, then punishing them for violating the principles of his government; but this Orthodox God is worse than he. Confiscation of property, fines, chains, imprisonment, banishment and death, imposed as penalties for legal misdemeanors growing out of the unavoidable ignorance of the Romans, are nothing in point of injustice, when compared with eternal woe as set against the sins of the ignorant heathen. The view which consigns all this unfortunate class to the silence and gloom of the Adamic death, with no promise of a resurrection, may be turned to as a grand relief to the mind harassed with the terrible thought of the old theory, but it is at war with that great elemental truth, Jesus as the world Saviour. It also, I humbly think, exhibits God's attributes somewhat out of harmony. It is true those having never heard the Gospel have no claim on Jehovah for future life, unless we look at the favor He has shown another portion of the same fallen race no better in point, moral standing. All might have been left to perish like dumb animals without giving a shock to eternal principles; but to offer salvation on conditions to a part of a race of intelligent free agents, raises the question as to why the same favor is not extended to that other part, since no violation of principle would ensue. Were it not for the revealed truth that God so loved the world, the sinful world, of which the heathen formed the greater part, I would not argue this question.

What would the best of us be without an inspired revelation but heathens, and quite likely pagans, bowing down to lifeless forms, graven by our own device. If we claim that the nationalities to which we belong possess intellectual and moral fitness for the reception of the Gospel by individuals, we are reminded of the fact that this fitness is due to the Word of God. Roman and Grecian civilization may have done much to prepare the human mind for the reception of the Gospel, under the demonstration of miracles during the Apostle's ministry, yet it may be true that this civilization was heightened and rendered permanent by the light and influence of the Christian religion, thus fitting the minds of individuals of aftertimes to believe and obey when miracles had ceased. But the Apostles preached to tribes and nations which had felt the power of Roman arms, but not the influence of their arts and learning—rude and uncivilized men as the Pisidian highlanders who heard the Gospel by the mouth of Paul. The Apostles stopped not to enquire as to whether this or that people had been lifted from barbarism to the higher plane of their civilized conquerors; whether under Roman rule, or whether they belonged to the great Caucasian family of nations.

Paul, from the Areopagus, in the presence of the Greek philosophic sects, and in opposition to the proud boasts of the Athenians of an origin different from the barbarous tribes around them, announces the fact, that God had made of one blood all nations of men, for to dwell on all the face of the earth (Acts xvii.); followed by the proclamation of God's command to all to repent—this harmonizing with the great commission to the Apostles to go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature. There is no distinction here based upon a difference in race or moral standing. All the then existing nations, tribes, and families of every clime, were to hear the good news as soon as they could be reached by God-ordained human instrumentalities. Nothing can be claimed for superior Roman, Grecian and Jewish fitness.

I now ask, must the heathen of to-day, the generation of the same class sleeping in the tomb of nations, and the mighty host of unenlightened men and women, ranging through every grade of intelligence, from the refined Greek down to those ranking lowest in the national tribes (yet not lower than others to whom the Apostles preached) be passed by without even the offer of the knowledge of God's plan, leaving them in total ignorance of the death of one styled their, as well as our, sin-offering? This will hardly harmonize with God's revealed attributes. Jehovah has promised to save men by faith in Christ. But in the language of Rom. x. 14, "How shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard, and how shall they hear without a preacher?"

It has been truthfully said that God cannot be thwarted in his plan. Now, if I have apprehended the true meaning of the passages quoted at the beginning of this article, then God has been thwarted in case the major part of mankind are to never hear the Gospel. Thwarted, by the remote ancestors of nations refusing to retain the knowledge of God; thwarted, because his Apostles were earthen vessels, and could not reach every part of the habitable world in a day instead of forty years; thwarted, by every neglect of duty, and every misdemeanor on the part of the Church which would in any way hinder mortals from hearing the word, and thwarted by stream and desert, mountain and ocean-wave. If he has not been thwarted, and he has not, then one of the two positions must be true: 1. That God, in offering his Son on the cross designed that his death should effect the final condition of those, and those only who should have heard of him prior to their death in this world; or, 2, that he has purposed, that all the descendants of Adam shall have a fair trial under the knowledge of the Redeemer.

Much more might be written on this subject. I have left untouched Rom. v. 15, the puzzle of all puzzles to commentators holding the common view.

ON NARROWNESS.

BY HENRY DUNN.

We hear a good deal now-a-days about the evil of narrow views in religion. We ourselves often say, such or such a one is lamentably narrow. It may be well, therefore, to ask what is intended thereby? how that evil, if it be one, originates? and what apologies may be made for it?

That human thought has its limits will scarcely be disputed by any sensible person. "Hitherto shalt thou go, but no further," is inscribed alike on the page of Nature and on the Book of Revelation. Each hides in its bosom things that are too high for us—things that must be accepted as facts, but which can neither be explained nor understood. The refusal to be perplexed by such matters, or to weary one's self in vain endeavors to comprehend the incomprehensible, is not narrowness but wisdom. Humility in all such cases requires our submission. Even reason tells us that it is but vanity to "kick against the pricks"

But it is always hard to say where these limits commence. As knowledge enlarges, the field of investigation widens. And this is equally true with regard to every branch of human inquiry. The mystery of past ages thus becomes the understood law of the present; not by reason of any authorized intrusion into the secrets of God, but by virtue of diligent and humble endeavor to improve every means of discovery that he has placed within our power.

In natural science this is generally understood and acted upon. In relation to religious truth it is otherwise. Here the developments of the past are regarded as too sacred to be questioned—too certain to admit of doubt.

The reason for this difference of treatment is obvious. Conclusions in natural science are supposed to be traceable altogether to the operations of the human intellect, and are, therefore, always open to investigation. Conclusions in theology are mostly regarded as gifts from above, the result not of human but of Divine grace. How, it is said, can this or that be essentially wrong which has been wrested, as it were, from the hand of God by the power of prayer, bestowed in answer thereto by the Holy Spirit?

The error of this reasoning is two-fold. It assumes—which is far enough from the truth—that man does not need, or, at least, does not obtain Divine help in investigations. It asserts, although often unconsciously, that the words of inspiration, and inferences drawn therefrom, by good men, stand on pretty much the same ground—that the first is infallible, and the last two sure to be disputed. It ignores the fact that one is divine, the other human; that no authority whatever can attach to deductions which have been drawn by fallible men, often reasoning under the influence of prejudice, passion or of ignorance. Improvement is impossible until we are prepared to admit that truth, for the wisest and best of reasons, is only imparted to man by slow degrees; that every age has its allotted portion, which it is bound to find out and appropriate; that in every case this can only be reached by diligent labor in connection with humility, patience, candor and dependence in God.

Eminently is this true of divine knowledge. He who imagines otherwise—he who supposes that the inspiration of the Almighty in answer to prayer so enlightens neither an individual or church that its interpretations are divine, its inferences certainly true, is but the dupe of his own fancy, the slave of his prejudice, indolence or interests.

The certainty for which so many are craving, and in the pursuit of which they seem prepared to sacrifice everything, would be no blessing if it could be obtained. Doubt is essential to faith; difficulty to perseverance in the search after truth; a right state of mind to the attainment of intellectual repose.

Narrow-mindedness, when understood to mean the restriction of thought within its limits which man may have demanded, but which God has not authorized, commonly arises from the persuasion that adherence to certain dogmas is essential to salvation; that apart from the hearty belief of these there can be no truly Christian life; that whatever tends to weaken faith in these conclusions, or to modify the forms in which they have hitherto been presented must be injurious if not fatal.

The worthlessness of this reasoning becomes evident the moment we remember that man's responsibility bears not so much on the conclusions at which he arrives, as on the spirit and temper in which he investigates; that the process of search involves a chief part of his probation; that nothing can be more dangerous than to shut up the mind and to make believe that it is satisfied; nothing more degrading than to be content with revolving in a given circle, and to fancy this is progress; nothing more wicked than to make our fearfulness an excuse for our idleness; to act as if God were an austere master demanding more than we can give, and on the strength of this misconception to feel justified in hiding our one talent in the earth.

A QUERY.

"OUR Lord says, 'Heaven and earth shall pass away.' Will you give what you think is his meaning?"

I think it a form of expression denoting an impossibility, and not an affirmation. The words are connected as follows: "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away." As though he had said, "If heaven and earth could pass away, but that is impossible, for it is given to Abraham and his Seed for an everlasting possession, yet my words shall not pass away."

That the heaven and earth are to undergo great and important changes, physically as well as otherwise, there can be no doubt; but that it is ever to pass away, in the sense of a literal destruction by fire or otherwise, is to suppose a failure of the promise that Abraham should have "all the land" he saw "for an everlasting possession;" for "The Lord said to Abraham, Lift up thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward; for the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed for ever."—Gen. xiii. 14, 15.

If the earth is literally to pass away, no gift of another earth that Abraham never saw would make the promise good. Heaven and earth are to be "changed" (Heb. i. 12), but not destroyed or literally pass away; but they might sooner pass away than the words of Christ to fail: both things are impossibilities; for "the earth hath he established for ever."—Psa. lxxviii. 69.—Ed.

"OH, THE DEPTH OF THE RICHES!"

Who says I am poor? One who knows not the depth
Of the wisdom and riches of God;
One who feels not the worth of the Infinite Love
That is freely and fully outpoured.

Poor! poor! A King's daughter! All glorious within,
Her clothing of finest wrought gold!
And raiment of needlework beauteous and bright,
That shall never more fade nor wax old!

I poor! with the touch of my Lord on my brow,
And the peace of my Lord in my heart!
I poor! with such heavenly treasure in store
As no garners of earth can impart!

Oh, the depth! oh, the height! oh, the wonderful breadth
Of the wisdom and riches of God!
Oh, the blessing and wealth of the Infinite Love
That is freely and fully outpoured!

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.

FROM J. D. SHERIDAN, IOWA.

BRO. STORRS: The BIBLE EXAMINER for October is before me, filled as usual with food for the hungry soul. I am still in feeble health; but, through the goodness and mercy of God, I have been enabled to cultivate a small garden which has furnished me the means to obtain daily food for the soul as well as the body, for which I give sincere and hearty thanks to the GIVER of all good things, among which is the BIBLE EXAMINER not the least. While I cannot in my present mental condition endorse all I find in any religious periodical which it has been my privilege to peruse, the EXAMINER contains much that is wholesome, nourishing and elevating to the unbiased student of the Bible.

In the BIBLE EXAMINER for October, I find an article headed "The Eastern Question Solved." The writer undertakes to prove that Turkey or the Ottoman Empire is no less than the "lewd woman" of the Apocalypse, and also the beast that carries her. This kind of reasoning seems too much like making the Roman Church the woman that was seen setting upon a beast and at the same time the beast that was carrying her. I have for some time questioned the propriety of using the term "he" when speaking of a religious institution or organization. In Scripture phraseology political governments are almost universally denominated beasts; and are described in the masculine gender; while religious systems are represented as the opposite sex. For instance—the true and faithful Church as a bride, and the apostate one may very appropriately be denominated a "lewd woman."

To make the little horn of Dan. vii. the beast and the lewd woman of the Apocalypse one and the same must necessarily confound the terms "he" and "she." Our brother writes: "The prophet Daniel says of her, chap. xi. 19, he shall turn his face toward the fort," etc. This is making the prophet use language that I do not find in the book accredited to him. In the 7th chapter of that book there is a "terrible beast" brought to view having "ten horns," and "another little horn came up among them." The prophet uses the terms beast and horn interchangeably. (See verse 11.) Doubtless, a political system is brought to view: the prophet describes it in the masculine gender, in every instance, as "he," him or his; never in the opposite gender. So in the 11th chapter, 21st verse, a "vile person" is brought to view; he, as the head of the kingdom, to whom they do not confer the honor of the kingdom, but he comes in by flatteries, increases in wealth and power, "he shall exalt himself and magnify himself above every god!" verse 36.

This vile and wicked king is represented as coming to his end and none to help him—"At that time" . . . Daniel's "people" shall be "delivered" out of the most troublsome times they have ever witnessed. This representative head of the last Gentile government is spoken of forty-nine times in Dan. xi., from the 21st verse to the end of the chapter, but never in feminine gender.

Now, if the Spirit does not use these terms interchangeably when speaking of two systems of government, represented as male and female, it appears to me it is calculated to mislead, to say the least, for us to take that liberty.

That there will be a gathering under one head, or union of the masses among the false systems of religion, styling themselves "Christians," succeeded by an organized opposition, comprising all the secret orders of socialism and infidelity combined, which desire to rid the earth of priestly rule, I have no doubt. This, to my mind, is the means God will use to punish the "woman" professing purity and holiness.

These few suggestions I have thrown out, not in the spirit of contention, but in love to all desiring to elicit truth on the subject.

FROM POLLY G. PITTS.

BRO. STORRS: I do bless God to-day that is working a work for the BIBLE EXAMINER; yes, a blessed work that none can hinder. O! how glad I was when I received No. 1 of Vol. xxiii. I would not ask to have it sent gratis; yet I did hope it would come, and my hope is realized. O! why am I so blessed? Well, here is the answer: Jesus prayed, "Sanctify them through thy truth: thy Word is truth!" And the BIBLE EXAMINER has the seal of God's Spirit upon it, and it is talking of the things of Jesus and showing them unto us through it; and, thanks to our God, it is so free from tradition and mysticism and other isms! Oh, how very glad I was in reading brother Stewart's letter! His love for you, my brother, and the aged and God's cause made me rejoice exceedingly. He says: "I wonder at the Providence which impelled me forward from the caravan of the orthodox, toiling on so slowly in the fixed twilight of traditional belief into the goodly company of patriarchs, who have journeyed so far into the land of truth that the bright rays of its rising sun are warming their hearts and lighting up their pathway." Amen! so it is: and I can say, as Moses said, "We are journeying to a land concerning which the Lord hath said, I will give it thee. Come with us, we will do thee good." Yes, my brother, come with us. "Though it does not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that when He appeareth we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." Oh, what a blessed hope! "Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the vail: whither the forerunner is for us entered, Jesus, our great High Priest, who can be touched with the feelings of our infirmities." We bless the Lord for that; for we are old and infirm, and every hour we need thee. Yes, blessed Lamb of God, we feel our need every day, and would lean on thy blessed promises, that we shall "bring forth fruit in old age," and that we "shall be fat and flourishing"; or green, i. e., showing life, like a "tree planted by the rivers of water, whose leaf shall not fade."

There is much food in this number of the EXAMINER; my heart was cheered by it, and I do bless God that he is raising up help for it and cheering the hearts of the old, who have been looking many long years for our Divine Master; but our hope grows brighter all the while. Many have fallen asleep looking, but that will not prevent their rising to meet him when He comes. No; and those that are alive when He comes will not go before them. I well remember some that have fallen asleep old and full of days and full of hope. Bro. Jonathan Wilson for one has fallen asleep. Why I think of him at this time is, he wrote that he had seen five generations; so have I; yet I think he was not so old when he fell asleep as I am—i. e., almost 84 years; yet I bless the Lord that he hath given me long life that I might see the truth of the coming "ages"; and above all, the ever-enlarging views of God's love and mercy toward our fallen race. O! bless the Lord for what mine eyes have seen of His stately goings and what my heart has felt of His loving kindness and tender mercies! I was truly glad when I read dear sister Lamb's letter. May the Lord ever bless her endeavors to hold up his truth!

So our ever-remembered and very dear Bro. Rockwell sleepeth. Well, in love, I can say, "Sleep on, blessed sleeper"; nothing shall disturb your dreamless repose! but in the morning thou shalt awake to glory and blessedness. Thou hast borne the burden and the heat of the day, and by and by thou will enter into the joy of thy Lord. Yes, rest, rest, dear friend, on the couch of forgetfulness; unconscious now of all the pangs of dissolution. The pains, the groans, the dying strife passed with thee forever. Peace to thy slumbers! Thou art gone to the grave; but I will not deplore thee, for the Master hasteth and will soon be here. Then "we will all rise together in the morning." God grant it for Jesus' sake! My unfailing love to you, my brother, and yours, and the elect of God. Your sister in the Lord.

Fredericksburg, Iowa, Oct. 21, 1878.

FROM LEVI BOUGHTON.

WE may know when the kingdom of God is near as well as we may know when summer is near, when the fig tree putteth forth leaves. 1. Jerusalem was to be trodden down by the Gentiles till the times of the Gentiles is fulfilled. Now, what do we see in Jerusalem, the land that was to be desolate, so much so that it could not be bought nor sold, Jer. xxxii. 43 and 44 being fulfilled? The Jews are returning by thousands, buying and building. To facilitate their return, the king of the North has done his work of weakening the strength of the Turkish government (or, the descendants of Esau), and the "hook" has been "put in his jaws" and he is "turned back"; (the hook was the Congress that sat in Berlin) and will not come forth, as I understand it, till Israel and Judah are united in one nation upon the mountains of Israel and are dwelling securely, and he, the king of the North, "shall not know it, and thinks an evil thought"; that is, to "go up to take a spoil and take a prey," the gold and silver and apparel that have been gathered there by Judah and Israel in great abundance. And when he, the king of the North, comes up it will not be alone, but "many people with him," a great and mighty army, and "they shall fall upon the open field, and be dung upon the face of the earth"; and "the LORD our God shall come and all his saints with him"; showing that at some time previous the saints have been gathered "to meet the Lord in the air, and shall be ever with the Lord." The generation that shall see these signs begin to come to pass, shall not pass away till all these things shall be fulfilled. Please read Ezk. xxxvii, xxxviii. and xxxix. entire.

Victor, N. Y. October, 1878.

FROM JANETT A. MAYO.

BRO. STORRS: I have received the October number of the EXAMINER. I am thankful that your life is spared, and that you are able to give us so many of your own thoughts. I am seventy-seven years old. It is fifty years since I found the goodly pearl, and "went and sold all that I had and bought the field"; and in it I have found great and durable riches. It is remarkable that so many of your readers are aged as well as yourself. J. W. Stewart wonders at the providence that he has come upon such a band of aged pilgrims. We welcome you, Bro. Stewart, to our company; we need you. You are right; we are old, and many of us are poor. We've come by the way of Calvary, and we're going to Mount Zion. We are "taking heed to the sure word of prophecy." It has been a light all along the journey. There have been learned men who have said that our light was nothing but a Jack-o'-lantern, and have tried to break the lamp. But their weapons were too short. We hold on to the promises of God made to the Father. All that He has promised, that has not been fulfilled, WILL be.

Massachusetts, October, 1878.

G. B. MARTIN, Iowa, writes: "I am greatly pleased with the BIBLE EXAMINER. Every number animates, refreshes and comforts me. I hope it may be sustained; for I am sure it is greatly needed. I often think of writing something for its columns, but there are so many able writers that I think best to give place for them. I wish to see it filled with the best productions to be had; and I think it has able men and women as writers who are lovers of the Saviour and his words; and that is what is needed in these eventful times, ominous of greater events shortly to take place; therefore, let us wait and watch, and be ready for any emergency, that we may be fit for the Master's use when he appears.

"We have no preaching here on the future ages; but, immortal-soulism—eternal torments and going to heaven at death. The resurrection is of no account with them; they have a bridge over the resurrection, and go right up to heaven when they die; as a consequence, if there is a resurrection, the 'immortal souls' of the righteous must be called out of heaven and the wicked out of hell and be united to their mortal bodies. Lord save us from such folly. The preachers say but little in their pulpits about 'hell fire'; they have probably become ashamed of that awful fable. I hope they may become ashamed of its basis—immortal soulism—and drop it, as they have the old Calvinistic doctrine of 'in-fants in hell not a span long.'"

LUCRETIA B. LAMB, Minn., responds to my remarks preceding her letter in October EXAMINER, as follows: "I see by your preamble to my last letter that you are laboring under a mistake. I have no funds; in this you are correct; and I have no treasures but my children; I have seven of them, who are heads of families, and, by the blessing of God, are in comfortable circumstances and richly supply all my wants. Being almost blind, and accustomed from my childhood to industry, I find idleness insupportable. I cannot see to do any needle-work that I am acquainted with but manufacturing these rag-mats. Feeling desirous to honor the Master and spread the light of truth abroad, I have covenanted to this object all I can obtain by the sale of them. Could I find a ready market I could do much more than I can find it possible to do now. The object I have in view makes the work more precious, and the time passes with the consciousness that I am accepted of Him who owned the widow's mite with so much approbation.

"I will send you, as I am favored with a sale of mats, until I have paid for seven copies of the present volume, and more if I can; hoping that we shall soon see JESUS as he is and lay aside corruption and put on incorruption.

"I will do all I can with the help of HIM who has provided me with a glorious way of access to the seat of power, riches, wisdom and mercy, that endureth forever; and to the principle of love itself. Oh, why should we not continually have an exercise of faith that quenches the violence of fire? Yours, in love."

GEO. L. HART, Conn., writes: "How I wish the glorious light of the truth that shines forth in the doctrine of salvation in the ages to come might be allowed to be freely taught to those who would like to know; but, as in the Saviour's first advent, the lords of priestcraft held the key, or power, and would not themselves go in nor suffer others to go without doing them all the injury they could by excommunicating them from the Church, so now the whole force from Catholic Rome to Second Advent daughter, who exercise all the power they have, would like to render powerless the effort of the few that love the whole truth. But the glorious hour is dawning near when such opposers will not have even the light of a candle in their folly; and if, as in Jerusalem's downfall, the poor, innocent, deceived ones were not among them it would not seem quite so sad. I feel unworthy of such peace as flows in the search for light. Truly the path is brighter and brighter unto the perfect day. May the Lord bless you in your last work to the waiting Church, who will ere long begin the warfare that shall end in universal peace; when all nations shall remember and turn unto the Lord."

ELD. J. S. LAWVER, Kansas, six weeks since, wrote me: "I am just up from bilious fever, and contemplate going to California this fall or winter for my health and preaching. Do you think that good could be accomplished by my going there, to my health and to the cause of truth? How few care to embrace the doctrine of 'God is Love'—a 'fair chance'—one chance for all men—a chance for God to fulfill his oath to Abraham. It is easy accounted for when one's system has been so completely poisoned that it is nearly impossible ever to entirely recover from the effects. Many repel a 'fair chance' gospel as if there could be such a thing as an unfair one. May God keep you to the end, is my prayer. I thank you very much for your fatherly instruction of myself. Yours, in hope."

ELD. N. H. PALMER, Dalton, Ga., writes: "I am much straitened in my financial condition, but not in despair. My loss would be considerable, but doubtless you should strike my name from your mail-book, not from your list of friends. You will secure the reward of faith 'by patient continuance in well doing.' It must be true. The triumphs of the Cross mainly belong to 'the ages to come.' Yours, in the blessed hope."

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.

No, Bro. Palmer, I shall not "strike your name from my mail-book." I only regret that inability prevents my doing more to aid you; but the "Lord will provide." Your EXAMINER is paid for to September, 1879.

ELD. J. LEWIS, Illinois, writes: "I never was more thankful than when the blessed BIBLE EXAMINER came to tell me it was likely to live another year; for God has put it into the hearts of some lovers of truth to aid with needed help, so that No. 1 of Vol. xxiii. is before me, and I am thankful to our Father in heaven for the precious boon. It preaches a full gospel. When I say this I infer that some who preach the advent do so by the halves or small parts. May their eyes be opened to see the whole truth and no longer fight against it; for 'God will have all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth': that is, saved from the death that came by Adam and brought to a knowledge of the truth by the second Adam before their final state is fixed."

CHARLES G. WILLEY, Mass., writes: "The EXAMINER comes to me on monthly visits, filled with good things, new and old, from the heavenly treasury. Please send me two copies of the coming volume. Some of our Advent brethren begin to see there is a possibility of others being saved beside the little flock. The war in the East closed quite different to their expectations; consequently they feel that the basis of their hopes is shaken. Thank the good Lord for those precious truths revealed in God's Word in relation to his purposes concerning our fallen race. In view of this, can we not exclaim with the great apostle: 'O, the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and knowledge of God,' etc."

SOLOMON HOVEY, Mass., writes: "Within a few days past I have had put into my hands some of the last numbers of the BIBLE EXAMINER, edited by yourself, and, on reading the same, my wife with myself, are delighted to find you advocate Bible Truths, which we are very much interested in, and we wish to subscribe for the magazine. My wife and myself are strong believers in the soon second coming of our blessed Lord and Saviour; but we left the so-called 'Second Adventists' years ago in consequence of their being so ready to denounce all those who have truth in advance of themselves."

ABRAHAM PENNELL, Western N. Y., wrote a short time since: "I see by New York papers there is to be a Conference held in the city to discuss the subject of the 'Second Coming' of Christ, to which all denominations are invited. I count this one step in advance. Is not light increasing, and may we not hope and look for more? It is vain and foolish to try to stop the sun from shining, and so it is to try to stop truth from spreading. The effort has been tried long enough to satisfy any reasonable man."

CASPER B. MINER, Canada, writes: "I esteem it a duty as well as a privilege, to subscribe for the BIBLE EXAMINER, although I am nearly blind and have been so the past five years; still I get as much of it read as I can, and next to my Bible I find it far the best reading, and the nearest in accordance with God's Word. I am truly thankful to my heavenly Father that he has given you grace, and put it into your heart to issue the EXAMINER; and it is my prayer that you may be spared to continue the good work."

BARZILLAI BROWNE writes from Los Angeles, California: "I have been here five months on a visit to my son; have been preaching the truth to a few who are looking for the coming of Christ. They at first were bitterly opposed to your and my views; but at last begin to see the truth in regard to the Promise and Oath God made to Abraham. There are only three families in this city of like precious faith. I send you herewith two new subscribers."

SARAH C. MACOMBER, Mass., writes: "I am so glad the BIBLE EXAMINER is to be published another year. It is like an oasis in the desert for me. We pray it may live till our MASTER comes, when the truth shall be known as it is."

THE OLD CLAIM DISPROVED.

THE advocates of inherent immortality, for the lack of Scripture argument, are constantly crying out, "All nations and people have believed in the immortality of the soul." This is not true; though uttered, doubtless, under the impression that it is. But "ignorance is the mother of devotion," is an old saying; and certainly it is "the mother of devotion" to the doctrine of inherent immortality; or else some other worse element is; for there is no such doctrine taught in the word of God. This fact is what makes its advocates fly to heathenism for help, and cry out, "All nations and people have believed it."

MR. CONSTABLE, Prebendary of Cork, in reviewing a Mr. Pridham, who had set up this old plea for inherent immortality, thus responds to it in The Rainbow:

"In his endeavor to strengthen his position, Mr. Pridham refers to heathen opinion. He says that he might 'make nature also an opposing witness in this controversy; for the voice of conscience, whenever audible at all, confesses an indefinite futurity of joy or woe.' When will this old mistake be removed? We beg leave to tell him that so far from there being an all but universal belief on the part of heathen nations that all souls would exist forever either in woe or joy, it was their all but universal belief that there was no future life at all for good or bad. Tartarus and Elysium were favorite topics with poets, and favorite themes in schools of philosophy, but were laughed at and rejected by the great mass of mankind, whether educated or ignorant. We dare say that Mr. Pridham will be surprised at this, for he has probably all his life been hearing the contrary. We will, however, lay facts before him, and ask him to correct his opinion. Of all the schools of heathen philosophy the Epicurean was the most widely prevalent. It denied a future life altogether. But perhaps he will say that the mass of men believed it. We hope he will accept the testimony of St. Paul, that the mass of men had no such belief. He will find the apostle's testimony to this effect in 1 Thess. iv. 13. Perhaps he would like to see a testimony from an early Christian writer to the same effect. He shall have it from Tertullian, who is the more to be heard here, as he labors to show, as much as possible, that heathen opinion concurred with his notion of the immortality of the soul. In one place he says 'to the belief of this (viz., the resurrection) truth compels us—that truth which God reveals, but the crowd denies, which supposes that nothing will survive after death'; he adds—'the wise, too, join with the vulgar crowd in their opinion sometimes. There is nothing after death, according to the school of Epicurus. After death all things come to an end, even death itself, says Seneca to like effect' (vol. ii. 215-16 Tertullian. Edition Dr. Roberts). What then becomes of the universal belief in the immortality of the soul? It is a myth repeated in our ears till we have believed it! The truth is, that belief in immortality was not a part of heathen belief. Christ came—not to confirm an existing belief—but to restore a faith which had been lost. Mankind in Christ's time believed there would be no future life for any: Christ came to announce that through himself there would be eternal life for his redeemed."

CHARITY NEVER KILLETH.

BISHOP THOMPSON, in one of his fireside talks, giving his experience among the Southern Conferences, referred to a sermon of a colored preacher on "Benevolence." In one of the propositions, "that many churches have very little spiritual life and power, because they do not give as much as they ought to give"—elaborating this thought, the preacher said: "Ise knowed many a church to die cause it didnt gib enough, but I neber knowed a church to die cause it gib too much. Dey don't die dat way. Bredren, has any of you knowed a church dat died cause it gib too much? If ye do, jest let me know, and I'll make a pilgrimage to dat church, and I'll climb up by de soft light ob de moon to its moss-covered roof, and I'll stand dar and lift up my hands to hebben and say, 'Blessed are de dead dat die in de Lord.'"

FROM JAMES W. STEWART.

CAIRO, Ill.; Sept. 21, 1878.

BRO. STORRS: Since writing you last August I have received a letter from London in reply to an inquiry I sent in regard to Mr. Dunn's works. As it may be of interest to yourself and to some of the readers of the EXAMINER, I send a copy of it as follows:

"4 STATIONER'S HALL COURT,

LONDON, Aug. 12, 1878.

"SIR: We beg to acknowledge your letter received this morning and to forward herewith a list of Mr. H. Dunn's works still in print. We do not know of any periodical advocating his views, and he did not form a school of his own. We shall be happy to forward any of the books (as list enclosed) on receipt of the amount, which can be remitted by post-office order. You will please advise the mode of transmission.

"We are, sir, yours obediently,

"SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & Co."

I hope some of the brethren will endeavor to secure all these books, as I shall, and thus aid the EXAMINER in making known the truth.

CHARLES HOPE.

I GAVE notice in the EXAMINER for October of the death of this brother. Since then notice has been sent me by his daughter, which I give below, preceded by a few lines from Bro. Casper B. Miner. He says:

"I have known the subject of the inclosed obituary many years and counted him as one of my dearest friends; but it has pleased God to remove him; and, glory be to His name, he is not lost, but only waiting a glorious resurrection."

Bro. Hope's daughter writes:

"As my father was many years an interested reader of your periodical, and as it has pleased God to call him from life, I am requested to write a short obituary notice for him.

"Charles Hope was born in Gloucestershire, England, in 1800; removed to Canada in 1842, where he has resided since. For many years he has been a believer in the speedy second coming of Christ, and hoped to live till that grand event. But increasing weakness warned him of the end of his pilgrimage, and he readily submitted to God's will. After much suffering, borne with patience, he fell asleep in Jesus Sept. 3, 1878. Though his hand was tremulous, he had firm hold of the everlasting covenant; and, though his foot often grew weary, he realized that it was not far to the Mercy Seat, and he was ready to trust Him who can never fall into error."

SYMPATHY FOR THE ERRING.—Of how much of our indignation against even a deliberate wrong would we be disarmed, if we could know for ourselves a tithe of all the sorrow, and trouble, and disappointment, the poor erring heart had passed through! What efforts are made in youth to stand up against the pressure of the world, and how, when fallen, from miscalculation, or an overconfiding nature, or want of tact, it bravely rose up and tried again; and when hard necessity came and drove it to the wall, how it looked around for help, and waited, still striving to stand upright, and fell while striving; and even when fallen, how it yearned for one more chance to rise and be a man, how loth at last to give up all for lost! Could we but see a thousandth part of these struggles, as they rend our brother's bosom, and almost break his heart, how should it disarm us of our vindictiveness, and incline us even to run to him, and raise him up, and stand by him, and bid him "Try, try again!"—Selected

NEW YORK, DECEMBER, 1878.

All Communications should be addressed to No. 72 HICKS STREET, BROOK LYN, N. Y.

TERMS: $2.00 PER ANNUM, IN ADVANCE.

EDITORIAL NOTICES.

THE BIBLE EXAMINER is a Monthly Magazine. Terms, $2 00 per year, in advance.

Subscribers' Names should be written very plain. Do not neglect this. It is utterly impossible sometimes to decipher names, and mistakes must occur in consequence. As to their Address, give simply the name of the Post-Office and State.

Let all Correspondents be careful to address me as follows:

GEO. STORRS,
72 Hicks Street,
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

All "Postal Money Orders" sent me should be drawn on Brooklyn, N. Y.

To Clubs the BIBLE EXAMINER will be supplied on the following terms:

Two copies to one address,	$3
Four " " " "	5
Ten " " " "	10

The ten may be divided and sent to the address of two persons, if desired. The prices fixed above are expected to be paid in advance and the money sent at the risk of the subscribers.

Any person wishing either volume of the EXAMINER in sheets—that is unbound—shall have it on receipt of one dollar. The volumes that I can supply are 18, 19, 20, 21, and 22; only a few, however, of volume 20.

BOUND VOLUMES.—The BIBLE EXAMINER, bound, can now be furnished at $2 per volume in neat, plain binding; in morocco, with gilt edges, $3 25. Volumes 18, 19, 20, 21, and 22 can be had of me at the prices named per volume.

PAMPHLETS.—The only one I can furnish is the "DIVINE DISPENSATIONS: or, The Divine Plan in The Government of our Race." Price, 15 cents single copy; $1 25 per dozen.

REMITTANCES.—In these times of theft and robbery no one should venture money by mail except by a "Postal Money Order," if you can get one. If that cannot be done have your letter "Registered" at the office where mailed. Even then its safety depends on the honesty of the officials who take charge of the letter. It is, perhaps, just assafe to send small sums in a letter, sealed and properly directed, without registering as with.

The next best thing to a "Postal Money Order" in remitting money is a Draft on some Banking House in New York City, payable to me or my order—GEO. STORRS.

On page 85 I have given notice that the New York Tribune Extra, containing the papers read at the late "Conference of Believers in the Premillennial Advent," can be had for 15 cents. The demand has been so great for them—20,000 having been sold, and calls for them in book form—the Tribune now says:

"We have reproduced this Extra in a handsome octavo volume of 120 pages, printed in good type. In paper covers, this will be sent to any address, post-paid, on receipt of 25 cents."

I hope all our readers will avail themselves of a copy. Though in some things I differ from sentiments expressed at that Conference, I rejoice in the many grand truths exhibited, and that they are going forth by thousands. May God bless the work! It will be impossible to transfer the matter presented in the limited space of this magazine. I did hope to give Prof. Lummis' on "The Kingdom and the Church," but space will not permit.—ED.

A QUESTION.—Will you please explain 1 Cor. xv. 50. "Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God: neither doth corruption inherit incorruption"? W.

REPLY.—I understand the phrase "flesh and blood" is used to express the idea of a corruptible nature, liable to die; hence the apostle adds: "Behold I show you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we [the living members of Christ's body] shall be changed." As Christ, the living Head, "dieth no more, death hath no more dominion over him (Rom. vi. 9), so those who become members of his body are in like manner invested with bodies which are "quickened by the Spirit" (1 Pet. iii. 18); which Spirit is the life-power and essential to their immortality, and alone can make them heirs or inheritors of that kingdom which hath no end.—ED.

LETTERS RECEIVED TO DEC. 1.

No letters are acknowledged except those containing money or some inquiry that can be answered in a few words. Such as are acknowledged will be accounted a receipt for whatever is said to be enclosed, unless I state to the contrary.

"THE UNGODLY DIE LIKE LICE."

SUCH is the heading of a late article by a prominent supporter of the idea that resurrection from the dead does not belong to any of the wicked, but that they remain eternally under the death that came by Adam.

His argument is founded on a new translation of the text Isa. li. 6, which reads, "Lift up your eyes to the heavens, and look upon the earth beneath: for the heavens shall vanish away like smoke, and the earth shall wax old like a garment, and they that dwell therein shall die in like manner, but my salvation shall be for ever, and my righteousness shall not be abolished."

The writer contends that the words in like manner are a mistranslation, and should read "like lice," as he says the original word is kehn, and is translated lice where found in other Hebrew texts. Not to contest that point, let us look at his conclusion. He says:

"As the ungodly are like lice, evidently they will not have a resurrection from the dead to die again, unless it can be shown that lice are exposed to a like fate. But no one has the temerity to say those insects are to have a resurrection from the dead in order that they may die a second time. The wicked perish, as insects and beasts do, in their own corruption. Only the innocent and the justified can live again."

Here is a mixture of truth and error. It is a truth that no man will "have a resurrection from the dead in order that he may die a second death." All resurrection from the dead is of grace or favor. "As by the offence of one [Adam] judgment came upon all men to condemnation [to death]; EVEN so by the righteousness of one [Christ] the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life."—Rom. v. 18. Life was lost by the first Adam; it is to be restored to "all men" by the second Adam. The difference between the righteous and the wicked is, the righteous are raised from the dead immortal and "cannot die any more"; the wicked are not so raised, but may die "the second death"; not for the sins of this life—though they receive according to the deeds done in the body—or, "Christ shall reward every man according to his works."—Matt. xvi. 27; 2 Cor. v. 10.

Life from the dead is imparted to all men by virtue of Christ, "the Son of God," taking on him our nature, thus becoming the "Son of man" and Restorer of the race to all that was lost by the first Adam; and He will "destroy death," or crush the head of evil, so that no man—saint or sinner—can be held in death till he has first had the knowledge of "the only true God and Jesus Christ," and has "wilfully" rejected Christ as his Redeemer and Lord; for "God will have all men . . . come unto the knowledge of the truth," and that "Christ gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time."—1 Tim. ii. 3-6, and Heb. x. 26, 27.

Now, suppose "ungodly men die like lice," as the writer being criticised affirms, does that prove they cannot be raised from the dead because "dead lice" are not? Truly, that is logic with a vengeance! Did "Christ give himself a ransom for all" lice as he did "for all men"? Did he "taste death for every" louse as he did "for every man"? Did he say, "The living God is the Saviour of all" lice, "specially of those who believe"? When he can show that Christ or his apostles talked in that manner about lice, then it will show that our friend's "lice" will not stay eternally in death.

Does my friend think Christ, the Son of God and the Son of man, will be "satisfied" and his "soul" at ease to find "death" so strong that he cannot or will not venture to accomplish that which he has said should be done by his "voice"—"all in the graves shall come forth"?

My friend has modified the original "Non-Resurrection" theory a little. It used to be essential to a resurrection that the person should have a divine or spiritual union with Christ. Now, he says, "only the innocent and the justified can live again." That is some gain. He saw the original theory left infants eternally in the grave. Now the "innocent and the justified" can and will have a resurrection. Glad there is progress in the family of Non-Resurrectionists, for, says Paul, "As by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation, EVEN so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life." Even so, as Adam brought all men unto death, Christ will bring all men out of death; for they are "justified" thereto, and such, our friend admits, will "live again." So, if they "die like lice," they do not remain dead for ever, if live do.

THE JEW QUESTION.

THE discussion, or presentation of this question at the "Prophetic Conference" in New York City, last October and November, drew out our friend "D. T. Taylor," in the "Bible Banner" in the following strain:

"THE INEVITABLE AND ETERNAL JEW."

"It is not to be supposed that so many students of prophecy as convened in New York would agree in their views of the millennial age. Pre-millennialists do materially differ. I never adopted the views of the so-called English Literalist School known in this country as the age-to-come. Speakers at the great conference do adopt it. Some of its features are not a little repulsive to a pure Christianity. Dr. Tyng is reported as saying to the Sun reporter he believed that 'The Lord is to come personally to Jerusalem: the temple and city shall be re-built, and the ceremonial of the restored (Jewish) tribes re-established for a memorial of grace,' while Bishop Nicholson ran over with a kindred carnal Judaism. Pity it is so. It is this sort of Judaism that renders Dr. Porter, of Yale, so hostile to all pre-millennial doctrine, and to carp so harshly at Moody's preaching of the advent, though I do not know that Moody adopts the rank view of such as the good Dr. Tyng. Think of going back eighteen hundred years to an exploded Hebrew ritual, the old dead ceremonial law, and digging that carcass up from its grave, to set before Christ and Christians as 'a memorial of grace!' I sincerely hope the aromatic pot of ointment prepared at New York, Nov. 1, 1878, will not be spoiled and made to stink by such dead flies. Brother Tyng gets all this from those last chapters of Ezekiel. May his eyes be opened, to perceive the instant dawning of a purer age. There is a certain unaccountable wildness of interpretation on this Jew question. But all is not truth though it be stamped with renown and antiquity. The critic's pen is abroad. It should be kind, but may be sharp. We are to take heed how and what we hear, and rightly divide the word of truth. I am certain that those who idolize the Jews fail to do so. But at the general aspect and seen results of the great conference I do and will rejoice.

I deeply regret that so good and intelligent a man as "D. T. T." should indulge in such language as that above. His heading is appropriate in one respect: it states truths:

1. The question is an "Inevitable" one; it "cannot be avoided" — "it is not to be avoided": the Bible is full of it; our Lord did not fail to confirm the importance of it, when he said, "SALVATION is of the Jews."—John iv. 22. Jesus, the Christ, was a Jew, and the angel announced to Mary, before his conception, "The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David: and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end."—Luke i. 32, 33.

2. My friend TAYLOR has well said, the "ETERNAL JEW." God will eternally keep his word in regard to that people; and strange as his dealings with that people may appear to us—and as impossible as it may seem to impotent man, that they can be brought back to "the land wherein their fathers have dwelt," yet God has said it shall be done, "and they shall dwell therein, they, and their children, and their children's children for ever; and my servant David shall be their prince forever."—Ezk. xxxvii. 25.

Does my friend suppose we are capable of judging what ordinances God may see fit to establish as "memorials of grace" in their restored state? Are we so infinite in knowledge that we can say, "Hitherto shalt thou go and no farther." May not we receive instruction from the mouth of the LORD who saith, "For my thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the LORD: for, as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts."—Isa. lv. 8, 9. Please read the remainder of the chapter.

"Carnal Judaism" is it, to believe God can and will do as he has said in relation to his ancient people? It may appear strange and impossible to us, finite creatures. There is one thing "impossible" with God, and only one thing: i.e., "to lie."

I hope my friend "T" will not think me un-"kind" if my "pen" is a little "sharp." I have given only a little of what the Bible pours out streams and floods on the subject. I adopted the "age-to-come" near forty years since, but have gone on till I see the force of Paul's language, that though "we were children of wrath, even as others; yet God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ, . . . that in THE AGES TO COME he might show the exceeding riches of his grace in his kindness toward us through Christ Jesus."—Eph. ii. 3-6.

God in the present age is raising up samples, to be exhibited in the "the AGES to come," of the wonders of his grace through his Son. My heart is full of this glorious subject: and I say, "Come, Lord Jesus; and Come Quickly," and remove "the covering cast over all people, and the veil that is spread over all nations."—Isa. xxv. 7.

ED.

MISREPRESENTATION.

PATIENCE is a crowning grace. James says, "Let patience have its perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing."—James i. 4. It is certainly the most difficult grace to practice; especially when good and intelligent men persist in misrepresenting the religious views of their brethren. It is difficult to attribute such conduct to ignorance, in some cases; yet charity obliges us to do so, or to a prejudice that possesses the mind, unconsciously to its possessor. If the CREATOR makes allowance for such things, we ought to follow his example, and "be followers of God, as dear children."—Eph. v. i. And Paul says: "For ye have need of patience, that after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise."—Heb. x. 36.

Now, I beseech brethren who feel it their duty to oppose the views some of us hold in regard to the "ages to come"—First: Inform yourselves as to what those views are: and, Second, State them truly. Till you do these things you are not prepared for the work you undertake, and you may not only be found wanting in due respect to your brethren in Christ, but dishonor God, who cannot allow us to "do evil that good may come." If truth cannot be defended without such a hazard, we had better leave its defence to others, and "wait" till God's "due time" shall come for Him to vindicate it himself.

What shall we think when good and intelligent men make such statements as the following in regard to the views some of us hold in reference to God's administration with those who never had an opportunity to "know the only true God," nor "Jesus Christ," in the present life? Said a writer in the World's Crisis. They hold that

"The modern nations, Mohammedan, Catholic, and Protestant, are to have a SECOND CHANCE to be saved under the forthcoming order of things. They are to come up from the dead and be blessed in Abraham."

Charity compels me to believe this writer made this statement in ignorance, or through the power of an invincible prejudice, of which he, probably, is not conscious. Love of truth constrains me to say, that writer is entirely mistaken in his statement. In strictness of language, no one of Adam's race will have "a SECOND chance to be saved"; but every one of them will have a "chance"; or, rather, an OPPORTUNITY to "know the only true God and Jesus Christ" (John xvii. 3), before they will have eternal life, or be doomed to eternal death. Now, if any man can show that all of Adam's race have had that opportunity, or "chance," in this life, then I say, they never will have another; there is no "SECOND CHANCE to be saved": but ONE "chance" is secured to all by the promise and oath of God. "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."—John iii. 16. There is no final salvation without faith in the Son of God; and there can not be faith in him without a knowledge of Him. That knowledge, unnumbered millions of the race never had, and have died in unavoidable ignorance, of the true God and Jesus Christ." Such, I, with others, teach, never had a "chance to be saved," but will have an OPPORTUNITY; (not "a second chance"; for, they never had one before) to secure an endless life, in "the ages to come": for, "God will have all men . . . come to the knowledge of the truth: for there is one God, and one MEDIATOR between God and men, the man Christ Jesus; who gave himself a RANSOM FOR ALL, to be testified in due time."—1 Tim. ii. 4-6. Prove that "due time" has ever come to all men, and then our opposers will have some ground to stand on; till then they have nothing but assumptions or misrepresentations to present, which will not long serve them for a hiding place; for thinking men cannot always be deceived by such a method of warfare.

To virtually accuse the Creator of professing such love to the world as to give his Son to humiliation, suffering and death, "for all," and at the same time determine that millions on millions shall "perish" without the knowledge of his love and its provisions for them to be saved—and without the possibility of faith, because they have no knowledge on which to found it;—I say, to accuse God of such administration, is a "blasphemy against God." But happily for such blasphemers, our blessed Redeemer has said, "All manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men; but the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost shall not be forgiven unto men . . . neither in this age, nor in the age to come."—Matt. xii. 31, 32.

But blasphemy against God's administration needs repentance and faith to secure the forgiveness. Look at the horrid sin implied in the theory of our opposers. It stands thus:

1. God professed to love all men, "the world," so as to give his Son:

But he never intended that the vast majority should know it.

2. "Christ gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time":

But that due time God well knew would never come except to a few.

3. Christ commanded the Gospel to be preached to every creature:

But God determined only a few should ever hear it.

4. God promised, and confirmed it with an oath, to bless all the families of the earth in Abraham and his seed:

But he never intended to bless them with the knowledge of his Son, in whom alone is salvation by faith, except a few.

But why need I add more? Every theory in Christendom that excludes any man, woman, or child, of Adam's race, from salvation without giving them an opportunity to embrace the Redeemer ("who gave himself a ransom for all"), by faith, is a blasphemy against God and his Christ and their administration; virtually charging them with hypocrisy and false pretences. It is such theories that have filled and are filling the world with infidelity.

I say these things neither in anger nor ill-will to any one; but in grief and in pity. Grief, that God and Christ are thus dishonored; in pity to my fellow Christians, that they are still held in bondage to such God-dishonoring theories; remembering that I myself have been in the same fearful position. May God in infinite mercy and love soon deliver us all from the "blindness in part," that "has happened to" christendom as well as "to Israel."

Paul was concerned that the name of God and his doctrine be not blasphemed.—1 Tim. v. 1. So should all Christian men be. How can his name be more awfully blasphemed than to teach men, who know not the true God, that he is a being who practices duplicity with the creatures he has made; professing the most fervent love to them all, yet leaving the vast multitudes to "perish," utterly and forever, without ONE opportunity to act faith in the REDEEMER, of whom they are never permitted to hear? If to charge the living and true God with such an administration is not a blasphemy against him, please tell us what is? It seems to me, it is very close upon a blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, which can only be excused on the ground of "unavoidable ignorance."

If "unavoidable ignorance" may not be offered as a plea, for those who have lived and died in it, for ONE opportunity to know "the only true God and Jesus Christ" in order to faith; then what plea can be offered for those Christians who represent God's administration as without mercy to the ignorant masses who have in this life been deprived of the knowledge so necessary to salvation? Will such Christians not be "condemned out of their own mouths"? Be it remembered, "There is no respect of persons with God" in judgment.—Rom. ii. 11. If unavoidable ignorance is no excuse in the one case, it will not be in the other; and we may well ask, "WHO THEN CAN BE SAVED?"

ED.

THE SECOND ADVENT OF CHRIST:

ARE YOU READY FOR THAT EVENT?

If you think you are, try yourself by the following teaching of the "COMING ONE."

"You have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbor, and hate thine enemy. But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you; that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust. For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans the same? And if ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? do not even the publicans so? Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect."—Matt. v. 43-48.

Here is a sentence which comes from the mouth of Him "Who shall judge the living and the dead at His appearing and His kingdom."—2 Tim. iv. 1. If we love not our enemies, we are to have no "reward";—we are no "better" than "the publicans"; we are not "the children of our Father which is in heaven"; we have not his characteristics, and have no right to expect that resurrection which constitutes one a child of God, who cannot "die any more." Solemn thought! Shall not all who profess to be anxious for the Second coming of Christ, take heed to this standard of acceptance? Is it not possible that we may fail of a change to immortality, an undying state, for the lack of the love here set forth by the Author of life and immortality? Have we learned the lesson inculcated in the text? Have we seriously sought to understand and practice it? If not, how shall we appear in the presence of Him who has so clearly set this lesson before us? Have we not neglected this "wedding garment"? If so, will not disappointment be our lot? Shall we not be "speechless?" Will not shame cover us, notwithstanding all our manifold expressions of desire for "the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ"? Ought we not to lay the subject of the text seriously to heart, and not rest till we are assured we have learned it? Can we feel, scripturally, assured that we shall meet with acceptance in the day of Christ, if we are not perfected in love as here taught by the Judge himself? What though we do love those who love us—our sect or party—and do good to those who do good to us, if our love is short of the Judge's standard, what are we better than "the publicans"? Will our Judge alter his standard?

Let us now more minutely examine the standard itself. It is to be "perfect [in love], even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect." This leads to the inquiry as to how perfect is his love?

He "loved the world" (John iii. 16): that is each and every individual of the human race. This love was not a mere profession. It was demonstrated in the highest and most self-sacrificing manner by the "gift of His only begotten Son"; subjecting Him to humiliation, shame, sorrow, pain and death, for the benefit of the race. This was not done for friends, but "enemies"—"sinners"—"ungodly."—Rom. v. 6-10. Thus did "God commend his love toward us."

Love only can beget love; but for it to do this, it must be manifested, not by words only, but by acts, which demonstrate the reality of its existence. Such is the love of God to men. It is impartial: "He maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust." The gift of His Son was equally impartial: "He gave himself a ransom for all"—"tasted death for every man"—"He is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world." "He is the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world."—1 Tim. ii. 6; Heb. ii. 9; 1 John ii. 2; John i. 29.

How little do men, even Christian men, comprehend the greatness of the love of God! Much of this ignorance is attributable to false conceptions and misrepresentations of the divine character and government. The evil tempers and selfish dispositions of unholy men, so ungovernable in themselves, have been supposed to exist in their CREATOR; and the thought that such was the case has been strengthened by some expressions found in the Bible, but more especially by the difficulty men have found in overcoming these evil dispositions in themselves. The desire for revenge for real or imaginary insults or injuries, is so strong in animal men that they conclude God is like themselves; and as unsanctified men became religious teachers they gradually incorporated the revengeful element into their ideas of the CREATOR; and thus began the apostacy from pure christianity, ending in religious wars and persecutions, fancying they were "doing God service," while they were acting in direct opposition to the true spirit of the love of God to the world.

By this means hostility to God himself has been promoted, and infidelity has spread not only out of the church, but in the nominal church, till pure Christianity is driven into a corner, and those who still retain its true spirit "sigh and cry," in secret, "for all the abominations that be done in" the name of God, representing him as anything but a desirable Ruler. The great fact that "God is LOVE" is no longer realized; and otherwise good men talk and act as if He were the most savage tyrant and merciless ruler that ever administered a government in the universe; so that the professedly Christian world seem to have retrograded to that Gentile state in which Paul said, "the things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to devils, and not to God."—1 Cor. x. 20. They have created an imaginary God, actuated by like passions of their own; but one that has no relation to that God who is described in the text on which these comments are founded.

To restore men to the knowledge of "the only true God and Jesus Christ," who was sent into the world to redeem and deliver the race from sin and death, is the object in view in all I have to say, and thus to lead men to apply themselves to the great work of conformity to God in love. Only as the true knowledge of God's character and government is understood can we ever hope to see men in earnest seeking conformity to the law of Christ in the text at the head of these remarks.

In view of this subject, is it not the duty of all professed Christians to cultivate a tolerant spirit towards such as hold sentiments adverse to their own? realizing that the best instructed "know in part" only, in the present state and age. Shall we not study more earnestly to understand the character of our CREATOR, and seek a more perfect knowledge of the principles of his government in relation to the creatures he has brought into being? Love was the moving cause of creation; love rules in all departments of divine enactments for man's conduct, and in the administration of the laws under which man has been placed: so that corrupt as men may seem to be, love pleads the excuse of ignorance, even when there seems really no ground for excuse. See this exemplified in the case of one, whom to have "seen" was to "see the Father" (John xiv. 9), as He was in the agonies of death by the hands of those He came to bless: "Father, forgive them: they know not what they do."—Luke xxiii. 34. Hear that prayer of love, O ye who fear love may be so exalted as to extend to the "ignorant and them who are out of the way," through unavoidable circumstances (Heb. v. 2); so that the "compassion" of this "High Priest" should extend to them beyond this present life! Go learn the agony of love for the ignorant from Him who in the midst of sufferings, on which the sun refused to shine, poured out His love in strains which are enough to melt a rock; and see that He who preached the sermon in my text practiced what He preached.

Shall we, who profess to be the followers of Christ, not walk in his steps? Shall we shut up our bowels of compassion and love, and doctrinally shut up JEHOVAH's love for "the world" to our narrow ideas of a few short years to carry out the counsels of his love for the race to which the Son of God united himself, and for which He "gave himself a ransom," which God is pledged to see "testified in due time" to all men? Rather let us apply ourselves to learn the lesson of love Jesus has set us by precept and example. On the accomplishment of this work depends our heirship to the kingdom as "kings and priests to God and the Lamb"; and without it we have no scriptural grounds to expect to awake in the resurrection as "children of God"—the "joint heirs of Christ" and "Bride of the Lamb."

This way of love is the "strait gate and narrow way" which "few," alas, are willing to enter and walk in; and they strive to find an easier way to enter eternal life: but saith Jesus, "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them, for this is the law and the prophets. Enter ye in at this strait gate," etc.—Matt. vii. 12, 13. This is the application of the law of love we have been considering. "Few" will accept it: others will "suffer loss," yet may ultimately learn the lesson from the few: and thus the final result will be "a great multitude, which no man can number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues," . . . "who have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."—Rev. vii. 9-14. This company cannot be the "few," for they are not the "little flock"; but are clearly distinguished as "a great multitude, which no man could number." ED.

"WE" EDITOR.

WHEN I revived the BIBLE EXAMINER in 1871, the following announcement was made:

THE EDITORIAL "WE."

I have determined hereafter to drop the above plural pronoun in editorials. An independent Editor cannot use it with propriety, because it indicates that he speaks for a sect or party, and not for himself alone or on his own responsibility. A sectarian or party paper may use the "we," because the Editor speaks for his employers, and they, with himself, constitute the "we." But one who speaks for himself, only, cannot properly use the word. Modesty is no excuse for such an impropriety. In fact, pride was the parent of its use, probably.

"Paul seldom ever used 'we' in his Epistles; and when he did, it is highly probable he included some fellow-laborer in the expression. The pronoun 'I' is almost painfully present in all his writings. Let one read 2 Corth. xi. and xii. throughout and convert the 'I' into 'we' and see if Paul would make an Editor for a sectarian or party paper. Farewell, then, to the 'we' Editors. I am no longer of that enslaved class. I shall speak for myself, responsible only to God."

Now, in 1878, I am of the same mind, though it may seem strange to some.—ED.

Truth is a steady thing, and acts steadily through the reason, by the weight of evidence. To rest upon men's fancies and feelings only, is to work upon that which flags and becomes sluggish when not continually roused by fresh excitement; just as a drunkard is tempted to drink more deeply every day, from finding that his constitution needs the stimulant more and more.—Whately.

THE PROMISE AND OATH OF GOD TO ABRAHAM.—NO. II.

BY THE EDITOR OF THE "BIBLE EXAMINER."

THE promise and oath, that in Abraham and his seed "all the families of the earth—all kindreds, all nations shall be blessed," I understand to relate to all the race of Adam, without exception; to be fulfilled in this life or a future one; all men of every age or nation, are embraced in it and cannot fail of having an opportunity, here or hereafter, of receiving the benefit of that promised blessing.

At this point we are met by the objection that, Such a view conflicts with the doctrine taught in the Bible, that there is to be no resurrection of the wicked dead. Here, then, it is proper to inquire who this class embraces—

WHO ARE THE WICKED DEAD?

In answering this question, I trust we shall leave all conjectures and be instructed by the Bible alone. That book is a safe guide in all matters of faith. John Wesley, the founder of what is known as "Methodism," gave a definition of sin which is both Scriptural and rational. He said, "sin properly so called is the voluntary transgression of the known law of God. Sin improperly so called is the involuntary transgression of the law of God whether known or unknown."

This definition of sin is clearly set forth in the Bible. Said Jesus, "If I had not come and spoken unto them, they had not had sin; but now they have no cloak for their sin. . . If I had not done among them the works which none other man did, they had not had sin; but now have they both seen and hated both me and my Father."—John xv. 22, 24. Here is a clear recognition of the distinction between voluntary sins and involuntary ones. It is light sinned against that constitutes sin, properly so called; light which gives us the knowledge of God, his love and kind designs. An act may be sin in itself, and yet not be sin properly so called. The apostle John says, "If any man see his brother sin a sin not unto death, he shall ask, and he shall give him life for them that sin not unto death. There is a sin unto death; I do not say that he shall pray for it."—1 John v. 16.

Here is a clear distinction made as to sins; some are of a worse character than others. Paul saith, "Sin is not imputed when there is no law."—Rom. v. 12. Again he says, "Where no law is, there is no transgression."—Rom. iv. 15. Also, Paul, in speaking of the ignorance of the heathen, says, "The times of this ignorance God winked at, i. e., overlooked; but now commandeth all men, everywhere, to repent," etc.—Acts xvii. 30. All this testimony shows there is a distinction in what is called sin, in the Bible, which warrants the idea that sin, under some circumstances is such properly so called: and under other circumstances it is improperly called sin, though such in itself. Without enlarging on this point I proceed to show that the gospel knows of but one sin which is punished with the loss of endless life.

That one sin is a "wilful" and deliberate rejection of Christ after he has been made known to us by a clear presentation of the truth concerning his work of redemption from sin and death, and as the author of an endless life. Such shall not "see" the life of the ages, but "the wrath of God abideth on him." Such is the law (so to speak) of the Gospel: a dispensation under which "every creature" has been or must be placed before an endless life is given or a final death can be inflicted. Who ever has had made known to them "the only true God and Jesus Christ," or has "received the knowledge of the truth" concerning God's love to them in sending his Son to "give himself a ransom for them," and thus become "a propitiation for their sins," and then "sins wilfully" by rejecting that love and Jesus as the "one Mediator"—such persons commit a sin for which there is "no more sacrifice," nothing remains to them but the fearful death which "devours" them.—John xvii. 3; 1 Tim. ii. 5, 6; 1 John ii. 2; Heb. x. 26, 27. But what has this to do with such as have never heard the facts above stated? They have "no sin" in gospel sense. "Every creature" must first hear the "Glad Tidings," and have an opportunity to embrace Christ as their Deliverer before their final state is fixed; their faith or unbelief must be a manifested fact.

Says an objector, "Then there must be a resurrection of some into a mortal state; and we cannot believe that." There are many things we may not "believe," nevertheless they may be true. The Scriptures are our rule; they do affirm that "all the families of the earth shall be blessed in Abraham and his seed." If a mortal revival into life is necessary to fulfill that promise and oath of God, then there will be such a revival; and who shall say that the ALMIGHTY cannot or will not cause it to take place? Mark well, my view excludes from such revival only those who have been blessed with the truth, and wilfully reject Jesus Christ; such are wicked in the gospel sense; and dying in their unbelief are condemned "not to see life," but to have "the wrath of God" abide "on them."—John iii. 36. Thus the view does not affect the doctrine of the non-resurrection of the wicked dead, but it defines who are properly, or in a gospel sense, the wicked dead. Such, and only such, will remain in death.

As to a resurrection into a mortal state, Scripture facts show such has been the case, both under the Old and New Testaments; and that Abraham expected it in Isaac's case, if he had slain him; because otherwise God's promise would fail, "that in Isaac shall thy seed be called." "He staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief; but was strong in faith, giving glory to God; and being fully persuaded that what he had promised, he was able to perform; and therefore it was imputed to him for righteousness."—Rom. iv. 20, 22.

God's promise and oath—"two immutable things in which it is impossible for God to lie"—must be honored, however improbable or impossible it may seem to us finite creatures, that the thing shall surely come to pass. By unbelief, to say the least, we dishonor God, and bring discredit on his word; and in so plain and clear a case, stated in such a solemn manner, as the promise and oath of God to Abraham, we are bound to accept it as meaning what it says, whatever difficulties might appear to limit its meaning.

No criticism can change this promise and oath. I therefore accept it in all its fulness, and believe to accept it thus, is to accept "the gospel preached to Abraham"; the unwavering belief of which constituted that patriarch the father of all believers.

At this point of the argument, that "all the families of the earth shall be blessed in Abraham and his seed," it is appropriate to examine the text Romans ii. 12, 16, viz: "For as many as have sinned without law shall also perish without law," etc. This text is the only one found in the Bible that gives countenance to the idea that men can be saved or eternally perish without the knowledge of the REDEEMER. If it can have no other construction than that put upon it by the advocates of salvation by "the law written in their hearts," then, truly, the apostle is made to contradict himself, and his whole testimony is made worthless; for he expressly says in the next chapter, "By the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in his (God's) sight" (Rom. iii. 20): he also assures us that "if there could have been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been the law; but the Scripture hath concluded all under sin that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe."—Gal. iii. 21, 22.

Nothing, then, can be plainer than that whatever Paul meant by the language, (Rom. ii. 12-15), he did not mean that the final state of those ignorant of Christ would be determined by any "law written in the heart." That God's present dealings with them might be regulated by that, may be admitted; for, so it was by the law given to Israel—it was a law not by which their final state was to be determined; it was only "a school-master unto Christ, that we might be justified by faith; but after that faith has come, we are no longer under a school-master."—Gal. iii. 24.

No law, then (unless it be "the law of faith"), can determine any man's final destiny. Law may and does inflict pains and penalties even unto death, as was the case under the law given by Moses, but not necessarily proving that the final state of the individual was fixed thereby.

HENRY DUNN, of England, remarks on the text under consideration, that "The point of the apostle's teaching, it is admitted by all, is that God will judge all men justly, and according to the advantages they have enjoyed. But if they who have sinned without a rule of duty, and those who have transgressed against light and knowledge, are alike to perish everlastingly, in the sense commonly attached to that phrase, the distinction drawn is an idle one, and the argument unmeaning. The fact is—and the recognition of it is essential to the comprehension of the Epistle—the apostle here is not declaring the final lot of any one. He is simply bringing in all men alike guilty before God, and shutting up all to the need of that Saviour whom he is about to announce.—iii. 20, 22." . . . "Still keeping to his point—the vindication of God's righteous dealing with all men—he maintains that a Gentile, obeying the light of conscience is as pleasing in God's light as a Jew obeying the law. (verses 14, 15). Both alike are regarded as 'justified,' in the sense of being accepted as true men. He is neither affirming nor implying that either the one or the other can be saved by works. Nor shall we here fail to observe, that it is a part of Paul's gospel, or good news, that the world is to be judged 'by Jesus Christ,' one 'who can be touched with the feeling of our infirmities.'"

BISHOP MIDDLETON remarks on the passage Romans ii. 12-15, that Paul, "In order to show that by the Gospel alone can a man be justified, and that the Mosaic revelation is, in this respect, of no more avail than the light of nature, a proposition, the proof of which is the main object of the whole Epistle, he has occasion to refer to the different rules of life with which the Gentiles and Jews had respectively been punished; to the latter more than one revelation had been granted; for from the earliest ages to the time of Malachi, the Almighty favored them (the Patriarchs and Prophets) with repeated indications of his will." The Bishop adds, "With respect to the present passage, I am of the opinion that the Apostle meant to reprove the presumption of the Jews, who thought themselves sure of eternal life, because God had favored them with a revelation of his will, in which case the reasoning will be: 'As many as have sinned without a revelation shall be punished without incurring the additional penalty which such a revelation would have enacted; and as many as have sinned under a revelation shall suffer the severer punishment which that revelation, whatever it be, has denounced against their crimes.'"

But if "perish" in the text means a final and eternal destruction, or death, what distinction or difference is there in the punishment between the Jew and the Gentile? It is manifest that "perish" in the text means no more than that they should suffer loss; but the nature of the loss is not the subject of the discourse.

The term translated "perish" is from apolumi; and variously translated in the New Testament, and is spoken of "the lost sheep of the house of Israel"—of the prodigal son, who "was lost but is found"—of those Christ came to save, "I am come to save that which was lost," and many like passages; so that the expression in the text proves only that sin is disastrous, and brings loss under all circumstances.

God's promise and oath will stand against all the theories and unbelief of good or bad men. He will take care to see that the end is reached, however impossible it may seem to us. The means are his. Faith is ours.

After it has been demonstrated that this promise and oath never have been fulfilled, either to all families, or all nations, it is said, "Some of all nations have been blessed in Abraham and his seed, and that covers the promise." Before any one take such liberty with God's pledge to Abraham they should prove that some of all nations have been blessed according to the promise and oath. But for the sake of argument, suppose we admit this assumption; then the promise and oath should be altered to correspond, and would read thus: "By myself have I sworn . . . that in thy seed some of all nations shall be blessed."

What would be thought of an immensely wealthy man if he should promise, and confirm it by an oath, saying, "In my wealth the United States shall be blessed." But the facts prove that only one of those States ever received any blessing from his wealth, or ever heard of his promise and oath? Would any thinking man, knowing these facts, say the promise and oath had been fulfilled?

What is the difference between a promise to nations and to families? It takes families to make nations; and a nation, as such, cannot be blessed without the families composing it being partakers of the blessing in some degree. God clearly included the families when he spoke of the blessing to come through Abraham, for he expressly said so to Abraham, Gen. xii. 3, and confirms the same to Jacob, Gen. xxviii. 14, thus: "In thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed." To say that "all nations" means something short—far short—of "all the families" of which those nations are composed is making a distinction where God has made none, but has expressly joined the two together, so that the one includes the other; and "what God has joined together let not man put asunder," saith Jesus.

I shall now notice a very natural conclusion that some draw from Rev. vii. 9-14, that all nations have had the good news of Christ and of redemption through his blood. Of a "multitude which no man could number, of all nations and kindreds, and people, and tongues," who "stood before the throne, and before the Lamb," it is said "These are they which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." The general opinion of Commentators is, that this exhibition represents the church, universal, glorified. Our friends, who are opposed to my views of the ages to come—or, kingdom of God—accept the view of the Commentators, and conclude this multitude out of all nations, etc., precludes the idea that all nations have not already been blessed in Abraham and his seed.

In dealing with the book of Revelation, or explaining its figures and symbols, we have need to express ourselves cautiously. Let us look at the idea that this multitude represent the church universal, or all the saved at the end of this age. If it does, we might ask the question once propounded to our Lord by his disciples—"Who then can be saved" out of those who now live, or have lived for the last seventy or eighty years, or during the present century? How many professed Christians for these eighty years can be numbered as those "who came out of great tribulation?" If that is to be the test, I think nearly all of us, who have lived in this nineteenth century, will fail of salvation. What have any of us yet passed through that would entitle us to say we came "out of great tribulation?" We must look for some other construction of the language of Rev. vii. 9-14 than that of the Commentators, or give up our hope of salvation among that multitude which John saw there.

This idea may startle some of our friends; but I repeat it, if all that are ever to be saved are from this, or any previous age of the world's history, not only multitudes of those who call themselves Christians in this century, but many of previous ages will fail of being of the "great multitude" seen in Rev. vii., no matter how great their faith may have been; for very many true believers have died without passing through "great tribulation."

We seek, therefore, an explanation of the text which shall harmonize with the facts of history, and the general tenor of Scripture. First: Let us see where the scene of Rev. vii. is laid. It is after that scene of chapter vi., in which the sixth seal was opened, and "the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains and the mighty men," etc., "said to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb; for the great day of his wrath has come; and who shall be able to stand?"

This scene shows that the persons represented, upon whom this great tribulation falls, were those who had the knowledge of "the Lamb," and had learned that there would be a "great day of his wrath": hence they had previously had the gospel message and despised or neglected it. A "great tribulation" now overtakes them; corresponding with smiting the image and dashing it to pieces, Dan. ii., and the destruction of the fourth beast, Dan. vii. That "great tribulation" passed, "the kingdom of God" is established on the earth—"the saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and possess it forever and ever."

The "great tribulation," then, is on the wicked rejecters or neglecters of the Lamb of God, and is the winding up scene of this age, when the corrupters of earth, and the corrupt-ers of God's word will find the "great day of the wrath of the Lamb" on them has come. That "great tribulation" being over, John is presented with a new scene; he says, "After this I beheld, and, lo, a great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues, stood before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes and palms in their hands," etc. When John was asked by the angel, "What are these . . . and whence came they?" he evidently did not understand the matter; he must have been surprised at such a glorious multitude, in such a position, and asked the angel an explanation. The angel replied, "These are they which came (ek) after the great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."

But, says one, "you have altered the text; it reads out of, and not after." Our translators have rendered the Greek word, ek, "out of," and it is generally so rendered in our Bible; but in turning to our Greek Concordance we find the first English word used, in defining the Greek word ek is "after," and it has also the sense of "since." It will also be observed that I have inserted the definite article [tees, the] before "tribulation." This article is left out of the text by our translators; but it is in the Greek, and clearly refers to the tribulation described at the close of chapter vi.

In the account of what John saw, in chapter vii., it is expressly laid "after this"—"after this," what? clearly, after the "great day of the wrath of the Lamb" spoken of in the previous chapter. After this day of wrath, which winds up the present age, John saw the fruit of the following ages, or the ages of the kingdom of God, briefly stated, it is true, but sufficiently clear to be unmistakable as a fulfilment of the promise and oath of God to Abraham.

Let the text be read with the closing of chapter vi. in view, and the fact that the scene of chapter vii. is expressly said to be "after this," and see if the following is not evidently the true sense of the text: "These are they which came [to Christ] after the great tribulation on the kings of the earth, etc., and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."

This construction agrees and harmonizes with a similar representation in Rev. xv., where John saw those who had gotten the victory over the beast "stand on the sea of glass, having the harp of God: and they sing the song of Moses . . . and the song of the Lamb, saying, Great and marvelous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints. Who shall not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name? for thou only art holy: for all nations shall come and worship before thee; for thy judgments are made manifest."

Thus, we see the saints on the sea of glass glorified—take the same view of the effect, on "all nations," of the judgments—"the great tribulation"—on "the kings of the earth," etc., that I have suggested on the texts in chapters vi. and vii., and the coming of "all nations," or, the great multitude of all nations," appear in both cases to be after the judgments which wind up the present age, and opens the ages of the "kingdom of God," which immediately follows the end of this; and "Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. Who hath ears to hear, let him hear."—Matt. xiii. 43. Thus shining on the world—"all nations"—will be blessed in "Abraham and his seed," and the multitudes of the saved, in the dispensation of the kingdom of God, will as much surprise many of our good brethren, who do not as yet see the matter as I do, as it surprised John when he saw it in vision. Then shall we truly see a multitude of redeemed ones who have washed their robes in the blood of the Lamb, "which no man can number out of all nations, kindreds, people and tongues." How gloriously, then, will the promise and oath of God to Abraham shine forth over the face of the whole earth, and his immortalized saints rejoice that they are honored in having a part with Christ in the glorious work of earth's redemption, and the salvation of such untold multitudes.

Who desires a part in this work of God's promise and oath in blessing all the families of the earth, or all nations? O! how blessed the thought that we, who may be among the redeemed of the past ages, will have such glorious employment in "the ages to come." What are all of earth's present joys or glories when compared with the glory and honor of being "workers together with God" and his dear Son in reducing the earth, so long cursed with sin, to order, peace, universal love and good-will, making "wars to cease to the ends of the earth"; and every man "shall sit under his vine and fig-tree, having none to molest or make him afraid"? If you, dear reader, would share in that glory, come now to Christ, that you may live in those blessed ages.

The view I have taken of chapters vi. and vii. of Rev. and of chap. xv. might be further urged as the true one from many testimonies of the Old Testament. I will notice Isa. lxvi:

"Rejoice ye with Jerusalem, and be glad with her, all ye that love her: . . . that ye may milk out and be delighted with the abundance of her glory: for thus saith the Lord, Behold I will extend peace to her like a river, and the glory of the Gentiles like a flowing stream. . . . Ye shall be comforted in Jerusalem. . . . The hand of the Lord shall be known toward his servants, and his indignation toward his enemies, for behold the Lord will come with fire, and with his chariots like a whirlwind, to render his anger with fury and his rebuke with flames of fire: for by fire and by his sword will the Lord plead with all flesh: and the slain of the Lord shall be many." (This corresponds with Rev. vi. 12-17, which please read.) . . . "For I know their works and their thoughts: it shall come, that I will gather all nations and tongues; and they shall come and see my glory: and I will set a sign among them, and I will send those that escape of them unto the nations . . . and to the isles afar off, that have not heard my fame, neither have seen my glory; and they shall declare my glory among the Gentiles," etc.

Observe, this proclamation is to those who had not heard the Lord's fame; and it was after the fearful judgment on "many" who were "slain" in that judgment; and there were those who "escape," and they are employed in making the proclamation to the "nations and isles afar off," who had "not heard" of the Lord's "fame," etc. Here, also, I might introduce God's oath (Isa. xlv. 23): "I have sworn by myself, the word has gone out of my mouth in righteousness, and shall not return, That unto me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear." Compare this with Paul's language (Phil. ii. 10, 11), "That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, in heaven and in earth; and every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father." Thus a universal proclamation of Jesus Christ is to be made to all; and all are required to give him honor to the glory of God. Here, then, is a proclamation of God's good-will to men which has never yet been made in the fulness set forth in the Word; but God has sworn by himself it shall be. Who shall call in question his promise and oath? When that promise and oath is carried into effect, we shall see the innumerable company brought to the Revelator's astonished view (Rev. vii.) "of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues."

No wonder that Jesus said, "And I if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me."—John xii. 32. He knew all the "families of the earth" were to be "blessed" in him; and he hesitated not to accept the cross in his work of blessing all men with the means of securing eternal life. His faith in God's promise and oath was not shaken, though the awful death of the cross lay in his path to the accomplishment of his work of blessing all the families of the earth; and because he became "obedient unto the death of the cross, God highly exalted him" and gave "him a name which is above every name; that at the name of Jesus every knee shall bow," etc. Therefore, his name is to be proclaimed to all "the families of the earth"; else, how could they be required to bow to it?

Let us rejoice and be glad that God is not so restricted in the means of carrying out his promise and oath as our finite minds might be disposed to think; and let us remember, his thoughts are not as our thoughts, nor his ways as our finite ways. His word will not return void; but will surely be accomplished every "jot and tittle" of it. "So let it be."

WHY EVIL WAS PERMITTED.

A DIALOGUE.

[The following is from "Twelve discussions Proving the execution of Evil Persons and Things," by Henry Smith Warleigh, Rector of Ashchurch, Gloucester, England.—ED.]

D. I can perceive plainly that, as our permanent welfare and happiness depended upon our correct knowledge of all the attributes of God, so he would necessarily exhibit all of them.

W. But this pity and love cannot be exhibited except by the exercise of them; and they cannot be exercised or used except upon an appropriate object. Now the only thing that can call forth the exercise of pity is a miserable object; and there can be no miserable object unless there is evil in existence.

D. This throws fresh light upon the subject. It would appear that evil and misery, as we call them, are necessary for the full manifestation of God's nature, and consequently for the welfare of all moral intelligent creation.

W. You have exactly expressed my convictions, and a truth which cannot be successfully disputed. This fully accounts for the interest which St. Peter tells us (1 Pet. i. 12) the angels take in the redeeming work of Christ; and also for their gratitude, as shown in the part which they take in singing the song of the Lamb.—Rev. v. 11-14. They were not redeemed by the precious blood of the Lamb; but in his work the attributes of God were fully developed, and by its means they learned more of the nature of their adorable Lord God, and were the better for it. When I hear persons with bated breath, as it were, lament the existence of evil, and express their wonder that it was ever allowed to be, I long to impart to them these important considerations, and thus turn their wonder into intelligent admiration, love and praise. When I view the great, grand scheme of Jehovah carried out by means of creation, preservation and redemption, and when I know that it will ultimately issue in the endless establishment of all good, and glory, and happiness, and in the utter extermination of that evil which the infinite wisdom and dexterity of God has made subservient to it, my intellect and heart, with a fresh power and zest, adore and magnify him whose infinite wisdom laid the scheme, and whose boundless love and almighty power are surely, though slowly, carrying it to its final accomplishment.

D. I must, for myself, express my gladness for these views. They relieve my mind and heart of a heavy burden, and make me see that the good God is making all things tend to a glorious end.

B. I really think you are treading on delicate, if not dangerous ground.

D. One question I would ask. Is it true? If not, it is capable of being refuted, and will you do it?

B. I do not exactly say it is true; but we are so unaccustomed to this sort of thing, and it has the appearance of making God the author of sin, at which one would shudder.

W. I can thoroughly respect your fear. Do remember, however, that the danger you dread can no more be a result of my views than of any other which may be advanced. Evil does exist, and we cannot shut our eyes to it; and it is the general opinion that God might have prevented it, and accomplished all the good without it. I have shown this could not have been, and I am sure you will allow the obvious distinction between an author of evil and a permitter of it. I hold God is the latter, but not the former. I have shown that if man is to be created at all, his evil doing could not be absolutely prevented; and we have seen that evil was permitted for wise and sufficiently important reasons. Now, let me observe, that it is your idea of endless evil which creates what danger there is. You say this evil will endlessly exist, and be eternally intensified. You secretly feel that this is something too horrible to be connected with God in any way; and many of you will scarcely allow that he even permits it; and others of you shut your eyes altogether to it. But suppose for a moment that evil will not be endless; that while it does last it is made to accomplish a necessary good, and an eternal good, which it only could achieve. Suppose, too, that when its purpose is accomplished it shall itself be brought to naught; all this would at once change the aspect of affairs, and take away that which makes you shudder. Now it has been proved that the Bible does not invest evil with the attribute of eternity; but that God has decreed, that, as evil had a beginning, so it shall have an end. Thus, whatever connection God may have had with the existence of evil, whether as author or permitter, there is nothing in what he did permit unworthy of his power or wisdom or love.

C. But if people think that evil is of use, is it not likely to encourage them in sin?

W. It seems to me there is a question prior to this. Is it true that the wisdom and love of God have turned and are every day turning a necessary evil into an instrument to promote his own glory and his people's benefit? If so—and who can dispute it?—then there is nothing in this fact at all calculated to encourage men in sin? I own, indeed, it may be true, that, in consequence of your erroneous system of teaching they may abuse this truth; but neither I nor the truth I announce can be answerable for this. Is the gospel answerable for the fact that some turn its grace into a savior of death? Supposing, however, there is a possibility of an abuse of this truth, should not God's ordained teachers of his holy book counteract it, as they do the alleged evil tendency of the doctrine of justification by faith only?

A. I will own we ought not to dispute what you say for it is true, and therefore salutary.

W. I want to urge another thought. The fruits of the Spirit cannot be matured in a Christian, and he cannot be fitted for his Father's house without the existence of evil.

B. That is a strange position; how can you make it out?

W. Heavenly joys and rewards are not for those who have not sinned because they have no opportunity of sinning, and no temptation to sin; but for those who have both opportunity and temptation, and who by Divine aid resist and overcome. "How can I do this great wickedness and sin against God?" There can be no victory over the foe without a battle with him. No crown till after the cross. No virtue without temptation; and in proportion to the fierceness of the temptation does the resistance of it show the strength of virtue and grace in the Christian. Thus we cannot be sure of the existence in us of true religion and virtue, nor of what strength they are, unless evil is in existence and we are tempted to yield to it.

D. Certainly a very important and practical observation.

W. Further, how can Christian graces be matured without exercise? and how can they be exercised unless evil is in existence, and we are plied with it? For instance, how can the Divine grace of forgiveness be exercised unless an injury is done? and how can we show the meekness and gentleness of Jesus Christ, except under provocation? And so with respect to all godly qualities. Let it, however, never be forgotten, that if our heavenly Father has for all these good purposes permitted evil to exist, he gives us Christians ample facilities to counteract and resist and conquer the fatal effects of evil. He urges upon us the all-powerful aids of his Spirit. He has given to us the means of grace. . . . Consider how very much all this comprehends; and then say what more God could have done for his vineyard than he has done. How grievous it must be to him, that when he looks for grapes, he finds only wild grapes!

A. I am being convinced that a deep and solemn responsibility rests upon us, especially upon some of us. If we, by our teaching have caused the people to err, what will be the consequences to us and to them?

D. If we have been wrong, let us be thankful that our eyes are at last opened. It is never too late to mend. It has been shown that man could not be made incapable of falling; that he ought not to be so made, and that evil has been permitted for necessary and benevolent reasons. Now, what is the end of all this, and how does it bear upon the main question, the extinction of evil?

W. Sin and evil were permitted for a necessary purpose. How obvious and reasonable then is the inference, that when the purpose is fully accomplished, it shall pass entirely away and exist no more! In other words, the attributes of God could not have been exhibited, and consequently the continued welfare of his intelligent creation could not have been conserved, nor virtues in human beings be matured without the presence of sin and suffering. But the attributes of God are now manifested; redemption, by the cross, has been completed; by and by he will, "of his gracious goodness, accomplish the number of his elect," and his kingdom shall have come, and have been established; when all opposition shall be put down, and every foe destroyed. Now I ask, where will be the use of evil any longer? On what plea can it be endlessly continued, as you aver it shall be? If God can put it down, why should it not be done? If the Son of God can destroy the works of the devil, what considerations of wisdom, benevolence or utility can forbid it? Benevolence, as we have seen, was concerned in the permission of evil, and that very benevolence will demand its utter extinction when it has done its work.

A. If I could successfully oppose your positions I would do so; but I cannot. I must yield to clear Bible texts and strong sound reasons.

W. Let me then take advantage of the concession; and on the ground which has been laid, let me construct another argument for extinction. We have seen that the reasons for permitting evil, and for tolerating its continuance are, from their nature, but temporary. When their object is achieved it is needed no longer. This being the case I will lay down this proposition: Unless sin and suffering become extinct, the saints in glory cannot be happy. In proportion as a man is holy he is vexed and disturbed by sin, even here below; and in proportion as he is good and benevolent, he is distressed and made unhappy by the sufferings of his fellow-creatures. Now, the imperfect saintly nature through which he feels these things now, will be perfected in the heavenly state, and can be made more sensitive to them there than it is here. How then can saints be happy while they know—as you say they will know—that myriads of their fellow-creatures are ever suffering the most exquisite tortures that can be inflicted? A man must be lost to holiness and benevolence now if he can behold sin and suffering unmoved. Can glorified saints be without a heart to feel these evils and agonies? If they can, they are not saints; or, if they are, God must have given them a different rule of action and feeling there from what he gave them here; and he must have infused into them a nature far different from the nature he gave them in this world. But since all this is untrue and absurd, since saints will be perfectly and exquisitely happy, and since they cannot be so in the presence of sin and suffering, therefore, if only for their sake, these shall come to an end. In fact, the perfect bliss of the saints will be coeval with the utter extinction of sin and pain, and not before.

D. Now it is put to us, I confess I cannot see how the happiness of heaven can consist with the endless miseries of hell.

W. The question, then, whether evil shall be extinct, resolves itself into the will of God. If it is his will, it will be done; but not otherwise. We may be allowed to suppose, that an infinitely benevolent, loving Being would wish to abolish all pain and sin, if he could do so consistently.

A. Can we suppose that any obstacle can be in the way, if he wishes it?

W. He must be consistent. "He cannot deny himself." Let us try this feature on various grounds. Does his truth forbid it? He has nowhere given the slightest intimation that sin and pain shall be endless; on the contrary, he has said they shall pass away; that he will make all things new, and that he sent his Son on purpose to destroy the works of the devil. His truth, therefore, cannot interfere with his wishes; but it falls in with them. Does his wrath forbid it? We have had positive proof that he does not keep his anger for ever. Does his justice? It has acquiesced in the destruction of an enormous amount of sin and evil; nay, it has helped in their destruction. Would it not be capricious to say, "So far and no farther"? If justice has helped to destroy some evil, why not all? Besides this part of the office of justice is to see to the welfare of the good; but their welfare, as we have seen, is inconsistent with the existence of sin and pain; therefore, justice would require their abolition; especially as truth and wrath do not require their continuance. Can it be that he is notable? I answer most positively and emphatically, No! No! a thousand times over, if that would increase the emphasis. All possible things are possible with him, though with no one else. We have seen he could not make a man God, and thus render him infallible and incapable of wrong. There is an absurdity in such a supposition, and an absolute contradiction. But there is neither absurdity nor contradiction involved in the supposition of the utter extinction of all moral and physical evil; and, as we have seen, there is no hindrance on account of truth or wrath or justice. He can do it, with the strictest propriety, if it so please him. Then does it so please him? The following considerations will help us to an answer: 1. God is the best of beings, and the most benevolent; and he is also the Fountain of goodness and benevolence in others. 2. If so, his benevolence is like ours, wishing for the extermination of sin and pain. The difference is in degree, not in kind. 3. The more benevolence we have, the more do we try to extinguish evil; but we are limited for want of power. 4. God's benevolence cannot lead him to an opposite line of conduct; and stroyed. Now I ask, where will be the use of evil any longer? On what plea can it be endlessly continued, as you aver it shall be? If God can put it down, why should it not be done? he is not bounded by lack of power, nor hindered by circumstances. The answer then is clear, undoubted and unhesitating. God does wish and will to extinguish all evil of every kind. I ask, with the authority of truth, "Who shall dare to stay his hand, or say, What doest thou? And who ought to contradict his decree?"

B. Well, if that is not demonstration, I don't know what is. If I were umpire and judge I would say: Take your case; you have proved your cause.

W. I have told you why evil was permitted; and I think, I have shown that our heavenly Father always acts infinitely wisely, and well, and kindly. "Let everything that hath breath praise the Lord."

A. My mind is quite satisfied—you have displayed to us the eternal, great, grand scheme of the Sacred Three; and, truly, a magnificent one it is; and worthy of himself. I thought you wrong, but I now see you have a good cause in hand, and I wish you all prosperity in it.

W. God is giving his blessing to this new reformation; and I have good reason to know that he is preparing the hearts of thousands, who are ready to rise up as a great army, when what they deem the proper time shall come. I want them to be more bold and decided for the truth; but it is hard for them to go against wind and tide.

THE CONFERENCE OF BELIEVERS IN THE PRE-MILLENNIAL ADVENT OF JESUS CHRIST.

THE above-named Conference was held in New York City, Oct. 30, 31, and Nov. 1. It was a great gathering, and much valuable truth was brought before immense audiences, and has since been published in The New York Tribune Extra, filling twenty pages large quarto, four columns to a page, very small type, making a vast amount of reading, at fifteen cents, postpaid, to be obtained by addressing New York Tribune, New York City.

It is impossible for me to give any special account of the matter presented at this Conference, as my strength would allow me to attend but one of the addresses, nor as yet to read them all. I shall probably say more hereafter. I give below the opening address by Dr. Tyng, Sr., read by his son. It is most excellent.—ED.

DEAR BRETHREN: In the name of our common Lord, I salute you this day. We here meet in the name of this exalted Redeemer—as believers in his divinity, his incarnation, his atoning death, his resurrection from the dead, his abiding intercession for those for whom he died, his future triumphant return to earth, as the final judge of man, the glorified Ruler, the everlasting portion of those whom he hath redeemed with his own death, clothed with his own righteousness, and justified before the throne of his Father and their Father—of his God and their God—in the perfectness of his work of merit, and by the glorious fulness of his acknowledged triumph and power. Our personal bond of union is our participation in this excellence and these attainments of man's Redeemer.

Accepting him, in all his offices in this relation, we partake together by his gift in all the blessings which he hath obtained, by his willing humiliation and his triumphant sacrifice for men. He has taught us that our security, our happiness, our faithfulness, depend wholly upon our personal union with him. We are saved, not merely by believing facts about him, or truths which he has taught, but by our living participation in him and with him through the power of his spirit. He is the vine. We are the branches. The living connexion which we must have with him. He has thus illustrated, as the branch cannot bear fruit if severed from the vine, so, also, must we be dead and helpless if separated from Jesus. Our whole spiritual heavenly life depends upon this vital connexion with him and our participation in the blessings which he has obtained and which he alone can impart. Thus he presents his historic future to his disciples, "In My father's house are many mansions; I go to prepare a place for you, and I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am, there ye may be also." This future, glorious coming of Christ is the very life of the hopes, the inheritance of his people. To the soul that really loves him, where he is in heaven, and prisons, not palaces, prove, if Jesus would dwell with us there.

Our relation is to be wholly this personal one with him. And our hope is always in the assured enjoyment of this. He is "the way, the truth and the life." How much the Saviour dwelt upon this personal relation in his last interview with his disciples, and how little some portions of modern christianity seem to realize it! It was laid at the foundation of all his last instructions and encouragements to his disciples. They are his disciples who, by the teaching and power of his spirit dwell—ing within them, live and walk and act in him, by his power, for his glory. True religion, under this dispensation, is this living—by the indwelling power of the Holy Ghost—in unbroken personal union with this glorious Saviour. Of this he says, “I will not leave you comfortless. I will come to you.” “He that loveth me shall be loved by my Father; and I will love him and will manifest myself to him.” This living of our souls in Christ by the power of the Holy Spirit, and this living of Christ in us by the same power is the reality of true religion, and of this it is that our Lord says, “I will not leave you comfortless; I will come unto you.” “Because I live ye shall live also.” “At that day ye shall know that I am in my Father and ye in me and I in you.” This divine scheme of spiritual and heavenly relationship has been the history of the True Church of Christ, through all the succeeding ages of the Christian era. Union with Christ, living in Christ, following Christ, looking forward to the promised coming of Christ, and to an everlasting dwelling with Christ, have made up the character, the joy and the hope of true believers in every age, and these constitute their significant description with equal certainty in our day. The lovers of a Saviour are looking for his appearing, longing with increasing desire to see him as he is, to be with him where he is; and thus he offers for them all the earnest supplication: “For all who shall believe on him, through his word; that they may (all) be one; that they may be with him where he is”; that they may behold his glory which he had before the foundation of the world. Thus in the day of his ascending triumph they beheld his glory as a cloud received him out of their sight. And while in wonder they looked steadfastly toward Heaven as he ascended, angelic messengers addressed them: “This same Jesus, who is taken up from you into heaven shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven. In the belief of this coming the Church of Jesus has been one in every age. In the thankful anticipation of this new manifestation of their glorious Saviour, his Church on earth have always been in union, believing in his future advent, looking for his appearing, striving to seek the things which are above, that when Christ who is our life shall appear, we may also appear with him in glory. In this sure confidence in the reality of this personal advent of the Saviour to the earth on which he died, in the certainty of the confidence that the time of his glorious advent draweth near, we stand and wait.

Many of its preliminary facts have been accomplished; much that was necessarily antecedent in the history and condition of man has already passed, and every passing year brings the great fact in this history of earth still nearer, and diminishes the number of earthly events which are to precede its manifestation. Knowledge and interest in connection with this great event on earth have vastly increased, and increasing multitudes are looking for the Lord's appearing with enlarged understanding, with new convictions, with constantly brightening hopes. For some of us, necessarily, the interval of hope must be short.

Our earthly period of education has come near to this conclusion, and but little more can elapse before we shall see the Lord in his glory. As a fact in our personal history, it has become almost in sight. But some of us also believe that as a fact in the history of man, involving consequences of immense, outspread extent, and of vast relative influence in the welfare of the earth and in the external consequences which are to follow in divided experience, this great manifestation standeth at the door, and while many sleep the Son of Man will come.

In this solemn conviction we have assembled here, bringing together our several impressions, convictions and studies, that we may individually contribute to the general fund of knowledge, of observation and conviction, in reference to this great event in the history of the earth—the coming of man's Redeemer to assume the government which he hath purchased with his death, to restore the earth to his own dominion, and to gather into one redeemed fold the flock which have strayed upon all mountains, and have been scattered wandering through all the mazes of human ignorance, waywardness and moral and intellectual degradation. And I close with the expression of an earnest hope that infinite grace, almighty power and everlasting love may bless the earth on which we dwell, the land which we inhabit, the nation of which we are part, and the whole race for which the Son of God was content to die. The Spirit of God has been ready to teach and the Faithfulness of God has covenanted a future restoration and opened the Hope of Everlasting Glory.

THE WESLEYANS AND ETERNAL TORMENT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "TELEGRAM":

SIR: This burning question—literally such—continues to give our Methodist brethren some trouble, and is likely soon to give them more. The Rev. William Impey has recently resigned his office as General Superintendent of the Wesleyan Mission in Southern Africa. Some time ago, Mr. Impey, with a noble courage of his convictions, wrote to the Mission Secretaries in London, expressing his inability any longer to enforce on his brethren, or the Kaffir converts of the Mission, the "plain, grammatical sense" of the words in the Wesleyan Catechism, that "hell is a dark and bottomless pit, full of fire and brimstone, in which the wicked will be punished for ever and ever, by having their bodies tormented by the fire and their souls by a sense of the wrath of God." Thereupon he was peremptorily ordered to come to London "to confer with them," the result being that he was compelled not only to resign his mission work, but all connection with the Wesleyan ministry, after forty years' earnest and successful service, no recognition of those services being offered in any form by the Conference. Truly the tender mercies of the orthodox are cruel. But worse remains behind. The chosen apologist of Methodist doctrine, the Rev. G. W. Olver, the Fernley lecturer on "Life and Death," at Bradford, has been weighed in the balances of the Conference, and found wanting in the brimstone element. The lecture was not considered satisfactory, the usual vote of thanks was omitted, and the lecture was published by the lecturer without any official imprimatur. Under these circumstances Mr. Olver declined to accept the honorarium provided for by the Foundation. We may on a future occasion refer more fully to the lecture itself.

W. MAUDE.

DR. CHALMERS ON CREEDS AND CONFESSIONS.

The following communication recently appeared in the Montreal Witness:

From a new edition of Dr. Hanna's "Life of Chalmers" we cull the following paragraph, which is well worthy the serious consideration of our ecclesiastical friends:

"Busied with his pamphlet on the Evangelical Alliance, in which he (Dr. Chalmers) was dealing with the proper place and use for confessions of faith, 'I look,' said he, to one of his daughters, 'on catechisms and confessions as mere landmarks against heresy. If there had been no heresy, they wouldn't have been wanted. It's putting them out of place to look upon them as magazines of truth. There's some of your stern orthodox folk just over ready to stretch the Bible to square with their catechism; all very well, all very needful as a landmark, but (kindling up) what I say is, do not let that wretched, mutilated thing be thrown between me and the Bible.' 'Bacon,' said his daughter, 'compares the Bible to the well-spring,' and says, 'he were a huge fool that would not drink but from a tank.' 'Ha! ha! where does Bacon say that? It's nasty in the tank, too, whiles.'"—The London Christian World.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MONTREAL "WITNESS":

SIR: The publications referred to in the above paragraph from the Christian World, and so little esteemed by the leading minister of the Free Church, it is much to be lamented, have been translated, and are being printed in the Chinese language for the use of the Presbyterian missionaries in that country. Is the Bible alone not sufficient in the hands of intelligent Christians for the enlightenment, conversion and salvation of the heathen? We learn from the Word of God that "The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul." Must the poor ignorant heathen be taught, nevertheless, to drink out of the sectarian "tank," while they have free access to the life-giving spring? Is not this dishonoring to God, and calculated to maintain disunion in foreign lands, where none should exist, as well as to impede the progress of "the truth as it is in Jesus?" These "wretched and mutilated things," as Dr. Chalmers terms all human creeds, should not once be named, especially by Protestant missionaries to the heathen.

A SUBSCRIBER.

FOUNDATION PRINCIPLES OF CHRISTIANITY.

"FAITH, HOPE AND CHARITY."

WE have these in 1 Cor. xiii. 13; Col. i. 4, 5, and 1 Thess. i. 2, 3—stated didactically to the Corinthians, and acknowledged as practically exemplified in the Colossians and the Thessalonians. I am not aware of their occurrence together elsewhere in the word. But taken together they are the three characteristic and distinguishing principles of Christianity, and as such they may well claim consideration.

Very fully and blessedly the higher truths of the word are set out before believers in these latter days—death, resurrection, union with Christ and standing in him in the heavenlies; the truth concerning the body and bride of Christ, the indwelling and presence and rule of the Holy Spirit, and concerning the assembly of God. But while we cannot very well be too much occupied with these truths—with all truth in its place—these three foundation truths which we have proposed to notice here, which are of so very personal, practical and experimental a nature, do much need our individual consideration.

Throughout 1 Cor. xiii. there is an obvious contrasting of love with gifts; maintaining the excellence of the former. There is deep admonition in this—even in the very place in which it occurs, the chapter of love (xiii.) occurring between that wonderful chapter of the body of Christ and gifts therein (xii.) and the chapter of the exercise of gift in the assembly (xiv.) All gift, we thus see, to be properly exercised, and in right spirit, must first have its baptism in love—must pass through love. In other words, love must pervade and characterize the entire exercise of gift; exercise of gift, so to speak, coming up out of love as its animating principle. This contrast, but now including faith and hope, as a sisterhood of three, has its climax in the closing verse of the chapter, “Now abide.” The gifts being more temporary and less necessarily possessed—less of the nature of a Christian—these three graces are vital and essential, as constituting the very nature of the Christian. Now, therefore, these abide—Now here their sphere and arena—these are to be exercised, not set aside nor their use postponed.

Now a few words as to each of the three distinctively.

What of FAITH? This assuredly is essential. Disallowance, rejection first of the word, and then of Him who was the word, was the culmination of Jewish guilt. God simply claims credence for all he says. And if faith is, properly speaking, simply an assent or credence on account of the veracity of him who speaks, then there is not any merit of itself in my believing God. Nothing else than assent or credence ought for a moment to be; and if my soul assents to the testimony of God's word both as to what I am and as to what God and his Christ have done for me, then I am saved on the principle of faith.—Heb. xi. There is thus the mixing of faith with the hearing of the word, and there is rendered the due and resulting obedience of faith. It cannot be otherwise. So Abraham believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness.—Romans iv.

God's complaint of old was, “How long will it be ere ye believe me?” for he was not believed either as to his promises or threatenings. This was man; and it reflects a sadly exact historical character upon Israel's failure to have it said, as in Deut. xxxii. 20, “They are children in whom is no faith;” being the first occurrence, we believe, of that word in the Old Testament. Here was want of the first principle of that which should characterize God's people. For God's people should be simply and necessarily believers.—Heb. iii. And it is only they who live on the principle of faith who really live.—Heb. ii. 4. We see from the word what is lost through unbelief; what, owing to their little faith, the disciples lost; the very sin and failure of believers being unbelief. This is, indeed, the root of failure.

See that picture gallery of illustrations and exemplifications of faith in Heb. xi. What scope faith has! faith in God; faith in Christ; faith for justification, deliverance, obedience, walk service, as, indeed, apprehending what the Father, and the Spirit and the Son are to me and for me, as opposed to the world and the flesh and evil against me.

HOPE. This is inclusive of much, and has wondrous scope. It is living hope exercised upon certainties which have been revealed. The Lord's coming is the fulness of it. He himself is our hope. As to his coming, what is really the heart's expectation is himself—the person of Christ. Revelation and intelligence are needed to know all that will be brought to us, or we brought into at that event, but He himself comprises it all and is superior to it all, so that it is he who expresses it all, and he suffices to the heart.

LOVE. Who can tell it out? God is love. And it is because he is love, and we are made the children of God, that love is the manifestation and development of the new nature which is of God. The expression of that nature and conformity with it is “the acting and feeling,” as another has said, “according to his likeness.” In 1 Cor. xiii. how love is dilated upon! It results from birth and relationship as God's children. It is the exercise of the affections of the heart upon an object which is supreme. With the believer it is God himself, because he has revealed his love. We love him because he first loved us; and we love the children of God because they are his. This is its principle and its order in sequence. That it is to God and to be exercised towards his people down here.—See 1 John iii. 5. His saints are thus the objects given us to love next to himself. Without love the family characteristic—that which expresses the nature of the children of God—is wanting.

A fully stated conversion is, being turned from idols to serve the living and true God, and to wait for his Son from heaven, with the knowledge of sins forgiven, having these three elements—and in its nature really including these three principles—faith, hope and love; and while these three principles constitute the Christian character, the measure of their exercise results in the more or less developed Christian character of truest type. Faith sees him; love communes with him, and realizes what he is, and loves those who are his; and hope looks for him. Faith in him, love to all his saints, and the hope of his coming are, therefore, very real exercises of the soul; and comprehensive enough, perhaps, but very briefly, we may have shown what we are to understand by the faith and hope and love of these three quoted scriptures. They admonish us of liability to failure. Not that Christianity is a failure, but Christians, tested by these ever-abiding first principles, are liable to be found failures.

Be it remembered these graces have their places and are to be exercised now and down here. They have a present, positive and active character, and as distinguished from gift, they are expected of all who are in Christ, whether male or female, without difference or distinction; and it is very blessed to know that these graces, which are so precious and so paramount, and which stand so truly in our individual responsibility as Christians, may be and are so fully exemplified by the sisterhood in Christ. Here is room for them for all the exercises of faith and hope and love.

The practical question for our consciences and hearts is, "Are these graces laid upon the shelf, so to say, unexercised and unused, or are they in use and actively now abiding in each of us, not doctrines stored away, but exercises of the heart in daily practice?" We are otherwise not acting in true and proper Christian character. These three must needs abide, and the greatest of these is love, because that which expresses God's nature, that which most goes out towards others, that which most endures, that which continues and will have its fullest exercise in the glory.

There is, indeed, a character of continuance for the other two, no doubt. Confidence and trust may be exercised in the glory and hope, which, though satisfied when the Lord comes, may stretch onward throughout the glory. But love must have its largest scope in the glory.

But, nevertheless, more exactly speaking here, faith is in the Lord as the now absent One; hope is in him as the coming One; and love is to all his saints as those who are his and are to be gathered with him. Thus these are a present test of the present condition of one's soul. Conscience may be exercised about them, as truly to be considered the foundation principles—the sine qua non of Christianity.—Selected.

THE CHRISTIAN LIFE.

THE Christian's life in this world is a life of anticipation—of looking forward into the future. His present enjoyment is derived to a great degree from his thoughts of what awaits him in the future, "for the grace that is to be brought unto him at the revelation of Jesus Christ."—1 Peter i. 13.

He travels a rough and thorny way here—a pilgrim and a stranger—having many difficulties to surmount and trials to endure, together with the scoffs and persecutions of the world. And if he had no hope of a better condition in the future he would be "of all men the most miserable." But the consideration of the glories that are reserved for him changes the whole aspect of his pilgrimage, causing him to rejoice in tribulation and glory in the cross of Christ, knowing that everything worketh together for his good, and that his afflictions here—while he keeps looking into the eternal future—will work for him "a far more, exceeding and eternal weight of glory."

Nothing will be more sure in causing a person to backslide from God and become entangled in a yoke of bondage than to keep his eyes and mind continually on the present with its trials, perplexities, poverty, persecutions, crosses and temptations. He will soon lose his zeal and earnestness in battling for the right, and, becoming careless and indifferent he will be overcome by the enemy and borne along by the tide of sin to death.

On the other hand, there is no surer way for a Christian, if he would be an overcomer, than to keep his mind and heart on the glories promised—and if he keeps his mind upon them his heart or affections without doubt will be upon them too.

It is impossible to backslide while we by living faith keep our mind on what God has promised to give unto the faithful. This is what inspired the apostle Paul to endure all the hardness which he encountered. "Forgetting those things which are behind," he says, "and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize." Again we read: "Unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation"; and this "hope we have as an anchor to the soul both sure and steadfast." It holds and keeps us amid all the storms that may beat against us while upon the sea of probation.

The perils thicken. The day of the Lord is nighing. Our redemption is almost here. The prize will soon be obtained. "Look not behind . . . remember Lot's wife." Keep looking toward the promised land.—Selected

HOPE.

"Behold, he cometh with clouds; and every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him; and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him. Even so. Amen."—Rev. i. 7.

DOUBTLESS one of the divine secrets of the marvelous power of the Bible over the human soul is to be found in the fact that it is so emphatically the Book of Hope. It is a great characteristic, indeed, of both the old and New Testament, that they look so much more to the future than any other book. They consist very largely of Prophecy, and the field of Prophecy is the field of Hope—THE FUTURE. The face of Hope is ever looking forward—onward; she cannot look back without ceasing to be herself; her eye is ever searching for and into that which is still unseen—her finger is ever directed toward the point where, anon, the yet unkindled splendor of the dawn shall be seen flaming in the forehead of the morning.

"Primeval Hope, the Aonian Muses say,
When Man and Nature mourned their first decay;
When every form of death, and every woe,
Shot from malignant stars to earth below;
When Murder bared her arm, and rampant War
Yoked the red dragons of her iron car.
When Peace and Mercy, banished from the plain,
Sprang on the viewless winds to heaven again:
All, all forsook the friendless, guilty mind,
But Hope, the Charmer, linger'd yet behind."

So sings the poet, and so says the heart. And it is just because the great subject of the Apocalypse is "that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ"; which is, or should be to the Christian, in comparison with all other hopes, as the sun.—Selected.

PARALLELS BETWEEN THE NATURAL AND THE SPIRITUAL CREATIONS.

BY G. B. STACY.

THAT the New Testament Scriptures teach us plainly that we stand related to two creations will not for a moment be called in question. The one natural the other spiritual. And while the Apostle tells us in his great argument on the resurrection, "That was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural; and afterward that which is spiritual." Nevertheless, the natural constitutes simply the preliminary details of the spiritual, the one being only the complement of the other. Hence we read, "In the beginning was the word, and the word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by Him, and without Him was not anything made that was made. In Him was LIFE, and the life was the light of men." The Lord himself declares, "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord, which is and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty." And the great Apostle to the Gentiles declares that "He is the image of the invisible God, the first-born of every creature; for by Him were all things created that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones or dominions, or principalities or powers; all things were created by Him and for Him, and He is before all things, and by or in Him all things consist. And He is the head of the body, the church, who is the beginning, the first-born from the dead; that in all things he might have the pre-eminence. For it pleased the Father that in Him should all fulness dwell."

It was the mission of Paul to disclose to the church the manifold wisdom of God, "and to make all men see what is the fellowship of the mystery, which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God, who created all things by Jesus the Christ, to the intent that now unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places might be known by the church the manifold wisdom of God, according to the eternal purpose which He purposed in the Christ Jesus our Lord." And so He hath been "working all things after the counsel of His own will."

When, therefore, "the Word" spake it was done, and when "He commanded it stood forth," and so creation (the natural) was accomplished by the Word, the Life, the Lord, and IN HIMSELF, for "all things consist in Him," that is, exist in Him or are com-prehended in Him as the acorn comprehends the oak or as Abraham comprehended, in his loins, Levi and all his posterity. Thus the natural creation was not only by Him but for Him and in Him, and so all fulness dwells in Him—the beginning and the ending—permitting the free action of the natural and the unrestrained development of its earthy and sensuous tendencies. The spiritual is designed to conserve, to educate, to train into symmetry and to quicken into spiritual life the natural. For it is the good pleasure of our Heavenly Father's will, and which "He has purposed in Himself, that in the dispensation of the fulness of times He might gather together in one all things in the Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth; EVEN IN HIM."

Now, as the Apostle teaches us that as we have borne the image of the earthy we shall also bear the image of the heavenly, and as it is clear that the natural are only types and patterns of the heavenly, we are justified in looking for the two creations to run parallel with each other in every phase of their characteristics in which the one can possibly typify the other. We suggest, then, that the natural typifies the spiritual in the constitution of the evening and the morning with the natural day. And, further, in the occupation of six days in the consummation of that creation. It is not necessary that we should find each day's work on the physical constitution of our planetary system typifying some special phase of the new creation; perhaps they may, but that is not necessary to our present argument. We proceed to the creation of man out of the dust of the earth. We have already seen that the purpose of God was arranged and determined before the foundations of the earth were laid; and that the entire creation was wrought in the Christ, its Life, and by His power. That He constitutes the vital essence, the living force thereof that it consists in Him, and the configuration of Adam as the all-comprehending head of the race, including in the prepotency of his physical nature every individual of his posterity, was but the initial point of the spiritual creation.

But when Adam was made "The Lord God said, it is not good that the man should be alone; I will make him an helpmeet for him. And the Lord God caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam, and he slept; and He took out one of his ribs and closed up the flesh instead thereof, and the rib which the Lord God had taken from man made He a woman and brought her unto the man. And Adam said, this is now bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh; she shall be called woman because she was taken out of man."

We propose to show that this is the grand type of the Bible. The creation of the all-comprehending head and representative of the race. Hence he was created in the image and likeness of God, not perhaps as the individual, but as the generic head of the race. But he was found incomplete, and it was not good for him to be alone; in order, therefore, that his helpmeet should be so in reality, she must be "bone of his bone and flesh of his flesh." Hence he was put into a profound sleep which should last until one of his ribs should be taken out of his side and configured and made meet to be his lovely bride and proper helpmeet.

In the natural creation God formed Adam out of the dust of the earth. In the new creation he formed the "second Adam" out of the flesh of our nature, hence "the Word was made flesh," and thus identified with it in all its past evolutions. And as the life in which the race exists and consists stretches along back to Adam, embracing and comprehending every individual of the race, or placing Himself in precisely the same relations to the race that Adam himself occupied.

This, however, is only the embryotic stage of the new creation, for it became him for whom are all things in bringing many sons to glory "to make the Captain of their salvation perfect through suffering." Hence, in his fleshly person he must expiate the sins of the race as comprehended in the body prepared for him; thus he was wounded for our transgressions, "he was bruised for our iniquities, the chastisement of our peace was laid upon him, and by his stripes we are healed," for he "died for our sins and rose again for our justification."

It was thus identified with the race as its life, clothed with its flesh and comprehending every one of its individuals in his person, "when he had by himself purged away our sins, that he sat down at the right hand of the Majesty on high," having "abolished death and brought life and immortality to light," or "led captivity captive." He was now the brightness of the Father's glory and the express image of his person; but, like Adam, he needed a helpmeet; hence he must visit the nations to open and woo their hearts that he might separate or sanctify to himself, as a chaste virgin, those he would present to himself as his purchased Bride, "without spot or wrinkle or any such thing," holy and without blemish.

In order, therefore, to the separation and formation of his espoused, it became necessary that the body of his flesh, the race, should be caused to fall into a "deep sleep"—a spiritually unconscious state—that they might have no conception of the separation the Lord is making out of or from among themselves; and thus we find the parallel between the natural and spiritual creations. The world "knows you not, because it knew him not." The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned. And this spiritual unconsciousness must continue until the espoused Bride is complete; for, like Eve, she must be "the mother of all living," the source and channel of resurrection life for the redeemed and reconciled race. "The seed of the woman," "the seed of Abraham," are "the Christ"; "the Christ" is the perfected "Church of the first-born," made up of the head and all the members of his body, or the Adam and Eve of the new creation.

Thus we verify James' version of the purpose of God to first visit the nations "to take out from among them" all found worthy to bear the name of their Redeemer and would-be Husband as his unblemished Bride: that after the nuptials are consummated all the prophetic assurances of blessings to the posterity of Abraham and the nations may be wrought out and accomplished.

The prophetic blessings are not one until the marriage of the Lamb has taken place. For James says: "After this I will return and build again the tabernacle of David which is fallen down; and I will build again the ruins thereof, and I will set it up, that the residue of men might seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles upon whom my name is called, saith the Lord, who doeth all these things."

It seems meet and proper, if the new creation has its Adam and Eve, that the completion of this generic head of the creation should also be accomplished during the sixth day of this spiritual order of things; and as the apostle has taught us that as pertaining to God who is Spirit, a thousand natural years are but as one day, we may expect the Bride to be ready for presentation to her Husband during the six thousandth year of Adamic creation.

The question, then, becomes all-important, What is the present age of the Adamic creation? As it is manifest none of the promised blessings to Abraham or his posterity can be performed until after "the marriage of the Lamb has come and his wife hath made herself ready"; the new creation cannot proceed until the perfection of its generic head is complete.

But these questions I must leave for another paper, simply remarking here that all the argument hitherto used to deny the possibility of probation in the ages to come are hereby swept away as the most flimsy cobwebs are swept away by the storm.

THE SECOND ADVENT OF CHRIST.

IS IT LITERAL AND PERSONAL?

"Knowing this first, that there shall come in the last day scoffers, walking after their own lusts, and saying, Where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation."—2 Peter iii. 3-4.

THE object of the writings of St. Peter, as stated by himself, was to furnish a synopsis of the teachings of both prophets and apostles with respect to the great salvation, and to keep his readers specially admonished as to what they were to expect. And as the substance of evangelical doctrine is contained in his epistles in general, so the substance of evangelical prediction is contained in this chapter in particular. I cannot enter into all the details, but will select a few topics which may profitably engage our meditations.

I. The first I name, and that which forms the centre in a group of wonders and at once determines the period to which the whole subject relates, is the announcement that Christ is to return again to the earth. It is this doctrine that the whole passage is meant to assert, defend, elucidate, and enforce in its practical bearings. It is a doctrine, also, remarkably prominent in the sacred writings. As a subject of hopeful expectation to the pious, and of terror to the ungodly; it is the most formally, repeatedly, and constantly affirmed. To say nothing about the Old Testament (which is just as full of it as the New, but which does not always distinguish, very clearly between the first advent and the second), there is hardly a chapter in all the evangelical writings which does not in some way refer to it. The Saviour himself, during his lifetime, spoke largely of a period when the mourning tribes of the earth "shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory," and when "he shall send his angels, with a great sound of a trumpet, to gather his elect from the four winds." (See Matt. xxiv. 25; Luke xxi.) The mysterious heavenly personages who appeared when he made his triumphant ascension from the Mount of Olives said to those who witnessed it, "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven."—Acts i. 9, 11. Paul declares that "the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and the trump of God."—1 Thess. iv. 16. In the epistle to Hebrews we read that "Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation."—Hebrews ix. 28. Peter says of himself and his fellow-apostles, "We have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ."—2 Peter i. 16. John says, "Behold, He cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him. Even so. Amen."—Rev. i. 7. And in the very last words which close the canon of Scripture it is written, "I Jesus have sent mine angel to testify unto you these things in the churches. Surely I come quickly. Amen."—Rev. xxii. 16–20.

I know not of another doctrine of the gospel that is announced with more perspicuity or solemnity. Christ's birth of the Virgin Mary is not more explicitly and unequivocally asserted, or more certainly attested, than his return again to the earth as literally and truly as he went up out of it. Nor is there a creed in Christendom, so far as I know, which does not embrace it as an essential part of the Church's faith. "He shall come to judge the quick and the dead," says the creed which bears the name of The Apostles. "He shall come again with glory," says the Synod of Nice. "We believe that Thou shalt come to be our Judge" has been for ages sung in the Te Deum.

The great Confession of Augsburg affirms that "Christ shall openly come again to judge them that are found alive, and restore to life those that be dead, according to the Creed of the Apostles." "He ascended into heaven, and there sitteth, until he returns to judge all men at the last day," says the Church of England. "We do believe, out of the Word of God, that our Lord Jesus Christ shall come again from heaven, and that after a corporal and visible manner, as hitherto he hath ascended, being adorned with great glory and majesty, that he may appear as Judge of the quick and dead," says the Confession of Belgia. And with the same unequivocal fulness is this article incorporated in all our hymn-books and liturgies, celebrated in our sacred songs, woven into our very prayers, and uttered over the graves of our friends as we consign their bodies to the ground. Indeed, it is one of the great mountain peaks of Christianity—one of the three grand particulars in which its sublimest substance lies. The incarnation, the cross, and the second coming are the stems upon which everything distinctive in Christianity is suspended, to which its whole doctrinal system is 'adjusted, and upon which the hopes of the world depend. To strike out either one of these would be to mangle the Scriptures from end to end, to stifle the voice of prophets and apostles, to spoil the noblest of Christian utterances in the days of the Church's greatest purity, and to emasculate religion itself.

If Christianity, then, can teach us anything, or if the declarations of the Scriptures are at all binding upon us, as we profess to believe that they are, we must accept it as a truth, and rely upon it as an infallible verity, that the same Jesus who was born at Bethlehem, crucified on Calvary, and received up into heaven from Mount Olivet, is literally and personally to return again to this world, to be seen with our eyes and heard with our ears, as he was seen and heard in the day that he was taken up. If this be not true, there is no truth in language, no inspiration in the Bible, no substance in our faith, no reality in the Christian's hope. The methods of interpretation which can explain away this doctrine, or detach it from the teachings and joyous expectations of the prophets and apostles must, at the same rate, silence all that we have hitherto heeded as the oracles of God, and leave us in a world of darkness with our only lights suddenly and forever extinguished. I accordingly accept and declare it, as a doctrine that must stand or fall with Christianity itself, that Jesus is literally and personally, and with great power and glory, to return again to this world, once more to tread the localities already hallowed to his Church by his miracles and prayers and tears and blood.—J. A. SEISS.

Every truth, like true coin, has its counterfeit.

As a consciousness of peccability in moral conduct leads us to utter with sincerity the words, "who can tell how oft he offendeth? Oh! cleanse thou me from my secret faults"—the consciousness of peccability in judgment should make us equally ready to add, "who can tell how oft he mistaketh?"

THE MISSION OF A FACE.

SELECTED BY B. S. MILLS.

[Written on seeing the picture of a gentleman eighty years of age.]

There's a look in your face that reminds me
Of the faces I see in my dreams,
When I sit down beside the "Still Waters"
That gladden the heavenly streams.
There's a look that suggests to me vict'ry
Over all that is petty and base,
As of one who had fought and had conquered,
Yet carried of battle no trace.

Not a scar nor a stain of life's battle,
Not a hint of a rapture struck down,
No mark of a cross or its anguish—
But a glory befitting a crown.

O soul that arises triumphant,
With a smile like the angels, I ween,
Whisper low in my ear the glad secret
That maketh your sight so serene.

Are the gates of the city so near you
That the heavenly joy you behold
Of the angels who walk in their beauty
The streets that have pavings of gold?

Do the toils and the burdens of living,
Seen backward, all glorified shine,
And youth's cup, that was bitter as wormwood,
Thrill the pulses of mem'ry like wine?

Do cares and ambitions seem trivial,
And vain all the tears youth must shed?
Or comes there an insight of comfort
When eighty's snows lie on the head?

No answer! The calm face is shining
Like the souls up in heaven, I ween,
With a strength that is ever suggesting
A star that is high and serene.

No answer! And yet I am richer
For the glimpse of a spirit that wears
So lofty and noble a courage
After all of life's toils and snares!

BE CHEERFUL, CHRISTIAN.

An old Scottish divine, in commenting on Psalm c. 2, "Serve the Lord with gladness," says: "Your serving him doth not glorify him, unless it be with gladness. A Christian's looks glorify God. We glorify God by walking cheerfully. It is a glory to God when the world sees that a Christian hath that within him that can make him cheerful in the worst times. He can, with the nightingale, sing with the thorn at his breast. The people of God have ground of cheerfulness. They are justified, and instated into adoption; and this creates inward peace; it makes music within, whatever storms are without. If we consider what Christ hath wrought for us by his blood, and wrought in us by his Spirit, it is a ground of great cheerfulness, and this cheerfulness glorifies God. It reflects upon a master, when the servant is always drooping and sad: sure he is kept at hard commons; his master does not give him what is fitting. So when God's people hang their harps on willows, sure they do not serve a good master, and repent of their choice; this reflects dishonor upon God. As the gross sins of the wicked bring scandal upon the gospel, so do the uncheerful lives of the godly. Religion doth not take away our joy, but refines and clarifies it. It doth not break our viol, but it tunes and makes our music sweeter."—Selected.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS."

I SHALL now show that God's purpose, by a first-born from the dead to bless the later-born—as it is written, "So in Christ shall all be made alive"—is fulfilled in successive worlds or ages (aiones), or, to use the language of St. Paul, "according to the purpose of the ages" (kata prothesin ton aionon, Eph. iii. 11), so that the dead are raised, not all together, but "Every man in his own order—Christ the first-fruits—afterward they that are Christ's at his coming" (1 Cor. xv. 23); which latter resurrection, though after Christ's, is yet called "the resurrection from among the dead" (Phil. iii. 11), or "the first resurrection."—Rev. xx. 5.

Now, it is simply a matter of fact that Christ, the first of the first-fruits, through whom all blessing reaches us, rose from the dead eighteen hundred years ago, while the Church of the first-born, who are also called first-fruits (Jas. i. 18; Rev. xiv. 4), will not be gathered till the great Pentecost. Some are, therefore, freed from death before others; and even of the first-fruits, the Head of the body, as in every proper birth, is freed before the other members. So far it is clear that this purpose of God is wrought, not at once, but through successive ages. But this fact gives a hint of further mysteries, and some key to the "ages of ages" (aiones aionon), which we read of in the New Testament, during which the lost are yet held by or under death and judgment, while the saints share Christ's glory, as heirs of God, in subduing all things unto him.

The fall here gives us some shadow of the restoration. For just as in Adam, all do not come out of him or die at once, but descend from or through each other, and generation after generation, though all fell and died in him when he fell and died, as part of him, and therefore partakers of his sad inheritance, so in Christ, though all have been made alive in him by his resurrection, all are not personally brought into his life and light at once, but one after another, and the first-born be ore the later-born, according to God's good pleasure and eternal purpose.

The perfect key, here as elsewhere, is to be found in the details of that law, of which "no jot or tittle shall pass till all be fulfilled" (Matt. v. 18); the appointed "times and seasons" of which, one and all, are the types or figures of the "ages" of the New Testament; for there is nothing in the gospel the figure of which is not in the law, nor anything in the law the substance of which may not be found under the gospel; God's once oppressed and captive Israel being the vessel in and by which he would show out his purpose of grace and truth to other lost ones.

Observe, then, that not only the first-fruits are gathered, some at the feast of the Passover, and others not till Pentecost, while the "feast of tabernacles," or, as it is called, the "feast of ingathering," is not held until the seventh month, "in the end of the year, when thou hast gathered in thy labors out of the field" (Exod. xxiii. 16); but no less distinctly both cleansing and redemption are ordained to take effect at different times and seasons. I refer to those mystic periods of "seven days," "seven weeks," "seven months," "seven years," which last complete the Jubilee, which are all different times for cleansing and blessing men—the former of which are figures of "the ages," the last of "the ages of ages" in the New Testament; under which last blessed appointment all those who had lost their inheritance and could not go free, as some did at the Sabbatic year of rest, might at length, after the "times of times," that is, the "seven times seven years," regain what had been lost and find full deliverance. For in the Sabbatic year the release was for Israel only, not for foreigners; while in the Jubilee liberty was to be proclaimed to all the inhabitants of the land.—Lev. xxv. 10.

What is there in the ordinary gospel of this day which in the least explains or fulfils these various periods, in and through which were wrought successive cleansings and redemptions, not of persons only, but of their lost inheritance? And if in the gospel, as now preached, no truth is found corresponding with these figures of the law, is it not proof that something is at least overlooked? God knows how much is overlooked from neglect of these Scriptures, which St. Paul tells us are needed "to make the man of God perfect" (2 Tim. iii. 16, 17), but which by some are openly despised and by others are neglected as the useless shadows of a bygone dispensation. In them is the key, under a veil perhaps, of those "ages" and "ages of ages," during which so many are debtors and bondsmen under judgment, without their inheritance. And though indeed it is true that "it is not for us to know the times and the seasons which the Father hath put in his own power" (Acts i. 7), it is yet given us to know that there are such times and seasons, and, in knowing it, to gain still wider views of "the manifold wisdom of God" and of "the unsearchable riches of Christ," our Lord and Saviour.—Selected.

"HE REDEEMED ME!"

THE tears of a slave-girl, just going to be put up for sale, drew the notice of a gentleman as he passed through the auction-mart of a Southern slave State. The other slaves of the same group, standing in a line for sale like herself, did not seem to care about it, while each knock of the hammer made her shake. The kind man stopped to ask why she alone wept, and was told that the others were used to such things, and might be glad of a change from the hard, harsh homes they came from; but that she had been brought up with much care by a good owner, and she was terrified to think who might buy her.

"Her price?" the stranger asked. He thought a little when he heard the great ransom, but paid it down.

Yet no joy came to the poor slave's face when he told her she was free.

She had been born a slave, and knew not what freedom meant. Her tears fell fast on the parchment which her deliverer brought to prove it to her. She only looked at him with fear.

At last he got ready to go his way; and as he told her what she must do when he was gone, it began to dawn on her what freedom was. With the first breath she said, "I will follow him—I will follow him; I will serve him all my days"; and to every reason against it she only cried, "He redeemed me! He redeemed me! He redeemed me!"

When strangers used to visit that master's house, and noticed, as all did, the loving, constant service, night by night and day by day, she had but one answer, and she loved to give it—"He redeemed me! He redeemed me! He redeemed me!"

"And so," said the servant of Christ, who spent a night on his journey in a highland glen and told this story in a meeting where every heart was thrilled, "let it be so with you. Serve Jesus as sinners bought back with blood; and when men take notice of the way you serve him—the joy that is in your looks—the love that is in your tone—the freedom of your service—have one answer to give—“HE REDEEMED ME!”

THE BIBLE EXAMINER.

BY ELD. S. W. BISHOP.

PEOPLE often talk about trusting the Lord, when the kind of trust they mean is entirely unscriptural. I do not believe it would amount to anything for any one to sit down and “trust God” to teach him to read when ample facilities were within his reach to accomplish this purpose, and he persistently refuses to avail himself of the helps proffered him. I do not believe that the strength, vitality, and the replenishing of the waste of the system that can only be obtained by eating wholesome food, will ever be given us while we refuse to take that food, or knowingly persist in taking unwholesome food into the stomach, no matter how much we may suppose that we trust in God. I no more believe that our trust in God for the means to issue the BIBLE EXAMINER will pass current in heaven while we either neglect or refuse to do what we can to assist in the work.

There is another point. It is remarked sometimes that “if the Lord wants the EXAMINER published he will furnish the means.” I do not question His ability to do so in the least. The silver and the gold are his, and the cattle on a thousand hills are his. Yes, his resources are infinite. There is, however, a principle involved in the above statement that needs looking into. If the EXAMINER was to stop for the want of means, would the fact that it was a necessity to stop it for that reason prove that the Lord wanted it to stop? If a special providence is manifested in stopping a periodical, there must be special reasons for such intervention. If the Lord stops a paper he must have good reason for so doing; and I know of but one reason that would cause Divine interference, and that one reason must be that the teachings of such periodical are perniciously erroneous. The infinite Father is not governed by fancies. If I were to believe in a providential discontinuance of the EXAMINER, I should base my belief on the contingency named above; for I could not believe it possible for the Lord to interfere in stopping it for any other reason. I am, however, fully aware of the truth taught in all the Scriptures, that in all His dealings with the children of men He treats them as being entirely free in the exercise of their will, and treats them thus because they are free, absolutely free, in the exercise of their volition.

Now for the application of these principles. There is not a single patron of the BIBLE EXAMINER who believes that God will move on any one to withhold funds from the support of that magazine because its teachings are pernicious. We all most fully believe that it advocates great principles of truth that are not either believed or published by any of the leading publications in America. If, therefore, God interferes at all, we must believe it will be in favor of the Magazine, for he will not oppose his own truth. So much for the first principle.

That there is no necessity for the EXAMINER to be discontinued I am fully aware is an established fact. If those who read the EXAMINER would practice one-half the economy that some are compelled to practice, means would be abundant. If some would lessen their certificates of deposit a mere trifle comparatively, there would be no lack. If, however, we are disposed to gratify our pride, our appetites, our covetousness or ourselves in anything that is needless and let the EXAMINER go down for lack of funds, I do not believe that God will work a miracle to furnish us with religious reading that is needful for our comfort, instruction and edification. It is possible that the Magazine in which we are so much interested may be suspended, much as some of us would be pained to have it so; but its suspension cannot be attributed to a lack of earnest, untiring zeal and effort, self-abnegation and sacrifice, on the part of its venerable Editor. It will not be suspended because there is not abundant means in the hands or within the reach of its readers. It will not stop because God wants it to stop; and we had better not lay it to the Lord if we let it stop. It will stop unless somebody furnishes the means to keep it going. Will we send in the means and relieve our editor from a portion of the cares and anxieties that burden him in his accumulated years? or will we let him bear all the burden and we only share in the blessing that is borne to us monthly in the columns of the BIBLE EXAMINER? And shall we share the fulness of the life of the eternal ages if we refuse to obey Christ here?

“Bear ye one another’s burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ.” Refuse to bear them, and break the law of Christ.

FAITH.

BY CYRUS MENDENHALL.

"Now faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen."—Heb. xi. 1.

OUR religion is built up and sustained by faith. This it is that prompts us to crucify the flesh, to abstain from worldly conformity, and to abound in good works. By faith we are justified and hope to participate in the joys and blessings of the Abrahamic covenant, because we believe that if we are Christ's then are we "Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise."

Christ is the grand central point upon which our all depends, and faith in him makes us claimants of the "exceeding great and precious promises" which are recorded in the Scriptures.

Are we strong in faith? Do we permit doubts to arise? If we are in "Doubting Castle" does it not imply that we disbelieve the Bible, and are afraid God will fail to fulfil his word? We need to lean hard upon him, trusting like little children and fearing nothing.

Unbelief is a species of sin gotten up by the adversary to lead us from rectitude; it opens a place in the heart for the entrance of evil, and no man can be an earnest working Christian if he doubts his own acceptance.

God wants implicit faith—the whole heart—entire consecration. Our blessed Master has said, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind, and thy neighbor as thyself." We find no half-way work. There is no middle ground. It is all Christ's, or all the world's.

"We walk by faith, not by sight." Though we have never seen Jesus we believe and confess that he died and rose again. "Whom having not seen, ye love; in whom, though now ye see him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory."—1 Pet. i. 8.

All you need is faith that the following words are true and are to be taken in a literal sense: "If we confess our sins he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." It is simply taking God at his word; or, as another has so clearly and forcibly written: "It is not a terrible effort to climb up, but a cutting loose from every human prop and dependence—sinking down at Jesus' feet—falling into his arms—venturing—confiding—claiming the promise—taking right hold of it as a thing that must be fulfilled, yea, that is just now being fulfilled."

This sort of faith saves men from sin, making them "living epistles read and known of all men." These promises are to be taken as realities without further questionings. If God in his infinite wisdom does not deem it fit to grant you some marvelous token of your conversion, striking you prostrate like Saul of Tarsus, are you to doubt and fear? All the disciples did not have Paul's experience, yet they believed in Jesus. Neither did they all need to feel the nail-prints in our Saviour's hand in order to have faith. So we are not to take another man's experience as a criterion, but with Job to exclaim, "Though he slay me yet will I trust in him."

The Spirit of God in its workings is not confined to certain rules; but operates differently under different circumstances, and upon different temperaments. And so Brother A. can testify the very day and hour of his conversion, having passed through much mental and physical suffering, and feeling sudden and joyous relief; while with Brother B. the process was more gradual and the work, though just as real, had not so definite an outline. He may require a strong faith because there may seem to be less evidence. The words of Jesus to Thomas are applicable: "Blessed are they who have not seen, and yet have believed." Let no one then refuse the gift of God because it does not come as they thought it would, or as Bro. A. or B. received it. Our hopes do not depend upon forms, ceremonies, or emotions, but upon faith in God's word and power. "For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God."—Bible Banner.

COMPROMISERS.

To embrace certain doctrines of the Gospel because they are popular, and to reject others taught with equal clearness because they are unpopular, is in reality to reject the Gospel altogether. You may as well invent your own religion. Many go away from Christ because of the reproach that comes upon them from following in his footsteps. All that will live godly in Christ Jesus must suffer persecution. There is no escaping it, but by denying Christ. Yet how very few are willing to bear it! Most persons yield a little here and a little there, to soften the asperity of the opposition against them, forgetting that just in proportion as, by these means, they get away from the cross, they get away from Christ. They love Jesus, but not enough to sacrifice social position for his sake. They seek to save their lives, and so, of course, they lose them. These are the days foretold by the prophet, when "men shall be lovers of their own selves, heady, high-minded," "having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof." Has not this time already come? Are there not many who will not endure the truth as it is in Jesus? Is there not trouble at once if their idols are touched? How often do ministers confess that they do not preach as close as they would, for the "people will not stand it?"—Selected.

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.

MRS. R. E. LADD, Springfield, Mass., writes: "Could my beloved companion know of the depressing changes in the past three years, witness the havoc of property, causing his own name unable to redeem pledges—methinks his sterling integrity would shudder. Thanksgiving arises to God that "in death there is no remembrance," and that he is spared the pain and suffering of these times of perplexity.

As much as he desired to live and see the development of God's plan in the earth—infinite wisdom permitted his release under more favorable circumstances.

Had not discipline begun and carried forward its work in my heart ere his removal, I certainly should have fallen into the lap of despair. But, not so! The work of trial and testing has gone on and on; but in, and through them, fresh courage and strength has been given for endurance.

The unfolding of Jehovah's plan of love has won me to himself without a rival. How easy and delightful to love and serve such a Being with all the heart.

How nature shrinks away and hides; yes, a new one is given that can in some degree appreciate and comprehend a little of the vastness, beauty and loveliness of such a Redeemer and Saviour.

To this end, all my interests are blended in the realm of LOVE. Supreme Love to God swallows up everything!—brings everything into abeyance, rightly considered. Who have I in heaven but Thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire beside Thee." The sweet, hallowed, permeating, all-absorbing influence of the Spirit wraps up and binds together all the graces in the coveted gift of charity, or love—cemented in one, as Christ prayed "that they all might be one, as He and the Father were one." What an array of strength to fortify, uphold, even weak, feeble, finite creatures in the midst of a "wicked and perverse generation, among whom we are to shine as lights in the world." Nothing to fear! He has all our leadings—our hands in his we walk safely, securely and peacefully through all the assaults of the enemy. "Nothing shall by any means hurt you." To the praise of God, I am proving daily the richness and blessedness of this great salvation, through the righteousness of Christ.

I read your Monthly with interest and profit. I sincerely hope and trust your heart and hands will be upheld, and you be permitted to live and deal out saving mercy to the church and a gospel attractive to the world, to win more to "the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world."

MRS. I. G. MALTBY, Conn., writes: "I love to read your magazine and cannot well do without it. It gives me light on the prophecies which have been in times past dark and mysterious. I pray that the Lord will open the hearts of the people to help in this good work; for I feel that it is light and truth. May the Lord give you understanding to present it in all its beauty and simplicity before a dying world, who are fast passing away without the knowledge of the future. Well might the prophet exclaim: 'For since the beginning of the world men have not heard, nor perceived by the ear, neither hath the eyes seen, O God, beside thee, what he hath prepared for him that waiteth for him'; but the apostle says, 'God hath revealed them unto us by his spirit, for the spirit searcheth all things; yea, the deep things of God.' I am glad that God has enabled you to unfold his work to the understanding of the ignorant, like myself. Those who have the wisdom to publish these great truths I bid them 'God speed,' and say with the Psalmist, 'O send out thy light and thy truth; let them lead me, let them bring me to thy holy hills, and to thy tabernacle.' From a lover of the plan of God in 'the ages to come.'"

MRS. JOHN SHAFER, California, writes: "I receive light from the pages of the BIBLE EXAMINER and love its truths, as I believe them Bible truths. That our Father may long spare your usefulness is a prayer I often breathe. Yours in hope, looking for a precious, coming Saviour."

GEORGE H. WATERHOUSE, Lynn, Mass., writes: "I was never so glad to get the EXAMINER before as when the November number came to hand. I do thank the Lord that he has enabled you to continue to give the household of faith meat in due season. I am thankful that I was ever permitted to see the BIBLE EXAMINER. It has been a great help to me in the study of God's Word, in which I have been deeply interested from a child; and for thirty years past it has been a new book to me. It grows better and better as God's plan of salvation opens up to my mind. I often feel to exclaim, 'Oh, the love and goodness of God! Oh, how great! I think I know a great deal of it; and I do in my experience; but how little compared to what is to be known of that love in the coming ages. Some in this city think it is infidelity to believe that any of our race can have an opportunity to be saved beyond this life. If there is none, the Gospel is a failure. The doctrine that holy angels rebelled against God and were cast out of heaven to this earth as 'spirit devils,' and suffered to deceive and lead mankind to eternal torments; and God send his Son, not to condemn the world; and he give up his life to save the world, and yet not secure the end he came to accomplish, but only secure one in a hundred of the human race, is too much for my faith. I do not believe that such a God is Abraham's God; nor the 'God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ,' who has pledged himself by promise and oath that 'all the families of the earth shall be blessed in Abraham and his seed.' Amen.

A RESPONSIVE HEART.

[I RECEIVED the following from a thinking and candid person, who a few months since thought me in error on the "Ages to Come." It shows what effect truth will have on a candid mind when viewed aside from party and sectarian prejudices.—EDITOR.]

O, I see so much love and justice in the character of God that my heart expands greatly in contemplation of his wondrous plan—a plan such as an All-wise and good CREATOR alone could form and execute. All his dealings with man, from the moment he steps upon this mortal shore, flow from an inexhaustible fountain of love. Though the whole human race are drifting about in the great ocean of mortality, and none are able to save themselves, yet a JEHOVAH of love is full of compassion for them in their helplessness, and is "not WILLING that any should PERISH," and because he "so loved the world" he sends them the mighty LIFE-BOAT, that whosoever will get in "may not perish." But if the great mass of the human race sink beneath the surging billows of eternal death without any knowledge of the great LIFE-BOAT sent to their rescue, or without having it brought near enough to them to afford one chance of accepting or rejecting the benefits which it offers, would not God be willing that they should perish, and the divine declaration, above quoted, be untrue? If any perish—i. e., die in a penal sense—without being offered an opportunity of excepting of eternal life by rendering obedience to him who offers it, who can prove that God is "not willing" that all such should perish? O, why cannot men attribute to God even as much justice as they recognize in our Courts of equity? or as much love as one human being offers for another in distress.

Dear brother, let the electric fire of truth move on, for the Lord is mustering his hosts, who shall go forth to battle with error, conquering and to conquer. SENEX.

LOST AND SAVED.

MEN are lost. Only truth can save them. Those who continue ignorant continue unsaved; but those who reject truth are doubly lost. "This is the condemnation, that light has come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light."

MEN are lost. Only love can save them; for the central truth which brings salvation, and in obeying which the soul is purified, is the message of Divine love. "We have known and believed the love that God hath to us." "He that loveth not, knoweth not God; for God is love."

MEN are lost. Only Christ can save them; for it is in him that the truth and the love of God are manifested. "No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him." "Hereby perceive we the love of God" (St. John simply says "the love"—as though there were no love but this), "because he laid down his life for us."

THE BRIGHT SIDE.

GOD doth checker his providences white and black as the pillar of cloud had its light side and dark. Look on the light side of thy estate; who looks on the dark side of a landscape? Suppose thou art cast in a law-suit, there is the dark side; yet thou hast some land left, there is the light side. Thou hast sickness in thy body, there is the dark side; but grace in thy soul, there is the light side. Thou hast a child taken away, there is the dark side; thy husband lives, there is the light side.

God's providences in this life are various, represented by those speckled horses among the myrtle trees, which were red and white (Zech. i. 8); mercies and afflictions are interwoven; God doth speckle his work. O, saith one, I "want such a comfort"; but weigh all thy mercies in the balance, and that will make thee content. Look on the light side of your condition, and then all your discontent will easily be dispersed; do not pore upon your losses, but ponder upon your mercies. What! wouldst thou have no cross at all? Why should one man think to have all good things, when he himself is good but in part? Wouldst thou have no evil about thee, who hast so much evil in thee? Thou art not fully sanctified in this life, how then thinkest thou to be fully satisfied? Never look for perfection of contentment till there be perfection of grace.—Watson.

FORBEARANCE AND TOLERATION.

If the peculiarities of our feelings and faculties be the effect of variety and excitement through a diversity of organization, it should tend to produce in us mutual forbearance and toleration. We should perceive how nearly impossible it is that persons should think and feel exactly alike upon any subject. We should not arrogantly pride ourselves upon our virtues and knowledge, nor condemn the errors and weaknesses of others, since they may depend upon causes which we can neither produce nor readily counteract. No one can be aware of the kind or degree of temptation or terror, or the seeming incapacity to resist them, which may induce others to deviate.—Abernethy.

—With no other indication of the destinies of the human race than what is furnished by the emotions of pity that are now working, pent up in tender and noble hearts, we can hardly err in assuming that an age will yet come wherein that pity will find millions needing to be taught, rescued, and led to a higher and better destiny than had ever been their previous lot. That such may be the case is as easy to suppose as that immortality may be attainable, somehow, because God has implanted in every breast a thirst for an endless life. To plant such a thirst, without the possibility of its attainment, would be evidence of a want of wisdom and love in the Creator. So, to implant in our breasts a love and pity toward the ignorant and untaught millions of the human race, and yet never give this pity an opportunity to manifest itself, is equally an impeachment of our Creator's wisdom and love.

THE BIBLE STANDARD. Issued monthly by The Christian Association for the Dissemination of the Truth of Immortality through Christ alone. Edited by GEO. A. BROWN, Pastor of Mint Lane Baptist Church, Lincoln, England.

The Association publishing the above-named monthly met the last week in September; at which time Dr. Leask, of The Rainbow, and others addressed the assembly on the subject of immortality through Christ alone. I may give extracts from those addresses hereafter.

It gives me pleasure to see the cause is onward in Great Britain which I was called to engage in, single-handed and alone, in 1840, and which has since that time been espoused by thousands in the United States. May all "follow on to know the Lord, whose going forth is prepared as the morning"—the light becoming more and more glorious. "Immortality only through Christ" was the day-star that began to disperse the horrible blasphemies that had darkened the moral atmosphere of Christendom concerning the character and government of God—the God who "Is Love." Follow on, friends, till you see in the light of this truth that every son and daughter of Adam that now lives, or ever did live, or ever will live is to have the knowledge of "the only true God and Jesus Christ," and be put in possession of the means and opportunity to secure an endless life before their final destiny is decided; and "Christ shall see of the travail of His soul and be satisfied." Certainly He never will be satisfied till all the human family shall know that He "gave himself a ransom for all," and the "due time" comes for it to be "testified" TO ALL, with the opportunity and means necessary to secure the salvation connected with the "belief of the truth." If any "sin wilfully," by rejecting the Lord Jesus as their Redeemer, who gave HIMSELF to humiliation and death to deliver them from sin and death, the penalty will be the "second death": that is their final doom, from which no redemption is revealed.—ED.

THE RAINBOW for August, September, October and November came to hand November 30. Many thanks to Dr. Leask for this favor.—ED.

JOSHUA V. HIMES, of Nebraska, is seventy-three years of age, and since 1841 has been a prominent leader of the Adventists. He has lately been confirmed by the Episcopal Bishop of Nebraska, and is a candidate for the ministry. Meanwhile he is doing missionary work.—N. Y. Tribune, Nov. 30.

ERRATA.—On page 117, first column, 16th line from the bottom, for “heaving” read believing.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.—This number of the BIBLE EXAMINER completes one-third of this volume. We regret to say one-half of the subscribers have not yet made any remittance for it. While I thank them for the support of the magazine in past years, they will doubtless see that this volume cannot go on without their aid. A word to the lovers of the EXAMINER is all that need be said; to others, please say, at least, that you do not wish it sent to you longer, and you shall be gratified.

EDITOR.

A. D. 1879 is here. To all the friends of the BIBLE EXAMINER I wish a “Happy New Year,” and an increase in divine knowledge and love now and in the endless future, or “Ages to come.”

ED.

THE BIBLE EXAMINER is a Monthly Magazine. Terms, $2 00 per year, in advance.

Subscribers’ Names should be written very plain. Do not neglect this. It is utterly impossible sometimes to decipher names, and mistakes must occur in consequence. As to their Address, give simply the name of the Post-Office and State.

Let all Correspondents be careful to address me as follows:

GEO. STORRS,
72 Hicks Street,
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

All “Postal Money Orders” sent me should be drawn on Brooklyn, N. Y.

To Clubs the BIBLE EXAMINER will be supplied on the following terms:

Two copies to one address,	$3
Four “ “ “ “	5
Ten “ “ “ “	10

The ten may be divided and sent to the address of two persons, if desired. The prices fixed above are expected to be paid in advance and the money sent at the risk of the subscribers.

Any person wishing either volume of the EXAMINER in sheets—that is unbound—shall have it on receipt of one dollar. The volumes that I can supply are 18, 19, 20, 21, and 22; only a few, however, of volume 20.

BOUND VOLUMES.—The BIBLE EXAMINER, bound, can now be furnished at $2 per volume in neat, plain binding; in morocco, with gilt edges, $3 25. Volumes 18, 19, 20, 21, and 22 can be had of me at the prices named per volume.

PAMPHLETS.—The only one I can furnish is the “DIVINE DISPENSATIONS: or, The Divine Plan in The Government of our Race.” Price, 15 cents single copy; $1 25 per dozen.

REMITTANCES.—In these times of theft and robbery no one should venture money by mail except by a “Postal Money Order,” if you can get one. If that cannot be done have your letter “Registered” at the office where mailed. Even then its safety depends on the honesty of the officials who take charge of the letter. It is, perhaps, just as safe to send small sums in a letter, sealed and properly directed without registering as with.

The next best thing to a “Postal Money Order” in remitting money is a Draft on some Banking House in New York City, payable to me or my order —GEO. STORRS.

I thank the editor of the Parkersburg Eclipse. Iowa, for the following notice, given without my knowledge or solicitation:

EDITOR.

“BIBLE EXAMINER.—We have received a sample copy of the BIBLE EXAMINER, published by Geo. Storrs, Brooklyn, N. Y. It is a very fair treatise on Bible subjects, and apparently unsectarian. Every person wishing a good work in that line of literature can do no better than send for it. Some one would do well to make up a club, as a club of ten can get it a year for $1.00 each.

THE EDITOR'S BIRTHDAY.

December 13, 1878.

THIS day completes my 82d year in this mortal life. First of all, I desire to give thanks to our covenant GOD and FATHER for his abundant mercy and grace, bestowed upon me through His beloved Son, Jesus Christ our Lord and REDEEMER. Great, inexpressibly great has been His mercy to me through all my long life. To Him be all the glory of all the good of which I have been the partaker, or of which I have been the instrument of communicating to my fellow-creatures.

The LORD has truly led me in a way that I knew not; and opened up to my mind the glories of His character and government in a way and manner that I never anticipated when I day by day, more than sixty years ago, prayed "Open Thou mine eyes to behold wondrous things in Thy Word." Little did I then think how wonderful and glorious were the things in His Word—the Bible—to be known by the earnest seeker after truth. Though slow to learn, the patience and long-suffering of my Lord and Redeemer, has brought me through the mazes of human traditions into the heavenly light which is the comfort and joy of my last days of earthly pilgrimage.

I praise the Lord that he has given me strength to endure the reproach cast upon me for what advances He has enabled me to make beyond the narrow enclosures of sectarian prejudices, whereby the grace and mercy of God has been so circumscribed as to prevent His love and power from accomplishing the work of "crushing the serpent's head," or "destroying the works of evil." Blessed be His holy name that I have lived to see the truth set firm in this country and in England, that Jesus Christ, the Son of God, "gave himself a ransom for all men"; and that it shall be "testified in due time" to all men, either in the life that now is or in that which is to come, with the means and opportunity to accept the blessed Redeemer and "live for ever"; or, if "wilfully" rejecting Him, perish eternally as the only disposition LOVE itself can make of such incorrigible rebels against the love and mercy of that God who gave his "only begotten Son" to shame, suffering, and death," that He might bestow life everlasting on those who had sinned against his love, so great and so long continued, saying with the compassion that ought to have broken the heart of stone, "WHY WILL YE DIE?"

I am pleased in this place to give a portion of DR. LEASK'S "Special Editorial Address" at the end of Vol. xv. of the "Rainbow," as it so well expresses my views and experience since 1840, at which time I took an open stand against the doctrine of "Inherent Immortality" and "Eternal Torments." Please read his remarks with care; and may it stimulate all of us to "come up to the help of the LORD against the mighty."—Judges v. 23.

EDITOR.

DR. LEASK speaks as follows:

We venture at the close of another eventful year, very earnestly, but respectfully, to request all lovers of the teaching of Holy Scripture respecting God and man, to avail themselves of the present propitious moment greatly to increase the circulation of this magazine, which exists for the express purpose of clearing revealed truth from the manifold errors of medieval and modern theology. The present time is propitious because men are "thirsting" for truth as they have not done for ages. I quote the very word, the expressive metaphor, employed by an intelligent gentleman the other day, in reference to thoughtful men in his neighborhood. He said to me: "We are positively thirsting for light, and would submit gladly to any sacrifice to get it." But in this expression my friend only uttered the yearning of many hearts. Everywhere the feeling is the same now. The central wish of countless minds is just to know the truth. Oh, brethren! let us, by divine help, help them! It is an honor which we should not miss. There are, no doubt, some readers who would rather send a donation to the editor than ask their friends to become subscribers. We shall be thankful to receive such donations, and to send their value by post in copies of the RAINBOW to different addresses, as the donor may direct, or, in the absence of such selection, as the editor may select.

This eagerness for information is a delightful fact, for which those who love our blessed Lord cannot be too thankful; but let those who "know the truth," and who also know that "no lie is of the truth," remember that a time of quickened interest in religious questions is also a time of much peril. False teachers are always at hand on such occasions, influenced by sentimental theories which have no foundation in Scripture, and consequently no divine light to shine on the mind of the inquirer and give him peace. This remark has been only too clearly illustrated by Universalist books and pamphlets during the past few years—books and pamphlets in which the anti-scriptural doctrine of man's natural immortality is either assumed as indisputable, or maintained by the old arguments, whose utter worthlessness has been repeatedly exposed in these pages. The moment men substitute mere speculation, or theory, for Scripture, on matters about which we can know nothing apart from Scripture, they become "physicians of no value," and hinder the cause of truth in the world, whilst professing to help it. No eloquence, no learning, no ideal character of the great Ruler can justify mere mental theories respecting the destiny of men. What God has been pleased to make known on this profoundly important matter must be accepted as final. We must not venture to set aside the obvious lexical and grammatical meaning of Scripture in favor of some poetical or sentimental fancy of our own. For eschatology is not a philosophical region where we may disport ourselves at will, each trying to excel his neighbor in imagining what God may do, but a province which belongs exclusively to him who has told us what he will do.—Rom. vi: 23; 2 Thess. i: 7-9.

"The revealed future of the Church and the World" has been the text of the RAINBOW from the first number until now—a wonderfully comprehensive text, for it embraces everything connected with the nature and destiny of man, the character and government of God, the meaning of redemption, the Church of grace, the kingdom of glory, the restoration of the Jews, the discovery and mission of the House of Israel, the future position of the nations in relation to the land of promise, the rise, career and doom of the Antichrist, the destruction of all evil beings and evil things, the glorious reign of Christ and his saints, and the final ages when the magnificent design of the Godhead shall be realized, and "God shall be all in all."

The question of "Israel" is one of far-reaching importance at the present time, for this, among other reasons, that the world's future—I venture to say, its very near future—will be largely influenced, in accordance with the clearly revealed purpose of God, by Israel, commonly called "the lost ten tribes," and especially by EPHRAIM, to whom the birthright was given. This journal has to do with the revealed future of the world; Israel will be the chief earthly factor in that future; and Israel therefore must be sought and found—if that be possible—by facts and arguments which will at once satisfy the cultured and logical, and accord with the historical and prophetic Scriptures. There are, however, many Christian persons who think that the promises to Joseph's youngest son, and to the world through him, can only have a post-resurrection fulfilment. Let this grand question of God's "pleasant child" (Jer. xxxi: 20) be examined calmly and thoroughly, without bias or prejudice in these pages. It is one of the chief themes of "the future," and will amply repay the research it demands.

But whilst our standing "text" is so comprehensive, it is bounded by the all-important word "revealed." This limit and safeguard, thoughtfully chosen fifteen years ago, is very important. Its theological value is increasingly felt when we read the writings of good men who, deceived by the serpent's doctrine of natural immortality (Gen. iii: 4), and unable to believe the incredible horror of "endless torments," glide, of logical necessity, into the haven of universal restoration. But this harbor of refuge is not in the chart, nor is there any need surreptitiously to put it there, for the sufficient reason that natural immortality and endless torment are as contrary to the Holy Scriptures as darkness to light, or falsehood to truth. You get these dogmas in all their hideous proportions from cathedral and college, from pulpits, Papal and Protestant, from books issued from every sect of the fractured Church, and from millions of what are miscalled "religious tracts"; but from the blessed and infinitely precious Bible, God's own book—NEVER!

It will be remembered by those who were early subscribers that during all these years we have borne witness to the nearness of the Lord's Second Advent. This, in fact, has been our grand theme, our chief joy, a solace in trouble, a holy consolation in hours of sorrow, a motive for patient perseverance, and a hope of inexpressible gladness. And why should it not be all this? Is it not the purpose of God, the gospel of the glory (2 Cor. iv. 4, Greek), the blessed hope of the Church (Tit. ii. 13), the top stone of the living temple which grace has been building ever since the wondrous day of Pentecost? The fact of our Lord's promised return is undoubted, whatever may be said about the time; and its necessity in view of the inability of ecclesiastics to unite the divided Church, and of statesmen to give peace to the distracted world, has been habitually urged in this journal; and, we think, placed beyond doubt, at least in the case of men who are content to abide within our defined limits, the revealed future. The theological mistake of assigning to the ministry of the Church of grace a work which belongs to the high ministers of the King of Glory in the coming dispensation—namely, the subjugation of the world—has been repeatedly pointed out in these pages. Mediatorial grace electing a body for the Christ, and royal power commanding the world to "be still" in the presence of its great King, are very different things, which would not have been so lamentably confounded but for the double heresy of glorifying souls at death, and denying the pre-millennial coming of the Lord and the resurrection of them that are his "at his appearing and kingdom," when his saints shall be glorified together.

The time is short. Let us work for him! He is worthy. We tell him so in our prayers and praises. Let him see—let the world see—that we mean it by our intelligent efforts to diffuse his truth in its own native purity, free from the polluting presence of pagan tradition. This journal was begun—in obedience to what I surely believe to have been a divine impulse—for the purpose of teaching that the evening of this dispensation is upon us, and that the morning of the golden age is consequently at hand. For the dear Master's sake, our Redeemer and Life, let us tell men that his Gospel is all beauty, and that HE HIMSELF, who gave it its beauty, is coming to glorify all who love him. (John xiv. 3; xvii. 24; Acts i. 11; 1 Thes. iv. 15-18.)

Grateful for past aid in his service, and trusting that it will be continued for his sake, we wish for all our helpers the blessings symbolised by the glorious "Rainbow" seen by the seer of the Apocalypse "round about the throne"; and may the King, when he comes to establish his kingdom, say to each of us—"WELL DONE!"

DEFINITE TIME FOR THE ADVENT.

SOME Adventists complain because the "Prophetic Conference" in this city, last Fall, did not sustain the idea that the definite time of Christ's second advent could be known.

I have been settled for more than thirty years that not one of the prophetic periods was given to show the exact time of that advent? though some of them bring us into the vicinity of it, and leave no ground for doubt of its being "nigh, even at the door," when taken in connection with certain signs which our Lord gave us indicating the event. I cannot give any countenance to definite time-setting for the event, founded on prophetic periods; such arguments have invariably produced an unhealthy excitement and been an injury to the spread of the truth and fact of the advent itself. I have seen too much of this in the last thirty-five years to be drawn into that state of mind in which nearly all definite time-setters are found. Too often it produces an uncharitable spirit in its advocates toward all who do not accept their time conclusions. I know enough of these things to desire that Christians, professing to be lovers of Christ's second appearing, should be preserved from the evil resulting from definite time-setting. I am satisfied it neither promotes true piety or a preparation to meet the Lord.

In January, 1867, a leader in the definite time excitement for the coming of Christ that year, after having endeavored to fix the date of the commencement of the 1260 days, or years, of Daniel and Revelation, said:

"If the 1335 do not begin with the 1260 years, the book of Revelation after calling our especial attention to the 1260 years, has left us wholly in the dark as far as definite time is concerned, as there is not a period in it which reaches to Christ's coming. Our kind heavenly Father has not placed definite time in his word and left it to be a matter of mere conjecture as to whether those periods revealed anything definite or not. And we say, with all due reverence and humility, that if some one does not understand the year of Christ's coming, the promise of God will fail, and this can never be. We believe, then, that this present year, 1867, will witness the grand consummation—the coming of Christ and the resurrection of Daniel for his lot, with all the sleeping saints.”

To these assumptions I replied at the time as follows, and I do not desire now to alter anything I said then:

“Here are assumptions enough, and something that borders on blasphemy. The assumption that the 1335 begin with the 1260 is the first step, which I believe to be wholly groundless. The next assumption is that God ‘has placed definite time in his word’ for ‘Christ’s coming.’ The third assumption, coupled with blasphemy, is in these words—‘If some one does not understand the year of Christ’s coming, the promise of God will fail.’

“All this is characteristic of ‘definite time’ hunters, and shows the spirit begotten by such efforts. I believe the proximity of the second advent can be known, and doubt not it will take place at no distant day; but that our time-setters are all doomed to disappointment, I have little doubt. If any man will not live as he ought without having ‘definite time for the advent,’ I have no faith in his religion, at all. The laziest drone on earth will work when he sees his employer is right upon him, because he is coming; but a faithful servant keeps about his employer’s work because he loves his Master and his work.

“Such kind of talk as that which occasions these remarks may take with timid persons, but with the reflecting and sober Christian they can have no other effect than to produce regret at the injury such persons are doing the truth of God, and the hindrance such are likely to work to the spread of the truth of the advent itself. But it is not likely they will hear, even if an angel from heaven were to proclaim them in error. Let us all work while it is day; and ‘occupy till’ our Lord ‘come,’ as He has bid us do. Then shall we be found of Him in peace.”

Such was my view of time-setting; twelve years ago, and I have not seen cause to change my mind since; though I lost the good-will of the person referred to, and ever since he has seemed to regard me as an “enemy,” though I “told” him “the truth.”—Gal. iv. 16.

The downfall of “mystic Babylon” I regard as an event closely connected with the second advent of Christ to reign on the earth and over the nations.

Let us all watch and pray, and not suffer ourselves to be carried into any whirlpool of excitement, whether it comes from politicians, speculators or religionists of any class or character. A calm faith in God our Saviour, and resting in him as our hope and joy, is what we most need to fit us for the coming events now evidently “nigh at hand.” Let us all strive to cultivate the meek and lowly character of our blessed Lord. So shall it be well with us when He calls us to Himself though it may be through fiery trials.—ED.

EULOGY ON DEATH.

AN exchange paper contains some blank verses on “Death,” eulogizing this monster, as is usual with believers in inherent immortality. It begins by the inquiry—

“Why should we picture death a thing of dread?”

I answer—Because God so announces it, by making it the penalty of sin. If Adam had dreaded it as he ought, he might have been preserved from its power. By believing the serpent’s lie of natural immortality—“ye shall not surely die”—he had the “dread” of death removed, and fell into sin.

In the fifth line the following sentiment is uttered:

“Death is an angel—messenger divine!”

I do not wonder the writer placed a mark of surprise at the close of this line. Inspiration declares that “sin entered into the world and death by sin.”—Rom. v. 12. To call the messenger of sin “divine” is cause of surprise and astonishment. Next follows a “whitewashing” of the monster, thus:

“White-robed, though shadowed oft in dark disguise,
Stealing at midnight unto prison doors
Where weary spirits long in chains have pined,
And bidding them go forth to taste new life
Beyond the precincts of their dim abode;
While they, with many a sigh and groan of pain,
Reluctantly follow their mysterious guide.”

This is strange enough. “White-robed,” disguised in “dark” ones! Will the writer please tell us if immortality can be “weary”? I happen to think that weariness is not an attribute or accident that pertains to immortal entities. If the soul is immortal it cannot, in the very nature of the case, be “weary.” To talk of an immortal “spirit” pining “in chains,” is to talk unmitigated nonsense; and then for death to be represented as a white-robed thief, to steal out this chained spirit, almost caps the climax of folly; but a still greater one follows it. This weary spirit (immortal, of course) leaves its prison and chains

“with many a sigh and groan of pain,” and follows its guide “reluctantly.” Strange jargon this. One would think the absurdity was at his height to suppose this chained spirit leaves its prison with sighs and groans, without representing it as going “reluctantly.” This immortal entity, going “forth to taste new life,” ought to have been, in consistency, presented as shouting and dancing for joy, following its “guide” with the light-footedness of the young roe as it flies from its confinement, or from the pursuit of an enemy. But no! death—the “messenger divine”—is followed “reluctantly!” A plain evidence that the said soul has no knowledge of the fancied bliss we are told it is going forth to possess. Why do not our immortal soul theorists instruct these entities so that they shall behave better when the “white-robed” friend comes to conduct them to “new life”? Perhaps they are “fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the” defiers of death tell them, and therefore “groan and sigh” in “following” him, and go “reluctantly.” These fancy souls must be stupid things, after hundreds and thousands of the priests of death have so often declared the glories of death and his amazing friendship, that they cannot “follow” him in a better manner. I have heard of many of these glorifiers of death that took every possible care to keep out of his way; and if they hear of one that follows death gladly, by suicide, they cry out “insanity,” or “dreadful!” The fact is, the most devoted priest of death, after all his prating of death’s friendship, will not trust him at all; and you will see them hasten after a doctor and swallow the most bitter dose rather than let death lead them into their imaginary paradise.

Away, then, with all this lying song of death’s friendship! It is hollow and false as falsehood can be. No man really believes it, though many doubtless think they do; but it is all deception.

The writer of this eulogy on death next says:

“Death is a builder—architect supreme!
Pent in our clayey temples here we dwell—
One stroke of his rude hammer, they are dust,
And palaces immortal are our own.”

“Great is Diana of the” immortal soul advocates. If death introduces us into “palaces immortal,” what shall we do with them at the resurrection? The resurrection is the time and the way for this “mortal” to “put on immortality”; so saith Paul, 1 Cor. xv. But if death places us in immortal palaces we must leave those palaces at the resurrection, or it will be these immortals that put on immortality; that is, we shall put on that at the resurrection which, by the “stroke” of our friend death’s “rude hammer,” we had at death.

Next—

“Death is a pilot—long in our treacherous seas,
While cloud-hung skies above us frown, we sail,
And many a foul Charybdis lurks beneath.
We spend the fleeting moments as they pass,
In ceaseless longings for the onward shore,
Eternal shores are dawning in our sight,
And Death’s the friendly hand to guide us there.”

Here death is made an all-important “friend” “to pilot” us out of this life’s “sea” on to the “eternal shores”! Enoch and Elijah could not meet that “friendly pilot” and so landed without his aid! Unhappy men! How dared they venture without this pilot? Paul rejoices that God, on a certain occasion, “delivered” him “from so great a pilot”; and in that hour of trial he did not trust himself to that old shipwrecker—death—for a pilot! No, saith Paul, our “trust” is “in God who raiseth the dead.” See 2 Cor. i. 9, 10. The “pilot” death shipwrecks all who come into his power! God is the Christian’s pilot, and brings into “palaces immortal” by raising the dead. No thanks and no praise to death. Old “death” has stood on the shore to deceive weary mariners and to rob God and his Christ of the honor of conducting to “palaces immortal,” for many long years. But the old “black white-washed” hypocrite is doomed to an exposure by the grand doctrine of “Life and Immortality only through Christ”; that shall place him where his long series of crimes against God, Christ and truth demands; viz.: Jesus Christ shall “destroy death.”—Heb. ii. 14. Then will the robber of God and man be no more deified by good, but deceived, men who have so long sung his praises. Yes, friends, your old “pilot” is to go “into the lake of fire.”—Rev. xx. 14. A just doom for all such “liars” and deceivers. His godship will then be seen in its true character.

BAPTISM.

My friend HENRY HEYES, now in England, writing to The Restitution, in Indiana, speaks as follows:

“While we openly disagree with Dr. Leask about baptism, there is force and faithfulness in these words of his on Andrew’s work, p. 429: ‘There is some danger in the terms adopted in this argument of representing the rite itself as a saviour.’ We may be surprised that Dr. Leask, Dr. Seiss, G. Storrs, and others, ignore baptism, that is immersion, upon belief of the gospel of the kingdom; but they must answer for themselves.”

I thank my friend for freely allowing that "they must answer for themselves," and for admitting that DR. LEASK has "force and faithfulness" in his "words" in suggesting "danger in the terms adopted" by Immersionists "of representing the rite itself as a saviour." Broad hints have often appeared that carry that impression.

DR. LEASK and DR. SEISS can speak for themselves, if they think proper. I feel called upon to say a few words on my friend's remark of "ignoring baptism." I do not "ignore baptism, i. e., immersion." Let all attend to it who are convinced it is their duty to do so; but let them beware of treating others, who as conscientiously think otherwise, by a lack of charity toward them; and let all judge for themselves whether the Gospel baptism is received by water or the Holy Spirit.

John the Baptist said, "I indeed baptise you with water; but one mightier than I cometh, the latchet of whose shoes I am not worthy to unloose; He shall baptise you with the Holy Ghost."—Luke iii. 16. The Saviour said, in his last interview with his disciples before he ascended to Heaven, "John truly baptized with water; but ye shall be baptised with the Holy Spirit (Pneumati) not many days hence."—Acts i. 5. The baptism by Christ did not commence till he ascended to his Father.

Our Lord said to his disciples, "I tell you the truth; it is expedient for you that I go away; for if I go not away the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart I will send him unto you."—John xvi. 7. The baptism of the Holy Spirit is that which gives us the witness of our being sons and daughters of God; and hence is truly the Comforter of God's children. See Rom. viii. 14-17. Hence we are exhorted, "Grieve not the Holy Spirit of God, whereby ye are sealed unto the day of redemption."—Eph. iv. 30. "Quench not the Spirit."—1 Thess. v. 19. "Ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise."—Eph. i. 13, 14.

Again, this promised baptism is thus spoken of: "Jesus stood and cried, saying, If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink. He that believeth on me, as the Scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water." John adds, "This he spake of the Spirit which they that believe on him should receive; for the Holy Spirit was not yet given, because that Jesus was not yet glorified."—John vii. 37-39.

The baptism of the Holy Spirit is that without which we cannot be raised in "immortality, eternal life." If any think water baptism essential to them, let them obey their convictions; but see to it that they neglect not the baptism of the Spirit nor judge and unchristianize such as believe that the baptism by Christ is of the Holy Spirit, and that is the essential baptism, bringing into the body of Christ and making the recipient a member of Christ. See 1 Cor. xii. 13, 27.

INSTINCT OF PRAYER.

"PRAYER is the soul's sincere desire, unuttered or expressed." It is the natural act of a dependent creature. It is the voice of nature in its deep-toned breathings speaking to God. There is something nearly akin to prayer observable, even in inarticulate nature: "The whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain." The earth, unnerved and torn by throbbing earthquakes and belching volcanoes, seems as if struggling to give utterance to some terrible sense of woe.

The utterance of the brutes may be interpreted as the dim consciousness of want and dependence. But it is in man that this divine instinct becomes audible. Man alone is conscious of his helplessness, and in this consciousness can alone turn to a superior power. His whole life, from his cradle years of infancy to hoary age, teaches but one lesson—that of ignorance, of infirmity, and of dependence upon the God who made him.

"ENLARGE MY HEART."

There's a wideness in God's mercy,
Like the wideness of the sea;
There's a kindness in his justice
Which is more than liberty.
There's no place where earthly sorrows
Are more felt than up in Heaven;
There's no place where earthly failings
Have such kindly judgment given.
For the love of God is broader
Than the measure of man's mind;
And the heart of the Eternal
Is most wonderfully kind.
But we make his love too narrow
By false limits of our own;
And we magnify his strictness
With a zeal he will not own.
Pining souls, come nearer Jesus!
Come, but come not doubting thus;
Come with faith that trusts more freely
His great tenderness for us.
If our love were but more simple
We should take him at his word;
And our lives would be all sunshine
In the sweetness of our Lord.

THE PROMISE AND OATH OF GOD TO ABRAHAM.—NO. III.

BY THE EDITOR OF THE "BIBLE EXAMINER."

"I do not believe there will be any mortals in the future state: they cannot dwell together with immortals."

WHAT if you "do not believe?" shall your "unbelief" alter, or change the promise and oath of God? or, "make it of none effect?" Do these objectors not believe that angels visited Abraham, Lot, and others, and conversed with them? yea, even eat with them? And more strange still, do they not believe that the only begotten Son of God came to this earth and dwelt among mortal beings many years? and even laid down his life among and for mortal beings? Yes, and after his resurrection still remained among mortal beings forty days teaching and instructing them in "the things pertaining to the kingdom of God?"—Acts i. 3. All this the objectors believe, I presume. Is the disciple above his Lord? If our LIFE-GIVER has done these things, is it either impossible, improbable or unlikely that his immortal saints may be among, teach and rule over mortal beings? Shall we say "any thing" is "too hard for God?" If God has said it shall be so, is not that sufficient to satisfy faith? And what are the immortal saints to be kings over and priests to, during the reign of Christ on earth? Who, if not those who are "left of the nations," after the "Lord my God shall come and all the saints with" him?

The idea that mortal and immortal beings cannot dwell together, is founded in prejudice; is unscriptural, and subversive of the Christian faith. It limits the power of God, and makes our weak judgment the rule to determine what God can, or will do. If he please to have it so, it can be done. The only thing faith asks is the proof that God has said it. That point settled, faith asks no more; it "staggers not," but is "strong, giving glory to God." "That point" was "settled" in my mind years ago; and nothing that I have since seen or read has changed it; but I do not disfellowship those who see not as I do.

It no more follows that all mortals will cease to live when this age is followed by another, than it did when the antediluvian age ended in the patriarchal age, or that in the Mosaic age, or that in the gospel age. In neither case were all mortals cut off. Enoch was translated, still mortals remained. Elijah was translated, still mortals were left and propagation went on. Jesus was raised from the dead, yet there were mortals still. What then shall hinder there being mortals in a future age, or under the administration of the kingdom of God, which is the next dispensation? True, they that attain that age by a resurrection from the dead, will not marry nor be given in marriage: they are immortal like their risen Lord. But does that prove that none others in that age will marry or be given in marriage? Not at all. Those who use the words of our Lord in Luke xx. as proof that there are no mortals in that age read carelessly, I think; they overlook the subject of discourse and the important conjunction "and." The Sadducees held that there was "no resurrection of the dead." If such were the case, in their estimation there would be a difficulty in marriage matters. Our Lord tells them, "They which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world [aionos—age], and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry nor are given in marriage," etc. The question was not about the living, but about "the dead." Those who attain to that age, by a resurrection from the dead, are clearly distinguished from mortals by the conjunction "and," which would have been needless if all in that age were immortal.

Jesus told his disciples, "Ye which have followed me, in the regeneration when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones judging [ruling] the twelve tribes of Israel."—Matt. xix. 28. The immortals are the rulers in the kingdom of God "under the whole heaven" (Dan. vii. 27); that kingdom is an everlasting one, and its rulers "cannot die any more." In that day "the LORD shall be King over all the earth: in that day shall there be one Lord and his name one. . . . And it shall come to pass that every one that is left of all the nations which came against Jerusalem shall even go up from year to year to worship the King, the LORD of hosts, and to keep the feast of tabernacles: and it shall be, that whoso will not come up of all the families of the earth unto Jerusalem to worship the King, the LORD of hosts, even upon them shall be no rain: and if the family of Egypt go not up, and come not, that have no rain, there shall be the plague, wherewith the LORD will smite the heathen that come not up to keep the feast of tabernacles. This shall be the punishment . . . of all nations that come not up to keep the feast of tabernacles."—Zech. xiv. 9, 16-19.

Thus we see there will be mortals when the LORD is King over all the earth, and punishments will be inflicted on the disobedient.

"Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God," etc. True: because to inherit is to be an heir. Christ is the primal heir. "If children (of God) then heirs: heirs of of God, and joint heirs with Christ" (Rom. viii. 17); and we become children of God, in fact, by "being the children of the resurrection."—Luke xx. 36. These are those who "inherit the kingdom." But the subjects of that kingdom are not heirs, and do not inherit it, though they are greatly blessed in living under the rule of the heirs of it. The heirs are immortal and cannot die any more. Does that prove all mortals are excluded from being citizens there? I have shown that there are mortals there who are liable to "punishment," in my remarks on Zech. xiv., which is only one scripture among many of the same character.

I have produced abundant evidence that Christ, after he takes his father David's throne, is to reign over "all people, nations, and languages," which includes a wide domain, even over "kings and princes" of the earth, who shall become subject to his government, and offer him gifts and do him homage, as saith the prophecy.

Do not let us drop into the narrow notions of the ancient Jews, who supposed they were the only favorites of heaven, and all others reprobates. These ancient, self-righteous Jews had no heart to receive the promise of God to Abraham, that "all the families of the earth," or "all nations," were the objects of his love, and that all "the world" were embraced in that love which led God to give his Son.—John iii. 16. To suppose the few saved in this and previous ages, are all who are to be saved into eternal life by him who "tasted death for every man," and is the propitiation for the sins of the whole world" (1 John ii. 2), is a view as narrow as the selfish platform of the old Jews. "O, but the saved in this and past ages are a great multitude." Jesus calls them a "little flock," and saith but "few find the strait gate." The "great multitude" of saved ones may be found to belong to "the ages to come." God's love hitherto has been eclipsed by the traditions of men and the selfishness of the human heart: but that obscurity will vanish away when the Sun of righteousness shall arise to shine on this benighted world and a pur-blind church, and "the knowledge of the Lord shall fill the earth, as the waters cover the sea."

It is asserted by some that the Scriptures have been translated into all of earth's dialects, and so all nations have them in their own language. This is a mere assumption: but suppose it were true. What then? How long ago was that accomplished? If at all, it has been done only recently. Does that cover the broad promise and oath of God? By no means. Four thousand years have passed since the promise was made, and hardly a century has passed since the Scriptures have been accessible to one in ten thousand, and even now, out of Christendom, not one in a million, probably, have the Bible within their reach. That fulfils the promise and oath of God, in the estimation of some men. If such a meagre fulfilment is all we are to look for, who can tell us how much can be relied on of God's promises in other matters? We are thrown into the mazes of uncertainty in regard to the future. If there is no more certainty of a literal fulfilment of God's promise and oath to Abraham than some professed believers in the Bible would have us to think, then all faith in any of his promises is but a fancy; they may possibly come to pass some how, or in some way, but there is no certainty that any of them mean just what they say; and what ground for faith that Christ will ever come again to this earth? "Oh, the Bible says he will." We know it does, and God says, and confirms it with an oath, that in Abraham and in his seed all the families of the earth shall be blessed; yet some men do not believe it means just that; for they know that very few of the families of the earth have ever yet been thus blessed, and they do not believe they ever will be, for millions on millions and thousands of millions have gone down into the grave without ever having heard of Abraham or his seed; and they think God's promise and oath cannot reach them now; as if their thoughts could bind God's power. "Oh, but God has said"—! No matter what he "has said"; they are not sure that he means what he has said; for they do not believe he means just what he said to Abraham; and hence, they have no foundation on which to stand in regard to anything else he has said; it may mean something very different from what the language expresses.

The same principle prostrates nearly all that God has spoken of the future in the Old Testament, and carries the idea that God's thoughts cannot exceed our thoughts, nor his ways our ways. But I care not to press this last point, though it is clear it saps the foundation of all faith, and leaves men exposed to be "tossed to and fro by every wind of doctrine" that happens to blow with most positiveness.

Let us throw away the old Jewish spectacles, which enabled them to see no blessings from Messiah but for themselves, and look through the "promise and oath of God" to that blessing promised to all the families of the earth:" then shall we see, as we have never seen, the magnitude of God's love to "the world." This view will cause us to wonder at our past blindness, and to adore that love of God and of "Christ which passeth knowledge." "Unto him be glory in the church by Christ Jesus throughout all ages, world without end"—or, "the endless succession of ages," as Macknight renders it.—Eph. iii. 21. A literal translation of this text may be given as follows:

"To him be glory in the church, by Christ Jesus, through all the generations" (genas, accusative plural) "of the age of the ages. Amen."

Here is a solemn testimony, to which the Holy Spirit, in Paul, adds its oath, by an "Amen." This testimony is, that there shall be "generations" in "the age of the ages," and that "Christ Jesus" is the administrator; for it is "by" him, the "glory" is to be revealed in that "age of the ages."

What of the "generations"? How many are there? Well, there are at least a thousand. Thus saith the LORD, by the mouth of David, "Be ye mindful always of his covenant; the word which he commanded to a thousand generations; which he made with Abraham," etc.—1 Chron. xvi. 15; also, Ps. cv. 8. All the generations from Adam to this time do not exceed two hundred, allowing thirty years to a generation. Eight hundred generations yet to come. If the thousand generations are yet to be made up, which side of the second advent shall we place them? If 6,000 years have made only 200 generations, how many will be wanted to fill up the "1,000 generations"? Ans.—Twenty-four thousand! Who are willing to wait that long for the second advent of Christ, rather than admit an age, or ages to come, after the advent, in which generations, consequently, probation will go on, to fill up the thousand generations? But we will not press this point.

I accept the Psalmist's testimony as follows: "All the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the LORD: all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before thee: for the kingdom is the LORD's: and he is the governor among the nations:" [plural]. . . . "A seed shall serve him; it shall be accounted to the LORD for a generation:" [singular]: "they" [that seed] "shall come, and shall declare his righteousness unto a people that shall be born, that he hath done this."—Psa. xxii. 27–31. Generations will go on among the "left of the nations," and people will "be born," after the one generation has had its resurrection and are immortal: then, after that, "they shall declare" God's "righteousness" [his infinite mercy to the creatures he has made] "unto a people that shall be born." A blessed and glorious work, which looks like God fulfilling his "promise and oath to Abraham." Those who do not like such work, will not be compelled to engage in it.

In connection with Psa. xxii., just considered, read Psalm lxvii. "God be merciful unto us, and bless us; and cause his face to shine upon us. Selah. That thy way may be known upon earth, thy saving health among all nations. Let the people praise thee, O God; let all the people praise thee. O let the nations be glad and sing for joy: for thou shalt judge the people righteously, and govern the nations upon the earth. Selah. Let the people praise thee, O God; let all the people praise thee. Then shall the earth yield her increase; and God, our own God, shall bless us; and all the ends of the earth shall fear him."

This again corresponds with Jer. xxiii. 5, 6: "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous BRANCH, and a King shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In his days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell in safety," etc. Here are promises which the Lord is pledged to fulfil, agreeing with Ps. xxii. 27–31, and corresponding with the promise and oath to Abraham.

Let us now look at the testimony of God by Isaiah, chap. xi. On this chapter immense labor has been bestowed to harmonize it with the theory of burning the world at the second advent of Christ; but still it reads just as it always did, and shows conclusively an age in this world that has never yet been seen, and never can be, if there is not a dispensation yet future differing essentially from any that has ever gone before. Here is presented to us a BRANCH out of the root of Jesse. None will doubt but that the Son of David—the Son of God—is here intended. Under his government the animal creation will become changed so as to be harmless and docile; "the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child put his hand on the cockatrice's den. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain: for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea. And in that day [when the earth is thus full of the knowledge of the Lord] there shall be a root of Jesse, which shall stand for an ensign of the people; to it shall the Gentiles seek; and his rest shall be glorious." This is not all: "It shall come to pass in that day that the Lord shall set his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people which shall be left from Assyria," etc. Not the gathering of spiritual Jews, but his people whom he had once before gathered; not a gathering from Babylon, as will be seen: that gathering was not in "that day" just spoken of. "And he shall set up an ensign for the nations, and shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth."

Here the language distinctly marks the two nations into which the posterity of Jacob were divided in the days of Rehoboam, son of Solomon: one nation was called Judah and the other Israel, and sometimes Ephraim, from the principal tribe of the nation of Israel. This latter nation was not "scattered," but was "cast out" of the land of Israel into Assyria some hundred years before Judah was carried captive into Babylon. Israel was therefore called "outcasts," as in the text before us; see also 2 Kings xvii. 20. Nor was "Judah dispersed" to the "four corners of the earth" till their Temple was destroyed by the Romans. The promise in this text, therefore, clearly relates to their gathering subsequent to that destruction; and as no such gathering ever has taken place, it must still be future, and is not "conditional," and is as certain as a "Thus saith the Lord" can make it. If any doubt remained the next verse would dispel it: "The envy also of Ephraim shall depart, and the adversaries of Judah shall be cut off: Ephraim shall not envy Judah, and Judah shall not vex Ephraim."

Before Ephraim or Israel was carried away into Assyria there was continual strife, contention and war between the two nations. When one shall be assembled and the other gathered, this envy and vexing each other shall be known no more. And let it never be forgotten, these things are to be done "in that day" when "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord"; of course, future, and a glorious day. In that day, verse 16, "There shall be a highway for the remnant of his people, which shall be left, from Assyria; like as it was to Israel in the day that he came out of the land of Egypt." Here we see what the first "recovering" was, which is alluded to, verse 11, where it is said, "The Lord shall set his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people," etc. It was their being brought up out of Egypt, and it is "the remnant" of the same people of whom the prophet speaks.

The prophet then goes on to tell us what that people will say when gathered: "And in that day thou shalt say, O Lord, I will praise thee; though thou wast angry with me, thine anger is turned away, and thou comfortest me. Behold, God is my salvation! I will trust, and not be afraid; for the Lord JEHOVAH is my strength and my song; he also is become my salvation. Therefore with joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation. And in that day shall ye say Praise the Lord, call upon his name, declare his doings among the people, make mention that his name is exalted. Sing unto the Lord; for he hath done excellent things; this is known in all the earth. Cry out and shout, thou inhabitant of Sion; for great is the Holy One of Israel in the midst of thee."—Isa. xii.

This subject is made so plain by the prophet that it does really seem wonderful that any should call in question the meaning of the prophecy, or attempt to spiritualize it. That it applies to any events in the past has never yet been shown. That it is not a conditional promise, is equally manifest. So surely as the BRANCH of Jesse's root ever reigns on earth, so surely, "in that day," will these things come to pass.

The text relied upon to prove the end of the world, or mundane system, is to come when the gospel of the kingdom has been preached in all the world for a witness to all nations (Matt. xxiv; 14), has no such sense as is attached to it by the advocates of burning the world or earth at the second advent. Let us carefully examine the text and the context.

As Jesus went out of the temple his disciples called attention to the "buildings of the temple." "Jesus said unto them, See ye not all these things? Verily I say unto you, there shall not be left here one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down." The subject then was the destruction of Jerusalem and her temple. The disciples inquired of him, "privately, saying, Tell us, when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of aiōnos—age," not of the "world," as our translation has it; for the end of the world, proper, had no connection with the Saviour's language in relation to the destruction of the temple. This destruction of the buildings of the temple, involving, as it necessarily would, the end of services there, the disciples construed into an end of that age, as it truly was.

In his reply, Jesus tells them, "This gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the (oikoumene) world for a witness unto all (ethnesi, heathen) nations; and then shall the end come." The end of what? The end of the age spoken of, when the temple should be thrown down. This is clearly the sense.

Now, as to the oikoumene, translated world, Matt. xxiv. 14, it is the same word found in Luke ii. 1, "There went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus, that all the (oikoumene) world should be taxed." All the world, here, was the Roman empire, and no more. Jesus uses the same word in his statement of how extensive the gospel should be preached before the temple at Jerusalem would be destroyed, and the Jewish age would come to an end.

Some persons take the ground, from Paul's language 1 Cor. xv. 24-28, that "the end" of probation to all the families of the earth will come at the second advent of Christ and the resurrection of the dead in him. The correctness of such assumption depends upon whether such persons give a true interpretation to the language employed by the apostle.

I ask, What is "the end" spoken of? What is "the kingdom" referred to, and when is it "delivered up"? What is meant by death as "the last enemy," and to whom does Paul state it to be the last enemy? This chapter is devoted to the proof of the resurrection of the believers in Christ. Their last enemy, who shall ever have dominion over them, is death: to them therefore death is destroyed by resurrection. That Christ does not deliver up the kingdom at that time is evident from many prophecies. First: Ps. lxxii., "In his days shall the righteous flourish." (Surely not till raised from the dead.) "He shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth. . . . The kings of Tarshish and of the isles shall bring presents; the kings of Sheba and Seba shall offer gifts. Yea, all kings shall fall down before him; all nations shall serve him. . . . His name shall endure forever; his name shall be continued as long as the sun; and men shall be blessed in him: all nations shall call him blessed." This whole prophecy relates to what transpires after Messiah reigns on David's throne, which reign is after the resurrection spoken of in 1 Cor. xv.

Still another prophecy. Dan. vii.: After the fourth "beast was slain, and his body destroyed and given to the burning flame," one like the Son of man appears before the Ancient of Days, "And there was given him dominion [not 1800 years ago], "that all people, nations and languages, should serve and obey him: His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." The angel explains this to Daniel as the reign of the saints, made immortal, of course, thus: "But the saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom forever, even forever and ever." The horn of the fourth beast prevailed against the saints "Until the Ancient of Days came, and judgment [rule] was given to the saints of the Most High: and the time came that the saints possessed the kingdom." . . . "And the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him."

Thus prophecy makes "peoples, nations and languages" to exist, after the saints are made immortal; and they are all put in subjection to the saints in a kingdom that has no end.

It is said, "There can be no age of probation after the second advent of Christ, for he leaves the Mediatorial seat and ceases to be a Priest at that time." This I consider an unfounded assumption, and a palpable contradiction of the promise and oath of God to Messiah himself, which speaks as follows:

"The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent, Thou art a Priest forever after the order of Melchisedec."—Ps. cx. 4.

Such is God's testimony concerning the Priesthood of Messiah, David's Lord, who is the Christ. God's oath makes sure that his priesthood is unchangeable and never to pass away; for God has sworn to it "and will not repent," or change His mind: the thing is as fixed and eternal as it is possible to be made. "The law maketh men high priests which have infirmity, but the word of the oath, which was since the law, maketh the Son, who is consecrated forever more."—Heb. vii. 28. There is no limitation to the Son's priesthood here: "But this man, because he continueth ever, hath an unchangeable priesthood. Wherefore he is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them."—Heb. vii. 24, 25. Here is no limit to the priesthood of Christ, unless he shall cease to live: if he can die, his priesthood may end; not without.

He is made a Priest by the oath of God, after the order of Melchisedec. This personage was "King of righteousness, and after that also King of Salem, which is King of peace, . . . having neither beginning of days, nor end of life; but made like unto the Son of God, abideth a Priest continually."—Heb. vii. 2, 3. Here is no countenance of the idea that the priesthood of Christ is ever to end, but the reverse. The date of the commencement of the priesthood of the Son of God and its end (if it ever is to end) is clearly hidden from view. In this character He hath "neither beginning of days nor end of life," so far as is revealed, but "abideth a Priest continually." Whoever attempts to limit it undertakes to "be wise above what is written," and should be careful that his theory does not set aside the oath of God.

Christ, during this present age or dispensation, is a priest upon his Father's throne; but the time will come when He will sit upon his own throne—that to which He is heir, viz., David's throne. "I have sworn unto David, my servant, thy seed will I establish forever, and build up thy throne to all generations."—Psa. lxxxix. 3, 4. "Once have I sworn by my holiness that I will not lie unto David. His seed shall endure forever, and his throne as the sun before me: it shall be established forever," etc.—Vs. 35–37. But this throne has been "overturned" for more than two thousand years; yet God's oath secures its re-establishment to Him "whose right it is," viz., David's Son, Jesus the Messiah.—Ezek. xxi. 27. This throne is Jesus' own throne; and, when re-established, is perpetual and eternal. That throne is upon this earth, for David never had a throne in heaven, nor in what some people call "the new earth"—meaning a literal new earth, formed after this earth has been dissolved by fire. If such an earth ever exists, David's throne never did exist there, and never will, unless it is removed from the scene of David's rule. But be that as it may, David's throne is secured to an heir, which all must admit is Jesus the Christ.

The question then arises, Will he exercise the office of his priesthood on his own throne? Let Jehovah himself answer: "Thus speaketh the Lord of hosts, saying, Behold the man whose name is the BRANCH; and he shall grow up out of his place, and he shall build the temple of the Lord; even He shall build the temple of the Lord; and He shall bear the glory, and shall sit and rule upon his throne; and He shall be a Priest upon his throne," etc.—Zech. vi. 12, 13.

I do not care whether the temple here spoken of is the literal or spiritual temple. If it is the spiritual, then we must look beyond this age for its completion, when all the materials are collected by a resurrection from the dead; and His sitting and ruling upon

His throne is when the temple is completed; "and He shall be a Priest upon his throne": hence his priesthood continues into the age following the present, or the kingdom of God age. The next age is the kingdom of God, which is to follow the present "wild beast" governments. Then will David's throne be re-occupied by its rightful heir, and his priesthood continue; "for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it."

Then, and not till then, if ever, will a mediatorial kingdom be established. God offered to ancient Israel to make them "a kingdom of priests" (see Ex. xix. 5, 6), if they would obey His voice. But they did not, and that kingdom came not into their hands, but God visited the "Gentiles, to take out of them a people" (Acts xv. 14), which Peter characterizes as "a royal priesthood." These are being trained, in this dispensation, to be rulers in "the kingdom of God," or dispensations to follow the present; for saith Jesus, "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame and am set down with my Father on his throne."—Rev. iii. 21. So, if a mediatorial kingdom is ever to be established it will be when the "royal priesthood" sit down with Christ on his throne, where he will still exercise the office of High Priest, and His brethren, honored with a place on his throne, will exercise the office of subordinate priests.

This order of things, like all other good things, the papists have attempted to forestall, by their human arrangements, by calling their mode of operations the "Mediatorial kingdom"; (and Protestants have borrowed their phraseology), thus "making the words of God of none effect by their traditions"; displacing God's arrangements of the ages, or dispensations, to exalt themselves in this mortal state.

I have not designed to give more than an outline of this subject in this article. I trust I have said enough to set candid inquirers after truth to thinking. By prayerful thinking we shall "grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and LIFE-GIVER, Jesus, the Anointed."—2 Pet. iii. 18. Let no one suppose they have come to know all the truth; for, at present, "we know in part," said the Apostle to the Gentiles. The ancient Jews stumbled and fell at the doctrine, brought out by the Apostles, "that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, and of the same body, and partakers of his promise in Christ by the gospel," (Eph. iii. 6); it was "the mystery, which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men, as it is now revealed unto the holy apostles and prophet, by the Spirit."—

Eph. iii. 3, 5. Let us see to it that we do not, like the Jews, stumble and fall at the doctrine of the great blessings to come to the Gentiles (who have never yet had the gospel) when the dispensation of the kingdom of God is opened; which is now nigh at hand, and is "the age to come," to be followed by "an endless succession of ages," when "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea."—Isa. xi. 9; Psal. lxxii. 19; Hab. ii. 14; Eph. iii. 21.

A COPY of the following communication was sent by the Author to the "Prophetic Conference" held in this City last Fall, with a desire to have it read there, while the original was sent to me. I did not suppose it would be read, because the object expressed by the "Call" for the Conference seemed to exclude it. But other subjects equally foreign to the expressed one were introduced and largely dwelt upon; such, for example, as "The Gathering of Israel," etc. I present the following as quite as appropriate, in my judgment. It is from P. ALLING, Norwalk, Ohio.—EDITOR.

"THE PRE-MILLENNIAL ADVENT OF CHRIST."

FROM P. ALLING.

To the Brethren convened in New York, October 30, 1878, to consider this subject.

GREETING:

THE announcement of this meeting to consider the pre-millennarian advent of Christ has given me very much joy; and had it been possible to be present and participate in the blessings of this meeting I should be glad; but as providence indicates otherwise, I will be present in spirit, and in my Christian salutations.

I have long been a firm believer in this doctrine, but was formerly equally as strong a believer in the popular dogma of the world's conversion through the agency of the church, aided by the Spirit of God, consequently know full well how to sympathise with others whose minds are similarly beclouded.

The difficulties I had to encounter in my change of sentiments were great, and at times seemed insurmountable; but being a firm believer that the Bible was of God and harmonious in all its parts, in process of time learned never to adopt a theory that contradicted any positive statements of this Book, but wait God's appointed time for light on passages that were dark and mysterious. As the result has been an enlightenment upon difficult passages and subjects, I take the liberty of throwing out some thoughts for the prayerful consideration of this assembly.

There are many Bible statements indicating the world's conversion, that with our past light are difficult to be disposed of, some of which are the following: "But as truly as I live all the earth shall be filled with the glory of God."—Num. xi. 21. "All the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations shall come and worship before me."—Psal. xxii. 27. Again: After the vials of God's wrath are poured out the Revelator says, Ch. xv. 4, "For all nations shall come and worship before thee; for thy judgments are made manifest." This fixes the time when this is to be done.

These, with many other promises of like import, are positive and clearly expressed statements, yet future, hard to be disposed of with the common theory "of the wreck of matter and crush of worlds" in immediate connection with the second advent of Christ. Thoughtful and intelligent minds, imbued with the spirit and a love for "every word that proceedeth from the mouth of God," hesitate about adopting a doctrine, so at variance with the literal import of such promises.

On the other hand, there is another class of Bible statements teaching most clearly that the above promises cannot possibly be fulfilled till after Christ's return. The following is a specimen. In Daniel ii. and vii. it is clearly revealed that there were to be four universal consecutive Gentile kingdoms, commencing with Babylon and ending with Rome. The last was to tread down the whole earth in each of its diversified forms of government, with its papal horn, which was to make war with the saints, and to prevail till the judgment, just as it is now doing.

In the book of Revelation the same Roman kingdom is kept up in various symbols: the last of which in chapter xvii. is under the figure of a great scarlet-colored beast, with seven heads and ten horns, full of the names of blasphemy, upon which is seated the great papal or Babylonish harlot; both of which are to continue till the judgment. Again: In the seven seals, the seven trumpets, and the seven vials, we have so many consecutive lines of prophecy, filled up with evil, spanning all time between the first and the second advent of Christ; none of which will admit of a millennial peace, prior to the judgment. Other prophecies, both of the Old and New Testament Scriptures, are all in harmony with these outlines of earth's history to the end of the present dispensation. Then how can we harmonize the promised blessings, first noted above, unless the word of the Lord reveals a probationary state after the second advent of Christ? Here was the real difficulty in my experience. But, thanks be to God, in process of time, through the aid of others, my mind has been enlightened to see we have in Christ the antitype of the Melchisedec high priest, who in Abraham's day was both priest and king. I used to believe, with many others, that Christ's priestly office ended when he came as king; after which there was no further propitiation for any class forever. But now I see the mistake. He gives up nothing, but adds to his priestly office the regal, and holds both forever, consequently never ceases to be gracious to "the ignorant and them that are out of the way." This, of course, is an extension of probation to the age or ages to come, which is a joyful thought. But the great question is, as to who are to be the recipients of this grace? This opens a broad field for investigation, the outlines of which can only be defined, and that too very briefly. We will begin by a quotation from Rom. xi. 32, which is a finale of the apostle's argument in relation to both Jew and Gentile to times future; thus, "For God hath concluded them all (margin—or shut them all up together) in unbelief, that he might have mercy upon all." Israel's final cutting off and unbelief, was after their rejection of Christ, when a veil was spread over them, which yet continues. The work of grace to the Gentiles that then began was limited to the taking out from them "a people for his name"; after this he (Christ) will "return, and build again the tabernacle of David, which is fallen down—and I will build again the ruins thereof, and I will set it up, that the residue of men might seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles upon whom my name is called, saith the Lord, who doeth all these things. Known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world."—Acts xv. 14–18. This testimony is to the point and establishes a time of mercy both to the Jews and Gentiles after the return of Christ, and includes all of the two classes, shut up in unbelief. This people, taken out from the Gentiles, is an elect or a chosen few, who are perfected like Christ, our living head, by trials and conflicts through faith in his name, to fill out the vacuum caused by the cutting off of Israel the natural branches, agreeable to the covenant God made with them in the land of Moab, at the end of their forty years of wandering in the wilderness. See Deut. chapters.

But when and where were the Gentiles shut up in unbelief?

In Genesis ix. and xi. we have the record of the covenant of the bow, which God set in the clouds, that he would no more destroy all flesh, with a flood of water, made with Noah, and all flesh. Soon after, as they journeyed from the east, they came to the land of Shinar, where they established themselves and built a city, to make for themselves a name and to prevent their being scattered abroad over the earth. In that city they began a tower which was to reach unto heaven. At this point God confounded their language and scattered them abroad over all the earth. Soon after God called Abraham out from among them, and commanded him to go into the land of Canaan, and covenanted "to give him that land for an everlasting inheritance," which was yet future in Stephen's day (Acts vii), as also in our day. God also covenanted with him thus: "In thee and in thy Seed (Christ) shall all the nations of the earth," yea, "all the families of the earth, be blessed." When Abraham went out, agreeably to that command, all the other nations and families of the earth were "shut up in unbelief"—outside of a saving knowledge of God—"without God and without hope in the world," and were "strangers to the covenant of promise," and so continued for at least two thousand years, till the conversion of Cornelius (the first Gentile) in about A. D. 42. But did they not have a law written upon their hearts? Certainly, but it was not the law of Moses, the schoolmaster, to bring them to Christ; nor was it the law of faith in the LIFE-GIVER of the world, but rather a law of discernment between right and wrong in matters of this world, culminating in human governments as their highest attainments, and in idolatry as their religion. This was their wisdom after they disregarded the knowledge of God as seen in the flood and in the "covenant of the bow set in the clouds." And why? Because they did not wish to retain him in their thoughts and in their ways; therefore they were given over to worship four-footed beasts and creeping things, reptiles, etc.

As a mass they are thus to remain until the prophecy in Jer. iii. 8, 9 is fulfilled; which reads thus: "Therefore, wait ye upon me, saith the Lord, until the day that I rise up for the prey; for my determination is to gather the nations, that I may assemble the kingdoms to pour upon them mine indignation, even all of my fierce anger: for all the earth shall be devoured with the fire of my jealousy. For then will I turn to the people a pure language, that they may all call upon the name of the Lord to serve him with one consent." Now, as we are taught by Christ that there is to be a resurrection of the dead—"of all that are in their graves"—and as the apostle has it—"all that die in Adam are to be made alive" (in the resurrection) "in Christ," is it unreasonable to believe that this grace of a pure language will be extended to these nations, and these families of earth, shut out by an impure language? I think not. Again: As Christ "tasted death for every man," and "is the true light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world," why will not this be a fulfilment of the covenant God made with Abraham, of blessing all the nations and families of earth?

Here let it be understood that these promises are not to be construed into a universal, unconditional salvation, as claimed by our Universalist friends, but rather an unconditional invitation extended by Christ and his immortalized Bride, after her marriage to the Lamb, unitedly given, as saith the Revelator, "Whosoever will let him take of the waters of life freely." O what a glory this will be. Paul records it thus, "For there is one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time."—1 Tim. ii. 5, 6. To all of these classes shut up in unavoidable ignorance, under this "veil of covering spread over all nations"—(Isa. xxv.) their due time will then have come to hear of this salvation, and come, if they will, and submit to be saved by accepting and obeying Christ.

These and other clearly expressed statements of the Bible teach that the entire race of man must, in the past, present, or future ages of the world, have an opportunity of hearing the terms of this salvation as clearly and explicitly before they are assigned to the power of the second death, as did Adam and Eve in the beginning. After heaving, obedience to the laws of life will be required. This class, who then come in, are the subjects of the kingdom, and never attain unto the high office of kings and priests, and are to be ruled over by those who gain the two, five, or ten talents, as taught by Christ.

As to the nations and multitudes of earth, who live in the Gospel Age, under the influences of the Spirit which was to convict the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment, and have had the opportunity of hearing of Christ and his salvation, and neglect or refuse to submit; no second opportunity will be granted them any more than was to our first parents after they had disobeyed God's law; their loss will be eternal and without remedy. At least, so these things appear to me.

With this view we can readily harmonize the doctrine of the pre-millennial advent of Christ, as an impending event, with the prophecies of both the Old and New Testament scriptures without violence to any portion thereof. As, also, see the goodness and mercy of God toward the race.

These views are not altogether original, but are borrowed from others, but the arrangement is new.

THE BRIGHT SIDE OF PROPHECY.

It is one of the characteristics of the prophecy that even its darkest scenes are heralds of light; its storms precede a calm; its judgments on ungodly nations are parts of the process by which eventually righteousness will cover the earth; and its destruction of the Antichrist and his allies prepares the way for the universal reign of the Prince of Peace. This is God's mode of working, and it is worthy of his infinite wisdom and goodness. He has in view the final and permanent establishment of truth and peace in the world, and the means by which he will realise his ultimate purpose are perfectly adapted to the end in view. It is not enough to say that the loyal will adore him for the glorious issue when it has been reached; they will also, in reviewing the process which secured the issue, say, "This also came forth from the Lord of Hosts, who is wonderful in counsel and excellent in working."

Sometimes we find predictions so exquisitely beautiful, and clothed in language of such regal splendor that even the most vigorous faith is conscious of doubt. A mental glance at the state of the world and the church shows that both come immeasurably short of the divine picture with which the prophet has fired our hearts; and so the question comes, in lying serpent fashion, How is this picture to become a fact? The old notion—child of human pride and ignorance—that we are a necessary factor in the divine operations, starts up in its usual vanity, and because we are not so useful in the service of heaven as we should be, God's prophets fondly described a state of things which will never come to pass, and the God of the prophets made promises which he is unable to fulfill! If Christian people would only put the misgiving suggestion that troubles them in so many words thus, they would be ashamed of themselves and ask pardon of the Father. With him all things promised are virtually accomplished. He knows what he means to do, and he will do exactly what he means. He may use us, and if he does it will be a supreme honor; but it would be just as well if governments and ecclesiastical confederacies distinctly understood that he can do without them.

But we are not left to the mercy of argument or inference for a reply to our question. The Lord understands us thoroughly, and so has graciously anticipated our doubts and misgivings by an answer which, though couched in a few simple words, is positively wonderful for its depth of meaning: "The zeal of the Lord of Hosts will perform this." If we are dealing with rationalistic skepticism, we would say, earnestly: Now marshal all your doubts, and put in battle array all your misgivings and improbabilities, and when you have got your army in the best possible position, see if it can face that grand oracle of the Most High without quailing. "The zeal of the Lord of Hosts" is engaged to accomplish all his beneficent designs regarding our world, and they will be accomplished, all your proud reasonings to the contrary notwithstanding. But we do not write for men of this class at present. There are believers of the Gospel of Christ who have been trained in a very narrow school of thought; which has led them to the conception that unfulfilled prophecy is simply inexplicable mystery; or that, stripping off the "oriental imagery," all that is meant is some spiritual blessing which the missions of the Church will carry to the nations. In other words, they "spiritualise," and so neutralise, some of the grandest prophecies of the seers of Israel and Judah, and commit to the hands of men deeds which cannot be accomplished without supernatural power.

And, be it observed, this dread of supernaturalism—for that is the heart of the matter—is extremely inconsistent on the part of Christian men. All that they believe of the truths of the Gospel is founded upon the supernatural. But for divine intervention they could have had no Gospel, no Saviour, no hope of eternal life. The Gospel narratives are the history of the miraculous; and it may be, nay it is certain, that there will be divine intervention again in the affairs of the world before it can be transformed into the splendid paradise which the bright side of prophecy makes it. Let skeptics scoff at the supernatural if it so please them, but for believers in the incarnation of the Son of God and his resurrection from the dead, to do so is at once inconsistent, absurd, and sinful. Alas! good men stand in the way of God's truth more than bad men. Of course they do not mean it for a moment, but the fact is nevertheless true that the mournful ignorance of many true Christians respecting the contents of the Divine Book has hindered the testimony of faithful witnesses to the grand doctrines of the Book—that eternal life is the gift of God in Christ, that the Church is the body of Christ, and that the entire world is the destined kingdom of Christ. The teachers of these magnificent truths—few in number, and generally poor and despised—are in harmony with prophets and apostles, and, of course, with the Lord of both; but the spiritualising, that is to say the neutralising majority, will not hear them, and so the bright side of prophecy is covered with fog, and the benign purpose of God respecting the world is unknown.

It is in the Book in many a glowing paragraph, radiant with the light and love of heaven; but the innate dislike to the supernatural of men who owe everything to the supernatural, has suggested metaphor or parable where neither exists; and thus the "glorious things which are spoken" of the city and throne of the Lord on Mount Zion, and of the entire world under his beneficent reign, through the executive ministry of his "princes"—those members of the Church which are fitted for this high service—are hidden from view as a magnificent landscape is sometimes concealed by a dense fog. Nevertheless it is all there, and when the fog is dispersed by the power of the sun the entranced spectator will behold it in its beauty. So, whether the teachers of Christendom are fit for their work or not, the day is coming "when the Lord of Hosts shall reign in Mount Zion and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously"; and "the name of the city from that day shall be THE LORD IS THERE.—DR. LEASK, Editor of The Rainbow.

EVANGELICAL THEOLOGY AND CHRISTIAN LIFE.

BY HENRY DUNN.

THAT the theological system of the Puritans was in some points very defective must certainly be admitted. I have already indicated one serious blot if I have truly affirmed of the men of that party that the spirit and temper of Judaism pervaded their characters, biased their judgment, and sanctified their errors. It was a necessary consequence of this Judaical tendency that they overlooked or misconceived much in the teaching of Christ which, properly understood, is distinctive of Christianity, and essential to a right understanding of its nature and character. The doctrine of non-resistance is a case in point. They seem to have been absolutely unconscious that any inconsistency was involved in their appeal to the sword.

And yet what can be clearer than the teaching of Christ that while the soldier—called being a soldier—is, by express permission, allowed to continue in his vocation, the disciple is not the less forbidden to choose that position, although it be in the support of a cause sacred, as is that of liberty when in conflict with tyranny and wrong? The reason of the distinction is obvious. The soldier, “called being a soldier,” is, like law itself, so far as his official obligations are concerned, only the passionless expression of the supreme will of the community. As such he sustains the police of nations, and is the instrument without which the magistrate would bear the sword in vain, and cease to be a terror to evil-doers.

The position of a disciple voluntarily taking up arms is very different, since he is distinctly forbidden, in the Sermon on the Mount, to resist evil, or to struggle with men of the world for either equality or pre-eminence. The doctrine set forth in that sermon plainly is, that truth and righteousness—and this includes civil and religious liberty—will be most efficiently secured and preserved among men by suffering testimony—by the holding up, on the part of the few, of an example similar, however inferior, to that which was maintained by Christ himself when he was on earth; a testimony that is obviously above, and therefore foreign to the conceptions of the multitude even when Christianized; one that involves, in every form, the highest self-sacrifice; one that must appear, to ordinary religious men, sometimes extravagant, sometimes extremely foolish and mischievous, always destructive of satisfactions which, assumed to be innocent, are the great objects of desire among men, whether heathen or Christian, Jew or Gentile.

My own impression is, that Christ's main object, so far as can be gathered from what is left on record, was not so much to influence society at large as to call out of the world a body of disciples for the special purpose of bearing witness to the highest forms of truth; a body that was to consist of men who should fairly represent him in the earth, think as he thought, and walk as he walked; men who should willingly (by choice, not by compulsion) abandon the honors and dignities of this world even as he did, and who, being really pilgrims and strangers here, should have their affections, not their thoughts, exclusively fixed on that which is to come—“a city, having foundations, whose builder and maker is God.”

It was to these, always regarded as “a little flock” and “a peculiar people,” that he entrusts his truth and his memory, calling upon them to follow in his footsteps, even though it should involve, as it had done to him, mockery, reproach, loss of liberty, or even death. He looks forward to a body of this kind, however small or despised, as being the future “light” and “salt” of the world—one which would always hold up a standard that should be unaffected by the changes which were sure to take place when Christianity enlarged its borders. The Puritans did not believe in this circle within a circle. They regarded every believing man as an elect child of God, however feeble his faith, or however inconsistent much of his conduct might be—“The earth is the Lord's,” said they, and we his saints are its rightful rulers. They assumed that the triumph of Christ was identified with their success; and they imagined that promises bearing only on the dispensation to come, would be fulfilled in their own present experience.

But the teaching of Scripture does not favor notions of this character. The elect of God are the elite of the universe. To such alone can the term “Bride of Christ” be properly applied; for none but they can share in the throne and priesthood of the risen Saviour. Who they are, or where they are to be found, it is not for any man to enquire. Hidden at present from mortal eye, they will one day be owned and made manifest, before an assembled world, as the best, the noblest, the most Christ-like souls earth, with all its discipline, and heaven, with all its love, can fashion and bring forth.

Lawful enough it may be for us, in our ignorance, to hope that we ourselves, and those whom we see around us in the daily Christian intercourse of life, with whose prayers we mingle our own, and with whom we share the fellowship alike of Christian effort and of church communion, all belong to that blessed company; for, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it is not fitting that we should form any other judgment. But it is not really so. Only a part are chosen to honor. For God's elect, did we know them, would be found even now worthy of their name, and very different from those who only perplex by their inconsistencies, or plague by their folly.

Loving, trustful, and unselfish; broad in their sympathies, candid in their judgments, honorable in their lives, and humble in the estimate they form of themselves, these, the true sons and daughters of the Highest, will one day issue from the obscurity in which it pleases God as yet to hide them, and "they shall walk in white, for they are worthy." From deepest poverty and peasants' huts, with here and there, it may be, one from the palaces of princes; from lonely prisons, and from martyrdoms severer than those of the axe or the stake; cultured, or rude of speech; great souls, of whom the world knows nothing, will then come forth, and stand confessed God's own nobility, the aristocracy of the skies.

To be saved is one thing, but to be honored of God and of Christ is quite another thing. To be forgiven is much; but to hold rank among the sanctified is far more. The one is not unfrequently found in combination with the ambitions of this world; the other, even now, has no heartfelt affinities with anything that does not more or less, bear on the world that is to come.

What is said in Scripture regarding the rewards that will be bestowed in the world to come on some believers and withheld from others, seems to me necessarily to suppose the existence of a higher as well as a lower class in the Christian community. For these rewards are not promised either to those who but fulfill the ordinary obligations of Christianity, or to men who are known only as professed followers of the Redeemer. They are always spoken of as the recompense of special service, special devotedness, or special faith bringing forth unusual results. Nor is their bestowal at all inconsistent with the declaration that at the best we are but unprofitable servants and can never do more than it is our duty to do.

The little stress laid by the Puritans on inducements to holiness drawn from promises of reward, and their rare application of such teachings as motives to exertion, was a natural consequence of the prevailing belief that no essential differences exist among real Christians, that in the eye of God they are all seen alike in Christ as "dear children." This, when viewed in combination with their belief that all but the elect were reprobate from birth, and, to bestow the words of the Westminster Confession, "fore-ordained to dishonor and wrath, to be for their sin inflicted, to the praise of the glory of God's justice," while the happiness of heaven would largely consist in gazing on the torments of the lost, must have had a most injurious influence on the moral character of multitudes. Here, then, we have a most serious blot resting on Puritan theology.

And this leads me to notice that not in Puritanism only, but in much of our modern Evangelical teaching, the ethical is too often regarded as subordinate to the doctrinal, right doing being frequently deemed of less importance than right thinking, and correct conduct less regarded than correct opinions, or rather what are supposed to be such.

I do not of course mean to say that any good man, let his system of theology involve what it may, will ever deliberately regard his actions as of less importance than his notions; for he must know perfectly well that the one question of supreme importance at last will not so much relate to what has been believed, or even to what has been done, as to what a man has become under the discipline and teaching of the Divine Spirit, whether or no he is "a new creature in Christ Jesus." But many of these too often seem to forget that to the young, the inexperienced, and above all to outer worshipers in the temple of truth, it is of the highest moment that their attention should be constantly directed to the moral element in the New Testament; that conduct should never be regarded as of slight importance even before the soul is renewed; that the fact should continually be urged upon them that a good moral life is by Christ himself declared to be a fitting preparation for the reception of spiritual truth; that faith in the doctrine proclaimed by the Redeemer, and ability to perceive its Divine character, is best promoted by obedience.

At first sight one would say that all Christians admit this. But they do so under many reservations. The Thirteenth Article of the Church of England distinctly declares that good works done before the grace of Christ and the inspiration of His Spirit are received "have the nature of sin," which, if true, certainly leads to the conclusion that they have no value as quickeners of spiritual insight, for that which is of the nature of sin cannot tend to promote the perception of Divine truth. And yet Christ said to men who were rejecting Him, that he who doeth the will of the Father shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God or not.

The Puritans intensified another view of things to the uttermost, and in their zeal for the divine sovereignty, and eager denial of all good in an unconverted man, stripped Christianity of its educational character, and contentedly consigned the multitude to eternal perdition.

The result was precisely what might have been expected. No sooner were the conventional forces by which the people had been restrained withdrawn, than the young men of the age—almost all who were not really converted to Christ—rushed into licentiousness and profanity, and swelled the torrent of wickedness, which now overflowed everywhere. Stillfleet, writing before the Restoration says of the time, "Controversies about religion have increased till they have brought religion itself into a controversy." And again—"I fear this will be the character whereby our age will be known to posterity; that it was the age wherein men talked of religion most, and lived it least."

Such then, in brief, I hold to be the true explanation of the disastrous change which took place in the character of the English people after the Restoration, and for which the nation had been gradually preparing since the accession of Cromwell.

The lesson conveyed is an instructive one. It may be summed up in the conclusion that although Evangelical teaching may be universally diffused, no precept of Christ can be violated with impunity, however such violation may be supported by sophistical reasonings, or sanctioned by the religious; as the appeal to the sword undoubtedly was in the times of the Commonwealth.

Secondly, that no form of Evangelical thought, no system of theology, however orthodox, will suffice to retain spiritual life among any people who habitually live below their profession, or who place doctrine, however true, before conscientious obedience to the commands of the Saviour.

HENRY DUNN.

AN INTERNAL EVIDENCE OF CHRISTIANITY.

Of the internal evidences by which Christianity recommends itself as true, one of the greatest, but one too little regarded, is that it represents the higher destiny of mankind to be attainable only through suffering. All of us experience the truth of the declaration of the apostle, that "The whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together." All the higher and deeper feelings of our nature at once acknowledge this to be true in a spiritual as well as a literal sense. How small is the actual sum of human happiness compared with what we might have hoped or imagined it to have been! Man is, indeed, born to trouble, and no system can explain away the broad fact that so long as we are in the body we must be, more or less, in one way or another sufferers.

This is to my mind all but a conclusive proof that the "desire of all nations"—the promised Messiah—must have come to suffer. "Behold and see if there be any sorrow like unto His sorrow." How totally different to all the world's ideas of deliverance was that of a suffering Messiah, and yet to the mind and conscience how truly does it accord with the inmost desires and feelings!

In this world men look to power, mighty armies, strong navies, great talents, commanding eloquence, as the means whereby deliverance is to be effected, and associate the ideas of dignity and grandeur with such. But these are not the weapons by which spiritual victories are gained. "We wrestle not," says the apostle, "against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places." Hence it is that earthly weapons and earthly influence, however apparently great, and however likely to produce the end in view, rarely if ever succeed. "Non tali auxilio nec defensoribus istis." Did not our Lord recognize the truth of this when he said that he could have twelve legions of angels to assist him against his enemies; but their aid would, in that case, have been too much in the nature of earthly force and power. Do the greatest conquerors, after all, ever really conquer by great armies or great power? We are beginning to ask this in these days, when we almost everywhere refuse to employ force in the case of conscience. Force may crush the body, but it is utterly unable to overcome the soul.

An enemy is only really conquered when he is converted into a friend, and our Lord's object in coming on earth was to reconcile all things to his Father; to make willing subjects of rebels; to cause his Father's name to be not simply revered but loved, nay, adored. Who can doubt that God could in a moment have crushed all his rebellious subjects; but who doubts also that such was not his wish nor intention? No; he intended a far greater conquest. His Son was to be a Redeemer in the highest, noblest sense; a conqueror who should "destroy the works of the devil," and thereby clothe himself with dignity and grandeur unspeakable.

- And when we come to speak of dignity and grandeur, what can be more so? what can more fully embody all that is involved in real dignity and majestic grandeur than the image of the spotless sufferer led forth to execution, to die the death of a criminal? I hesitate not to declare that the grandest sight the world ever witnessed was the patient demeanor, the calm dignity, the noble resignation to the will of his Father of that glorious Being. What is it that fixes the attention and rivets the fancy in such a picture as Doré's "Christ Leaving the Prætorium"? Surely it is the central figure of the innocent sufferer, like "a lamb without blemish and without spot," bearing the sins of a guilty race, to reconcile that race to his Father. Pilate little thought of the deep solemnity of the words he uttered when he said, "Behold the man!" The purple robe and the crown of thorns were solemn realities, typifying that the Kingship was only to be obtained through suffering:

"Did e'er such love and sorrow meet,
Or thorns compose so rich a crown?"

How infinitely grander was such a crown than one composed of all the gold and jewels that earth could afford! When was there ever a conqueror so exalted as the "King of the Jews?" He was a King who had in his own person sounded the utmost depths of woe and sorrow, and knew their force and power. What could he have done more than he did? He went down to the lowest depths of humiliation and suffering that he might be the Redeemer of men from every form of humiliation and suffering. Can there be, or is it possible to conceive anything more wonderful than the Son of the Most High God suffering the death of a slave and a criminal? Well might Nature, though ordinarily impassive and impervious to pain and sorrow, veil her face, and thick darkness spread over the earth!

When we feel most inclined to complain of our sufferings in this world, does not the thought of this great event stifle all our murmurings? Does the slave groan under the cruel blows of tyranny? Does the criminal turn away in horror at the thought of what he must undergo? Did not the King of the Jews endure the same, and did not a fate as terrible await the Lord of all? Despised and rejected of men; led out to crucifixion without the camp; a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief.

"O, Head so full of bruises,
So full of pain and scorn."

Thus the Redeemer of mankind—the promised Messiah—was, in the fullest sense of the word, a sufferer, for so, and so only, could he be a victor in the spiritual conflict.

The death of the Cross, I regard then, as one of the great proofs that Christ was the promised Messiah, the Deliverer of the race from its present bondage of corruption. Of course I do not mean to say that this fact in itself is any proof of his being such. But taken in conjunction with other facts it becomes of the highest possible importance in that respect. When we remember that he was, by the confession of all, a man who went about doing good; that he gave the world the most marvelously sublime and beautiful precepts; that no one of his adversaries could accuse him of any fault or sin. And at the same time that he never held out to his followers any hopes of comfort or reward in this world; but, on the contrary, told them that they would have to follow in his footsteps and be set at naught by men; yet invariably, when asked, proclaimed himself to be the promised Messiah. Then, I say, it is impossible to resist the inference that his was the most sublime and beautiful character the world ever saw; and that he is, in fact, just the Messiah that the soul of man most cordially embraces as the one that was promised. If there was to be a Messiah at all, surely Jesus Christ answered exactly to all the particulars, both of prophecy and promise, and above all, answered to the deepest feelings of the human mind.

All the best men in every age have confessed that they were "pilgrims and strangers" upon earth; that to be misunderstood, despised, rejected, counted as madmen or as fools was, and must be, the lot of those who look for higher, nobler things than this earth can afford. Under God's providence, however, this very rejection and persecution become the means whereby these same things are procured. How else but through suffering is it possible for the noblest feelings of our nature to be developed? Surely it is true, then, that "it became him by whom are all things, in bringing many sons to glory, to make the Captain of their salvation perfect through suffering."

It is often argued that if the Deity were so merciful a Being as we hope he is, he would not have subjected man to such temptations as he has done, but would at once have made him perfect. But surely this is to take a very narrow view of the case. If the object of the Deity has been to make a very insipid race of beings, he would at once have made that race perfect, as no one for a moment wished to make a noble God-like race of beings, a race who should be fit for dominion over the works of his hands, then I contend He must first subject that race to stern discipline. Had it not been so, would he ever have created man to exist in a place where, as we have every reason to believe, evil already existed? The fact of his having done so is, therefore, a proof that he meant the dominion, and rule, and authority to be ultimately given to man.

Hence it is that all men are subjected now to vanity and suffering; and hence, also, it was necessary that the Messiah—the deliverer of the race—should himself be a sufferer. But having once suffered and died, “He dieth no more,” but has “abolished death and brought life and immortality to light.” And now, therefore, He has gone forth “conquering and to conquer,” giving gifts unto men, yea, even his enemies, that the Lord God might dwell among them.

This, then, was the grand object of Christ's coming into our world—“that the Lord God might dwell among men.”—Selected.

THE SPIRITUAL MAN.

WHAT is meant by the spiritual man? Every one is spiritual who loves Jesus, the Saviour who died for him. Simple and encouraging as this answer is, it implies the mystery of Christ and the Church. Only he is spiritual who is in Christ; a member of the mystical body of which the glorified Head is in heaven, a branch in the true Vine; who, by the power of the Holy Ghost, has been transplanted out of Adam, out of the realm of sin and nature, into the Second Adam, the Kingdom of righteousness and grace. To become spiritual requires a new birth from above; to be spiritual is to possess the Spirit of Christ as an indwelling Spirit, uniting us with Christ the Lord, who is the Head of the Church. Here is a great mystery.

At the right hand of God, enthroned in glory, possessing all power in heaven and on earth, adored by angels, we behold Jesus, the Son of man, in whom dwelleth the fulness of the Godhead bodily. Below, on earth, are the members of his body, his people, who by faith and the indwelling of the Spirit are one with him. They are the children of Adam, yet they are no longer in Adam, but in Christ, new creatures; sin still dwells in them, yet sin has no longer dominion over them, yet Christ dwells in their hearts by faith. They think, and speak, and act as other men do, yet it is Christ who lives in them, who by his Spirit guides and animates them, and brings forth the fruits of righteousness and holiness. They have bodies of infirmity and death, and yet their bodies are the temple of the Holy Ghost, who shall quicken them at the coming of Jesus, and change them into bodies of glory and immortality. They are living on earth, but their citizenship is in heaven. They are branches of a tree whose root is at the right hand of God. They are in a world doomed to death by the corruption of lust, but they are partakers of the Divine nature. They are men, and yet they are more than men; for they are Christ-men, and Christ is the incarnate Son of God. They are counted the off-scouring of the earth; they have been mocked, persecuted, imprisoned, tortured, killed; but they shall come again, and with Christ Jesus be the rulers and kings of the earth. Such are the spiritual, Spirit-born, and Spirit-inhabited men, the sinners who, saved by grace, love Jesus Christ and him crucified.

God manifests himself in creation in ascending gradations. In vast inorganic masses, as sustaining force; in the world of plants and animals, as the fountain of life, the Creator of organism; in man, as the Source of wisdom and love. Beautiful is the light which is reflected in the precious stone; yet the rose or the simplest daisy is much higher and nobler than the most beautiful gem; and higher than any plant is the life which speaks to us in the touching notes of the nightingale; and incomparably higher than the highest manifestation of animal life is the smile of a child, or the first utterances out of the mouths of babes, proclaiming God's praise.

But as man is above the noblest and highest representatives of the animal world, and as the animal is above the plant, and the plant above the stone, so is the Son of man, the Christ, above humanity; and so are the Christ-men above the natural Adamic race. And as no stone develops into a plant, or plant into a bird, or animal into man,* so humanity never produced Christ, the Son of man. He came from above, out of the bosom of the Father; he is from heaven, Lord of all. So are the Christ-men, not born of the flesh or the will of man, but of God. And as the plant appears on the substratum of the mineral world, and comprises all the noble elements it contains, and yet is above it; and the animal includes and embodies all the elements of plant life, and is king of the plant world: so is the Son of man the true and perfect man in whom all human excellencies and capabilities find their adequate expression and culminating point, and yet he is more than man—the Lord and Head. So are with and in him the Christ-men, true men, and yet more than men; they will reign over men with Christ. After the four kingdoms, which are represented by lion, bear, leopard, and the fierce beast, shall come the Son of man and the saints of the Most High; then shall be the reign of humanity.

* The teaching of Genesis i. is explicit. God called forth, by his creative power, out of the waters and the earth, the various species of plants and animals; each after his kind, “whose seed is in itself.” As for man, his creation is most solemnly narrated (Gen. i. 26); and upon this fundamental fact rests the whole superstructure of man's redemption by the Son of God, who became man.

Christ is the Lord from heaven in his divine glory, but also in his humanity. He is the Son of man, the spiritual man who has life, and who is able to change the natural man into a spiritual; for he can baptize with the Holy Ghost. And only he who is from above, and above all, can renew, quicken, and elevate man into a heavenly life and inheritance. He was born of the Virgin Mary, conceived by the Holy Ghost, and anointed with the Spirit without measure. Though his is a body of weakness, though he appears in the likeness of sinful flesh, though he is surrounded with suffering and evil, and is full of sorrow and acquainted with grief, see him throughout his walk on earth the spiritual, the heavenly Man, the Lord of life, liberty, power, and glory. Do not all Adamic men around him appear bondsmen, without light, without life, without goodness, without joy? What infinite distance is between him, as Son of man, and all others, even the disciples! When Jesus speaks, when he argues, when he quotes the Scriptures, what light, what simplicity, what depth! He speaks another language; he thinks and reasons and sees truth as one who lives in another element; he is the Son of man who is in heaven. How dark, how ignorant, how confused, how clumsy are all other men beside him! What liberty and dignity breathes in every word he utters, in every step he takes! He is the only man who walked on earth. All others move with uncertainty, err into by-paths, have to be turned back into the right way—they must retrace their steps. Christ walked always in the light, in love, in strength; the path of this Jesus man is like the shining light, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day. See him in his poverty; poorer than the foxes that have holes, and the birds of the air which have nests; but the whole world is his palace. How rich is he; free from care and irradiated with brightest serenity, he watches whole nights on the mountain top under the quiet stars of heaven; he sleeps calmly during the fearful tempest of the sea. Is he not Lord, as Man, when by faith in the Father he rebukes the sea, heals the sick, raises the dead? Have you watched him feeding the multitude with five loaves and two fishes? What poverty for a King and Messiah wherewith to welcome his people! See him as the Son of Man lifting his eyes unto heaven, and thanking the Father for his gift! See him by faith feeding the multitude, and sending them away satisfied and rejoicing—baskets of fragments remaining in rich exuberance of his bounty and love!

Jesus, the Son of Man, was the spiritual Man; tempted in all things as we are, yet without sin; with a body of weakness, not like that of the first Adam in Paradise, but in the likeness of sinful flesh. He lived by faith, and, abiding in the Father's love, kept his commandments, and thus was Lord of all. But he was alone. There was none like him. In that kingdom of which he spoke to Nicodemus, where only the Spirit-born can enter, he was as yet the only inhabitant. He had come—not to abide alone—to be the King and the Head of a new creation, of a spiritual humanity. And therefore he died. Oh, the love of our glorious Lord! He took upon him our sin. Looking unto God, he glorified divine holiness and justice, and took the severest view of sin. But looking unto man, he took the most loving and gentle view of sin. He looked upon it as a disease, and is he not the Physician to heal? He looked upon us as sheep who had gone astray, torn, wounded, perishing; and is he not the good Shepherd, full of pity and tenderness? He saw us as lying helpless and dying in the road, cruelly injured by the adversary; and is he not the compassionate and merciful Saviour who cannot pass by, but must save us even with his own death? Oh, what a Mediator between God and man! Him we love with adoration, and adore with love.

Christ rose from the dead the Second Adam, the quickening Spirit. Now begins the Church; now begins the fulfilment of the promise, "He shall see his seed." As the Church was manifested on Pentecost, so it is by the renewal of the Holy Spirit that each individual member is grafted into Christ. Not by birth, not by baptism, not by our own works, but by the Spirit are we joined to the Lord. To become a Christian is not to adopt certain opinions and habits, not to engraft new thoughts and feelings and works on our former natural self; it is to become a new creature, to be changed by the power of the Holy Spirit to become spiritual. So great a thing is it to be a Christian, to be a Christ-man, a member of the body of which he is the Head. Yet so easy is it to become a Christian! You need only be a sinner, weary and heavy laden; you need only hear the voice, "Come unto me. If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink." A Christian is a man born of God. But whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ, is born of God.

Christ draws the believer unto himself; into himself; into closest communion of life and work. He identifies us with him. As he is, so are we in the world. He is the light of the world, and he assigns to us the same position. Like him, we are witnesses, priests and kings. As the Father sent Christ, so he sends us.

He wishes to raise us into most intimate union of life and power. When the disciples wondered that in consequence of Christ's word the fig-tree had withered away, the Saviour said, "Have faith in God!" If in union with Christ we have faith as a grain of mustard seed, we shall be able to remove mountains, and nothing shall be impossible to us. "He that believeth in me, the works that I do shall he do also, and greater works than these, because I go to the Father." Christ and the believers are one, because we are no longer merely natural, but spiritual men.

The Spirit is given unto us as the Spirit of sonship. We are not merely in the position of children, but we are in truth and reality the children of God. Our adoption is an actual investment with sonship. There can be in the nature of this no parallel to this in the earthly sphere. Christ is the only-begotten of the Father, and we in him are truly sons of God, for we are born of God and one with Christ. And because we are sons, God hath sent the Spirit of his Son into our hearts.

Think of it, believer, that the Spirit of filial trust, communion and delight in the Father, that was in Christ, is in thee also; that thou also knowest that the Father is always with thee, and that he loves thee with an infinite love. Take hold of Christ, and, trusting in him as thy Saviour, rise with him above fear and the atmosphere of nature and the first creation into the heavenly region of sonship, and say Abba in the full assurance of faith. And then go back to earth and man, to work and suffering, in the spirit of liberty, which the Son of God only can give, and which sons only possess. To do the will of God, in action or in suffering, will be no hardship and bondage, but, as it was to Christ, your "meat," the strength and refreshment of your life.

The Spirit of Christ is the Spirit of light. Now we understand and know what before was only dimly perceived as a theory. We have an unction from the Holy One, and know all things. The Christian is one who has the chrisma, the anointing. Christ is the Holy One who sends the Spirit. The world cannot receive the Holy Spirit, for it seeth and heareth him not; but the believer is a spiritual man. We know the truth. The apostle reminds the Christians here that they are taught of God (Theodidact); and that they are not dependent on human teaching. They are not to be led astray by the assumptions of philosophy and human erudition. Since in Christ are hid all the treasures of knowledge and wisdom, and they have the Spirit of Christ, whose it is to lead us into truth, they must only abide in communion with the Father and the Son, and they shall be taught all things as they need, and as it is salutary for them, according to the Spirit's wisdom and love. What we learn by the Spirit we hold fast; for, in learning it, we receive the assurance that it is God's truth.

The Spirit of Christ, of sonship, is eminently the Spirit of love. The life of Jesus on earth was a manifestation of love. Love is the fulfilment of the law, as well as the essence of the gospel. The law demands love, and thereby goes beyond itself, contradicts itself, announces its insufficiency, and stretches forth into the gospel. The law cannot give love, because it cannot give life. If life could come by the law, Christ and the gospel were not needed. The law is good, and holy, and just, but we are sinful and dead; the law is spiritual, but we are carnal; the law is fulfilled in love, but we cannot and do not respond to it. But what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God in his infinite mercy accomplished through Christ. In the new covenant, God gives us the Spirit; and the righteousness of the law is fulfilled in us—we love. Therefore the Spirit is essentially love. The law demands love, the Spirit creates love. And this as the Spirit of Christ. All his life on earth was love to God and man. His zeal for the glory and truth of God, his holiness and uninterrupted communion with the Father, manifested itself in his unfailing patience, meekness, gentleness, and forbearance. The most blasphemous and malicious accusations of his enemies he answers calmly. He weeps over Jerusalem, he washes his disciples' feet, he dies for them on the cross. All that is in the world, however evil and dark and bitter, brings out only the fullness of his love. Hence to be filled with the Spirit of Christ is to love; it is to possess the Spirit of a Divine love, which "beareth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things"—the Spirit of Christ crucified, whose love no waters could quench, for it was stronger than death.

The spiritual man lives on earth, and he has to meet affliction and sorrow, he has to deal with sin and doubt, he has to keep himself unspotted from the world, and he has finally to meet death. The Apostle Paul (Rom. viii.) gives a very full and glorious exposition of the spiritual man's position, trial, and victory.

1. With regard to the afflictions and trials which, in this world of sin and sorrow, press often heavily on the child of God. The Spirit is the Comforter. He is tender, for he is the Spirit of Jesus who wept. Nay, the Spirit is in deepest sympathy with all suffering creation. It is because we have the first-fruits of the Spirit that we groan within ourselves, waiting for the redemption. But the Spirit enables us to compare the sufferings of the present time with the glory which shall be revealed in us. It is easy, in times of sunshine and peace, to say, "Heaven will be still more beautiful and lovely than earth"; but, in affliction and grief, the Holy Spirit only can give us a realizing and comforting hope of glory. But the Spirit not only sustains us in trials, he watches also over the precious seed which, unconsciously to the soul, falls into its depths, and which yields afterward the peaceable fruits of righteousness. Without the Spirit of Christ, afflictions would not merely be comfortless, but barren and unfruitful. But the Spirit of Christ, who through sufferings entered into his glory, converts afflictions into the cross, and worketh in us patience, experience, hope—a fuller life of love.

2. In relation to sin. Christ was sinless; the tempter could find nothing in him. The poisonous influences of the world could not penetrate into his holy soul. He was harmless and undefiled. Christ was filled with the Spirit. He knew the weakness of the flesh, but he knew no sin. But we are full of sin; we have to do both with sins and with sin, with the manifestations and the existence of the carnal mind, the flesh, in which dwelleth no good thing. Yet we are not carnally-minded, but spiritually-minded; we are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit; for Christ is in us, and we have the Spirit of Christ. How, then, are we to solve this apparent contradiction? In what other way than by Faith? By reckoning ourselves to have died unto sin; by resting in the death of Jesus and his redemption; by believing that Christ has redeemed us from the guilt and power of sin. If we thus look unto Christ, the Spirit works in us mightily.* Sin is imprisoned as a criminal; it is mortally wounded, nay, it is put to death. He who endeavors to fight with sin and to destroy it, apart from the death of Christ, apart from the perfect pardon and acceptance which God has given to us in Jesus, sinks back into the region of law and the fallen creation, and must experience that the law is not the death, but the strength of sin. Rest in the death of Jesus, and you will experience that sin lies enchained; the Spirit crucifies sin by the cross of Christ, and by the resurrection-power he constantly renews our life; so that, although we live in the flesh, we do not walk according to the flesh.

The whole secret of the Christian's life is looking unto Jesus. We believe that in him we are complete, and that actually and according to the rights of the New Testament in his blood, we possess in him liberty and holiness; therefore we have peace, though constantly fighting against sin; we have life, though we are in the body of death. The crucifixion of the old man is accompanied with peace. It is not by self-imposed penances, abstinences, mortifications, that we overcome sin. All this may be carnal and making the cross of Christ of none effect. When we crucify the old man we are not in doubt and torment, in the spirit of bondage and uncertainty; we are rejoicing in Christ Jesus. We rest in full assurance of faith in the redemption which we have in his blood, and it is thus that we know the power of his resurrection. Looking unto Jesus in perfect peace and liberty, we receive strength to conquer sin and to mortify the members which are upon earth. The great and faithful High Priest applies by the Spirit the power of his blood unto our hearts; and a Christian is full of peace and joy while he denies himself and fights the good fight of faith. His position is within the gates of the city of peace; his discipline is by the grace of God which bringeth salvation.

* The Spirit of God reproves and rebukes; he rouses the conscience, and leads us to judge ourselves. The reason of this is our continual forgetfulness of the power of Christ's death and resurrection. The more we are filled with the Spirit, the more Christ lives in us, the less work will there be for the conscience. We are to live by faith, and our definition of sin is, "Whatsoever is not of faith is sin!" "Abide with me" is the simple but all-comprehensive counsel and command of our loving Saviour.

And the Spirit himself helpeth our infirmities, so that we have abundant reason to praise the Lord and to be always rejoicing. Only believe that you have died with Christ and that you are risen with him! You are justified by faith, you are sanctified by faith. The spiritual man knows nothing save Christ crucified, the living Christ! The Spirit always directs us to the Father and to Christ, not to Himself and the work within us. As Otinger, in his paraphrase of Isaiah lv., says from deep experience: "Do not treat my gospel as a law. It becomes a law to you, if you wish to understand the manner of your growth. But you are to look at the source of your growth and not to the mysterious process of the Spirit within you. Christ is to you grace, righteousness, wisdom, strength, without your knowing exactly what passes in your heart. For my grace works in a hidden way; you can understand the working of grace as little as you can explain how the rain makes the earth fruitful. Rest assured that my word shall bring forth in you fruits of righteousness. You can do nothing but use my word as a word of life and be guided by the spirit of repentance and faith."

3. What is the spiritual man's relation to the world? Without any effort or exertion of his own, as a sudden, perfect, accomplished fact, the cross of Christ has crucified the believer to the world, and the world to him.—Gal. vi. 14. When we come to Christ crucified, such a change takes place in our hearts that the world, formerly so beautiful and attractive in our eyes and rooted in our affections, appears to us now dead, or at least dying, fading away, developing only the corruption which is in it. Is it not so?

There are many of the admirers of the cross, many who are willing to be comforted and soothed by Christ's sufferings and death, and yet they may be enemies of the cross of Christ; they may be one in spirit with the age, the evil world that crucified him. Minding earthly things, they can never know the power or the sweetness of Christ crucified. Believer, rise from the disciple-stage, which savoreth not the things that be of God, to the spiritual, pentecostal condition! For as much as Christ hath suffered for us in the flesh, arm yourselves likewise with the same mind. (Compare Peter in Matt. xvi. 22, 23, and 1 Peter iv. 1.)

4. Lastly, the Spirit is the Spirit of hope and glory. By him we wait for the coming of the Lord, when we also shall appear with him in glory; and death loses its terror as it has lost its sting. The body is the inviolable temple of the Holy Spirit. We know that the Holy Spirit watches over the bodies of the saints till the resurrection; it is the Spirit who shall also quicken our mortal bodies. Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption. But Christ by his Spirit shall change our bodies of sin and of weakness. Then shall we bear the image of the heavenly, the Second Man, the Lord from heaven; then shall we be arrayed in fine linen, clean and white, and enter into the joy of our Lord. Then shall we be "spiritual," the children of the resurrection—body, soul and spirit—redeemed by Christ, renewed and glorified by the Holy Ghost; in union with Christ the Lord, the quickening Spirit, we shall glorify the Father forever and ever.

Meanwhile this is the time of warfare, trial, patience, humility; the time of David and not of Solomon; the time of service and suffering. Remember Christ crucified. Let us not be carnal and walk as men (1 Cor. iii. 3), but let us be spiritual and walk in Christ's love. Amen.—The Rainbow.

A WRITER'S REMINISCENCE.

WILLIAM M. PEGRAM, in Scribner's Magazine, relates the following incident:

It was during the winter of 1864-65, which will long be remembered by the soldiers who took part in the campaign in the Valley of Virginia as one which tried men's souls and their heels also, that the thrilling scenes occurred which I am about to describe.

The old Fourth Cavalry was on a forced march down the Valley to meet a column of the enemy which was advancing, and after a hard day's ride went into bivouac just at nightfall on the roadside. We did not have the "cigars and cognac," as the old song says, with which "to bivouac," so; after a hasty bite of something to eat, and picketing and feeding horses, we soon rolled ourselves, head and ears, in our blankets, and lay prone upon the frozen ground. To a tired soldier sleep comes quickly, and with it almost entire oblivion—he rarely dreams—so hardly more than a minute elapsed after the lying down before the entire camp was as silent as the grave. While preparing for rest we had been notified of a coming snowstorm, not only by the black clouds which hung heavily in the north-east, but by heralds in the shape of cutting snowflakes propelled by the wintry blast. It was fearfully cold—so bitter was it, indeed, that it was thought expedient to dispense with the usual camp guard, so as to enable all to obtain whatever of comfort was possible under the circumstances. The regiment at that time numbered between six and seven hundred men, who, soldier-like, caring only for the present, and unmindful of the morrow, slept soundly and, I may add, rapidly.

I had slept as I had supposed only a few minutes when I suddenly awoke to consciousness, being made aware of an immense pressure upon me, accompanied with almost intolerable heat. In attempting to move I found myself, as it were, packed tightly in a mold which I fitted exactly, and I was unable to turn either to right or left. I soon found that I was covered with a very friendly blanket of snow. With a vigorous push I threw my blanket off, and a most curious spectacle presented itself to my astonished gaze. The black clouds had passed away and the bright morning moon shone down upon the ground covered with a white mantle of eight inches of snow. Looking around me as far as my eye could reach in every direction, I saw nothing but the unbroken snow covering what appeared to be mounds or graves in every conceivable position. I was sitting upright in my own grave in the middle of a huge cemetery. Not a human being could I discover anywhere, while everything was as still as death itself.

While I was wrapt in the contemplation of so wonderful a scene, the bugle at headquarters, a quarter of a mile off, sounded the reveille and lo! what a change! In an instant the quiet cemetery was alive—all the men arose at once from their snow graves, and what was the stillness of death but a moment before was now bustle and activity. Instantly the text flashed through my mind, "The trumpet shall sound and the dead shall be raised." Words fail me in describing my feelings at the moment of the occurrence. Had I had any idea of the time I would have called some of my comrades. As it was I am fortunate enough to be probably the only person who has really seen a prototype of the resurrection.—Selected by H. W. S.

THE ABSURDITIES OF SOME MEN.

BY ELDER S. W. BISHOP.

It is passing strange to see what shifts men will make to save an unreasonable position. I saw an illustration of this principle a few weeks since. It was on this wise: A public discussion was held in Providence, R. I., between an "Age-to-come," and Anti-age-to-come believer. In that discussion brother anti took the following positions, viz.: "All the prophecies of the Old Testament that concern the children of Israel are conditional; and as the Jews failed to comply with those conditions in the period of the first advent, therefore, none of those prophecies will ever be fulfilled." He thus made void, theoretically, a large portion of all the prophecies of the Old Testament. It was pitiful to see with what callous assurance he threw whole chapters by one fell swoop into the annihilating vortex of conditional prophecy. He seemed to suppose that it was his divinely appointed mission to sort out just what portions of the inspired word of God it would do for us to believe, and to repudiate, for himself and all men, all that came in the way of his self-established system of belief. I have heard infidels blaspheme the word of God, but never was so shocked in my feelings as in listening to the barefaced, sacrilegious assertions made by that man, while he professed to be a follower of Christ, and a believer in his immediate second coming.

Look at the absurdity of claiming that the little handful of Jews, who lived in Palestine in the days of the first advent, did decide unchangeably, by their acts, the eternal doom of all the seed of Israel. Because that few rejected Christ, the millions who had lived and died previous to that time; and the great multitudes of the ten tribes who never returned to Palestine from the Assyrian captivity; of whom Josephus declares that in his time they were still outside of the Roman empire, and beyond the river Euphrates; all these are to be deprived of all that God has promised to Israel, and that too without giving them the smallest opportunity to obey even their apochraphal conditions.

Another position taken by this champion of anti-age-to-come, was as follows: "The throne of David promised to Christ was also conditional." He did not inform us what the conditions were, or to whom they were offered, or who fulfilled the conditions, but went on to make the following assertions: "Christ is is now reigning on David's throne"; and "the glory that should follow" the sufferings of Christ is all confined to this dispensation. Absurd as these notions do appear, and as contrary as they are to all facts, and revelation, still this mistaken brother is not alone in these religious vagaries. A certain paper is being constantly freighted with these absurd ideas. The ministers associated with that paper, both in their public preaching and in their writings, some of them at least, are ventilating the same erratic sentiments. Among their notions are the following: 1. Christ is now reigning on David's throne. 2. The saints are now reigning with Christ, having already entered on the office work of the royal priesthood; being now, in this present dispensation, constituted "kings and priests unto God." 3. The saints are now judging the world by divine appointment. 4. The church is now on the sea of glass of Rev. xv. 5. The new heaven and new earth of Rev. xx. i. is now in existence, and has existed since about 1815.

It is very true, and I am glad to be able to record the fact that some of the ministers associated with the Advent paper of which I speak, and those who pay most for the support of that paper, do not endorse these fancies. The question may arise, Why write about these things? I answer: 1. I wish all the readers of the BIBLE EXAMINER to see how hard-pushed the men and women are who are waging war against the doctrine of future probation. This class of people are the only consistent opposers of the doctrine of the future ages. How else can you dispose of the prophecies which speak so plainly of the great and glorious events of the future, except you throw them out of the Bible. If they were to declare them utterly destitute of divine authority it would frighten honest, Bible-loving souls away from the theological notions that required their abnegation. It is necessary, therefore, to adopt a milder form of procedure, and what so easy as to throw them all into the ecclesiastical wastebasket of conditional prophecy? The men that do this may be honest. I do not arraign them on a charge of dishonesty; no, no; but their's is the honesty of desperation. Some thing must be done to get rid of the testimony drawn from the writings of the "holy men of God who spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost"; and there is no other way so feasible as to claim they are conditional, and that the conditions have been broken, and therefore their words will never be fulfilled. The use made of these prophecies is proof positive that they know that if they accept them as they were given by the Most High God they cannot avoid our conclusions. Their attempt to manipulate or do away with these prophecies in any way is a virtual admission that we are right in our conclusions as to the teachings of the Word of God concerning the future of our race. Who in the possession of a sound mind can for a moment believe that the Holy Spirit would inspire men to declare scores of times that "thus saith the Lord," when that God, who moved the prophets thus to write, knew that not one jot or tittle of what he told them to write would ever be fulfilled, but all he has said by them in these scores of different places would prove an utter failure? What man or woman in his or her right mind will stand up and claim that Christ is now reigning on David's throne; that he is now reigning in his kingdom? Every fact in the universe stands out in plain and positive contradiction to the assumption that Christ now reigns over this earth. There is not a foot of land on earth where wickedness does not hold sway. The Gentile times have not yet ended, and till they do Gentile kings hold the dominion of earth. The reign and kingdom of Christ comes not until he returns to this earth. See Dan. vii. 13, 14; Matt. xxv. 31; 2 Tim. iv. 1; Rev. xi. 15-18. What man who knows himself and takes observation of his fellows can indulge in the hallucination that he is now a King, a reigning King and Priest in the kingdom of Jesus Christ?

It amounts to nothing, whatever, to say "Christ is reigning in some sense." If Christ is reigning at all he is reigning in just the sense in which the word of God declares he will reign. There is not so much as a far-fetched inference to the effect that two kingdoms, two reigns, and two thrones are promised to Christ. If Christ has entered on his reign, and that reign is confined to this age, he will not in any sense reign in any age beyond the present. Christ is not, however sitting on his throne in this age. He declares in the most emphatic language that he is now sitting on his Father's throne. See Rev. iii. 21. If it could be proved, however, that Christ is now sitting on David's throne, and reigning in his kingdom, it would defeat the very object that these men wish to secure by their spiritualistic system of interpretation. When Christ takes the throne of David he is to reign forever, and that too in a kingdom that shall never end. See Luke i. 32, 33. All must admit that if Christ is now reigning, his reign is probationary, and when he does reign, it is an unending reign, on the authority of the angel of God.

Again, what man who is not deluded by a human theory will assume that Christians are now kings, that they are reigning in the kingdom of Jesus Christ? Do they look, act, and feel like regularly installed kings, joint rulers with Jesus Christ? Why do they not exhibit their credentials, why not let us see their crowns? Then we would be at least staggered in our present view. If they are in the kingdom, where is Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and all the prophets? See Luke xiii. 28, 29. The Corinthian church once got puffed up with this same idea, and Paul had to deal out to them a rebuke, couched in the language of inspired sarcasm to dissolve the illusion. He writes to them, "Now ye are full, now ye are rich, ye have reigned as kings without us; I would to God ye did reign, that we also might reign with you."—1 Cor. iv. 8. So I say, most emphatically.

These brethren were in a delusion, and those who take the same position now are just as effectually deluded. The saints do not reign till Christ comes the second time. See Dan. vii. 21, 22; Matt. xxv. 34; 2 Tim. iv. 8; 1 Pet. v. 4; Rev. iii. 21.

In the midst of all this attempt to turn God's plan upside down we may take occasion to be encouraged, for while we do from the heart pity the folly of men that are constrained to go to such lengths of stupid speculation in order to manufacture weapons with which to attempt the overthrow of the divine arrangement, we are happy in the consideration that their folly will tend to make others wise. Surely "we can do nothing against the truth, but for the truth."

PARALLELS BETWEEN THE NATURAL AND THE SPIRITUAL CREATIONS.— NO. II.

BY G. B. STACY.

"THEREFORE, as by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation, even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life." Hence the Apostle also argues, "As in ~~Sodom~~ all die, even so in the Christ shall all be made alive." In other words, all the creation existing and consisting in the Christ are entitled to participate in his risen life, and their title to it is justified by his own personal resurrection, because it hath pleased the Father that the race should consist in him, that he should be its beginning its ending and its fullness. The first-born was made such on account of the race, and but for the fact that the birth of the races must succeed or follow, there would have been no necessity for the first-born. But the fact of the first-born necessitates the after-borns. Thus the first-born and the race are part and parcel of the one undivided purpose of God, and the one cannot exist without the other. Hence, whatever it behooved the source, the origin, the life of the race, as it is written, "Thus it behooved the Christ to suffer and to rise from the dead." So it behooved the race to suffer and to rise from the dead before their destiny during the ages could be determined. For it is only in the dispensation of the fulness of the times that he might gather together in one all things in the Christ." For he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith all things are put under him it is manifest that he is excepted who did put all things under him; and when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all."

The great work of subjugation, then, belongs to the ages beyond the resurrection of the first fruits; that resurrection belongs only to the first fruits, or first-borns, those who are during this life being created anew in the Christ Jesus unto good works. They constitute the true workmanship of the Lord, his espoused, the chaste virgin, made anew "to righteousness and true holiness," that their creation may be perfected by resurrection or transformation; and to completing the organization of his spiritual body, the proper "seed of Abraham," who are also the promised "seed of the woman," and now become the Bride, the Lamb's wife. He is, then, ready to accomplish all the promises made to him, and all the prophecies recorded concerning him, even as "the woman was made for the man," and the man was incompetent to increase and multiply his own species until God gave him the woman. Nor did God give him the command to "be fruitful and multiply," until he had first presented Eve unto him, that she might be "the mother of all living." So God has not given the Son, the second Adam, the right or power to proceed to accomplish the things written until he first takes out of the face the espoused virgin, chaste, pure and without spot or blemish, and bringing them up from the dead presents them to the Christ as his Bride that he may make her his wife. Hence the Father has retained him at his own right hand "until the time for the restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." Not till then shall "the times of refreshing come from the presence of the Lord." Then shall "he send Jesus the Christ" that he may blot out the sins of the peoples, educate, discipline and prepare them for the new heavens and the new earth which he will create. Thus, the new creation must progress through the ages of judgment, discipline or rule, till it reaches its consummation in new heavens and new earth; and all the glorious promises contained in the writings of all the holy prophets belong to this period for their fulfilment.

Looking at the subject from this, its scriptural phase, we see the imprudence, impropriety, nay, disreputableness of the virgin undertaking to perform the functions of the wife, before the nuptials are consummated. Hence, the development of the great mystery of iniquity, the besotted harlot clothed in all the beauteous gorgeousness of fleshly arrogance and assumption.

On the other hand, the chastity and purity of the espoused virgin requires the retiring modesty that always characterizes the pilgrim stranger while he sojourns in an enemy's country. It is the Lord who visits the people, the Lord who opens human hearts, and woos all the respondent ones, and espouses those whom he elects, without any of the paraphernalia of fleshly impulse.

The next phase of the question we propose to consider is, the fact that the creation of the woman was the last act of creation, and most probably finished about the end of the sixth day's work. If the six natural days are typical of six ~~hundred~~ years, during which the second Adam is espousing his virgin and making ready for the marriage, it would seem that the marriage should be consummated toward the close of the six thousandth year of creation. The question then is, can we determine when the sixth thousandth year will come? We believe the scriptures themselves gives us a demonstrated chronology. For instance, they give us the length of the Antediluvian Age:

	YEARS.
To the Flood . . . . .	1,656
To the Calling of Abram . . . . .	427
To the Confirmation of the Covenant . . . . .	10
To the Giving of the Law . . . . .	430
The Sojourn in the Wilderness . . . . .	40
Division of the Land . . . . .	6
Judges till Samuel the Prophet . . . . .	450
Reign of Saul . . . . .	40
Reign of David . . . . .	40
To Dedication of the Temple, 4th year of Solomon . . . . .	40
Regal Age to the 6th year of Gedaliah . . . . .	430
Captivity from Burning of the Temple . . . . .	70
Interval between Captivity and Daniel's 70 Weeks . . . . .	66
Daniel's 70 Weeks reach to Calling of the Gentiles, A.D., 37 . . . . .	490
From A.D. 37 to A.D. 1878 . . . . .	1,841
Total years . . . . .	6,000

There is no part of this statement of the world's chronology but is definitely stated in the Scripture testimonies, save the 66 years' interval between the captivity and Daniel's seventy weeks, and the 1841 years since the calling of the Gentiles. The 66 years are made up of the remainder of the reign of Darius from his decree terminating the captivity in his 2nd year 34 years, Xerxes 12 years, to the 20th year of Artaxerxes, when he issued the decree from which Daniel's seventy weeks begin to count.

Again, Rawlinson in his Heroditus says, that the commencement of the reign of Cyrus is "fixed with much certainty at 538 years before Christ." Now if we deduct A. D. 37 from Daniel's 490, that is the 37 years of the Christian era that reached to the calling of the Gentiles, then we have 453 of Daniel's weeks, 66 of the intervening reigns, and 19 years from the 1st of Cyrus to the 2nd year of Darius, made up of 2 years of Darius, seven months of Smerdis, seven years and five months of Cambyses, Cyrus alone seven years, and Cyrus and Darius two years; making the 538 years of Rawlinson complete, which demonstrates, that the interval is correct, though taken from profane authors. There is also a scriptural method of arriving at the same result, namely, the date of Antiochus' decree removing the disabilities of the Jews, and relieving them from eating their defiled bread among the Gentiles. There is no doubt in my mind, that the present year is the 6,000th year of the world's history.

Another argument, that leads to the same result, is found in the fact, that "the times of the Gentiles," or their opportunity to accept of the calling and the kingdom of God, has this year reached the same number of years, that God allotted to the Jews nationally to accept the same. Thus from the death of Jacob which occurred A. M. 2315 or 1807 years before the birth of Christ, to his death A. D. 33-34. There was 1841 years; it was at the death of Jacob that the Patriarchal age ceased, and the Tribal or National began; hence it lasted 1841 years before their "house was left unto them desolate." And from the calling of the Gentiles A. D. 37 to 1878 there was also 1841 years, and so upon the principle of equality we have a right to suppose, that God will accomplish his work of selection, and election from among the Gentiles this year.

It does not, however, necessarily follow that the marriage must be consummated this year, as there evidently was an interval between the rejection of the Jews and the calling of the Gentiles of at least three and a half years, but whether this has anything to do with the consummation of the marriage is perhaps doubtful; and therefore it becomes all who are conscious of having responded to "the high calling" of our God and Father, to see to the perfection of their education and discipline—to keep "their lamps trimmed and burning, and oil in their vessels," and to preserve that constant state of preparedness, that realizes, that waits for the instant and expected approach of the Bridegroom.

It hath been said that this cry went forth years ago. I think this is a mistake, for it is not likely that the Bridegroom would start to have the nuptials performed while he was yet visiting for the purpose of selecting and electing members of his body to complete the organization of the Bride, and it seems to me that all the arguments that prove the equality of the Father's dealings with the nations, require that the Gentile's opportunity should equal that of the Jews; and, therefore, it would be a breach of custom, order and etiquette to announce the coming of the Bridegroom to the marriage before he had finished wooing and espousing all his Bride. I beg the brethren to think and meditate upon the suggestions of these papers, and compare them with the teachings of the Scriptures, and hold fast only to those that are clearly sustained thereby. And may we all be guided into all truth, and fully prepared for his coming and welcomed to the marriage supper of the Lamb, is the earnest prayer of the writer.

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.

FROM MRS. J. G. MALTBY.

BRO. STORRS: Whilst contemplating the goodness, mercy and love of God, my heart ran out to you. I felt as I must cast in my mite to the treasury of the Lord's servant, whilst so many are spending their money for that which is not bread and their labor for the meat that perisheth, just to keep up with the fashion and custom of the world, and are bringing up their children to think more of the gifts of what they call "Santa Claus," than the gift of God's dear Son, who came into the world to save us from sin, and set us an example to show us the way of life and peace, that we might overcome the world with its vanities and pleasures, and be fitted to have a home with him in the ages to come. My heart cries out "Oh, how good the Lord is!"

You, with our dear Bro. ROCKWELL, have been an instrument in the hands of God in enlightning my mind upon the great plan of God which has been hid from us up to these last days, when the Lord is revealing his secrets to his servants, and is now sending out his light and truth, to gather in all that will accept it, and showing us the mystery of his will which He hath purposed in himself. "That in the dispensation of the fullness of time, He might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth, even in whom also we have obtained an inheritance."

I feel thankful that the Lord inclined me to look at the Abrahamic covenant and promise. In examining that with the scriptures of truth I see a beauty and harmony there that I never saw before. Much in the prophecies, that was dark and mysterious, I could find no place of their fulfilment till I began to read the BIBLE EXAMINER, and look out the references; then the veil began to lift, and I could see a little light, for which I could praise the Lord. I was shut up; I could not talk nor pray, as I had done. I did not know what was the matter. But since I have left the old theory, that we Adventists have preached all along, and some are still preaching, that when Christ comes all things will be finished, and the world burned, leaving neither root nor branch. I had to drop that and look at the character and love of God. I found a beauty and harmony in the scriptures that I never saw before. I could say with the blind man that Jesus restored, "I see men as trees walking." Since then I have an increased light, and my path has been as a light that shineth more and more.

I was talking with a pilgrim of 89 years, not long since, who has had a stong belief she should live till the Lord comes. I held up the promise of God to Abraham and the coming of Christ to establish his kingdom on David's throne and His reign there till he had subdued all things, and conquered the last enemy, which is death. "Oh," she said "I believe the Lord sent you. I had got where I could not see anything; come again, do come soon."

ALFRED S. IREDALE, California, writes: "We are glad to report the seed taking root in good ground on the Pacific coast, which, with God's help, will in due time bear fruit unto the Lord, we trust, an hundredfold; then your labors and our prayers will not have been in vain unto the Lord, for the light to shine in dark places, even in the hearts of the children of men. We think of and pray for the speedy return of the blessed Saviour to put an end to wickedness on the earth by the setting up of his kingdom, which will stand forever."

In the next paragraph, 12th line, for "proper" read "promised"; in the 28th line, for "face" read "race." On page 131, 1st column, 16th line from the top, for "beauteous" read "pompous"; and in the 2d paragraph below, 6th line, for "hundred," read "thousand." In the 10th line, for dates, instead of "40" read "4"; in the line following, for "the 6th year of Gedaliah" read "the 11th year of Zedekiah."

THE BIBLE EXAMINER is a Monthly Magazine. Terms, $2 00 per year, in advance.

Subscribers' Names should be written very plain. Do not neglect this. It is utterly impossible sometimes to decipher names, and mistakes must occur in consequence. As to their Address, give simply the name of the Post-Office and State.

Let all Correspondents be careful to address me as follows:

GEO. STORRS,
72 Hicks Street,
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

All "Postal Money Orders" sent me should be drawn on Brooklyn, N. Y.

To Clubs the BIBLE EXAMINER will be supplied on the following terms:

Two copies to one address,	$3
Four " " " "	5
Ten " " " "	10

The ten may be divided and sent to the address of two persons, if desired. The prices fixed above are expected to be paid in advance and the money sent at the risk of the subscribers.

Any person wishing either volume of the EXAMINER in sheets—that is unbound—shall have it on receipt of one dollar. The volumes that I can supply are 18, 19, 20, 21, and 22; only a few, however, of volume 20.

BOUND VOLUMES.—The BIBLE EXAMINER, bound, can be now furnished at $2 per volume in neat, plain binding; in morocco, with gilt edges, $3.25. Volumes 18, 19, 20, 21 and 22 can be had of me at the prices named per volume.

PAMPHLETS.—The only one I can furnish is the "DIVINE DISPENSATIONS: or, The Divine Plan in the Government of our Race." Price, 15 cents single copy; $1 25 per dozen.

REMITTANCES.—In these times of theft and robbery no one should venture money by mail except by a "Postal Money Order," if you can get one. If that cannot be done have your letter "Registered" at the office where mailed. Even then its safety depends on the honesty of the officials who take charge of the letter. It is, perhaps, just as safe to send small sums in a letter, sealed and properly directed, without registering, as with.

The next best thing to a "Postal Money Order" in remitting money is a Draft on some Banking House in New York City, payable to me or my order—GEO. STORRS.

QUESTIONS.

Please explain John vi. 54, "Unless you eat my flesh and drink my blood you cannot inherit eternal life." D.

Read the sixty-third verse and you have the "explanation" desired.

"Will you please give me your Bible opinion what covenant we are living under?" W.

RESPONSE.—All true believers in Christ as their Redeemer and Lord are under the covenant of Grace and are dead to the law. If believers seek to be "justified by the law," they "are fallen from grace." See Rom. vi. 14, 15, and Gal. v. 4.

"Will you give your views of Rev. xxii. 8, 9?" I.

I suppose the inquiry is to find who the person was that said to John, "I am thy fellow-servant and of thy brethren the prophets, and of them who keep the sayings of this book." Without arguing the question, I reply, decidedly, "ELIJAH the Prophet."

"What proof is there that the 'desire of all nations, spoken of in Haggai ii. 7, is the Messiah? He certainly was not the desire of all nations at His first coming, nor is He now. Please give your views of the text." H.

Please read the context and see if "all nations" have ever yet been "shaken," as the text says they shall be. When they are, they will doubtless desire a Deliverer, though they may have no knowledge of the person that is to be that Deliverer. The shaking is referred to Heb. xii. 26, 27. Before the rightful king takes possession of this world the kingdoms of this world will be so broken up that men will see that some stronger power must be looked for or chaos will come. In their extremity God sends the Deliverer; and who can it be but Messiah?

"SEARCH THE SCRIPTURES."

SUCH is the injunction of Him who "spake as never man spake," and who knew where the fountain of truth is. He once severely re-proved his disciples, after his resurrection, for their "slowness of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken." The same disposition exists to-day of disbelief in the prophecies of the Old Testament Scriptures; and they are, mostly lightly esteemed or accounted of little consequence now that we have the New Testament.

In order to have a comprehensive and true knowledge of the mind of God we must have an understanding of both Testaments, and the Old was the one, and the only one, that Jesus commanded his hearers to "search"; the New was not written till years had passed away, and cannot be understood except by a diligent and careful comparison with the Old. How certain, then, are those to err who discard the Old Testament or lightly esteem it, and so explain the New as to contradict it! Such teachers "err, not knowing the Scriptures" to which Jesus referred, and which Paul tells Timothy "are given by inspiration of God, and profitable"; and also "able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus." Peter, in like manner, speaking of the prophecies of the Old Testament, after referring to the scene in the Mount of Transfiguration, tells us, "We have the prophetic word more firm: whereunto ye do well that he take heed, as to a light that shineth in a dark place." . . . "Knowing this first, that no prophecy of the Scriptures is by any private impulse or invention, for the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man, but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." Such being the fact in regard to the Old Testament, what presumption, not to say blasphemy, for men to set light by this inspired testimony or attempt to prove it unreliable by calling its prophetic declarations conditional! If one prophecy is of that character all may be; and then the foundation of faith is swept away, and no sure hope of the personal return of Christ from heaven can exist; for that return and His reign on earth are both the subject of prophecy.

It will be seen, hence, that in order to be benefited by the Scriptures there must be faith, which is confidence in or reliance on what is written or spoken. Man's belief or unbelief influences him in all his tempers, words and actions. How is faith to be produced if words do not mean what they say? If we are led to suppose the speaker does not mean just what the words naturally import, what ground for faith can exist? Certainly none at all, unless the speaker explains that the words are not intended to be understood literally, or some of his other words contradict the literal sense and compel a different one.

Our first parents fell by disbelieving, on the one hand, the truth God had spoken; and, on the other hand, by believing a lie. If, however, the prohibition and threatening had not been in plain and literal language, who could blame them for misconstruing it? The tempter told them the language, "Thou shalt surely die," did not mean what it expressed; but that "God knew" to eat of that tree would make them "as gods." This was the first sermon ever preached teaching that God does not mean what his words literally express; and it is the model sermon, after which all those copy who give a mystical meaning to the plain words of God, especially in treating of the prophecies of the Bible.

From the lie in Eden to the present time the real cause of infidelity is mystifying the testimony of God, thus producing uncertainty as to its meaning and destroying faith; and professing Christians are mainly responsible for this serpentine work. It has brought the Bible into contempt and almost banished real faith from the earth; and it has filled the world with superstition and wild fanaticism, which goes under the name of deep devotion, or spiritual-mindedness, and palms itself off for true religion on the simple-hearted and unsuspecting, while it denounces those on whom it fails to impose its fancies as lacking in spiritual discernment.

It is my desire to raise in the minds of those with whom I communicate confidence, unshaken faith, in what God has said. This cannot be done unless we can be convinced that he means what his words express, unless it can be clearly shown that his other clear testimony forbids the literal construction of the language:

When God has promised and made oath to anything we are not at liberty to give any other construction to the words, "that have gone out of his mouth," than the literal and obvious meaning of the language employed: he "will not alter the thing" that he hath spoken.—Psa. lxxxix. 34. No trifling with such testimony is to be indulged in or attempts to limit its meaning. We are firmly to believe God says what he means and means what he says; and we are not at liberty to add to or take from the obvious sense of the language.

Not to regard this principle is to weaken or destroy the Divine testimony; and we are in danger of making "void the words of God by the traditions of men." The more simple and unqualified our faith in such testimony, the more peace and quietness of mind shall we possess and the more shall we honor God; and he will take care to honor us for our confidence. Abraham is the grand example of such trust in God's word, when he withheld not his beloved son Isaac, but offered him up for a burnt offering, after God had promised him, "In Isaac shall thy seed be called." A "knife lay at the throat of the promise;" but Abraham staggered not; "accounting that God was able to raise" Isaac "up from the dead." Such is faith. It quibbles not at appearances nor talks of "conditional prophecies," but gives glory to God by a steadfast reliance on his word, however dark the cloud that intervenes. Let us exercise like precious faith, that we may be blessed with Abraham. Ed.

LITERAL FULFILMENT OF PROPHECY.

EZEK. XXXVII. EXAMINED.

THERE is but one interpretation that can seriously claim attention; that is that the literal posterity of Jacob, in the flesh, are to be gathered into the land between the river of Egypt and the great river Euphrates. Let us now try the prophecy Ezek. xxxvii. 15-28, and see if all the parts can be made to harmonize in such an interpretation.

First.—Was the land of Canaan "their own land"? See Gen. xv. 18: "In that same day the Lord made a covenant with Abram, saying, Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates." Also, Psa. cv. 6-12: "O ye seed of Abraham his servant, ye children of Jacob his chosen. He is the Lord our God: his judgments are in all the earth. He hath remembered his covenant forever, the word which he commanded to a thousand generations. Which covenant he made with Abraham, and his oath unto Isaac; and confirmed the same unto Jacob for a law, and to Israel for an everlasting covenant: saying, Unto thee will I give the land of Canaan, the lot of your inheritance: when they were but a few men in number; yea, very few, and strangers in it." Texts might be easily multiplied to prove this point, but these, I judge, are quite sufficient.

Second.—Was the posterity of Jacob divided into "two nations"? 1 Kings xi. 31: "And he said to Jeroboam, Take thee ten pieces: for thus saith the Lord, the God of Israel, Behold, I will rend the kingdom out of the hand of Solomon, and will give ten tribes to thee." And xii. 20-24: "And it came to pass, when all Israel heard that Jeroboam was come again, that they sent and called him unto the congregation, and made him king over all Israel: there was none that followed the house of David, but the tribe of Judah only. And when Rehoboam was come to Jerusalem, he assembled all the house of Judah, with the tribe of Benjamin, an hundred and fourscore thousand chosen men, which were warriors, to fight against the house of Israel, to bring the kingdom again to Rehoboam, the son of Solomon. But the word of God came unto Shemaiah, the man of God, saying, Speak unto Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, king of Judah, and unto all the house of Judah and Benjamin, and the remnant of the people, saying: Thus saith the Lord, Ye shall not go up, nor fight against your brethren the children of Israel; return every man to his house; for the thing is from me. They hearkened therefore to the word of the Lord, and returned to depart, according to the word of the Lord." That point is settled.

Third.—Did they go forth "among the heathen"? See 2 Kings xvii. 6, 20-24: "In the ninth year of Hoshea the king of Assyria took Samaria, and carried Israel away into Assyria, and placed them in Halah and in Habor by the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes." "And the Lord rejected all the seed of Israel, and afflicted them, and delivered them into the hand of spoilers, until he had cast them out of his sight. For he rent Israel from the house of David; and they made Jeroboam the son of Nebat king:

and Jeroboam drave Israel from following the Lord, and made them sin a great sin. For the children of Israel walked in all the sins of Jeroboam which he did: they departed not from them; until the Lord removed Israel out of his sight, as he had said by all his servants the prophets. So was Israel carried away out of their own land to Assyria unto this day. And the king of Assyria brought men from Babylon, and from Cuthah, and from Ava, and from Hamath, and from Sepharvaim, and placed them in the cities of Samaria instead of the children of Israel: and they possessed Samaria, and dwelt in the cities thereof." As to the nation of Judah, or the Jews, they were scattered into all nations after the destruction of Jerusalem. Here, then, is a fulfilment.

Fourth.—Can the literal posterity of Jacob in the flesh be gathered into the land of Canaan? Look at Isa. lxvi. 20: "And they shall bring all your brethren for an offering unto the Lord out of all nations upon horses, and in chariots, and in litters, and upon mules, and upon swift beasts, to my holy mountain Jerusalem, saith the Lord, as the children of Israel bring an offering in a clean vessel into the house of the Lord." Also, Jer. xxxii. 37-44: "Behold, I will gather them out of all countries, whither I have driven them in mine anger, and in my fury, and in great wrath; and I will bring them again unto this place, and I will cause them to dwell safely: and they shall be my people, and I will be their God: and I will give them one heart, and one way, that they may fear me forever, for the good of them and of their children after them: and I will make an everlasting covenant with them, that I will not turn away from them, to do them good; but I will put my fear in their hearts, that they shall not depart from me. Yea, I will rejoice over them to do them good, and I will plant them in this land assuredly with my whole heart and with my whole soul. For thus saith the Lord: Like as I have brought all this great evil upon this people, so will I bring upon them all the good that I have promised them. And fields shall be bought in this land, whereof ye say, It is desolate without man or beast; it is given into the hand of the Chaldeans. Men shall buy fields for money, and subscribe evidences and seal them, and take witnesses in the land of Benjamin, and in the places about Jerusalem, and in the cities of Judah, and in the cities of the mountains, and in the cities of the valley, and in the cities of the south: for I will cause their captivity to return, saith the Lord." And Jer. xxxiii. 7-9, "I will cause the captivity of Judah [one nation] and the captivity of Israel [the other nation] to return, and I will build them, as at the first. And I will cleanse them from all their iniquity, whereby they have sinned against me; and I will pardon all their iniquities, whereby they have sinned, and whereby they have transgressed against me. And it shall be to me a name of joy, a praise and an honor before all the nations of the earth, which shall hear all the good that I do unto them; and they shall fear and tremble for all the goodness and for all the prosperity that I procure unto it." So when this event shall occur there shall still be "nations" upon "earth," who "shall hear all the good that" God will do to Judah and Israel, when He has gathered them. They are to be built "as at the first." They were "one nation at the first."

The Lord next administers a reproof which we all should do well to hear—verses 23, 24: "Moreover, the word of the Lord came to Jeremiah, saying, Considerest thou not what this people have spoken, saying, The two families which the Lord hath chosen, He hath even cast them off? thus they have despised my people, that they should be no more a nation before them."

Fifth.—Can they be brought into "the land wherein their fathers have dwelt"? Not if this gathering is the "elect remnant," brought up in the "resurrection" upon the new earth, after the final conflagration; for, I repeat it, their fathers never dwelt there. But if we understand literal Judah and Israel, I have shown it can be done.

Sixth.—Can they be united again in one nation under one king? See Hosea i. 11, and iii. 4, 5: "Then shall the children of Judah and the children of Israel be gathered together, and appoint themselves one head, and they shall come up out of the land; for great shall be the day of Jezreel." "For the children of Israel shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image, and without an ephod, and without teraphim. Afterward shall the children of Israel return, and seek the Lord their God, and David their king; and shall fear the Lord and His goodness in the latter days." Also Isa. xi. 12, 13: "And he shall set up an ensign for the nations, and shall assemble the outcasts of Israel and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth. The envy also of Ephraim shall depart and the adversaries of Judah shall be cut off; Ephraim shall not envy Judah and Judah shall not vex Ephraim." Here is a perfect union.

Ed.

[To be concluded next month.]

CHURCH ORGANIZATIONS.

MEN have been educated to think a man cannot live a Christian without joining some church. I have never "organized" a church since I left the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1840, believing that all who receive Christ and are accepted of him are by the "Spirit baptized into one body," and that is "the body [or Church] of Christ." Those thus baptized by the Spirit into the body of Christ are "joined" to the Church, and constitute the true one. They may or may not have what is called a "visible organization," but that makes them none the less or more a church. It is not an external organization that makes them such, but the internal grace which makes them of the body of Christ. The external organizations have deceived many souls to their ruin, I fear, by the persons supposing that, because they have accepted a place in them by the rites and ceremonies of such organisms, they belong to the body of Christ, whereas they remain ignorant of a true and living union with Christ and rest in outward observances which can never give them life eternal; they think more of what has been done to their flesh than of the inworking of the Spirit which raised up Christ from the dead, and by which only can any man be quickened into eternal life.

In relation to those who embrace "the ages-to-come" view, I would say, as Paul said to the Corinthians in another matter (1 Cor. vii. 27): "Art thou bound unto a" church—Baptist, Methodist or any other, with a name of human invention, "seek not to be loosed." "Art thou loosed from a" church—Baptist, Methodist or any other with such names, "seek not a" connection with any of them.

I have never advised a person embracing the views I hold to leave a church where he or she held a relation to it merely because of having embraced these views; if said church will allow them to remain in peace, "Seek not to be loosed" from it. But do not put your light "under a bushel" for the sake of remaining in their body; for by so doing you sin against the light God has given you, and your light will be sure to go out; or, which is the same thing, your light will not shine, and others will not be benefited by it; and thus you will meet with loss and dishonor the LIFE-GIVER. But if the church is willing you should remain in it as a free person, then remain, using kindness and love among them; speaking of your views frankly, but not forcing them upon others at improper times or in an uncourteous manner.

If this privilege is denied you, then leave them, or let them exclude you; in such cases a brother or sister is not bound to such church. Being free from such church, "in my judgment," he or she is better off not to attempt a union with another human organization; you will not find it any more tolerant than those you have left. In these organizations there soon arises some spirit that seeks to control and restrict the actions of its members, and they find they have left one organization to be enslaved by another. Make sure that you have received the Spirit of God, and are thus "baptized into Christ"; then "stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ has made you free, and be not entangled again in a yoke of bondage."

By these remarks I do not wish to be understood as opposing church organizations for such as cannot live without them. It is better to use crutches than not to walk at all; but such will be likely always to walk limping. A living, healthy man, with sound limbs, will be likely to lay aside crutches, or esteem them as a burden rather than a help.

Live for Christ; seek the fulness of his Spirit, that you may be "filled with all the fulness of God"; and do not be troubled by your want of what is called a "church relation"; you are probably better off without it than with it. Remember, nothing can give you life save union with the LIFE-GIVER—the Spirit that raised up Jesus from the dead working in you. Therefore, "grieve not the Holy Spirit of God" by trusting in any device of man's invention; whether it be organizations or "carnal ordinances," however specious they may seem. Beware of losing the Spirit by the use of any human device. Trust in the living God; watch and pray, and wait for the Son of God from heaven; then will He organize His Church never to be dissolved or deranged.

IS CHRIST NOW ON DAVID'S THRONE?

THERE is an attempt being made to establish the idea that Christ is now reigning on the throne of David. I have no disposition to enter into controversy on such a palpable absurdity. I esteem it a disregard of the plainest statements of the Bible, and as leading only to fanaticism and putting fancy in the place of faith. If Christ is now reigning on David's throne, then the kingdom of God has come. But that kingdom was not to be set up till in the days of the divided state of the fourth worldly kingdom from Babylon. See Daniel ii. 44; vii. The last-named chapter states the time when the kingdom of God is to be set up, viz., when the Ancient of days did sit: "The beast was slain" (the fourth earth-born kingdom with its ten divisions) "and his body destroyed and given to the burning flame." Then it was that "one like the Son of man" made His appearance, "and there was given Him dominion and glory and a kingdom." Not till the fourth earth-born kingdom and its ten subdivisions have run their course is Christ put in possession of the kingdom of His father David and of this world; and when He takes that throne his saints, as "joint heirs," sit with him on his throne and are immortal with him, and "cannot die any more."

If any one is so blinded as to suppose such an event has taken place I pity their deception, and hope they may yet escape the deception and "wait for God's Son from heaven, whom He raised from the dead" (1 Thess. i. 10), lest they should fall under "the wrath to come." "Thy kingdom come" is still our prayer.

To talk of Christ now sitting on David's throne, because He sits on God the Father's throne in heaven, is indeed a grand absurdity. That throne David never occupied, for, says an inspired apostle, "David is not ascended into the heavens" (Acts ii. 34), and therefore it could not be called his throne in any sense.

The throne of David was on earth, in Palestine; and was there called "the throne of the Lord," because it was the throne He established for the king of Israel, to be ultimately occupied by "The Christ" as the Ruler of that nation, and from thence to exercise dominion over all the earth and to subject all nations to the "Law that should go forth from Jerusalem."—Micah iv. 1-6.

That throne was "overturned," and to remain so "till He come whose right it is," etc. See Ezek. xxi. 25-27. Does any one believe "the throne of the Lord" in heaven, where Christ sits at the right hand of God, has ever been "overturned"? If so, when and by whom?

Let us beware of letting fancy take the place of faith: for where that is the case we have made "shipwreck" of faith. ED.

THE AGES TO COME.

I SEE not how any one can maintain the literal destruction of the wilful sinner, and deny the literal return of Israel. The principle of interpretation is the same in both cases. If compelled to give up the principle in one case, there appears no difficulty in doing it in the other, nor in rejecting the idea of the literal return and reign of Christ, and kindred subjects.

The words of James, Acts xv., when taken in connection with the prophecy from which he quotes, seem to make a clear distinction between those concerned in "building again the tabernacle of David," and the heathen (Gentiles) that are called by the name of the Lord. The prophecy referred to, is found in Amos ix., and reads thus: "Behold, the eyes of the Lord are upon the sinful kingdom, and I will destroy it from off the face of the earth (land); saving that I will not utterly destroy the house of Jacob, saith the Lord. For, lo, I will command, and I will sift the house of Israel among all nations, like as corn is sifted in a sieve, yet shall not the least grain fall on the earth." . . . "In that day I will raise up the tabernacle of David that is fallen, and close up the breaches thereof; and I will raise up his ruins, and I will build it as in the days of old, that they may possess the remnant of Edom, and all the heathen (Gentiles) that are called by my name, saith the Lord that doeth this." . . . "And I will bring again the captivity of my people Israel, and they shall build the waste cities and inhabit them" . . . "and I will plant them upon their land, and they shall no more be pulled up out of their land, which I have given them, saith the Lord God."

It seems to me this is clearly a prophecy, the latter part of which is to be as literally fulfilled as we know the former part has been; and I dare not transfer the promises here made to Gentile Christians, for it would destroy the harmony of the word; for those Gentile Christians are distinguished from the "house of Israel," being expressly named the "heathen upon whom my name is called," in distinction from "they" who are employed in raising up the tabernacle of David.

Hence, my view is briefly this: "They which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world" (aionos, that age; i. e., of Messiah's reign on the throne of his father David during the millennium), "and the resurrection from the dead," etc., will be the saints of all nations, and all previous ages, from Abel down to the time of Messiah's second advent; who will then be made alive from the dead, or changed if living, and "shall reign with him," as he hath said, "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my father in his throne."—Rev. iii. 21. To such, Jesus has said, "I will give him power over the nations: and he shall rule them with a rod of iron; as the vessels of a potter shall they be broken to shivers: even as I have received of my Father."—Rev. ii. 26, 27. Whatever view may be taken of the latter part of this text, two facts seem clear: First, there are "left of the nations" after the saints are made rulers with Christ; and second, the nations to be ruled are not immortal; and I may add, their subjection or destruction is clearly set forth.

The millennium age is only the beginning of Christ's personal reign on earth, and is for the subjection of "the left of the nations" and the complete re-establishment of literal Israel "in the land wherein their fathers have dwelt," according to the Word of the Lord.

That age is to be followed by an "endless succession of ages" (Eph. ii. 7, and iii. 21), in which "the rest of the dead" are to "live again," and their final state to be determined by their acceptance or rejection of Christ as their Redeemer and Lord. On this point I cannot now enlarge.

AN INQUIRY.

"You say, 'Every son and daughter of Adam that now lives or ever did live or ever will live, is to have the knowledge of the only true God and Jesus Christ, and be put in possession of the means and have an opportunity to secure an endless life before their final destiny is decided.' Do any have that knowledge in this age? If so, and they do not believe, will such die the second death?" B.

In support of my position I give now but one text. "God our Saviour will have all men . . . come unto the knowledge of the truth."—1 Tim. ii. 3, 4:

Whether any fail of that knowledge in this life, I pretend not to determine. It is most likely the number who have it are only the "Little Flock."—Luke xii. 32. "Blindness in part has happened to" all others (Rom. xi. 25), and that in mercy, lest they should "sin willfully after receiving the knowledge of the truth."—Heb. x. 26.

My opinion is, therefore, that very few, if any in this life, sin so as to bring on themselves the second death; and that sin can only be committed after resurrection. Indeed, if the wicked Scribes and Pharisees, who crucified our Lord, though guilty of a great sin, were still prayed for by the blessed Redeemer in such language as this: "Father forgive them, for they know not what they do" (Luke xxiii. 34), it seems impossible that any others can have, in the present imperfect state, been guilty of sinning willfully so as to bring on them the second death.

If there is such a case, it appears to me, it is only such as have "blasphemed against the Holy Spirit." But those it seems are to come into the "age to come." My friend "B." must excuse my declining to give a positive answer to his last inquiry. It is sufficient for us to know that God's "mercy is everlasting" (Psa. c. 5) and that he is not "willing that any should perish."—2 Peter iii. 9. The idea that He should let one soul perish without the knowledge of Himself and of His Son, and an opportunity to accept His mercy in Christ, is, to my mind, a blasphemy against God and His government.

Ed.

Some men use logic as blind persons are apt to employ dusky or smoke-hued spectacles—not to assist their vision, but to disguise their total want of it.

Away on the summit of the Rocky Mountains, a falling raindrop may be blown either east or west by the slightest breeze. At the opportune moment a breath of air sends it a few inches toward the setting sun, and it falls just over the crest on that side, blends with kindred drops, rushing on to the valley of the Columbia, is merged in the waters of that majestic river, and hastens on to find a home in the bosom of the peaceful Pacific; or, if it be wafted ever so little this way, its course of destiny is changed, and ultimately, through the Gulf, it becomes part of the stormy Atlantic. Our thoughts, like falling rain-drops, may, ere they crystalize into action or character, be changed in their course, and so lead to different conclusions or a different destiny.

OUR GOD IS MINDFUL.—When we think of the labor required to rear the few that are in our household—the weariness, the anxiety, the burden of life, how wonderful seems God's work! for he carries heaven and earth, all realms, in his bosom. Many think God takes no thought for anything less than a star or a mountain, and is unmindful of the little things of life; but when I go abroad, the first thing which I see is the grass beneath my feet, and nestling in that, flowers smaller yet, and lower still the mosses with their inconspicuous blooms, which beneath the microscope glow with beauty. And if God so cares for "grass of the field, which, to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven," shall he not much more care for the minutest things of your life, "O ye of little faith?"

THE PROMISE AND OATH OF GOD TO ABRAHAM.—NO. IV.

BY THE EDITOR OF BIBLE EXAMINER.

THAT I may not be misunderstood I make the following statement of my position: 1. God has promised, and confirmed it by an oath, that in Abraham and his seed all the families of the earth shall be blessed. 2. This promise and oath is to be understood in the literal sense of the words used. 3. This promise and oath is not yet fulfilled in its fullness. 4. Therefore, there are to be ages in the future for the perfect fulfilment.

The two questions to be answered are: (1) Did God mean what the words express? (2) Has that promise and oath had a fulfilment in the past?

These are the questions at issue. I take the affirmative on the first and the negative on the second.

No argument will avail that evades either of them. If it can be shown that I am mistaken in the exposition of some texts of scripture that will not prove my general view of the promise and oath is incorrect.

I regard the subject as one of the first importance. If the kingdom of God is soon to be developed, it is desirable to know all that can be known about it, while preparing for it, and just how reliable God's promises are; whether they are to be received literally or otherwise. This knowledge must deeply affect our faith and stability in the work of religion.

To prevent mistakes, I make the following definite statement of my views concerning those who live in what is called "Christendom." I have no idea that any very large portion of them ever heard the Gospel as it came from Christ and his apostles. They have heard a corrupted message by professed teachers of the gospel; and multitudes of them, for centuries, have had no means of determining what the pure gospel is; and have been really in as great darkness, as to the character of God, and his love to the world, as the darkest pagans now are, or ever were. Who these persons are, in Christendom, God only can certainly know. All such will yet hear the Gospel in its purity, sometime and somehow. So I believe.

Men who have been deprived of the Good News of God's love will yet be made to hear it by some means; which will determine their final destiny. Those who improve that trial of God's "abounding grace," will not be made "heirs of the kingdom"; but will become subjects of Christ and his Bride, "the Church of the First-born" from the dead; and if subject to Christ, of choice, will be perpetuated in life by means of "the tree of life, the leaves of which are for the healing of the nations."—Rev. xxii. 2. If they reject the service of Christ, they die for their own sin, and live no more. There is but one sin known in the Gospel which excludes men from life: that is, unbelief; or a rejection of God's message of love and life, attended by "the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven."—1 Pet. i. 12.

That the Gospel is corrupted and is not preached as Christ commissioned his disciples to preach it, needs no other proof, in these days, than the fact that very few are found who preach it "with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven." This work is to be revived in "the ages to come."—Eph. ii. 7.

"The Ages to Come" are a legitimate subject of inquiry by every student of the Bible. To say otherwise is to call in question a God-given right to man, as man, and an infringement of the privilege given to responsible beings. The command to "Search the Scriptures" by our Lord justifies us in an earnest and diligent search after all the information contained therein in regard to the present state and the future of ourselves and of our race. To contend that there is but one future age, and that an eternal one, is a palpable contradiction of Bible testimony. To contend that probation ends to all the race of Adam at death, or with the present age, has been proclaimed with a positiveness which might be becoming in professing Christians if they had a "Thus saith the Lord" for it; but they have no such foundation on which to build; and it is only a tradition of men, which has been so long proclaimed that it has come to be accepted for truth, the same as the doctrine of inherent immortality; while the Bible never speaks of either; and both are unknown in the language of that Book. Like most popular errors, professed Christians "take them for granted" without proof and against evidence.

I am among those who believe it is a Christian's privilege and duty to "grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ," and all that pertains to his government and work over and for the human race, whether in this age or "the ages to come." But knowing only "in part," now, error will be more or less mixed with all our advance in knowledge and require correcting, modifying or improving, if we make any progress. Those who think otherwise may boast of their stability, but give sad evidence of self-conceit and an imaginary infallibility, such as is claimed at Rome. Such persons are in no condition to increase in knowledge, and may be said to be stereotyped or petrified.

Thirty-five years ago I thought and taught, with many others, that this age was to wind up everything with respect to the human race—the world to be burned and all the human family, except the saints, to be swept away by the fires of the day of the second advent of Christ. Difficulties I found in the way of the theory, but was swept on for a time by the current that surrounded me, till, finally, in 1844, I was so arrested as to bring me to a review of the whole question; and, after careful and prayerful study, I became settled that this age did not end God's work in the salvation of the race of Adam, though it would end it with many.

With this change of views, I gave a lengthy article in the BIBLE EXAMINER in the month of August, 1844. I have not advanced backward on this topic since, but have "followed on to know the Lord," and have found "his going forth is prepared as the morning."—Hos. vi. 3.

My present views are as briefly as possible set forth in the articles I am now presenting the readers of this magazine, and summed up in the two questions I have presented for discussion in this article.

An objector has said:

"God does not say whether the blessing is Spiritual, National or Commercial. To say either is an assumption," etc.

What is this but saying, "The Promise and Oath of God does not mean anything—it has no application, for no one can tell what it means?" If what the blessing is, is uncertain then who can have any faith in it? Paul was of a different mind on this point, for he says, "Abraham believed God, and it was accounted to him for righteousness. . . . And the Scripture foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith preached before the Gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed."—Gal. iii. 6, 8.

Paul's idea, then, was that the promised blessing is "the Gospel," and related to the question of how men could be justified and be children of Abraham spiritually; hence, the blessing related to spiritual things. If "national and commercial blessings" followed, they were like the paper and twine the merchant uses to cover his goods delivered to the purchaser—they are thrown in gratis. The idea that we cannot tell to what the promised blessing relates is, in fact, an "assumption" that it does not mean anything on which to found faith; so the promise and oath of God is of no more value than a heathen oracle, which is given so equivocally that it may be construed one way, or another directly opposite. Not so does the God of Abraham deal with the children of men. He means what he says, and says what he means. In no other way can we have a ground of faith.

Future life and Eternal life are not necessarily synonymous, or expressions of the same import. Christ is "the resurrection and the life." There is no future life but what comes as a favor of God by Christ; hence, there is no future life except such as is a blessing bestowed on him who is the subject of it, or that is not the result of God's love. That life is eternal to all who have improved the present life, to form a union with Christ by the reception of his Spirit; thus becoming "partakers of the Divine nature."—2 Pet. i. 3, 4. These being raised from among the dead, thereby become permanently "the children of God," and cannot "die any more," or are possessed of eternal life. If others have a future life, it is because "where sin abounded, grace did much more abound."—Rom. v. 20. And, "If through the offence of the one (that is Adam) the many have died; much more, the grace of God . . . by one man, Jesus Christ, hath abounded unto the many."—Rom. v. 15. "Wherefore as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned . . . Therefore as by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life: for as by one man's disobedience [the] many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall [the] many be made righteous.—Verses 12, 18, 19. On the 19th verse I give the following remarks from "Dr. Bloomfield's Critical Notes on the Greek New Testament," edited by the late Prof. Stuart. Dr. Bloomfield says:

"This verse is explanatory of the preceding, and oi polloi should be rendered 'the many,' which, as appears from the foregoing, is equivalent to pantes. It is very important to attend to this force of the Article, and to bear in mind that throughout this whole passage it is (as Abp. Whately observes) 'the main drift of the Apostle' to set forth the universality of the Redemption, as being co-extensive with the evil introduced at the fall, which it was designed to remedy. So the great Bently, in his masterly sermon on Popery, after quoting what is said in verse 12, and the reditio at verse 15, remarks: 'Who would not wish that our translators had kept the Article in the version which they saw in the original? thus: 'If through the offence of the one (that is Adam) the many have died, much more the grace of God, by one man, Jesus Christ, hath abounded unto the many.' By this accurate version, some hurtful mistakes about partial redemption, and absolute reprobation, had been happily prevented. Our English readers had then seen, what several of the fathers saw and testified, that oi polloi, the many, in an antithesis to the one, are equivalent to pantes, all, in verse 12, and comprehend the whole multitude, the entire species of mankind, exclusive only of the one. So again, verses 18, 19, our translators have repeated the like mistake: where, when the apostle had said, that 'as the offence of one was upon all men (eis pantas anthropous) to condemnation, so the righteousness of one was upon all men to justification:' for, adds he, 'as by the one man's disobedience (tou enos) the many (oi polloi) were made sinners, so by the obedience of the one (tou enos) the many (oi polloi) shall be made righteous.' By this version the reader is admonished and guided to remark, that the many in verse 19 are the same as pantes, all, in verse 18.' The meaning therefore of verses 18, 19 may be thus expressed (with Mr. Holden): 'As, by Adam's disobedience, all men are brought into a state of condemnation; so, by Christ's obedience, all men are brought into a state of justification and life; i. e., have the means of attaining that justification which will be crowned with eternal life.'"

So much for the critical examination of this portion of Scripture. Thus much is made evident, No man remains in death for Adam's "one transgression." Christ is constituted "Lord both of the dead and the living" (Rom. xiv. 9); and that includes "the many," or all men descended from Adam. In this respect, Jesus has taken "away the sin of the world" (John i. 29); so that nothing can hold any man in death but a wilful rejection of the Son of God as the LIFE-GIVER, whom God gave, in his love, to "give life unto the world"; for, "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."—John vi. 33 and iii. 16.

Are we to admit the idea that because millions on millions have gone down in death without ever having heard of the love of God to them, or of the provision for their obtaining life everlasting, that therefore God has no means to reach them with the Gospel message? Perish the thought! If there are no other means of their hearing that message, they will as certainly be revived from the dead as that Abraham will be revived from the dead to inherit the land promised, because he never did inherit it while in this life. So "all the families of the earth shall be blessed in Abraham and his seed;" and literal death is no obstacle in the way of God's fulfilling his "Promise and Oath" that it shall be done. If any choose to "stagger through unbelief," in this matter let them enjoy the pleasure of that unbelief; but it will not annul "the Word of God," which "shall not return to" him "void, but it shall accomplish that which" he please, and that to which he has sworn, and all for whom Christ died, whether dead or living, shall hear of God's marvellous love to them, and have the offer of life eternal through him, "who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time."—1 Tim. ii. 6. God's "times and seasons" he hath put and kept "in his own power."—Acts i. 7. If he pleases to take "the ages to come" (Eph. ii. 7) to "show the exceeding riches of his grace," and to unfold "the unsearchable riches of Christ" (Eph. iii. 8), who of the children of men, saints or sinners, shall say, He cannot or will not do it, even though we, short-sighted mortals, cannot see how it is to be done?

THE PROMISE TO OVERCOMERS.

"To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcome, and am set down with my Father in his throne."—Rev. iii. 21.

THIS promise of our Lord to overcomers implies:

1. That his throne is distinct from the throne of his Father upon which he now sits, and

2. That the time is coming when he will vacate it to sit upon his own throne.

These points are important, and highly concern all those who enter the lists for this honor—an honor before which all earthly honor is as the light of the glow-worm before the light of the sun. The one is limited and soon vanishes away, the other is unlimited and continues for ever; so earth's honors are circumscribed and transient; but heaven's honors are uncircumscribed and eternal. And of them all, this is the highest—to sit with the Christ upon his throne!

What is the throne of Christ?

The title of our Lord, "the Christ," is almost sufficient to give us an answer. It is his official designation, and is synonymous with the titles, "the Messiah," "the Lord's Anointed," and "the King of Israel." These titles indissolubly connect his throne with the nation of Israel. Now what throne has there been in Israel on which the Christ can sit? Let us see:

In 2 Samuel vii. 8-16, we read these words: "Thus saith the Lord of Hosts, I took thee

(David) from the sheepcote, from following the sheep, to be ruler over my people, over Israel. . . . Also the Lord telleth thee that he will make thee an house. And when thy days be fulfilled, and thou shalt sleep with thy fathers, I will raise up thy seed after thee, which shall proceed out of thy bowels, and I will establish his kingdom. He shall build an house for my name, and I will stablish the throne of his kingdom for ever. I will be his Father, and he shall be my son. Even in his suffering for iniquity,* I will chasten him with the rod of men, and with the stripes of the children of men. . . . And thine house and thy kingdom shall be established for ever before thee [i. e., before thy presence in resurrection-life]; thy throne shall be established for ever." This divine oath is thus referred to in Psalm cxxxii: 11, "The Lord hath sworn in truth unto David; he will not turn from it; of the fruit of thy body will I set upon thy throne." And so Isaiah, in chapter ix. 6, 7, wrote in anticipation, "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given: and the government shall be upon his shoulder: and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The Mighty God, The Everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice, from henceforth even for ever. The zeal of the Lord of hosts will perform this."

The throne of David is the only throne that has existed in Israel to which God has promised perpetuity; and this perpetuity is bound up in the royal seed of David, of whom God predicated in the above oath, "I will be his Father, and he shall be my Son." And now the question is, Has that Son been born? We all know the answer. That Son—blessed be God!—has been born; and his name is JESUS. God was in very truth his Father (see Luke i. 26-35); but equally was he of the seed of David by his mother Mary. When announcing his birth, the angel Gabriel renewed again to Mary God's ancient promise in the following words, "He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest: and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David: and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end."—Luke i. 32, 33 Thus, then, the throne of Christ is—

The throne of his father David

And here we would ask, Where was the throne of David? Was it not on Mount Zion, in Jerusalem, in the land of Palestine? How unscriptural, then, the theory which teaches that the throne of Christ is in heaven or in men's hearts!

But although Christ's throne—the restored throne of David—is to be located on God's holy hill of Zion (Ps. ii. 6), yet the authority of that throne will be world-wide. All people, nations, and languages shall own his beneficent sway.

"Let the heavens rejoice, and let the earth be glad.
Let the sea roar, and the fulness thereof.
Let the field be joyful, and all that is therein;
Then shall all the trees of the wood rejoice
Before the Lord; for he cometh,
For he cometh to judge the earth:
He shall judge the world with righteousness,
And the people in his faithfulness."—Ps. xcvi.
11-13.

Blessed time! O! Christ, haste thy coming! All creation travaileth in pain, waiting for the day of emancipation! And thy Church groans for thy coming! Daily does she cry, Come, Lord Jesus, Oh, come quickly!

When will Christ return to sit upon his throne?

At present our Lord sits upon his Father's throne. He is there as our advocate and Mediator.—1 John ii. 1; 1 Tim ii 5. "Wherefore he is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them.—Heb. vii. 25. And "Unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation."—ix. 28. It is certain, then, that our Lord will return. But when?

In Acts iii. 20, 21, we read, "And he (God) shall send Jesus Christ, which was before preached unto you; whom the heaven must receive until the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." Similar testimony is given by the Apostle James in chapter xv. 13-18, "James answered . . . Simeon (i. e., Peter) hath declared how God at the first did visit the Gentiles, to take out of them a people for his name. And to this agree the words of the prophets; as it is written, After this I will return, and will build again the tabernacle (i. e., house or throne) of David which is fallen, and I will build again the ruins thereof, and will set it up: that the residue of men might seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles, upon whom my name is called, saith the Lord, who doeth all these things. Known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world." And, says John (Rev. xi. 15), "The seventh angel sounded; and there were great voices in heaven, saying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ; and he shall reign for ever and ever." These testimonies are very plain. And what do they teach? That—

Christ will return to claim the throne and kingdom of his father David—the throne and kingdom of universal empire—at the end of this dispensation, when his Body—all that shall be overcomers—shall be complete.

With the manner of that return we have not now to do. It may be learned, however, from an examination of Rev. xix. 11-21, and Zech. xiv. 3-21.

David, in Ps. cxxii. 2-5, thus sings of the time subsequent to it:

"Our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem!

Jerusalem is builded, as a city that is compact together:

Whither the tribes go up, the tribes of the Lord,
Unto the testimony of Israel,

To give thanks unto the name of the Lord.

For there are set thrones of judgment,

The thrones of the house of David."

And Isaiah writes, "Behold, a king (Christ) shall reign in righteousness, and princes (the overcomers) shall rule in judgment." And adds the beloved John in the Apocalypse, "I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment (authority) was given unto them; and they shall reign for ever and ever."

To aspirants for these honors I would say, Behold the throne and kingdom of the Lord Christ, and the time for his entrance thereon!

It is supremely glorious to be co-heirs with the Heir of all things, the Lord of life and glory. Let us determine by grace to be overcomers! The way is plain. "Even as I also overcame." We know how Christ overcame, and must follow in his footsteps if we would attain the honor of exercising authority under him in his kingdom—the kingdoms of this world. And if we desire to be near his royal person, we must be holy and useful, glorifying God by our good works; for the position we shall occupy in his kingdom will be regulated by these. Some will be rulers over ten cities; others over five. "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever." Let us, then, "fight the good fight of faith, and lay hold on eternal life." Let us "quit ourselves like men, and be strong." Let us look to ourselves that we "receive a full reward." And the reward is great—very great!—a kingdom, a crown, and eternal life!—The Rainbow.

THE GLORY TO BE REVEALED.

THERE was doubtless a terrible splendor by the eastern gate of Eden where the Cherubim was placed, when the flaming sword turned every way to keep the way of the tree of life—not, as some modern mystics suppose to be a substitute for the tree of life—but simply to scare away all unhallowed marauders, proclaiming in the lightning sweep of every revolution no road back to life in this direction; the estate is forfeited and the gates are closed for ever.—Gen. iii. 24. We do not know whether there was any visible radiance when God walked in the garden in communion with man, and the presumption is rather against such a conclusion. Hence we are inclined to find the beginning of our history in the burning bush at Horeb, the mountain of God: "And the angel of the Lord appeared unto him in a flame of fire out of the midst of a bush: and he looked, and behold the bush burned with fire, and the bush was not consumed."—Ex. iii. 2. When Moses turned to examine the great sight, the voice of the Lord came to him from the bush, and he was taught to put his sandals off, and feel that he was standing upon holy ground. In the presence of that glory the favored man communed with the great I AM, receiving his commission to deliver the people of promise from the house of bondage: for God had seen their affliction and he knew their sorrows. He is—the Substantial and Everlasting One—from eternity to eternity—all other things, materialisms or spiritual forces, are but shadows; it is in him that we live and move; and have our being; his spirit garnishes the heavens; his countenance strengthens the angel; his right hand sustains the sons of men. The announcement combined an austere simplicity with a metaphysical grandeur, and was well calculated to impress with solemnity and awe both the missionary and the monarch to whom he was sent. Worlds and systems may grow old and shrivelled, angels and men may languish and die; but the I AM is the Absolute and Unchangeable One who only hath immortality.

2. When the people of Israel began their memorable journey from Egypt, it is said, "And the Lord went before them by day in a pillar of a cloud, to lead them the way; and by night in a pillar of fire, to give them light; to go by day and night: he took not away the pillar of the cloud by day, nor the pillar of fire by night from before the people."—Ex. xiii. 21, 23. The succeeding chapter shows how the great glory was a defense to one camp and a menace to the other when the Red Sea crisis arrived. "And the angel of God which went before the camp of Israel removed and went behind them; and the pillar of the cloud went from before their face and stood behind them; and it came between the camp of the Egyptians and the camp of Israel; and it was a cloud and darkness to them, but it was light by night to these, so that one came not near the other all the night." In a short time Moses and the children of Israel sang the wonderful song which is on record in chap. xv.: "Who is like unto thee, O Lord, among the gods? Who is like thee, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders?" The song is matchless in fire, in majesty and in transport; and sung by a host would be like a blast of trumpets. The fragment which we have quoted is merely to indicate to our readers the character of the Lord who had saved them, and the connection between the attributes of his sublime nature.

3. When the children of Israel arrived at Sinai, where they were to receive their national constitution, the glory settled upon the mountain. "And Moses brought forth the people out of the camp to meet with God; and they stood at the nether part of the mount. And Mount Sinai was altogether on a smoke, because the Lord descended upon it in fire; and the smoke thereof ascended as the smoke of a furnace, and the whole mount quaked greatly. And when the voice of the trumpet sounded long, and waxed louder and louder, Moses spake, and God answered him by a voice."—Exodus xix. 17-19. Amid circumstances so dread, and yet so magnificent, the chosen witnesses of God received explicitly from the Most High the moral and political code which was to be their basis and security, the life and strength of their national existence. Before hastening on, we may remark that their law was their religion, and their religion was their law. In these Gentile times, though we have one institute of greater spiritual charm than ancient Israel, yet the tables are broken; the grand old unity is absent; we have our religion from one source and our law from another—and often in direct antagonism. When the glory of promise returns again, so will the ancient harmony. Our religion will be our law, and our law will be our religion, when the great Theocracy is restored under more auspicious circumstances beyond all shocks of time or war, or possibilities of revolution.

4. We have in Exod. xxiv. a journey into the mount by Moses, Aaron, Nadab, Abihu, and seventy of the elders of Israel. "And they saw the God of Israel: and there was under his feet, as it were, a paved work of a sapphire stone, and as it were the body of heaven in his clearness. . . . And Moses went up into the mount, and a cloud covered the mount. And the glory of the Lord abode upon Mount Sinai, and the cloud covered it six day; and on the seventh day he called unto Moses from out of the cloud. And the sight of the glory of the Lord was like devouring fire on the top of the mount in the eyes of the children of Israel." During the forty days' communion, Moses received direction concerning a palace for the King of Israel. "Let them make me a sanctuary that I may dwell among them." As we learn from chap. xxv., the chief glory of that sanctuary—the most holy place—was the mercy-seat, where the golden cherubim stretched their wings on high with their faces toward each other, but looking toward the mercy-seat which rested upon the ark of the testimony. "And there will I meet with thee from above the mercy-seat, between the two cherubims which rested upon the ark of the testimony."—v. 22. It is added in chap. xxix., "And there I will meet with the children of Israel, and the tabernacle shall be sanctified by my glory." "And I will dwell among the children of Israel, and will be their God." The last chapter of Exodus adds that when Moses finished the work, "Then a cloud covered the tent of the congregation, and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle: the cloud remaining by day and the fire by night in all their journeys." Between the cherubim there was a fire burning which man never kindled—the Shekinah, the presence of the Lord in essential glory; and from the majesty of that presence his voice proceeded when counsel was demanded. It was known by the people that the God who had redeemed them from Egypt dwelt among them. Something more excellent came in ripe time, never seen by the Jewish law-giver or any of the prophets of Israel, in which the communion between God and man became both deeper and richer—God no longer in a general way dwelling among, but dwelling in his holy people by his Holy Spirit. Nevertheless, the early reality was a great one, and not shadowy in the sense of an imperfection, but prophetic of wider realization. The glory shall be rekindled in a finer field and under more auspicious circumstances, never again to be obscured or eclipsed, or hidden behind any obscuring veil.

5. We must not forget on the road, that the glory of God was likewise revealed under penal circumstances. "And Nadab and Abihu, the sons of Aaron, took either of them his censor, and put fire therein and put incense thereon, and offered strange fire before the Lord, which he commanded them not. And there went out fire from the Lord, and devoured them, and they died before the Lord. Then Moses said unto Aaron, This is it that the Lord spake, saying, I will be sanctified in them that come nigh me, and before all the people I will be glorified."—Lev. x. 1-3. In correspondence with this are the tragical circumstances on record in Num. xvi. After the earth had opened her mouth, and swallowed alive the families of Korah, Dathan and Abiram, it is added, "And there came out a fire from the Lord, and consumed the two hundred and fifty men that offered incense." Though princes and chief men in the congregation, they went down into the darkness of Sheol without hope, or were scorched and withered in a moment by the fire of the Lord. We are thereby reminded that in a season which surely cometh, "the Lord shall be revealed from heaven in flaming fire, taking vengeance on those who know not God, and obey not the gospel; who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power."—2 Thess. i. We are not to conceive in either case of any difference in the glory. The serene splendor on the mercy-seat between the cherubim, was the same fire which destroyed the rebels in a moment. The pure white radiance which burned from within outwardly on the Mount of Transfiguration, was the same fire which will fall upon the impenitent with everlasting destruction. The difference lies not in the nature of the glory revealed, but in the difference of the material on which it falls. Where it lights upon things and persons anointed and sanctified, there is brightness above sunlight, and charm unknown to Nature even in her holiest sanctuaries. Where it falls upon things and persons corrupt and hopeless, it burns as an unquenchable fire, and the end is utter destruction.

Though the stage has not yet arrived for any fullness of exposition, yet we may even now indicate that holiness shines out in glory, and that glory becomes the vehicle and instrument of power. "God came from Teman, and the Holy One from Mount Paran. His glory covered the heavens, and the earth was full of his praise. And his brightness was as the light; he had horns coming out of his hand: and there was the hiding of his power."—Hab. iii. "Give unto the Lord the glory due unto his name, worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness. The voice of the Lord is upon the waters: the God of glory thundereth: the Lord is upon many waters: the voice of the Lord is powerful: the voice of the Lord is full of majesty."—Ps. xxix. "The Lord reigneth, let the people tremble; he sitteth between the cherubim, let the earth be moved. The Lord is great in Zion, and he is high above all the people. Let them praise thy great and terrible name, for it is holy."—Ps. xcix. The reader can peruse the entire chapter in Habakkuk, and the whole of the two psalms. He will perceive that it is the Holy One who burns forth in glory, and the God of glory who thundereth in power.

6. But we must hasten on, though the temptation be strong to linger by the way. The tabernacle was finely adapted to a people on pilgrimage; but after settlement in the holy land of promise, a place of worship was demanded corresponding with the new circumstances. The right time was determined by him who doeth all things well. David, the ruler after the mind of God, had subdued the hostile nations on every side, and bequeathed a wide and quiet dominion to his son, Solomon the Wise. He, by divine direction, reared the building, which alike in material beauty and supernatural charm was the glory of the earth, and, on the memorable consecration, we read: "Now when Solomon had made an end of praying, the fire came down from heaven and consumed the burnt offering and the sacrifices, and the glory of the Lord filled the house. And the priests could not enter into the house of the Lord, because the glory of the Lord had filled the Lord's house."—2 Chron. vii. This sublime revelation led the children of Israel to fall upon their faces to the ground worshiping, and saying, "Praise the Lord for he is good, for his mercy endureth forever." The Solomonic reign, though glorious in an earthly point of view, was ruinous to the manners and morals of the people, and there was desperate corruption under all the lustre and varnish of the splendid time. The sensuous development in luxury and external splendor had enervating and debauching influence; for the congenial idolatries and immoralities which belong to one soil flourished and prevailed immensely. Hence, on the death of Solomon, there followed rapidly the disruption of the kingdom, the establishment of practical heathenism among the ten tribes, and likewise the increasing corruption of Judah. It became manifest that the enshrined splendor, the visible glory proceeding from essential holiness could not long remain in the midst of such idolatry, rebellion and general uncleanness.

7. The circumstances under which Isaiah and Ezekiel were inaugurated into office come rapidly under our notice. In the year that King Uzziah died, Isaiah beheld "the Lord sitting upon a throne high and lifted up, and his train filled the temple. Above it stood the seraphim. . . . And one cried unto another, and said, Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts, the whole earth is full of his glory!" In the midst of such solemnities the prophet received his commission to proceed to the people, among whom natural and judicial glooms were gathering. The passage is of supreme interest on more accounts than one; besides declaring the necessary connection betwixt holiness and glory, it gives us a glimpse of the Son of God. We have the highest authority for applying the language to our own Redeemer. "These things said Isaiah, when he saw his glory and spake of him."

Under national circumstances still more frightful and corrupt, but in the midst of glories and sublimities more exceeding, Ezekiel received his appointment and was installed into office. Neither Milton nor Dante could have written anything like the first chapter of Ezekiel. It is beyond the sublime imaginative splendor of one, or the stern and terrible realism of the other. The fire infolding itself, the wonderful living creatures, the chariot wheels whose rings were full of eyes, and so high that they were dreadful; the noise of the winged creatures like bannered hosts, great waters, or the voice of the Almighty; the lamps moving up and down, and the lightnings proceeding from the fire; all the glorious circumstances, in the most perfect keeping with each other, belong to divine realism, and could never have been conceived by human genius. But this by the way: the chief glory to us is when we recognize—as in the former scene from Isaiah—the MAN upon the THRONE over all. The throne was like sapphire, and the man was like fire, and there was a brightness round about—and such was the likeness of the glory of our Lord.

8. Ezekiel relates, in chaps. 10-11, the sad departure of the glory from the temple and from the city, lingering for a season on a mountain on the eastern side. But the prophet is likewise consoled by a vision of the RETURN. The forty-third chapter relates that after the building of a stupendous temple—which is yet in the future—the ascended glory descends again. "Afterward he brought me to the gate that looketh toward the east. And behold the glory of the God of Israel came from the way of the east: and his voice was like a noise of many waters; and the earth shined with his glory. . . . And the glory of the Lord came into the house by way of the gate whose prospect is toward the east. And the Spirit took me up and brought me into the inner court; and behold the glory of the Lord filled the house. . . . And he said unto me, Son of man, the place of my throne, and the place of the soles of my feet, where I will dwell in the midst of the children of Israel forever; and my holy name shall the house of Israel no more defile."

We are not to conceive of a glory strictly localized in a temple; for the fine radiance must, according to promise, be wider—"But as truly as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord."—Num. xiv. 21. "And the glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together; for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it."—Is. xl. 5.

We overleap a great gulf of time and circumstance, and find in the days of King Herod wise men coming from the remote East to Jerusalem, to worship him who was born King of the Jews. While exploring the high field so marvelously lighted, there arose a star which belonged to spiritual astronomy, and they followed its guidance to the place where the child of promise was lying. By offerings of gold, frankincense and myrrh, they paid homage to the new-born King. On the Jewish side the glory of the Lord shown around the shepherds by night, and they heard angels sing the sanctity of the Saviour born in the city of David. After an immersion in water, the open heavens revealed a great glory, and the Spirit descended as a dove; and the voice of the Father was heard; so the Holy One was christened or anointed as the King of Israel and the Son of God. The account of his first miracle strikes the key-note. "This beginning of miracles did Jesus in Cana of Galilee, and manifested forth his glory; and his disciples believe in him." His last great miracle—the resurrection of Lazarus—has the same voice; being reminded by the doubting Martha that her brother had been dead four days and that she feared corruption had set in, he replies, "Said I not unto thee, that, if thou wouldest believe, thou shouldest see the glory of God?"—John xi. 40. Perhaps the transfiguration was the most emphatic revelation of the glory which is finally to shine forth. He was transfigured into such pure white splendor that no fuller on earth could have approached the whiteness—the immaculate holiness manifested in the immaculate glory. John, one of the witnesses, including the moral as well as the material radiance, says, "And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt amongst us, and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth." Peter, another witness, says, "For he received from God the Father honor and glory, when there came such a voice to him from the excellent glory: This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased."—2 Peter i.

17. Peter argues from such outshining, the power and coming of our Lord as the reality of the future, and the dawn of the perfect day—ancient prophecy having thereby received an additional seal. As the witnesses beheld that very glory in which prophecy declared the Son of Man would be revealed, the ancient documents became brighter by the new illumination, and stronger by the new seal in assurance and moral certainty. The lambent tongues of Pentecost belong to the same realism, as the mystery hidden from ages was then coming into manifestation, and it behooved the risen and glorified One to shed forth some tokens of his presence and headship. Stephen, the martyr, lifting his shining face heavenward, beheld the glory of God, and Jesus standing on the right hand of God. Saul, on his way to Damascus, saw a light from heaven above the brightness of the sun, and fell to the earth. John, in Patmos, saw One whose head and hair were white as snow with intense splendor; and falling at his feet as dead, was revived again by the voice and the hand of the Being who died, and revived, and liveth for ever. The teaching of Paul in Romans is powerful. We stand in grace or favor, rejoicing in the hope of the glory of God; the sufferings of the present are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us; the whole creation is in birth-pangs, anticipating the manifestation of the Sons of God on the resurrection morning, and shall share in the glorious liberty, or rather in the LIBERTY OF THE GLORY.

2. We learn from 2 Cor. iii. that there is a transformation now proceeding—"But we all with open face beholding, as in a glass, the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord." "Our citizenship is in heaven; from whence we look for the Saviour the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able to subdue all things unto himself."—Phil. iii. One great consequence of the revealed secret of the ages is, Christ in us as the hope of glory.—Col. i.

27. We are "looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ."—Titus ii. John says, "Beloved, now are we the sons of God; and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that when he shall appear we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." There is, doubtless, great glory when the nobles of God are gathered in the first resurrection and share with Christ the throne of power in the great regeneration; but even then there are evils and unfinished things on earth and in hades—hence the glory of God, when the temple in heaven is opened and we get a glimpse, is filled with smoke.

3. Further revelation conducts us on to a time when the last shapes of evil and deformity perish, and the smoke and the cloud are seen no longer.

The last two chapters of the Apocalypse bring to us Jerusalem, which is above, the mother of us all—the City which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God—the house with many mansions, which Jesus went to prepare. "And he carried me away in the Spirit to a great and high mountain, and showed me that great city, the holy Jerusalem descending out of heaven from God, having the glory of God." "And I heard a great voice out of heaven saying, Behold the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God." "And I saw no temple therein, for the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple of it. And the city had no need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine in it; for the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof."

Here we find the time and the place when the antitype of the Tabernacle wonder comes into unclouded revelation. The visible glory, without any smoke or disturbance, bathes the whole city in purest splendor; external lights and temple services being equally useless in the midst of the great and abiding glory and purity from the face and presence of him who liveth for ever.—Selected.

Controversy, though always an evil in itself, is sometimes a necessary evil.

Some men have but little fear either of lukewarmness or religious ignorance, in comparison of heterodoxy or dissent, and, careless whether their brethren be Christians provided they be not sectaries, would, as it were, condemn them to perish by famine, lest they should use unwholesome food. They say with the disciples, "We forbade him to cast out demons because he joined not with us."—Whately.

"BLAZING" THE KING'S HIGHWAY.

[The following article was set up for the last EXAMINER but was crowded out in making up the form. It is a report by Elder J. S. LAWVER of his and Elder JOHN FOORE's mission in laying out the King's Highway to the kingdom, in a tour West.—ED.]

WHILE Bro. Foore and I were preaching in a Western town, a short time ago, I found a lawyer, an agent of the United States, stopping over night, with whom I casually got into a discussion on the character of God, as being held by the sect-world. He said that he had been carefully trained by the sect-church; but he never could make the torment doctrine and reason agree. There seemed to be a conflict between the doctrine and reason; and that there should be no conflict between the Bible and reason.

I invited him to attend our lectures and we would show him that there was no conflict between reason and the Bible. I told him that the Bible taught that God first endowed us above the animal creation with moral faculties; and that as soon as we had exercised our reasoning powers by a proper education or training of the same, then God came to us with a revelation of himself, and said: "Come, let us reason together." Now, if the revelation was not reasonable, then God had thwarted his own plan; and, as we had a rule in logic, that where a proposition contains an absurdity it disproves it.

He attended our lectures a few times, and I talked much with him. He handed me five dollars and asked me to get him a Bible and "blaze" out the road, for surely he had found the road. I gave him a half dozen EXAMINERS, and we parted. I sent to St. Louis and got him a Bible and "blazed" out the road. I commenced by running out a main State road, from which I run off roads to all parts of the country, of time and people, to show him that the sectional roads all run into this one great State road, "blazed" out by God himself, using the lawful three "blazes" on legalized roads, as required by law.

I commenced the survey of the great National road, from the great "head-centre" of the world—Jerusalem, the city of the Great King: "Now the Lord had said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land which I will shew thee: and I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing: and I will bless them that bless thee, and curse them that curseth thee: and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed."—Gen. xii.

I commenced then where God directed me, so as to end the survey at the same place.

The next "blaze" we made, in coming on down the wilderness of time, was at Gen. xviii: 17-19: "And the Lord said, Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do; seeing that Abraham shall surely become a great and mighty nation, and all the nations of the earth shall be blessed in him? For I know him, that he will command his children and his household after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord, to do justice and judgment; that the Lord may bring upon Abraham that which he hath spoken of him."

God knew that the way, when once "blazed," would be kept open, notwithstanding the powerful effort to hedge up and close the road after a few narrow-minded sectarians had crossed over it, and got into the great city.

We again set our instruments (the Christian's "Theodolite"—the Bible), pointed it to Gen. xxii. 17, 18.

"That in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea-shore; and thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies; and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed; because thou hast obeyed my voice."

From here we went on, not having many "blazes" to make for roads leading into it, as the people had not become sufficiently numerous; only to make the legal "blaze." Three notches—"all nations blessed—all families blessed—and all the kindreds"; the reason the great State government ordered three "blazes" or notches is, one for each of the parties engaged in running out the road, viz., God, His beloved Son, and the Holy Spirit. We "blazed" again at Gen. xxvi. 3, 4.

"Sojourn in this land, and I will be with thee, and will bless thee; for unto thee, and unto thy seed, I will give all these countries, and I will perform the oath which I swore unto Abraham, thy father; and I will make thy seed to multiply as the stars of heaven, and will give unto thy seed all these countries; and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed."

Here we found a descendant of Abraham's, Isaac, living in the wilderness, who seemed much pleased with our visit when he learned our mission of "blazing" a main road out to the city of the great King.

Isaac assisted us now in directing the Theodolite to that part of the wilderness of time where his son Jacob lived, as he was desirous that the good thoroughfare should go by his place of abode. So we set out, and in the course of time we found Jacob. We informed him that the great State authorities directed us to "blaze" out a State road by his residence leading on to Jerusalem, the City of the great King. So at Gen. xxvi. we "blazed" Gen. xxviii. 13, 14.

"And behold, the Lord stood above it, and said, I am the Lord God of Abraham, thy father, and the God of Isaac; the land whereon thou liest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed; and thy seed shall be as the dust of the earth; and thou shalt spread abroad to the west, and to the east, and to the north, and to the south; and in thee and in thy seed, shall all the families of the earth be blessed."

From here we made a great many "blazes," but we will have to refer you to our voluminous field notes, the old Bible, taken on the route, until we come down to where the second one of the three, viz., the Son, took charge of the survey or "blazing" party for a short time; so, at Acts iii. 19-25 we made the next "blaze" as follows:

"Repent ye, therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord; and he shall send Jesus Christ, which before was preached unto you; whom the heaven must receive until the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began. For Moses truly said unto the fathers, A Prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren, like unto me; him shall ye hear in all things whatsoever he shall say unto you. And it shall come to pass that every soul which will not hear that Prophet shall be destroyed from among the people. Yea, and all the prophets from Samuel and those that follow after, as many as have spoken, have likewise foretold of these days. Ye are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant which God made with our fathers, saying unto Abraham, and in thy seed shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed."

The Son, in charge of the "blazing" party, was only with us a very short time in going through the wilderness of time. A mob attacked us and the Son was killed. This horrible act of the natives caused a delay in the survey some fifty days. God took his murdered Son home, and sent the Holy Spirit to finish the "blazing." He came and the first "blaze" we made was at Acts iii. 25. "Ye are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant which God made with our fathers, saying unto Abraham, And in thy seed shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed." We encountered a little opposition at a place called Acts xv., the natives here saying that they had already a "blazed" road through the circumcision. This being settled, we got tidings that God's Son, who had been slain in the active discharge of his duties of "blazing" out the "Abrahamic blessing of all nations" road, would come back, having been raised from death, and would take charge of the rebuilding of David's Tabernacle at Jerusalem, that the "residue of men" might follow after (all that have ever lived) and come up upon this "blazed" road to seek the Lord at Jerusalem and worship him.

Next we come to a place called Acts xvii. The head of our "blazing" party had to make a little speech to these heathen sectarians, who did not want any one to go to the city of the great King only over their sectarian road, instead of the one "blazed" out to Abraham. Our head man told them "God hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation"; and that they—the all nations must travel over this great national highway (blessing of all nations) to the city of the great King to worship. Here we "blazed" Psa. lxxxvi. 9: "All nations whom thou hast made shall come and worship before thee, O Lord; and shall glorify thy name."

A great howl was hereupon set up as to the meaning of "all." The great majority of the heathen sects avowed that it meant only those of our sect, or those who happened to be baptised—not knowing that the baptised go up first to get ready the great reception (for "the conversion of the world"). We went on doing the work of the Master surveyor, and made a "blaze" at Gal. iii. 7-9: "Know ye therefore that they which are of faith, the same are the children of Abraham. And the Scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed. So then they which be of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham." Then showed that the baptised ones were the seed who should have charge of the great Highway "blazed" by God to Abraham, we went on to Gal. iii. 26-29: "For ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ. There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus. And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise."

We showed them how to become of the promised seed. A few were baptized, and we went on to 1 Tim. ii. 3 to 7. "For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God, our Saviour; who will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth. For there is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus; who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time." We made known to the people God's design by this Abrahamic Highway; the 'blessing' of all nations. Here we were fearfully withstood—the people became so violent that from this "blaze" they commenced their violence, and killed many of the "blazing" party. We fled, blazing as we went, suffering fearfully until we came to Matt. v. 35. The city of the great King: "Nor by the earth; for it is his footstool: neither by Jerusalem; for it is the city of the great King." But our number was so fearfully reduced that only a "few" found it: "Because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it."—Matt. vii. 14.

We thus learned by our experience in "blazing" this road, that the cause of this loss of life was that as we neared the city a great many people thought that they would set themselves up as "blazers" and make money out of it; and each one of course made a "Theodolite" (a creed) for himself. They had no use for the Old Theodolite (the word of God); it was too old-fashioned for surveying as we near the city, and they commenced "blazing" out a road for themselves, and then made people believe that their's was the easiest road to the city—could have just as good a time as the heathens, but charged them a little to keep up expenses of D. D.'s and entertainments on the road: and before we got to the city we found over 600 surveying or "blazing" parties: and, of course, when we showed them that they must all (including all the dead of past ages) go up to the city on the only authorized "blazed" road, they, the "blazers," withstood us, even unto death, because it would take away from them their occupation—"bread and butter"; and crying against us, thus incensing the people against us so that we had to be perfected through much suffering, as was the Son perfected.

Well, a "few" got to the great city and we sent out this proclamation found in Rev. xxii. 17: "And the Spirit and the Bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come. And let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely." Then came to pass what one of God's old surveyors said, way back in Isa. ii. 1-5. "The word that Isaiah, the son of Amoz, saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem. And it shall come to pass in the last days, that the mountain of the LORD's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills; and all nations shall flow unto it. And many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the LORD, to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths: for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the LORD from Jerusalem. And he shall judge among the nations, and shall rebuke many people: and they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." Now, as all things were ready, the all nations, and families, and kindreds of the earth should be blessed, in having an opportunity to come to a knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus that they too might have eternal life, if they wanted it, before being condemned; then I recollect that the angels had sung of this time—"Good will toward all mankind."

The 600 and odd bypaths were all blotted out, and the great highway was made plain, as it is said, Isa. xxxv. 8: "And a highway shall be there, and a way, and it shall be called the way of holiness; the unclean shall not pass over it; but it shall be for those: the wayfar- ing men, though fools, shall not err therein." Hence, a fool could find it, and not err or get lost therein. Now, these "bypath" blazers see their mistake. They now discovered why a "Lord's wise man" (in this world) could not walk in their bypaths without stumbling. Yes, they see now it is true that the blind should lead the blind and they together should fall into the ditch: now we see righteousness and peace covering the earth as the waters cover the sea. And as these blind leaders and followers were now to be lifted out of the ditch and placed in the pure light of the "everlasting gospel" and be tried—restraints were removed for a "little season," the last trial over, God appears, the sea dried up, death and hell destroyed—and eternity ushered in, the great white throne, and the last "blazer" to eternity, is made: "He that overcometh shall inherit all things; and I will be his God, and he shall be my son."—Rev. xxi. 7.

Praise God for his dear Son, the means of grace, and the gift of the Holy Spirit, is the prayer of your unworthy brother, JOHN S. LAWVER.

THE BIBLE.

THOMAS J. BOWDITCH, in the Troy Times, makes the following statement, which may be of interest to some readers:

The name Old Testament first occurs in St. Paul's second epistle to the Corinthians, written in A. D. 55. The oldest of the Old Testament is the Septuagint, translated into the Greek, according to the tradition of Aristæus, B. C. 277, by seventy-two Jews. The work was undertaken at the desire of Ptolemy Philadelphus. It consists of 39 books divided into 929 chapters, containing 28,214 verses, 592,436 words and 2,727,100 letters. The Old Testament is supplemented by the Apocrypha, which contains 14 books, 183 chapters, 6,081 verses and 152,185 words. The middle book of the Old Testament is Proverbs. The middle chapter is Job xx. The middle verse is second Chronicles, chapter xx., verse 17. The least verse occurs in Chronicles chapter i., verse 1. The middle chapter and the least in the whole Bible is Psalm 117. The middle verse is the 8th of Psalm 118. The word "and" occurs in the Old Testament 85,684 times; the word "Jehovah" 6,855 times, and the word "satan" 34 times. The 21st verse, chapter 1, of Ezra, has all the letters of the alphabet. The 19th chapter of the second book of Kings and the 37th chapter of Isaiah are word for word alike. The same is the case with respect to the last verses of the second book of Chronicles and the first verses in Ezra. In the Old Testament dancing is mentioned twenty-one times, and in the New Testament five times, namely: Matthew xi. 17, xiv. 6; Mark vi. 22; Luke vii. 32, xv. 25, where dancing was an observance connected with worship. The first letter of which we have any record is that written in the Old Testament by David to Joab, directing him to place Uriah in front of the battle. A bad beginning, surely! Angels are first mentioned in the Bible when one pays his addresses to Hagar in the wilderness (over 2,000 years after the creation).

Hugo de Scanco Caro, a Dominican friar and afterward a cardinal (who flourished about 1240 and died in 1262) compiled the first concordance of the Bible, divided the matter into sections and the sections into under-divisions, and these sections are now chapters. Psalms were always divided, as at present. Rabbi Isaac Nathan, in 1445, introduced regular verses. These alterations have since been much improved. The books of the New Testament, written in Hellenistic Greek, were first collected about the middle of the third century. The New Testament is divided into 27 books, containing 265 chapters, 7,959 verses, 181,953 words and 838,380 letters. The middle book is Second Thessalonians. The middle chapters are Romans, 13 and 14. The middle verse is Acts xvii., verse 17. The least verse is John xi., verse 35. The word "and" occurs 10,684 times. The whole number of words in the Bible, 3,718,665. Martin Luther excluded Hebrews, James, Jude and the Apocalypse from the New Testament, but afterward the entirety were received as canonical.

The words "immortal soul," "deathless soul," "deathless spirit," "undying soul," "disembodied soul," "disembodied spirit," "eternal torment," "eternal suffering in conscious misery," "everlasting woe," "unending torment," "endless woe," "never-dying soul," and all their kindred words are words that never in a single instance are found in the Bible. But from the copious manner in which these words are passed to us from the pulpit and through the press, one would think, without examining the Bible, that it was full of them. The word "immortal" occurs but once in the whole Bible.

The English version of the Scriptures now in use is itself the result of repeated revisions. In the preface to the Bishop's Bible, 1568, a distinct reference is made to early Saxon versions, and there are still extant parts of the Bible in Saxon translated by Bede and by Ælfrice, of Canterbury. The first complete translation of the Bible was made by Wycliffe about 1380. It existed only in manuscript for many years. The work was regarded with grave suspicion, and a bill was introduced into the House of Lords for suppressing it; but through the influence of John O'Gaunt this was rejected. In 1408, however, in a convocation held at Oxford, it was resolved that no one should translate any text of Scripture into English, as a book or tract, and that no book of the kind should be read. This resolution led to great persecution.

The first printed edition of the Bible in English was published by Tyndale, the New Testament in 1526, and the Bible in part in 1532. Toustall, Bishop of London, and Sir Thomas More took great pains to buy up and burn the impression, but with the effect thereby of enabling the translator to publish a larger and improved edition. The first Bible printed in Scotland was in 1576. The earliest edition of the Bible printed in this country was in the language of the Nonatum (Natic) Indians. The translation was by one man known as the Apostle John Eliot, who labored as a missionary among the Indians. He was for many years engaged in the labor of translation. It is at all times a task of great difficulty to render the Bible into a foreign language, even if the language is a written one; but in such language as that of the Indians, which was never before written, the labor was gigantic. None but a religious enthusiast such as Eliot would ever have attempted it. The printing of this Bible was begun in 1660 and finished in 1664. The edition was 1,000 copies, of which not more than fifteen are known to be preserved in the United States. Twenty copies were sent to England, in which there was a dedication to Charles II. A second edition of this Bible was called for, and the whole work was reprinted at Cambridge by Samuel Green, the printer of the first edition, in 1685. The work proceeded slowly, as there was but one man, the Indian printer, who was able to compose the sheets and correct the proofs. The Indian title read as follows:

Mamusse wunnetupanatamwe up Biblum God naneeswe Nukkone Testament Kah wonk wasku Testament, &c.

The first English Bible in America was printed in Philadelphia by R. Aiken in 1782. The first German Bible in America was printed in Germantown, Pa., by C. Saur, in 1743. All the books of the Bible in French were first printed in this country in 1815, in Spanish in 1824, in Portuguese in 1850. The first American edition of the Hebrew Bible without points was printed in Philadelphia in 1814. In 1879 there will be completed the entire translation of the Bible into the Japanese language by the Protestant mission of Japan.

The Bible, especially the Old Testament, abounds with obsolete phraseology and with single words long since abandoned. The errors of some editions of the Bible are almost innumerable. In one of the editions of 1611 is the following: "Then cometh Judas with them unto a place called Gethsemane." A folio of 1717 has received its name of "The Vinegar Bible," from a misprint in the heading of the parable of the vineyard, and an edition in 1638 makes the heathen vex the Israelites, not with their "wives," but with their "wives"; and one in 1640 "rulers" in the wilderness was substituted for "mules."

In St. John's Lodge No. 1, A. F. and A. M. of Newark, N. J., there is an old black letter Bible printed in 1549. This Bible is of Mathews' translation, a folio in the gothic letter, and was used in the ceremonies when General the Marquis Lafayette was made a Mason.

The Book of Job is superior to all of the sacred writings. As a composition it is sublime, beautiful and scientific, full of sentiment, and abounding in grand metaphorical description. The writer may be said not to describe but to render visible whatever he treats of. In the last act, where Jehovah interposes and addresses Job out of a whirlwind to decide the controversy between him and Elihu, is an idea as grand as poetical imagination can conceive. The Book of Job bears undoubted marks of antiquity, as the following astronomical allusion will show. It says, where God is made to say to Job in the style of reprimand, "Canst thou bind the sweet influences of Pleiades?" In the Book of Isaiah there is sweetness in the poetical composition of his sentences. As many people believe in dreams, we shall conclude this article with the first two verses of the thirty-fourth chapter of Ecclesiasticus:

"The hopes of a man void of understanding are vain and false and dreams lift up fools.

Whoso regardeth the dreams is like him that catcheth at a shadow and followeth after the wind."

SUPERSTITION'S PERVERSIONS.

WHERE anything, not in itself moral or religious, is connected with religion, Superstition fastens upon that, because it is "worldly," and lets the rest go. Thus, when God's justice is described in scripture as vengeance, to show us that it pursues the offender as sternly as a revengeful man would pursue his enemy, Superstition fastens on the thought of God's thirsting for revenge, and regards sin only as an offence which provokes in God a desire of inflicting pain on somebody. Again, when water, or bread and wine, are made signs of the power of the Holy Spirit, or of Christ's body and blood sacrificed for us, superstition fastens on the water, or the bread and wine, as if they were the things themselves. When a place must be set apart for Divine worship, Superstition fancies that God dwells in that place, rather than in the hearts of the worshippers. When pictures or images of holy persons are set before us, Superstition fastens on the image, as if it were the reality. When rites or ceremonies are used to express our devotion, Superstition makes them our devotion. When prayers have to be said, Superstition makes the saying them, prayer. When good books are to be perused, Superstition makes the perusal, edification. When works are to be done from a good motive, Superstition makes the outward action the good work. When suffering for righteousness' sake is commended, Superstition takes the suffering for merit; and so in many other instances. It seizes ever on the outward—on that which is not moral; on that which strikes the senses or the imagination—and fastens there; while true religion, on the contrary, calls on us to “lift up our hearts” from the earthly to the heavenly, and use the outward, as a help to the inward.—Archbishop Whately.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

THE following was sent me to insert in the EXAMINER. It shows something of the present state of the world, and that the elements are preparing to bring on the great catastrophe that is to wind up human governments and call aloud for that of the REDEEMER of our race:

The writer of these lines, while traveling West a few days ago, fell in with General Garfield, of Ohio, on the cars, and had a long and interesting conversation with him on the leading topics of the day.

“The future of our country,” said he, “is a great problem, and for that matter, so is the future of Europe and of the whole world. This reminds me,” he went on to say, “of a conversation I had with a very intelligent gentleman in New York city, a few days ago. He had just returned from Europe, where he had been traveling for two years, and he was in a despondent state of mind over the impressions he had received while abroad. He detailed these impressions at length to me, and in a way that was well calculated to make a systematic impression. It was the prevailing impression among very many of the thinking men of Europe that society there is being undermined by certain irresistible influences. In the first place, it is honey-combed by widespread and still wider spreading infidelity. The Christian religion is no longer a supreme influence over the minds and consciences of the masses. The leaders of thought, the scholars of England, France and Germany, have popularized unbelief, and in France it has passed into a current remark that only women and children are any longer to be seen at church.

“In the second place, there is great restlessness among the masses in regard to the inequalities of society. Why should the few be so very rich and the many so very poor? is the burden of their inquiry, and also of their conversation one with another. This undertone of discontent is visibly growing, and is finding expression through channels that are unsettling the foundation stones of the whole social fabric in Europe. Socialism in Germany, Nihilism in Russia, Communism in France and Chartism in England are all at work, and the masses are being leavened with these principles. Their aversion to kingcraft and priestcraft borders upon revolution. The whole of Europe is volcanic at this time. Immense standing armies are all that repress the outburst. But while they repress it they afford the grievance on which revolution grows and spreads, and becomes more and more irresistible for the final reckoning. It is believed by many of the most sagacious minds that the day of upheaval is not far off.

“But this is not all,” said General Garfield, “that my New York traveler said to me. It is believed in Europe that one of those great historic movements of the Mongolian race, that in the remote past have dispersed their people into less densely populated countries than their own, is now preparing. For instance, the Russians, in pressing recently upon the Asiatic borders of their empire, developed by actual reconnoissance a Chinese army, of which they were totally ignorant, two hundred and fifty thousand strong, and armed, too, with all the effective enginery of modern war, including the Krupp guns. These guns have been made by their own skilled workmen, who had been sent to Europe and secretly taught the art, and Prussian officers had drilled their armies in the use of them. No man knows to-day the strength of the Chinese military establishment. All we see or know of what is going on in China is on the shore edges. It is believed that the skeleton for an army of 20,000,000 already exists. It is believed, further, the idea of conquest has once again taken hold of the Chinese mind, and that the great Buddhistic family of Asiatic races can be leagued for not only a wholesale raid upon Europe, but also a descent upon the Pacific Coast of the United States. Such a movement means the possible wiping out of Caucasian civilization. England has mobilized these Asiatics as a defense against Russia’s ambition in the East; but, as Count Shouvaloff said, in the Berlin Conference, what if the Asiatics, taught the art of war, should, like the irresistible Turks, once again look down upon the plains of Europe, bearing upon their banners the legend, ‘We come, we see, we conquer.’

“Modern war is now a matter of effective arms, and of a simple and reliable commissariat system. The Mongolian race is capable of great personal prowess. Being fatalists, they dare everything for the end they have in view. Their food is simple, easily supplied and easily transported. Their endurance of fatigue is proverbial. Once organized and in motion they could swarm into Russia as irresistibly as the locusts of Egypt, and upon the Pacific coast of this continent as numerous and destructive as the grasshoppers. Once started, where would they stop? Civilization would retire before them as from a plague. Look at the plague-spots in San Francisco to-day. Nobody lives in them but Chinese. Nobody else can live in them."

At this point General Garfield digressed to speak of what he himself had seen in San Francisco. "I have seen," said he, "in a space no greater than the length and height of this sleeping-car berth, in a Chinese tenement quarter in San Francisco, the home of twelve Chinamen. In that space they actually lived—yes, actually lived most of their time. There they crouched (all doubled up) and there they cooked, ate, slept, and, in a word, lived. They cooked with a little lamp a mess of stuff that they import from China, which, like their rice food, is very cheap, and a mere pittance in the way of earnings on the street, will supply them food and clothes for an indefinite time. A few cents per day is more to them than a dollar to the commonest American laborer. Hence the lowest grade of poor-paid labor retires before them as it would before a pestilence.

"This is not all. They have no assimilation whatever to Caucasian civilization. The negro assimilates with the Caucasian. He wants all that we want. He adopts our civilization—professes our religion—works for our wages, and is a customer for everything civilization produces. Hence (using a figure of physiology) we can take him up in the circulation of the body politic and assimilate him—make a man and a brother of him, as the phrase goes; but not so in the least degree with the Chinaman.

"And this brings me to say," said General Garfield, before leaving the cars, "that one of the great questions that now press upon Congress and the country for immediate attention and solution is, What shall we do with reference to Chinese immigration? We have always refused to citizenize them; shall we continue the treaty under which they are immigrating to our shores?"

ANGLO-ISRAEL.

PROPHECY is fulfilling rapidly before our eyes, and the fact is not observed. We hold that the Anglo-Saxons are Israelites, and that they specially represent the tribe of Ephraim, to whom the birthright was given. Israel was promised an inheritance of vast extent. The promise was fulfilled the other day, as one of the first fruits of the momentous Eastern question. England is the heir, and England is now the ruling power in Asia. The inheritance promised to Abraham has come to us. Egypt with the Suez Canal and the maritime route to India, Asia Minor with Arabia, as also Syria and the rich Euphrates districts, Turkey on both sides of the Bosphorus, together with the road over Persia to the vassal States of Central Asia, are now all under the powerful dominion of Great Britain. This enormous sovereignty over India, Asia, Syria and the Holy Land could come to no people on earth but one. There is no longer any obscurity. "The time of the End" has come. We are Israel, and we possess the land of promise! Let us watch the sequel with profound and prayerful attention. Events will be speedily developed now. Our faith has not been disappointed. Our hope will be splendidly realized. Thanks to the God of Israel! And the coming of the King of Israel is not far distant now. On all this we must speak more freely hereafter. This is simply a note to call attention to the great theme.—The Rainbow.

GROWTH IN GRACE.

SUPPOSE some one should offer to several persons, suffering under a painful and dangerous disease, some medicine which he declared would relieve their sufferings, and restore them to health; it would be natural and reasonable for them to ask for some testimony or other proof, to assure them of this, before they made a trial of the medicine: then suppose them to be so far convinced—some by one proof, and some by another—as to make trial of the medicine; and that they found themselves daily getting better as they took it: they would then have—all of them—an evidence from experience, confirming the former proofs that had originally brought them to make the trial. Just so, different persons may have been led by different kinds of proof to embrace the Gospel; but when they have embraced it; they may all hope for this confirmation of their faith, by the further proof from experience.

But—to use the same comparison—as those persons who had taken the medicine, if they were wise, would be convinced of its virtues, not from its being immediately pleasant to the taste, or from its suddenly exciting and cheering them up, like a strong cordial; but from its gradually restoring their strength, and removing the symptoms of the disease, and advancing them daily toward perfect health; so also Christian experience does not consist in violent transports, or any kind of sudden and overpowering impressions on the feelings, though such may be experienced; but in a steady, habitual, and continual improvement of the heart and the conduct. And this is the Christian experience alluded to in the New Testament Scriptures; which thus afford an additional internal evidence of these having been written by sober-minded men. For the test they refer to is "a growth in grace and knowledge"—a "bringing forth fruit with patience." "For patience," says St. Paul, "worketh experience; and experience, hope: and hope maketh not ashamed; because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us."—Selected.

THE FALL OF BABYLON.—THE MARRIAGE SUPPER OF THE LAMB.

WHAT we now want is for one to say, "Come hither, and I will show thee the judgment of the great harlot that sitteth upon the many waters" (Rev. xvii. 1), for all seeing, apart from his showing, will profit us nothing. What then did John see causing him to wonder with great astonishment? "A woman arrayed in purple and scarlet color,* and gilded with gold, and precious stones, and pearls, having a golden cup in her hand full of abominations and filthiness of her fornication, and upon her forehead a name written, 'Mystery, Babylon the Great, The Mother of the Harlots and of the Abominations of the Earth.' And moreover, 'drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the witnesses of Jesus, sitting upon a scarlet-colored wild beast full of names of blasphemy.'" (See Alford.) We note the association of harlotry with blasphemy. And well might the seer wonder when it was given him to understand that in her he saw the type of the false church in all ages, the seed of the bondwoman born after the flesh, persecuting the seed born after the Spirit; the seed of Cain, who was of that wicked one, and slew his brother because his own works were evil and his brother's righteous; the profane seed of Esau, which, despising its birthright, has ever sought to slay its brethren, the true seed of Israel; the seed of Balaam, who, with the word of the Lord in his mouth, carried covetousness in his heart and taught Balak to cast a stumbling-block before the children of Israel; the seed of Jezebel, who, though Israel's queen, slew the prophets of the Lord and threatened the life of Elijah; and in the church of Thyatira, "calling herself a prophetess, yet teaching and seducing God's servants to commit fornication;" the generation at whose hands shall be required the blood of all the prophets which has been shed from the foundation of the world, from the blood of Abel unto the blood of Zecharias, which perished between the altar and the temple; the stiff-necked and uncircumcised in heart and ears, rebuked by the holy martyr, Stephen, in those scathing words: "Ye do always resist the Holy Ghost; as your fathers did so do ye. Which of the prophets have not your fathers persecuted? and they have slain them which showed before the coming of the Just One, of whom ye have been now the betrayers and murderers, who have received the law by the disposition of angels, and have not kept it." It was these who had received the law, but had not kept it, that called forth from our blessed Lord that pathetic lamentation: "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, which killest the prophets, and stonest them that are sent unto thee; how often would I have gathered thy children together as a hen doth gather her brood under her wings, and ye would not!" And then it was that our Lord gave utterance to those remarkable words which confirm what we are now saying: "It cannot be that a prophet perish outside of Jerusalem."—Luke xiii. 33. (See Alford.) Words akin to those of Jeremiah: "Why trimmest thou thy way to seek love? therefore hast thou also taught the wicked ones thy ways. Also in thy skirts is found the blood of the souls of the poor innocents. I have not found it by secret search, but upon all these."—Jer. ii. 33-34. And those of Hosea: "All their wickedness is in Gilgal, for there I hated them (Gilgal the holy place, the place of worship); for the wickedness of their doings I will drive them out of mine house."—Hosea ix. 15.

*Simple and unsophisticated minds wonder with astonishment approaching that of John's to see the Roman, the Greek, the Anglican and one or two other Churches, in robing their priesthood, adopting these very colors that seem to denote this woman's livery.

This is she whose forehead is inscribed Mystery, having a name to live—the name of Israel in ancient and Christian in modern times—but dead, being destitute of the spirit that giveth life, having a form of godliness but denying the power. The mystery of iniquity is that which assumes to be what it is not. About iniquity abroad in the world there is no mystery; but when iniquity clothes itself in the guise of sanctity, and either creeps into the Church unawares or seeks to impose upon the Church by assumed superiority, what is it but Satan's ministers transformed as the ministers of righteousness, whose end shall be according to their works. Well may she be called Babylon, a synonym for confusion, wherein good and evil are confused and confounded; the Mother of the Harlots, the spiritual harlotry of all ages, professing herself Jehovah's bride while destitute of the Spirit of Jehovah, the bride of Christ while destitute of the Spirit of Christ. In Ezekiel's time they came as the people came, and sat before him as the people of the Lord, with their mouth showing love, but their heart going after their covetousness. In Peter's time they were "spots and blemishes, sporting themselves with their own deceivings, while they feasted in the Church, beguiling unstable souls, their hearts exercised with covetous practices, cursed children." And later still, to John in Patmos, the Son of man describes them as he sees them; in Ephesus, "saying they are apostles, but are liars;" in Philadelphia, "of the synagogue of Satan, who say they are Jews, and are not, but do lie." Thus professing espousal to Jehovah while never divorced from Satan, professing espousal to Christ while never divorced from self, wearing sheep's clothing but inwardly ravening wolves, professing love for God while embracing those who hate him. Is she not well named the Mother of the Harlots and of the abominations of the earth? For all the six things that the Lord hateth, yea, seven which are an abomination to him, are found in her: a proud look, a lying tongue, hands that shed innocent blood, a heart that deviseth wicked imaginations, feet that be swift in running to mischief, a false witness that speaketh lies, and he that soweth discord among brethren. If such a progeny is hateful, what must its progenitor be?

But now has come the time for her judgment, as she shall be found upon the earth at the period under consideration, comprising all churches bearing the Christian name which have not the Spirit of Christ and are therefore none of his. Whatever favor the King of Italy might be willing to show the Pope and his cardinals, or whatever favor the Czar of all the Russias might wish to show the Archimandrite and patriarchs, or whatever favor the then ruling power in our own realm might desire to show the bishops and archbishops of our State Church—should we then have one—the rulers will be then over- ruled. The power now dominant will be that of a wild beast, "diverse from all that have preceded him, exceeding dreadful, whose teeth shall be of iron and his nails of brass, devouring, breaking in pieces and stamping the residue with his feet. His kingdom shall be diverse from all kingdoms, and shall devour the whole earth, and shall tread it down and break it in pieces." For ages the woman has ridden the scarlet-colored beast—the emperors, kings and princes of the earth with whom she has committed spiritual fornication—and the beast with seven heads and ten horns has been willing to carry her for the service she has rendered to them. But when God's time shall come to judge her, "and avenge the blood of his saints," the beast that has carried her shall grow rampant by reason of her weight, and the oppression wherewith she has in her covetousness and arrogance oppressed the peoples, multitudes, nations and tongues, likened to many waters on which she sitteth. And the ten kings, receiving power as kings to reign "one hour with the beast," shall with "one mind give their might and power unto the beast." In that hour "God shall put in their hearts to fulfil his will," and the ten horns and the beast, "these shall hate the harlot, and shall make her desolate and naked, and shall eat her flesh"—i. e., appropriate her revenues—"and burn her with fire."

When this shall come to pass, it shall be seen that "The Lord is a man of war" (Ex. xv. 3), as well as the "Prince of Peace" (Isa. ix. 6), and his appearance as a Man of War must precede his appearance as the Prince of Peace. Let our amiable friends imbued with Peace Society's principles, and dreaming that the world will glide smoothly on to a spiritual millennium, note this. Before it can be said, "He maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth, he breaketh the bow and cutteth the spear in sunder, he burneth the chariot in the fire," it must be said, "Come, behold the works of the Lord, what desolations he hath made in the earth."—Psa. xlv. 8, 9. When Joel's prophecy shall have been fulfilled, "Beat your plowshares into swords, and your pruning hooks into spears" (see Joel iii. 9-16), then Isaiah's glowing words shall be verified: "Many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob, and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths. And they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more.”—Isa. ii. 1-5. But first “the Lord God of Hosts shall make a consumption, even determined in the midst of all the land” (Isa. x. 2, 3), for the destruction of the harlot and the beast which carried her. The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity, and shall cast them into a furnace of fire: there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth. Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father.—Matt. xiii. 41, 42, 43. Then “shall he cause them that come of Jacob to take root; Israel shall blossom and bud, and fill the face of the world with fruit.—Isa. xxvii. 6.

But to return. For now shall the overthrow of Babylon be likened to a great city on fire—see Rev. xviii.—when in righteous judgment it shall be said, “Repay to her, even as she repaid, and double unto her double according to her works; in the cup which she mixed, mix for her double. As much as she glorified herself and lived in luxury, so much torment and sorrow give her, for she saith in her heart, ‘I sit a queen, and am not a widow, and shall never see mourning.’ Therefore in one day shall her plagues come, death and mourning and famine, and she shall be utterly burned with fire, because strong is the Lord God who hath judged her.” The beast now rampant, exalting himself above all that is called God, or that is worshiped, sitting in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God, shall abolish all creeds; expel all bishops from their dioceses, all church dignitaries from their benefices, appropriating their revenues, and if “the smoke of her burning” becomes in any sense literally fulfilled, it will probably be the palaces in which they have glorified themselves and lived in luxury, and the cathedrals, ministers and churches wherein they have been enthroned as princes of the Church. Well may “the merchants, which were made rich by her, stand afar off for the fear of her torment, weeping and wailing, and saying, Alas, alas, that great city Babylon, that mighty city, for in one hour is thy judgment come.” And may we not add, “Alas, who shall live when God doeth this?” “But in her is found the blood of prophets and of saints, and of all that have been slain upon the earth. Thus with violence shall that great city Babylon be thrown down, and shall be found no more at all.”

Thus we have seen the fall and destruction of the counterfeit church on earth. It now remains for us to witness the true Church in the heavenlies, acknowledged and welcomed to the marriage supper of the Lamb.

For after these things “John heard as it were a loud voice of a great multitude in heaven, saying, Praise our God, all ye his servants, and ye that fear him both small and great. Hallelujah, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth. Let us rejoice and exult, and give honor to him, for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready.” “And it was given unto her that she should be arrayed in fine linen, bright and pure, for the fine linen is the righteousness of saints,” made theirs by his having lived in them, and become manifested through them as their life according to that of the apostle; “I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me.” And to John it was said: “Write, Blessed are they which are called to the marriage supper of the Lamb.” And then shall be seen such a mingling of grace with justice and justice with grace as he whose name is Truth alone could apportion; according to his words to the sons of Zebedee: “To sit on my right hand and on my left is not mine to give, but it shall be given to them for whom it is prepared by my Father,” and concerning those who, unmindful of this country, have desired a better, that is, an heavenly, the apostle to the Hebrews says: “God is not ashamed to be called their God, for he hath prepared for them a city.”

A prepared place for a prepared people truly, and well doth it behoove us to give diligence now that our calling and election may be sure then, seeing that only so shall an entrance be richly ministered unto us into the eternal kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, the inauguration of which we conceive to be the marriage supper now about to be celebrated. For now will come into force and fullness of meaning the words, “They that were ready went in with him to the marriage, and the door was shut.”

What then can be meant by the marriage supper of the Lamb? It is well understood to be the feast—whether the marriage supper of ancient or the wedding breakfast of modern times—celebrating the nuptials of a wedded pair, a figure with which all men of all ages and all climes have been familiar. High festival is kept for a day, and sometimes for days when such occasions arise, and fleeting as the most perfect joy of such may be—which, alas! is too often marred by some bitterness present or prospective, buried for the time—the joy of this occasion shall be not only absolutely perfect, but absolutely sure and permanent as perfect. Bliss in a seven-fold completeness will then be ours; seeing him, likeness to him, in holiness perfect, in knowledge perfect, in power perfect, with the purest and best of men and angels associated, and lastly, that estate rendered permanent. In what sense we may realize a table spread with bread and wine and rich fruits of paradise, what "eating bread in the kingdom of God," or "drinking wine new with him in his Father's kingdom," or "twelve manner of fruits" yielded month after month by the "trees of life growing on either side of the river," may mean the day must declare. Only to see his face and realize his presence will be a feast of joy that will need no festal luxuries to add thereto. He to our then perfected capacity for enjoyment will be meat indeed, drink indeed, a feast of fat things, a feast of wines on the lees well refined. Then shall we sing as never before,

The banquet that we eat
Is made of heavenly things,
Earth hath no dainties half so sweet
As our Immanuel brings.

The food prepared by heavenly art,
The pleasures well refined;
They spread new life through every heart
And cheer the drooping mind.

A thousand glories to the God
That gives such joy as this!
Hosanna! let it sound abroad,
And reach where Jesus is.

Was it a mere accident of a type that our Lord's "beginning of miracles, when he would manifest forth his glory, that his disciples might believe in him," was at a marriage feast? For now shall he be Master of the feast himself, and turning water into wine, "the good wine kept until now," shall say to the servants (possibly angels), "Draw out now, and bear it unto these my brethren." Was this a mere accident? we ask, or were the six water-pots of stone emblems of six thousand years brimful of sin, sadness, and sorrow now turned into joy, in fulfilment of his promise, "Your sorrow shall be turned into joy: I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice, and your joy none shall take from you?" Yes, they shall come from the east, and from the west, and from the north, and from the south, and shall sit down in the kingdom of God, and we shall see Abraham and Isaac and Jacob and all the prophets there. All the prophets of the Old Testament from Enoch to Malachi, and all the prophets and apostles of the New from John the Baptist to John the seer in Patmos, and such apostolic succession as his eye has seen, who all along the ages has not left himself without witness, many, many links of which have found no place in the pages of human history. What histories, what biographies will that day reveal! written not by poor short-sighted and erring man of his fellow-man, but revealed in the light of unerring truth, according to God's estimate of his people's service. Then the last service done to him in the person of one of the least of these his brethren shall in no wise lose its reward. What bliss will that moment bring when face to face we shall see him, no longer with visage marred more than any man, and his form more than the sons of men, but all radiant with the glory which he had with his Father before the world began. And then to hear his own sweet voice no longer in complaint saying, "What! could ye not watch with me one hour?" but as the voice of our own beloved Bridegroom in tones of music such as sin-cursed earth could never hear, "Ye are they which have continued with me in my temptations. And I appoint unto you a kingdom as my Father hath appointed unto me, that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom."

Well has it been written, "Eye hath not seen nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for them that love him;" but since Isaiah's day, by the coming of the Incarnate Son, "God hath revealed them in measure—unto us by his Spirit, for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God." For then in one grand choir shall we sing the song of Moses, the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb, saying "Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty, just and true are thy ways, thou King of the nations. Who shall not fear thee and glorify thy name? for thou only art holy, for all the nations shall come and worship before thee, because thy righteous acts have been made manifest." And then the refrain of every song of redeemed men, "Unto him that loveth us (see Alford), and washed us from our sins in his blood, and he made us a kingdom, even priests unto God and his Father; to him be the glory and dominion for ever. Amen." And then in grander chorus still, the ascription of praise fitted to the lips of angels too, "Amen! The blessing, and the glory, and the wisdom, and the thanksgiving, and the honor, and the power, and the might be unto our God for ever and ever. Amen."

Let post-millenarians note here the form of expression this song of the redeemed and risen ones takes: "All the nations shall come and worship before thee," showing this their song to be pre-millennial.

And now, with title deeds in hand and wedded to his Bride, the Heir of all things must descend to take possession of his inheritance. In order to which he must gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity, must dethrone the usurper Satan, personified in the Man of Sin, the son of perdition, the Lawless One, whom the Lord shall consume with the Spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming. For now at length the promise given at the very dawn of incarnation must be fulfilled: "He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest, and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end."—Luke i. 32, 33. The Lord hasten it in his time!—N. STARKEY, in The Rainbow.

A NEW YEAR'S OFFERING.

BY LUCRETIA B. LAMB.

DEAR BROTHER: Seventy-eight is in the past now, and we have entered upon seventy-nine. What shall its record be? The prophetic Word reveals this fact that we are nearing events more momentous and grand than have ever transpired on this globe since its formation. Its contemplation fills the mind with awe and reverence, solemnly impressed with the duty and privilege of an entire consecration of thoughts, purposes and actions to him who spake as never man spake. Thus consecrated, dear brother, my highest wish and earnest prayer—ere another New Year dawns upon the world—is that we may see Jesus as he is, and be permitted to wear his likeness and behold without a veil the glory of the Lord! My request for you, my aged veteran brother, ere the light dawned upon the earth this morning, was that ere this year closes I may behold you among the "army with banners," leading a rejoicing company, who have learned from your efforts to believe and obey the truth; while from Him who sits upon the throne rings out in sweetest melody: "Well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast," amid scoffs and scorn, "been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord;" while the responsive hallelujahs and amens resound from heaven and earth and under the earth. This is no fancy picture, but ere long to prove a glorious reality. Every day bears witness to our watchfulness and entire consecration.

82 Broadway, St. Paul, Minn., Jan. 1, 1879.

ELDER J. BLAIN, Buffalo, N. Y., is eighty-seven years old. He writes:

Some brethren begin to inquire if I am alive, knowing my age and poor health. By God's mercy I am yet spared, though so feeble as not to be able to walk but a short distance at a time, and that very slowly; yet I have no disease and eat heartily. I hope to see one more spring before I sleep in death. My work is almost done for this age; yet I am blessed with faith that my Father in Heaven is ordering all right. I praise Him for my existence.

I thank God for yet giving you strength and wisdom to write and select articles which give us cheering hope for our race in the "ages to come." Still may your strength endure.

A few friends remember me in kindness, and write to me in my loneliness and decrepitude. I ask brethren not to forget me, nor fail to hold up your hands in your great work in comforting God's people. Yours, in love.

Buffalo, N. Y., Dec., 1878.

JOSEPH LINGLE, Harrisburg, Pa., writes:

"I prize the EXAMINER above all publications I read, and hope and pray it may be continued to send forth the light it contains till He of whom it treats shall come. All the information I get is by reading, as I have entirely lost my hearing."

ELIAB WRIGHT, Bellingham, Mass., writes:

"I have been a reader of your EXAMINER for several years, and your other writings for many years. I am now an old man of eighty. My Heavenly Father has seen fit to give me health up to the past fall. My weight has been about 170 pounds from my youth up; but probably is now 120. In the morning I look upon these bones and ask the question, Can these be clothed again with mortality? I feel to acquiesce in the reply of the prophet Ezekiel—'Thou, God, knowest;' for He will do all things well. I have felt that God cannot lie; have taken this as a motto when I address Him, to address Him as a Heavenly Father; and anything that will contradict a good father is not a revelation of God. And I find the message of our Saviour was that we might become reconciled to God through him. I find to know God aright is eternal life; and that knowledge is yet to be made known to all men. I think none of us will be clothed with immor-talities till after we have that knowledge. Then it will be 'Glory to God in the highest.'"

DR. R. WILLARD, Haddonfield, N. J., writes:

"The EXAMINER still gives good testimony, and I doubt not that the time is near when sober thinkers on God's great and wise plan will think better of it. His purposes preparatory to restitution are fast fulfilling; let us be patient with all men."

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—The five preceding letters are all from aged pilgrims; each of them over eighty years, except Bro. Lingle, who may be a little short of that.

It gives me much pleasure to hear from such, and to know they are cheered and comforted by the glorious truth that the Promise and Oath of God to Abraham and his Seed is to be carried out in all its fullness to every soul of the human family, and that the work is not to be confined to this age, nor to "the age to come"; but will go on in "the ages to come," even in "the endless succession of ages" (Eph. iii. 21), and this is to be done "according to the eternal purpose, which God purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord" (verse 11); or, as it literally may be read, "according to the purpose of the ages," etc.

Some theologians, even professing "Adventists," seem to think that eternity to come is little more than a vast period of do-nothing, or a mere relief from all labor. But the Saviour says, "My Father worketh hitherto and I work;" and we may well expect that all who come into harmony with God and His Son will find their chief joy in working "together with" them (2 Cor. vi. 1) in the "endless succession of ages."

Aged pilgrim friends, let us take courage and keep our eyes open to the glorious truth that our hearts are to be made eternally joyful in blessing others who have not come to the knowledge that "God is Love," but shall yet drink from that fountain in eternal ages, and praise "God and the Lamb," and the great truth be realized recorded in Rev. v. 13: "And every creature which is in heaven and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power be unto Him that sitteth on the Throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever."

LOGICAL CONCLUSIONS.

BY ELDER T. T. JENKS.

WE all claim to favor good logic; an argument void of it is pronounced weak and unreasonable. Now, all Adventists believe in the resurrection of the dead. It is, indeed, the basis of their hope. Such will not once question the proof which Christ deduced from what God told Moses at the bush—of the certainty of the resurrection of the dead—and say it is not logical.—Mark xii. 26, 27. Now, if it follows that the dead must live again because God declares Himself "the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob," from the fact He is not the God of the dead but of the living, may we not, on the same principle of reasoning applied to other plain Scripture statements, as clearly prove, not only the resurrection of the dead, but probation after, for a portion of Adam's race?

Let me refer to a few Scripture texts:

1. In John i. 9, Christ is called "the true Light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world." Jesus says (John viii. 12), "I am the light of the world; he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness." If Christ is the light of the world, and that light shines on us through the Gospel, as Paul declares (2 Cor. iv. 4), and this "light lighteth every man that cometh into the world," the logical conclusion is as clear as noonday, that as millions of the race have died without this light having dawned upon them, they must be resurrected to behold the glorious light of the Sun of Righteousness; and if they will follow the light will no more walk in darkness.

2. God, by the prophet, hath declared: "As I live, saith the Lord, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but that the wicked turn from his way and live," etc.—Ezekiel xxxiii. 11. Paul, in 1 Tim. ii. 4-6, says of God, "Who will have all men to be saved and to come unto the knowledge of the truth; for there is one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time." The logical conclusion derived from this Scripture is, God having "no pleasure in the death of the wicked," and "will have all men to be saved and come to a knowledge of the truth," and having given His own Son "a ransom for all, to be testified (to all) in due time," as the largest portion of the race have died without the knowledge of the truth and the ransom provided, the "due time" for such must be in the resurrection state.

3. The angels said at the birth of Christ, "Behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people."—Luke ii. 10. As millions have gone and are yearly going down to death without hearing the good news, I conclude, and I believe it logical, that the joyful news must reach all such beyond the grave with its proffered blessings, without which it would not be "good tidings of great joy to all people," and the angel's message is false.

4. The Scriptures teach us that the condition of salvation is faith in our Lord Jesus Christ. "He that believeth shall be saved; he that believeth not shall be damned." Paul says (Rom. x. 14), "And how shall they believe on him of whom they have not heard? and how shall they hear without a preacher? and how shall they preach except they be sent?" As countless numbers have never heard the Gospel, and have gone down to death without any knowledge of the way of salvation through faith, the logical conclusion is evident that such must be resurrected and hear the Gospel, with the opportunity of accepting the same through faith and be saved, or, virtually, there has no provision been made for them; God's love for the world doth not include them; neither did Christ die for them, and the texts I have referred to in this article do not mean what they say.

Oh, let us not dishonor God by charging Him with unmeaning professions of love for the children of men. How few see the riches and abundant fulness of the Gospel! Well might Christ say to the great mass of professed Christians, as he said to the Sadducees (Matt. xxii. 29), "Ye do err not knowing the Scriptures, nor the power of God." Oh, that the Lord would open the eyes of his people that they may behold "wondrous things out of his law," is my prayer.

Westfield, Mass.

LETTERS AND EXTRACTS.

FROM ELDER J. S. LAWVER.

BRO. STORRS: Well, the blessed EXAMINER has just put in an appearance again, laden with fruit ripening for the kingdom.

I appreciate your labors more than ever, as they have been striking the keynote, viz: "Vindicating God's character, and his government over the children of men."

First, your long forty-year onslaught on the inherent immortality lie, which had gradually been neutralizing the necessity of a Saviour, and (O horror!) making up the composition of God's character ninety-nine parts devil and one part God!

Yes, you have battled nobly to show that, as ignorance and superstition are the twin relics of barbarism, so is immortal-soulism and eternal torments inseparably connected. Whenever the one dies so dies the other. Then the necessity of getting into the Saviour is seen as the only LIFE-GIVER; and the ninety-nine parts devil are at once dissolved, and then appears "GOD IS LOVE."

Yes, you have shown us that every act of God from the beginning to the present has been an act of love—conceived in love and brought forth in love. Yes, bless God, and shall end in love. AMEN.

Columbus, Kansas, Dec., 1878.

ELD. JOHN FOORE, Kansas, writes: "I have just returned from South West City; had a good time myself and Bro. J. S. Lawver, from Columbus. We vindicated the character of God in as clear a manner as we could, and all the brethren accepted the idea of blessing of "all nations" through Abraham and his seed. We found one advent D. D. who could not see anything but church organization and "world burning." But, thank God, the pathway is becoming brighter and brighter. Oh, I prize the EXAMINER so much! but I cannot get the means to pay for it any longer.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—I intend to send you the magazine, pay or no pay, so long as you are willing to receive it, and I am able to publish it.

GEO. L. HART, Unionville, Conn., writes:

BRO. STORRS: I have just been reading another of those flimsy arguments against probation in the future ages by Warren Tefft, in No. 1196 of the World's Crisis. After heaping every fanatical act of Adventists upon us he then goes into a truly wonderful argument, as it makes the Lord give eternal life to such as have kept the moral law—as he claims, of course, they have so kept it; which very untrue statement should at once arrest the attention of every seeker after truth. As "the natural man is not subject to the law, neither, indeed, can be," how, then, can a person be saved in or by the law? Let us read his old Jewish fable, exploded by our Saviour when he says, "I am the truth and the life;" and more: "He that is of the truth heareth my voice." Said Mr. Tefft: "If we go back to the Jewish age, all were saved by keeping the moral law without regeneration or change of heart." How is it that law—making nothing perfect, as the Word everywhere affirms—can give audience to sinners unpardoned? for if the law saves, the Christ is not needed. "Without holiness no man can see the Lord," said the apostle. One would suppose that the Spirit of God had never entered the heart of man before the first advent by Tefft's argument; but the word is too plain: "Holy men of old spake as they were moved by the Holy Spirit;" and without it we are none of His. While God has given Christ our Saviour power over all flesh, he gives eternal life to only those that believe in his name, in this age or any other; and that Jesus tasted death for every man we doubt not, giving "life a ransom for all, to be testified in due time." Our ignorant preachers of salvation by law should learn that the law is a fire that consumes, and only with the ceremonial of the atonement could ancient Israel hope, as it led to the true High Priest, who could make such atonement as could give pardon. How true—all are to know the law of righteousness and an acknowledgment to the death penalty must first be made, and a Saviour is ready to implant a seed that shall produce a new man that can keep the law, as only wilful continuance in evil is sin in the covenant of mercy. Thank God, that while the apostle said when he would do good evil was present—not sin evil; is the incomplete, and God made it, as the Word declares; and it remains for us to say whether we will remain in it or come to good, as evil must be done away in the perfect day, or age of completion, when Christ our Lord shall lead his chosen against the foe of earth. Sin shall, with its agent, the evil, perish in the day of the Son of man, the judgment Executor, and all that choose to go with them will perish.

A MEDITATION.

BY HENRY DUNN.

"I WILL not leave you comfortless; I will come unto you." Blessed Jesus, how sweet are these words of thine! How worthy of thy exhaustless love! Thou givest us thy Spirit, and in that gift thyself. Too often have I separated this indwelling of the Divine from the incarnation of my Redeemer. Too often have I missed the truth—deep and little understood—that the Spirit dwelling in us, is the Lord. Too often have I forgotten that men can receive this wondrous blessing only through the channel of Christ's humanity—that between the Spirit and the Redeemer there exists a Divine unity. Yet how definite are the words, "If I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you." And again, "The Holy Ghost was not yet given because Jesus was not yet glorified."

How plain is it, then, that this heavenly gift was to compensate for the absence of the Christ from earth. How plain, too, that it was to benefit the world; for, "when he is come he will reprove the world of sin and of righteousness and of judgment"—a reproof and a conviction leading ultimately, we may surely hope, not to deeper condemnation, but to reflection and contrition. And if it be so, how holy and divine is the revenge our Redeemer takes on the world that crucified him, when he thus repays death by life, enmity with love, and—overcoming evil with good—heaps coals of fire on his adversaries, not to consume them, but to melt.

Help me, O Lord, to discern this grace of thine; and while waiting for thy second advent, enable me to realize the sense in which thou art ever here; teach me to pray that the kingdom, now amongst us in mystery, may soon appear in manifested glory; and while ever hoping for the fulness of eternal life in the world to come, let me ever now possess the blessed assurance that its "earnest" is my own; that the Lord has not left his beloved ones "orphans," that though the world seeth him not, they do continually behold his face, knowing well that, because he lives, they will live also in "joy unspeakable and full of glory."

NEW YORK, MARCH, 1879.

All Communications should be addressed to No. 72 HICKS STREET, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

TERMS: $2.00 PER ANNUM, IN ADVANCE.

EDITORIAL NOTICES.

TO THE FRIENDS OF THIS MAGAZINE: Please remember that this number completes the first half of the volume. Shall the volume be carried on to the close? That is impossible unless the means are furnished that are not yet in my possession. Shall I hear a response from delinquent subscribers and those who intend to aid by donation?

My health and strength begin to show signs of serious decay; and sickness in my family has increased in the past month: but the Lord doeth all things well.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—It is impossible for me to prepare and publish long articles that are badly written: my present strength will not bear the strain.

If any subscriber fails to receive a number of the BIBLE EXAMINER, please inform me and I will supply it.

THE BIBLE EXAMINER is a Monthly Magazine. Terms, $2 00 per year, in advance.

Subscribers' Names should be written very plain. Do not neglect this. It is utterly impossible sometimes to decipher names, and mistakes must occur in consequence. As to their Address, give simply the name of the Post-Office and State.

Let all Correspondents be careful to address me as follows:

GEO. STORRS;
72 Hicks Street,
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

All "Postal Money Orders" sent me should be drawn on Brooklyn, N. Y.

To Clubs the BIBLE EXAMINER will be supplied on the following terms:

Two copies to one address,	$3
Four " " "	5
Ten " " "	10

The ten may be divided and sent to the address of two persons, if desired. The prices fixed above are expected to be paid in advance and the money sent at the risk of the subscribers.

Any person wishing either volume of the EXAMINER in sheets—that is unbound—shall have it on receipt of one dollar. The volumes that I can supply are 18, 19, 20, 21, and 22; only a few, however, of volume 20.

BOUND VOLUMES.—The BIBLE EXAMINER, bound, can be now furnished at $2 per volume in neat, plain binding; in morocco, with gilt edges, $3.25. Volumes 18, 19, 20, 21 and 22 can be had of me at the prices named per volume.

PAMPHLETS.—The only one I can furnish is the "DIVINE DISPENSATIONS: or, The Divine Plan in the Government of our Race." Price 15 cents single copy; $1 25 per dozen.

REMITTANCES.—In these times of theft and robbery no one should venture money by mail except by a "Postal Money Order," if you can get one. If that cannot be done have your letter "Registered" at the office where mailed. Even then its safety depends on the honesty of the officials who take charge of the letter. It is, perhaps, just as safe to send small sums in a letter, sealed and properly directed, without registering, as with.

The next best thing to a "Postal Money Order" in remitting money is a Draft on some Banking House in New York City, payable to me or my order —GEO. STORRS.

LETTERS RECEIVED TO MARCH 1.

Hereafter no letters will be acknowledged except those containing money, or some inquiry that can be answered in few words. Such as are acknowledged will be accounted a receipt for whatever is said to be enclosed, unless I state to the contrary.

PARCELS SENT TO MARCH 1.

Eld. A. M. Smith (2 par.), H. K. Foster, Wm. H. Maull, A. D. Tagert, Mrs. Battersby, W. K. Everson, M. D.

An individual in Maine sent for a "sample" copy of the BIBLE EXAMINER, which I sent him. After receiving it he wrote:

"I received the sample you sent me, and was exceedingly well pleased with it. It was far beyond my expectations. If they all prove half as good, it is well worth the subscription. I have for a number of years believed the doctrine you advocate, and had I known of your magazine I should have been a subscriber. May the love of God abound, and may you be supported in your efforts to diffuse the truth."

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR:—Of late I have had quite a number of calls for "sample copies"; particularly from the Southwestern States. It is a time that old stereotyped theology is being shaken, and thinking men and women are inquiring for light. Will the friends see if they cannot increase the circulation of the BIBLE EXAMINER?

"One Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time."—1 TIM. II : 4-6.

THE PASSOVER OR LORD'S SUPPER.

"CHRIST our Passover is sacrificed for us : therefore let us keep the feast, not with old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness ; but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth."—1 Cor. v : 7-8.

It is well known to most of the readers of the BIBLE EXAMINER that I have held the true time for celebrating the Lord's Supper is at the Passover, or at the first full moon after the Spring Equinox, and that it is a ye rly remembrancer of Christ's death at that season of the year, and it was at that time He instituted it for such a purpose ; and Paul says, "As often as ye eat this bread and drink this cup, ye do show the Lord's death till he come."—1 Cor. xi : 26. It is a memorial by which we manifest our faith in His sacrifice for our redemption from sin and death.

I am not disposed at this time to controvert the subject with those who think it is an ordinance to be used every Lord's day, or as often as they choose ; let each one do as he judges to be proper in the matter ; but I have long been satisfied that the anniversary of our Lord's death is the true time, and all other seasons are of Popish origin.

My friend Lederer, our Jewish brother of New York City, writes me : "The Passover night occurs this year (1879) on the eve of April the 7th, the 8th being the first day of the feast of Matzer, or unleavened bread."

It may be attended to by single families or by a single individual where his location or other circumstances make it difficult to unite with others. Any believer in the Christ of God is as divinely authorized to consecrate the elements of bread and wine, for the occasion, as any who are styled "Priests" or "Ministers," and it is only a Popish invention to suppose a priest, so called, is essential to consecrate the bread and wine.

The original institution of the Passover was at the close of a series of judgments on the Egyptians, in which all their first-born were to die by the destroying angel, and the LORD commanded Moses and all the Israelites to slay a lamb for each family, and sprinkle the blood upon the two side posts and the upper door posts of the houses wherein they should eat the flesh of the lamb ; and they were to do this that the destroying angel should see the blood and pass over their dwellings when in his work of slaying all the first-born of Egypt that night ; all of which was typical of something in the future, viz., of the LAMB of God, the shedding of whose blood was to be appropriated by faith for salvation from sin and the last great calamities coming on the world in the last days of the present age. In this respect I design now only to throw out a few thoughts, founded on the words of our Lord and Redeemer (Luke xxii : 15-18) : "With desire I have desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer : for I say unto you, I will not any more eat thereof until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God. . . . Until the kingdom of God shall come."

The kingdom of God will be preceded with great tribulations on the world and on merely nominal professors of religion, who have a name to live, but are destitute of that holiness which makes them dead to the world and alive to God, so as to be his children and heirs with Christ in the kingdom of God. Those who are Christ's by the regeneration, or work of the Holy Spirit, will escape these last terrible judgments, now impending, by being changed to immortality, and with their Lord and Redeemer keep the great Passover in the kingdom of God ; thus secured against the destroying angel sent forth to cut off from the earth those who have rejected Christ as their Lord and Redeemer, and sought salvation by some other means.

The suggestion I have made of keeping the passover by the true Church or body of Christ, in the kingdom of God, while the last great tribulation is going on in the earth is confirmed by the language of Christ in Luke xxi : 34-36. Speaking of those calamities on the earth, he says, "Watch ye, therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of Man." Then will they keep the great Passover with Christ. Glorious thought. How valueless all worldly honor compared with this. What glory soon to be revealed to the faithful followers of Christ. Let us keep the end in view, and not be entangled with the pursuits of worldly men and women, while necessity compels us to use means for bodily sustenance. ED.

LITERAL FULFILMENT OF PROPHECY.

Ezek. xxxvii. 15-28.

(Concluded from last month.)

Seventh.—Will the one king be David? This is the only point of difficulty, if it be one, in this interpretation. It is less difficult, however, to admit that David will have a literal resurrection, and reign over this "one nation," than to harmonize the prophecy with any of the previous interpretations. I remark, however, as the posterity of Jacob is one, so the lineal heirs of David's throne are one; and it is in accordance with Scripture usage to denominate David's successor David. See 1 Kings xii. 16: "So when all Israel saw the king [Rehoboam, son of Solomon] hearkened not unto them, the people answered the king, saying, What portion have we in David? Neither have we inheritance in the son of Jesse: to your tents, O Israel; now see to thine own house, David." This address was made to the king of Judah, the lineal heir to David's throne. It is authority, if we had no other, for the use of the name to the reigning king on David's throne. Jesus Christ is to have that throne at the time that Judah and Israel are gathered. See Jer. xxiii. 5-8: "Behold, the days come, saith the LORD, that I will raise unto David a righteous BRANCH, and a king shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In his day Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely: and this is his name whereby he shall be called THE LORD, OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS. Therefore, behold the days come, saith the LORD, that they shall no more say the LORD liveth which brought up the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt; but, the LORD liveth, which brought up and which led the seed of the house of Israel out of the north country, and from all the countries whither I have driven them; and they shall dwell in their own land." Jesus Christ was "born King of the Jews."—Matt. ii. 2. He is a king in the direct and legal line of David; and he is alive to reign; and for any other to reign on the throne of David, Christ being alive, it would be usurpation.

Eighth.—Can the literal posterity of Jacob be multiplied in the land spoken of? See Jer. xxiii. 3: "And I will gather the remnant of my flock out of all countries whither I have driven them, and will bring them again to their folds; and they shall be FRUITFUL and INCREASE." Also Jer. xxx. 18-20: "Thus saith the LORD: Behold, I will bring again the captivity of Jacob's tents and have mercy on his dwelling-places; and the city shall be builded upon her own heap, and the palace shall remain after the manner thereof. And out of them shall proceed thanksgiving and the voice of them that make merry; and I will multiply them, and they shall not be few; I will also glorify them, and they shall not be small. Their children also shall be as aforetime, and their congregation shall be established before me, and I will punish all that oppress them." Zach. viii. 3-5: "Thus saith the LORD, I am returned unto Zion, and will dwell in the midst of Jerusalem, and Jerusalem shall be called a city of truth; and the mountain of the LORD of hosts the holy mountain. Thus saith the LORD of hosts. There shall yet old men and old women dwell in the streets of Jerusalem, and every man with his staff in his hand for very age, and the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof." Lastly, see again Ezek. xxxvi. 8-11: "But ye, O mountains of Israel, ye shall shoot forth your branches, and yield your fruit to my people of Israel; for they are at hand to come. For, behold I am for you, and I will turn unto you, and ye shall be tilled and sown: and I will multiply men upon you, all the house of Israel even all of it; and the cities shall be inhabited, and the wastes shall be builded: and I will multiply upon you man and beast; and they shall increase and bring fruit: and I will settle you after your old estates, and will do better unto you than at your beginnings: and ye shall know that I am the LORD."

Ninth.—Will there be children among them? This question is answered by the previous, but I wish to compare verse 25: "They shall dwell therein, they and their children, and their children's children," etc., with Isa. xi. 1-9, where under the reign of the "BRANCH out of Jesse's roots," it is said, verse 8, "The sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice's den." These texts, in connection with those under the previous head, are conclusive that there will be increase by the propagation of children: of course, the "gathered" are men in the flesh, and not the subjects of the resurrection, for they "neither marry nor are given in marriage." Thus far, then, we find a harmony on this principle of interpretation.

TENTH.—Will they no more be removed? That is—Will they be exempt from another captivity? Here I remark, the term "forever," etc., in Scripture usage denotes the longest period of which the subject is capable to which it is applied. The examples of this are clear and numerous in the Bible. The inquiry now before us is not affected, therefore, at all by their removal to immortality. I will now call attention to a portion of Scripture which is of little value on any other theory than the one I now advocate, viz., Ezek. xi. to xlviii. Under Messiah's reign, and by the restored "one nation" the city and temple described in these neglected chapters, are to be built. In chap. xliij. Ezekiel says: "Afterward he brought me to the gate, even the gate that looketh toward the east, and behold, the glory of the God of Israel came from the way of the east: and his voice was like a noise of many waters; and the earth shined with his glory. And it was according to the appearance of the vision which I saw, even according to the vision that I saw when I came to destroy the city: and the visions were like the vision that I saw by the river Chebar: and I fell upon my face. And the glory of the LORD came into the house by the way of the gate whose prospect is toward the east. So the spirit took me up, and brought me into the inner court; and behold, the glory of the LORD filled the house. And I heard him speaking unto me out of the house: and the man stood by me. And he said unto me, Son of man, the place of my throne, and the place of the soles of my feet, where I will dwell in the midst of the children of Israel forever, and my holy name shall the house of Israel no more defile, neither they, nor their kings, by their whoredom, nor by the carcasses of the kings in their high places." See also Jer. xxxi. 38-40, "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that the city shall be built to the LORD from the tower of Hananeel unto the gate of the corner. And the measuring line shall yet go forth over against it upon the hill Gareb, and shall compass about to Goath. And the whole valley of the dead bodies, and of the ashes, and all the fields unto the brook of Kidron, unto the corner of the horse-gate toward the east, shall be holy unto the LORD; it shall not be plucked up, nor thrown down any more forever." Ezek. xlviii. 30-35, "And these are the goings out of the city on the north side, four thousand and five hundred measures. And the gates of the city shall be after the names of the tribes of Israel: three gates northward; one gate of Reuben, one gate of Judah, one gate of Levi. And at the east side four thousand and five hundred: and three gates; one gate of Joseph, one gate of Benjamin, one gate of Dan. And at the south side four thousand and five hundred measures; and three gates: one gate of Simeon, one gate of Issachar, one gate of Zebulun. At the west side four thousand and five hundred, with their three gates: one gate of Gad, one gate of Asher, one gate of Naphtali. It was round about eighteen thousand measures; and the name of the city from that day shall be, "The LORD is there"; or, "Fehovah Shamma," as the margin reads. A very different city from the one seen (Rev. xxi.), both in its dimensions and name.

I now appeal to all sober and candid minds, if the view here taken, of Ezek. xxxvii. 15-28, does not present a harmony that no other view ever has presented? If so, is it not evident the interpretation must be the true one?

It may be proper that I should add a few words on the expression, verse 16, "Judah, and the children of Israel, his companions." This expression does not denote the ten tribes, as such, nor the nation of Israel. It will be seen by an examination of 2 Chron. xi., 14-16, and xv., 9, that when the division took place into two nations, some individuals of the ten tribes went with Judah. Though they associated with Judah they were not Judah, but, "the children of Israel his companions": these, of course, shared in the fortunes of Judah, and are here reckoned with them. A remark also may be necessary on the expression, "Ephraim, and all the house of Israel his companions." Ephraim was the principal tribe of the ten; and sometimes the whole were spoken of under this general name; here, as the expression in reference to Judah had been made emphatic, including the individuals that had consorted with it from Israel, it was necessary also, to prevent any mistake, to note not only the general name of Ephraim, but all the house of Israel associated with the tribe of Ephraim. In verse 19 God says, "I will take the stick of Joseph—which is in the hand of Ephraim, and the tribes of Israel his fellows," which were the other nine tribes, "and will put them with the stick of Judah, and make them one stick, and they [not Christians, nor the resurrection elect] shall be one in my hand:" that is, "one nation," as after explained.

CONCLUSION.—This prophecy, in all its parts, has never yet had a fulfilment. The ten tribes never have been gathered—Judah and Israel never have been made one nation—they never have been united under one king—they never have dwelt in the land without experiencing a removal out of it—therefore, we are to look for the fulfilment of these things as still future, and as certain in their accomplishment. Whether a portion of it will be accomplished before the advent, or all of it after, may be the subject of a future inquiry. Ed.

“THE LOST TRIBES OF ISRAEL.”

MUCH has been said and written on this subject, and many mistakes have been made by supposing that if they are ever to come to light they are all to be found in the same quarter of the earth. Hence some writers contend they are in the far East; others, that they are all to be found in Western Asia and Europe; others still maintain that they are the Indians of America. All this confusion originates in the idea of the unity of the tribes in one quarter of the globe, so that if it is evident some people in one country give unmistakable marks of Israelitish origin all the tribes must be in the same region also, which is a great mistake. The different tribes may have each a different location in the earth. Without understanding this, and the prophetic utterances concerning each tribe, endless disputes may be the consequence, without satisfactory results. One writer, having found marks of undoubted Hebrew origin in one country—say Eastern Asia—concludes the lost tribes are all there; another finds such marks among American Indians and comes to a similar result; a third finds evidence that the Anglo-Saxons are of Israelitish origin, and his conclusion is of like character, and he writes as if the mystery was all solved and the lost tribes were found.

Each of these parties may have some truth, i. e., they may have discovered a portion of the lost ones; but the point to be determined is, to which of the ten lost tribes do they belong? It is quite unlikely that when they left Assyria they did so all at once, or all in the same direction. The carrying away captive of the ten tribes did not all take place at one time. About one hundred years after the division of the Hebrew nation—and two nations were formed called Judah (or Jews) and Israel—the captivity commenced. See 2 Kings x. 32, 32. One hundred years later another portion of Israel was carried away into Assyria. See 2 Kings xv. 29. About sixty years later was the final captivity of the ten tribes, so that, in fact, one hundred and sixty years were employed in the work of carrying away captive the kingdom of Israel, or the ten tribes. See 2 Kings xvii. 6–24.

Such being the facts, it is most likely that when the tribes left Assyria some left before the others, and, it may be, went into the far East and are there unto this day. At a later period the other tribes took a north or north-western direction and may be now found in Europe and America.

It is proper here to say the final captivity of the ten tribes took place about seven hundred years before Christ. The captivity of Judah, or the Jews in Babylon, was one hundred years or more later; and there is no evidence that any intercourse existed between the two nations after the captivity nor during the time thereof. It is most likely the ten tribes had all left Assyria before the time of Judah's captivity in Babylon.

I have been asked, “Are the Anglo-Saxons the lost tribes of Israel?” I answer emphatically, No; they are only one of those tribes; and that they are so is as clear as any fulfilment of prophetic utterance; but I do not agree with the attempts made by a writer in England, who endeavors to make so many identifications of them as Israelites, and I think he injures the cause he attempts to support.

A great portion of writers on the subject confound the whole ten tribes, as if their destiny was one in all respects. This is a great mistake; it makes confusion and damages the cause of truth.

It is my intention to make some further research on the question and see whether the Indians of this country may not be a portion of, or descendants from, some one of the ten lost tribes, and if the Scriptures and facts do not give some light on the subject. Ed.

A KIND OF FIRST-FRUIT.

I HAVE spoken heretofore on the “first-fruits,” but the subject is by no means exhausted; it is the basis of God's blessing to the world. Christ, and “they that are Christ's at his coming” (1 Cor. xv : 23), constitute the “first-fruits” of the harvest which is to follow. James, in speaking of believers, says, “The Father of lights . . . of His own will begat us with the word of truth that we should be a kind of first-fruits of His creatures.”—Jas. i : 18. Believers gathered out of the ages past and present—having suffered with or for Christ—are the first fruits and pledge of a harvest of God's creatures," or the mass of the race. John saw these gathered believers in vision, and describes the scene thus :

"And I looked, and lo, a lamb stood on Mount Sion, and with him a hundred and forty and four thousand, having His Father's name written on their foreheads: and I heard a voice from heaven, as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of a great thunder: and I heard the voice of harpers harping with their harps: and they sung as it were a new song before the throne and before the four beasts" (vital beings), "and the elders: and no man could learn that song but the hundred and forty and four thousand, which were redeemed from the earth. These are they which were not defiled with women" (spiritual fornication): "for they are virgins," (unpolluted by the whoredoms of such corrupt organizations as the Harlot woman and her daughters were guilty of;) "these are they which follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth. These were redeemed from among men, being the first-fruits unto God and the Lamb."—Rev. xiv. 1-5.

Here is the pure "church of the first-born, which are written in heaven," here is the "Mount Sion" to which believers, of the past and present ages, "are to come."—Heb. xii: 22-23. After the gathering, what next takes place? Let John answer:

"And I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting Gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, saying with a loud voice" (which all men everywhere shall hear and understand), "Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of His judgment is come; and worship Him that made heaven and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of water."—Rev. xiv. 6, 7.

Here is the work of the hundred and forty-four thousand, who "are a kind of first-fruits of His creatures," whom God will employ, when glorified, to proclaim the pure Gospel to the rest of "His creatures" of the Adamic race. There will be no schism in their theology; for these "Watchmen shall lift up the voice; with the voice together shall they sing" (the song of Rev. xiv: 3): "for they shall see eye to eye, when the LORD shall bring again Zion."—Isa. lii: 8. That is the time when the Gospel shall be proclaimed to "every creature" in its purity: "For then will I turn to the people a pure language, that they may all call upon the name of the LORD, to serve him with one consent."—Zeph. iii: 9. At that time, when the immortal ones shall "fly in the midst of heaven having the everlasting Gospel to preach," God's promise and oath to Abraham and his seed will have its perfect fulfilment; for these messengers are commissioned to go "to every nation, kindred, tongue and people" with glad tidings—the Gospel.

But, says an objector, the proclamation is, "The hour of God's judgment is come." True: and what more joyful news ever was heard than that God's rule, by His own chosen King, has actually commenced, when ungodly rulers—civil and ecclesiastical—will be stripped of their power, and Christ "shall execute justice and judgment in the earth."—Jer. xxiii: 5. Such an event caused a joyful acclaim in heaven, saying, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdom of our Lord and His Christ; and he shall reign forever and ever."—Rev. xi: 15

The hour of God's judgment is the hour or period of His reign, in the person of His Son. When that begins, wickedness and oppression, in all its forms, will be made to cease and "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the LORD, as the waters cover the sea."—Isa. xi: 9. Then will the tidings of God's love to "the world" be made fully known; and the "due time" will have come when "every creature" shall understand that "Christ Jesus gave himself a ransom for all"; and such as have never before heard this good news, or have been by unavoidable means hindered from knowing that love of God, shall now be blessed with that knowledge which is "able to make wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus."—2 Tim. iii: 15.

The hour of God's judgment will be the time in which the whole earth will be brought into subjection to Christ. It begins with the call to "all nations, kindred, tongue and people" to "Fear God, and give glory to Him," and to "worship Him." Impenitent oppressors, and all such as wilfully reject the reign of Christ, will be cut off or destroyed, but "Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved" (Rom. x: 13); but none can call upon that name till they have first heard of it; for, "How shall they call on Him in whom they have not believed? and how shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard."—Verse 14.

The great work of earth's redemption, then, is in the "ages to come" (Eph. ii: 7); and it is in those ages that "the unsearchable riches of Christ" will be fully manifested, and the innumerable company "which no man can number" who will have "washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb," shall then appear "before the throne, and before the Lamb," and triumphantly ascribe

"Blessing and glory, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and honor and power, and might, unto God forever and ever." Such will be the harvest gathered by means of the FIRST-FRUIT.

Ed.

AN ASSUMPTION OF A D.D.

"Fear not them which can kill the body but cannot kill the soul." A man cannot kill the soul. But if it is one with the body, any man can kill it. There is no such thing in the universe as a dead soul."

IGNORANT as this D.D. says we are of Hebrew and Greek, I think we know enough to comprehend the fact that he does not possess the attribute of omniscience, and therefore there may be such a thing somewhere in the universe as a "dead soul." If he will turn to (Rev. xvi: 3) he will find testimony that "every living soul in the sea died." Then there must have been such a thing as a dead soul. Should he say, "That means the fishes and whales died," I reply, they were souls, and they died. If he understands Hebrew and Greek, he knows that the principal word in Hebrew for soul is Nephesh, and that the only word in Greek for the soul is Psuche. In the Hebrew we find the expression dead nephesh "dead soul" of not unfrequent occurrence, though our translation does not always suffer that fact to appear, but a D.D. should not attempt to conceal it. The Greek term psuche is primarily and properly expressive of life, though our translators have sometimes rendered it life, and at other times soul. Of this Dr. Clark complains, particularly in Matt. xvi: 25-26. If our D.D. maintains a nephesh or psuche cannot be killed by man, yet he must admit that God is able to destroy both soul (psuche) and body; for so the remainder of the text declares, from which he quoted partially. Besides, if souls cannot be killed by men, in some sense, will our friend tell us how we are to understand the record, (Joshua x), wherein the overthrow of certain cities, it is said six times, with slight variations, "All the souls that were therein he utterly destroyed!" That looks as if men might kill some souls! Will he say, That means he destroyed their persons. Agreed. So soul sometimes means person, or personality. Now whose person or personality cannot men kill or destroy? Or, of whose person or personality did Jesus speak in the text under consideration? Was it the soul or person of all men, or of a certain specific class of men? Luke introduces the words thus, "I say unto you, my friends"; and Matthew shows that it was in a discourse with the disciples, and to fortify them against apostacy under their coming suffering, that Jesus spake the words under consideration. They express a fact, viz.: That man cannot extinguish their personality, or deprive his followers of life, so as to destroy or deprive them of that future and eternal life which he promised; but that God was able to do both—therefore fear not them who kill the body [deprive you of life now] but are not able to kill the soul (or extinguish your personality); for whosoever shall lose his life—psuche—for my sake shall find it." Compare Matt. x. 28, and Luke xii. 4, 5, with Matt. xvi. 25.

The text, then, gives no countenance to the assumption of an entity in man, called the soul, that survives in a state of consciousness when the man is dead; but it does give the glorious hope to the followers of Christ that however they may be tortured by men, even unto death, their personality shall be maintained by God, and they shall be raised up to an endless life at the last day. But it is also a warning that if they deny Christ, and apostatize under their sufferings, God will do that which man cannot do—destroy both soul and body—extinguish their being, their personality—forever: therefore fear him, and not men who have no such power.

PRAYERS.

PRAYERS need not be fine. I believe God abhors fine prayers. If a person asks charity of you in elegant sentences he is not likely to get it. Finery in dress or language is out of place in beggars. I heard a man in the street one day begging aloud by means of oration. He used grand language in very pompous style. And I dare say he thought he was sure of getting piles of coppers by his borrowed speech; but I, for one, gave him nothing but felt more inclined to laugh at his bombast. Many prayer-meeting prayers are a great deal too fine. Keep your figures and metaphors, and parabolical expressions for your fellow-creatures. Use them to those who want to be instructed, but do not parade them before God. When we pray, the simpler our prayers are the better; the plainest, humblest language which expresses our meaning is the best.—Spurgeon.

To believe in Christianity, without knowing why we believe it, is not Christian faith but blind credulity.

THE PROMISE AND OATH OF GOD TO ABRAHAM.—NO. V.

BY THE EDITOR OF THE "BIBLE EXAMINER."

AN OBJECTOR'S LAST RESORT.

AN objector to my view, as a last resort, says: "No man can be revived from the dead without a union with Christ." That is true: but he overlooks a Scripture fact, viz., Union with Christ is two-fold. First, Christ has united himself to the race, as such. "He was made flesh" (John i. 14); God sent "his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh" (Rom. viii. 3); "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same . . . For verily he took not on him the nature of angels; but he took on him the seed of Abraham" (Heb. ii. 14-16); he "made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men."—Phil. ii. 7.

Such texts are a sample of Scripture testimony going to show that Christ was connected with the race of men, as such, i. e., with all men, everywhere and of every age; for, "the head of every man is Christ."—1 Cor. xi. 3. By which means he was enabled to "taste death for every man" (Heb. ii. 9); and being "the man Christ Jesus, he gave himself a ransom for all" (1 Tim. ii. 6); and by his death and resurrection he became "Lord both of the dead and living" (Rom. xiv. 9); has the disposal of both dead and living by virtue of his own life, death and resurrection; for, "He is Lord of all."—Acts x. 36. Thus is Christ connected with the whole race of Adam, and is the Seed of the woman that shall bruise the serpent's head, and shall "destroy the works of the devil" (1 John iii. 8), thereby rendering the death which entered into the world by one transgression (Adam's) inoperative to hold Adam's posterity; and so by Christ's one offering of himself he "taketh away the sin of the world" (John i. 29) by rendering death powerless to hold any of the human family, unless they have rejected the LIFE-GIVER; which they cannot do till they have first heard of him. Till that personal rejection of Christ the union, by his taking upon him our nature, remains unbroken, and if raised into life it is by virtue of that relation, and is an act of grace, favor or love: none are raised in a hopeless state.

Such is the first ground of union with Christ.

But there is a second ground of union; this it is which secures the resurrection to immortality, eternal life. This union is by becoming "partakers of the Divine nature" (2 Pet. i. 4); having received the "Holy Spirit of promise" (Eph. i. 13), so that "the Spirit which raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken their mortal bodies" (Rom. viii. 11), being members of Christ's spiritual body; and hence, like their Head, they cannot die any more.—Luke xx. 36. These are raised incorruptible, immortal.—1 Cor. xv. 52-54.

Thus I have shown, that while union with Christ is essential to revival from death, this union is both human and divine; the latter only securing eternal life and immortality, while the former will secure a revival to all who have not wilfully rejected the LIFE-GIVER. Such as have not heard of him, and never had the means of knowing him, and hence have never severed the human union or relationship with him, are perfectly within the resurrection power of the LIVE GIVER, who is "Lord both of the dead and living"; and as "the Father raiseth up the dead and quickeneth them, even so the Son quickeneth whom he will" (John v. 21); for, "the head of every man is Christ."—1 Cor. xi. 3.

Well might the Apostle say, while contemplating a portion of this subject, "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! . . . For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things: to whom be glory forever. Amen."—Rom. xi. 33, 36.

Some, in these days, appear to talk as if they knew and had "found out" that God cannot or will not fulfil his promise and oath to Abraham and his seed, to bless all the families of the earth, because so many of them are dead who never had that blessing or heard of it. Let them remember that what God has promised he is able to perform. "Is anything too hard for God?" Shall his word return to him void, and not accomplish that whereto he sent it? Are his ways no higher than our finite ways? Are his thoughts to be confined to our thinking? Are things impossible to him because they seem so to us? It is time to "put away childish things" (1 Cor. iii. 11), and see if we cannot bear a little "strong meat" which "belongeth to them that are of full age."—Heb. v. 14.

THE QUESTION ABOUT CHILDREN.

The view I now take settles another "vexed question"; it secures the revival of infants, or all such as have died before personal knowledge of God's love to the world. They are revived by virtue of their union to Christ's humanity, which has never been dissolved; for when Christ returns from heaven he comes as "The Son of man" (Matt. xxv. 31 and xvi. 27); "for the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father with his angels," etc. He is both the Son of man and the Son of God. As the Son of man he is united with the entire race of Adam, and is the "one" who "died for all" (2 Cor. v. 14), because "all were dead": and those who are not in the dominion of death by a wilful rejection of the LIFE-GIVER, will have the benefit of the union of Christ's humanity, and death cannot hold them till such time as they reject the divine union which is to be preached to "every creature" for their acceptance. All raised by virtue of union with Christ's humanity will be in a probationary state, and to them continued life will be the result of the acceptance of the LIFE-GIVER, personally; and "the second death" will, to them, be the result of a wilful rejection of him.

THE SHADOW AND THE SUBSTANCE.

The law, given by Moses, was "the shadow of things to come; but the body is of Christ."—Col. iii. 17. The law required that a redeemer (Heb. Gouail) should be a kinsman, a man of the same race or family, "One of his brethren may redeem him."—Lev. xxv. 48. Christ, therefore, must become a kinsman of the race in order to be a Redeemer. For this end he became "the man, Christ Jesus." "Who gave himself a ransom for all" the race, "to be testified in due time."—1 Tim. ii. 5, 6. When that ransom is made known, or "testified" to the ransomed, if wilfully rejected, death takes its course; for, as there is but "one Mediator," so there is but one Redeemer; hence, if the testimony concerning him has come to the knowledge of those for whom the benefit is intended and they despise or reject it, there remaineth no deliverer for them.

This rejection, however, can only take place after the Redeemer's presentation to them or, after he has been so presented to them that there can be no excuse for the unbeliever's rejection of him. Till then death cannot hold one of the race redeemed; they live again by virtue of the connection with "the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all" men, by the virtue and right of his kinsmanship. But "If we sin wilfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins, but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries."—Heb. x. 26, 27. Till such wilful sin of rejection of the Redeemer his relationship remains, and life somehow will be secured till the trial of the individual is fairly and fully made. To suppose otherwise is to suppose that the whole scheme of human redemption is a mockery and deception to the vast majority of those "for whom Christ died."

GOD'S PLEDGE.

God has pledged himself that "he will destroy . . . the face of the covering cast over all people, and the vail that is spread over all nations," and "swallow up death in victory."—Isa. xxv. 7, 8. And he further said: "My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the Lord. For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts. For as the rain cometh down, and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither, but watereth the earth, and maketh it bring forth and bud, that it may give seed to the sower, and bread to the eater: so shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth: it shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it."—Isa. lv. 8-11.

A "MORTAL RESURRECTION."

The idea of a mortal resurrection for the purpose of inflicting torment (however short a time) and then killing again, is a baseless assumption, having no foundation in the Bible, in justice or reason. The character of such a transaction must ever be looked upon as an arbitrary act of revenge; as unlike God as the act of eternal torment, which justly shocks the reason of all thinking and unprejudiced minds. Neither of these views has any likeness of the God who "so loved the world as to give his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." No revival into life of any man once dead will ever take place except as an act of grace or favor. God has given his "Son power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as the Father has given him." In order to attain this eternal life, "all flesh" must first "know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ," etc.—John xvii. 2, 3. In order to obtain such knowledge the "true God, and Jesus Christ" must be made known, as proclaimed to "all flesh," or to all Adam's race; and the Father hath given Christ power over all flesh for this very purpose, and none can fail of that life except by a wilful rejection of it, which they can never be guilty of doing till the truth is made known to them.

THE TRUTH TO BE MADE KNOWN.

That the truth shall be made known to all men is affirmed in the most positive manner by the apostle Paul thus: "God our LIFE-GIVER; who will have all men live (Syriac); and to come unto the knowledge of the truth."—1 Tim. ii. 3, 4. What "truth"? Let Paul continue: "For there is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus; who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time."—1 Tim. ii. 5, 6.

Here is the truth which God wills all men shall come to the knowledge of: he "will" have all men "live," and receive this knowledge; for upon the reception or rejection of this "one Mediator" turns the final state of all for whom he "gave himself a ransom." On verse 5 Dr. Bloomfield says:

"This seems to have reference to what immediately precedes; q. d. '[God our Saviour will have all men to be saved and come to a knowledge of the truth];' for he is the God alike of all; and the Man Christ Jesus is the Mediator between God and men, who gave himself a ransom for all. Here it is implied that it is alone by a recognition of the truth as regards God and the Mediator between God and men that we can be saved."

The "recognition" can only be made from having the knowledge of "the truth" to be recognized; and God "will have all men to come unto the knowledge of the truth." Who shall say he cannot or will not do it because it has never yet been done? Is death an insurmountable obstacle in the way of God's will or too mighty for almighty power? Must his will be thwarted because we cannot comprehend the greatness of his power? Are our theories too mighty for God's promise and oath?

On the expression, "And come unto the knowledge of the truth," Dr. Adam Clarke says:

"The truth, the Gospel of Christ, should be proclaimed to them . . . and when it is made known, then it is the duty of those who hear it to acknowledge and receive it; this is the proper import of the original word, that they may come to the acknowledgment of the truth."

Dr. Clarke, on the expression, "To be testified in due time," quotes from Rosenmuller as follows:

"This is the doctrine which is reserved for its own time: the doctrine which in its own time shall be delivered to all the inhabitants of the earth."

So much for the testimony of the learned commentators. They, probably, hardly comprehended the fulness of their own statements; but the fulness is in the text, and thereby it is made certain that all, for whom Christ gave himself a ransom, will, some time or other, "come unto the knowledge of the truth"; and, if they accept it, will be saved or have an endless life. But if they reject it they will die for their own sins, and "be as though they had not been."

"IT LEADS TO UNIVERSALISM."

And now what have the opposers to say further? "Oh," say they, "it leads to universal salvation." I deny the allegation; there is no such result necessary from my position. Any doctrine may be abused. The preaching of the doctrine of the abounding grace of God and justification by faith led some to accuse the apostles of teaching a licentious doctrine, saying that they taught, "Let us do evil that good may come." Life believers have had to meet, continually, the cry of "Infidelity," because they rejected the doctrine of inherent immortality. Shall they now take up the cry of "Universal salvation" because I believe and teach that God will literally fulfil his promise and oath to Abraham? Or, in other words, because I believe the Gospel must and will be preached "to every creature," and an opportunity be given to every soul of Adam's posterity to secure an endless life, before they are finally doomed to an endless death, for non-improvement of the grace of God in Christ.

The persons who thus find fault with my position show, conclusively, it is for lack of other and better arguments. I have clearly stated that some will utterly perish and never find eternal life, because they wilfully refuse it on the terms God has offered it: i. e., by faith in or reliance on Jesus Christ as the one Mediator and LIFE-GIVER. No man can come unto God but by Jesus the Messiah; for, says our Redeemer, "I am the way, the truth, and the life: no man cometh unto the Father but by me."—John xiv. 6.

IS OUR VIEW HURTFUL?

I ask, then, What meaneth this bitter opposition to my views of the promise and oath of God to Abraham? Is it because the view is pernicious and will work dishonor to God and evil to men? It certainly cannot be the first; for no doctrine can be more honorable to God or better vindicate the righteousness of his government over the children of men. It cannot work evil to men. Pray tell me who it can harm? Will it make you love God less? To say that would be to say you do not love him now. Does it give encouragement to sinners to continue in sin because God's grace does so abound? Let all such know their "damnation is just" (Rom. iii. 3; they have "the way, the truth and the life" set before them; and if they "sin wilfully after they have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more (literally "no other") sacrifice for sin," etc.—Heb. x. 26. Who then is harmed by my view of the subject? It cannot harm the generations who have gone in death; they are past the evil effects of the doctrine, if there be any evil in it. As it cannot work evil to the living nor the dead, even if it be an error, why all this hostility to it, especially among those who have abandoned so many of the traditions of men and profess to be anti-sectarian? What is the root of their hostility? Let them ask themselves, is it not because it interferes with some pet theory that they have espoused and are unwilling to give up or even to modify? If so, what better are they than any other sectarians? What less is it than to claim an infallibility that does not belong to man? Even Paul could say, "We know in part . . . but when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away."—1 Cor. xiii. 9, 10. That which is perfect has not yet come; so we may and ought to be growing in grace and knowledge, and not get stereotyped or petrified, but "follow on to know the Lord."

WHAT BECOMES OF DEPARTED SPIRITS?

"Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it."—Eccles. xii. 7.

THE frequency and confidence in which the assertion is made that Sheol and its Greek equivalent Hades denote, in Scripture, the dwelling-place of separate or disembodied spirits suggests the necessity of once more calling attention to the matter in these pages.

We care not to inquire at present whether these terms have been so used in other writings; what we are concerned with is the use made of them in the Holy Scriptures. And, notwithstanding all that the reader may have found to the contrary in books of the learned and unlearned, we affirm, without fear of successful contradiction, that not in its fifty-one occurrences in the Old Testament is sheol spoken of as the abode of "disembodied or separate spirits." The same is true of hades in the New Testament. So far are the sacred writings from speaking of sheol or hades as the place of the spirits of the dead that, while the terms "spirit" and "spirits" occur about 350 times in the Bible, they are not once used regarding the dwellers in hades. These are rather startling facts, and they seem very unaccountable on the hypothesis that the spirits of the dead abide in hades till the resurrection. Not once in Scripture is the spirit of man said to go to, or to be in, sheol or hades. In presence of these facts we are certainly warranted to deny the accuracy of statements to the contrary by whomsoever made. An undeniable fact speaks for itself.

Moreover, the Scripture does tell us what becomes of the spirit of man at death. This is what is said: "Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit shall return to God who gave it."—Eccles. xii. 7. According to this testimony man's spirit at death returns to God—not sheol. It returns to God—where it was before it was given, whatever man may say to the contrary. This result of death to man is in exact harmony with the account of his creation. "The Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul."—Gen. ii. 7. The dust-formed man was without life, thought or sensation before his Maker inspired him with the breath of life; and so, when that God-imparted breath is withdrawn, or returns to God, the dust returns to the earth as it was, and the man is dead. To this fact Job referred when he said, "If He set His heart upon man, if He gather unto Himself his spirit and his breath, all flesh shall perish together, and man shall turn again unto dust."—Job xxxiv. 14, 15.

See how the sacred writings distinguish between man and that spirit which at death leaves him and returns to God. "Hence we gather," says Mr. Constable, "that that spirit of man which God takes from man is in reality God's own spirit brought back to its original source." "In death it only returned, went back where it was before God formed the dust of the earth into the figure and organization of man. The spirit which went forth to animate that frame was with God before it went forth." "Man is not the spirit, but only has the spirit of God within him. God may withdraw the loan, and at once sinks into nothingness that life of man which only depended for its being upon the presence of the spirit. This was a truth which the old philosopher, Job, well knew; and therefore he only pledges himself not to speak wickedness 'all the while my breath is in me, and the spirit of God is in my nostrils."* It was because the apostle knew all this that he reasoned—"If the dead rise not? let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die."—1 Cor. xv. 32. But blessed be God—"As by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead." God has made His Son Jesus "the resurrection and the life"; and those who have learned to trust Him can, in the hour of death, commit to Him the keeping of their lives as unto a faithful Creator.

So David, in prospect of death, confidently exclaimed: "Into Thine hands I commit my spirit: Thou hast redeemed me, O Lord God of truth."—Psa. xxxi. 5. Commenting on those words, Mr. Constable truly says: "It was because he was redeemed that he was able to commend his spirit into the hands of God, and to call it his at all. God first gave man his spirit in the covenant of creation. Man by sin forfeited his right to this spirit, and in consequence it is at death rendered back by every man to the God to whom it belongs. Redemption restores to the believer his possession of this spirit for life eternal; hence the believer, even when he is rendering up his spirit to God as the forfeit of original transgression, still regards it as his by the covenant of grace in Jesus Christ, and is able to use the very words that Christ used himself—'Father, into Thy hands I commit my spirit.'"

Stephen, when dying, used these words: "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit."—Acts vii. 59. It is worthy of notice that this faithful witness, the first to lay down his life for his Master's sake, commends his spirit to the Lord Jesus, not to the Father. The context furnishes a sufficient reason for this. Stephen saw Jesus looking on. "Behold, I see the heavens opened, and Jesus standing at the right hand of God," he exclaimed. What more natural, then, that the dying disciple should call his Lord, whom he knew to be "The Resurrection and the Life," to take his spirit into safe keeping till he returned to open the gates of hades and set the prisoners free? Stephen was well aware that just "as the living Father had life in himself, so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself, and that, as the Father raiseth the dead, and maketh them alive, even so the Son maketh alive whom he will;" that he is the Prince of Life, and has the keys of hades and of death; therefore, seeing Jesus standing at the right hand of God, it is no wonder that he cried, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit."

Let the reader observe that in the sacred **Hades*; or, The Intermediate State of Man. By Henry Constable, A.M. 1st edition, pp. 21, 22.

narrative there is a clear distinction made between Stephen and Stephen's spirit, for the historian tells us that when Stephen had called on the Lord Jesus to receive his spirit, "he (Stephen) fell asleep;" and that devout men carried Stephen to his burial, and made great lamentation over him."—Acts vii. 60; viii. 2. Who was stoned? Stephen. Who fell asleep? Stephen. Who was carried to his burial? Stephen. Not Stephen's spirit. It went to God, who gave it—to Jesus, who will keep it safely, and restore it when he calls his faithful witness from the dead.

These truths are further illustrated and confirmed by the language used by the evangelists, describing the death of our Lord himself. "When Jesus had cried with a loud voice, he said, Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit; and, having said this, he gave up the ghost (i. e. spirit)."—Luke xxiii. 46.

"Here Jesus"—to quote once more from Mr. Constable's Hades—"as a man is distinguished from the spirit which was in him; he gave it up; he was separated from it. He was therefore not that which was separable, and separated from him. When the spirit had gone to God, Jesus, the man, was left without the spirit, yet still himself. The spirit of Jesus was not Jesus himself. Jesus is dead; his spirit is gone back to God; his lifeless body hangs upon the cross. Which of the two is Jesus? The dead body, according to the Word of God. 'When they came to Jesus and saw that he was dead.' The lifeless body is called Jesus by his apostle John, and not the spirit which had left him. In the very same way the angels speak of Jesus to the women who came to anoint the dead body. . . . 'Why seek ye the living among the dead? He is not here, but is risen.'"

Jesus died. His spirit went to God. Jesus was taken down from the cross, laid in Joseph's sepulchre, and rose from it alive on the morning of the third day. Such is the language of Scripture. How very different from that of the theologians!

Perhaps it may be thought that the words of David, spoken, according to the apostle Peter, concerning our Lord—"Thou wilt not leave my soul in sheol" (Greek, hades), support the idea that at death the spirit goes to hades. The supposition contradicts other Scriptures. Stephen saw Jesus standing at the right hand of God, and called on him to receive his spirit. The supposition, moreover, is based on the thought that soul and spirit are synonymous. This is a mistake.

The late Dr. Eadie, whose deliverance is beyond suspicion<sup>3</sup> of bias in our favor, and whose learning will not be questioned, says: "It is obvious that the argument based upon the idea that Christ's soul went to sheol and his body to the grave has no foundation. The Hebrew does not warrant this distinction. Christ's soul, in such an idiom, is his entire person. Now, what is meant by sheol (Greek, hades)? It is explained in the second clause. It is the place where corruption is to be seen, the region of the dead; so the apostles understood it. Though Messiah was to die, death's power was to be very limited; he was not to be abandoned to his dark dominion."

This is confirmed by the Lord himself: "As Jonah was three days and three nights in the belly of the fish, so the Son of man shall be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth."—Matt. xii. 40. To say that these words teach that only the body of Jesus, and not Jesus himself, was to be buried is unwarranted and destroys the propriety of the comparison. It was Jonah himself, and not something belonging to him, that was confined in the belly of the fish; and the Lord said, "As Jonah was, so shall the Son of man be." The only difference is that Jonah was alive,* and the Son of man was dead. Yet it was he who was to be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth—not his spirit.

Nowhere in Scripture is sheol or hades said to be the abode of separate spirits. The Bible never speaks of the spirit of man going to hades at death, or being there between death and resurrection; but, on the contrary, that when the body returns to the earth the spirit returns to God who gave it. The spirit of man is not the man, but a divine gift by which his life is sustained.

These findings are not only true, but very important. They show the false character of prevailing religious sentiments, of the Romish doctrine of purgatory and the invocation of departed saints. They show the unscriptural character of that widespread system of Spiritism which professes to hold converse with departed spirits. But more, and better far, our findings show our ground of confidence for the cheering hope of resurrection from the dead, faith in the promise of the faithful and all-powerful God. He is faithful that promised; and we commit the keeping of our lives unto him as unto a faithful Creator.

Far mistaken are they who imagine that the Christian who believes that "the dead know not anything," and that, but for a resurrection, there would be no future life for the dead, finds himself without hope, peace and joy in the immediate prospect of death. During the last twenty-five years, within his own small range of observation, the writer has witnessed the expression of peace and hope in the hour of death in many cases of brethren and sisters—old and young and middle-aged. The disciple of threescore years and ten, and the tender youth of fourteen, consciously passing away from the sight of those who were to them the dearest of earth—in full confidence and hope of meeting them on the resurrection morn; yet none of these then—some of them never—had any belief in "the survival of the soul." In every instance their only hope of living again was in the return of their Lord to make them alive. And surely that was enough. He is faithful. "He that believeth in me, though he may die, yet shall he live." "I am he that liveth and was dead, and behold I am alive for evermore, and have the keys of hades and of death!" Is it not much better to rest our hopes on the word of the Lord than on the pleasing fancies of human imagination?—W. LAING, in The Rainbow.

A GLORIOUS WORK.

An able correspondent writes: "Thinking and guessing must give way to literal and lexical teaching upon the most momentous points of man's nature and future. You must brace yourself and friends up to the conflict, and develop the whole theology of Scripture upon the basis and in harmony with man's true nature and God's revealed character. It is a glorious work, casting that of Luther into the shade."

It is perfectly obvious to all who have escaped from the bondage of brainless prejudice that the work in which we are engaged is profoundly important. Sometimes, in musing mood, we have had a vivid conception of the startling possibilities of its issues. Is it too much to imagine the theology of Christendom purged of its dread paganism, which makes man an immortal rebel and God an omnipotent tyrant, and brought back to the apostolic platform with its exquisite picture of God in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them? If Christian men were "braced up" to the enormous dishonor done to the Divine character

[*I have long believed that Jonah was in a death state, breathless and unconscious, for nearly the entire period he was "in the belly of the fish," and was only restored to life and consciousness by being ejected into the open air. My opinion of the matter is unchanged.—EDITOR OF BIBLE EXAMINER.]

and government by the pagan dogmas which theology mixes with the doctrines of revelation, neither man nor money nor mental energy would be wanting to do battle with the evil and drive it out of the church and the world with all possible speed. The teachers of Judea crucified Christ; the teachers of Christendom have crucified Christianity. Oh, that those Christians who understand the truth would come to the rescue and redeem their Father's character and government from calumny.

The vital force of Luther's reformation was a weapon chosen from the divine arsenal—justification by faith in Christ. With this he bravely fought for God and men against a gigantic system of fraud and falsehood which had oppressed the nations for ages in the insulted name of Truth. But that potent weapon had been in the book ever since the days of the apostles. The false church concealed the book from which it pretended to draw its authority for inquisition, purgatory, saint worship, Mariolatry, and all the other impostures with which it deluded the world. And we who are to-day pleading for a thorough doctrinal reformation also find that our chief weapon—immortality by faith in Christ—has always been in the Book. Luther's master-doctrine was part of the faith delivered to the saints, and so is ours. The one doctrine is as clear as the other. Justification is by grace through faith in Christ. Eternal life is the gift of God in Christ. Both divine gifts are expressed in the same words.

But now let us think of the momentous fact that the Romish purgatory, if the divine doctrine of life only in Christ were universally believed, would no longer be treated by Protestants as an error, but would be rejected both by them and Roman Catholics as an impossibility. This ghastly, ghostly underworld of purgation through fire supposes a population of conscious, immortal, disembodied "souls." That is to say, it supposes that which has no possible existence and never had. If those to whom immortality is given by union to Christ nevertheless "fall asleep" until his second coming—which the Scriptures most clearly teach—it is very certain that those who die out of Christ, the unholy dead, who have no immortality, either inherent or bestowed, must be entirely and utterly unconscious. That is to say, they are dead, literally and absolutely; a fact upon which it would not have been needful to insist, in our efforts to restore apostolic doctrines respecting man, had not false doctrine, invented to fill the coffers of covetous priests, corrupted even language itself, and given to words a meaning the very opposite of that which they naturally and lexically bear. It makes one mourn with very shame over the perversity of those who professed themselves divinely appointed teachers that they have actually compelled language to wear chains of slavery and to say that death means life, and many similar absurdities, by which truth is concealed and the good news turned into a message of terror. This unnatural use of words has "crept" into the theological vocabulary, as the ungodly men of whom Jude speaks crept into the church, vitiating the blessed truths of the Gospel, making God say what "never came into his mind,"* and thus driving the inquirer into a labyrinth of subtleties where he cannot find the salvation and peace for which he yearns. Nothing can be plainer and simpler than the teachings of Scripture about sin and salvation, death and life, if we will accept the words as exactly representing the things of which they speak; but commentators and theologians have found in each term such a multiplicity of "senses" that the sense is difficult to discover. While professing to shed light upon the language of Christ and his apostles, they have covered it with a cloud of metaphysical speculations understood neither by themselves nor any one else. We are not bearing false witness, but stating sad truth. We are protesting against the doctrinal errors which have been invented and supported by the arbitrary attachment of a meaning to words which they do not bear for the support of theological systems of which the Bible knows nothing.

Probably it is altogether hopeless to expect harmony of belief until the Lord comes, but some ground in this direction would be gained if Christian men would do a very simple thing—namely, give up in religious thought that which they would scorn as absurd in secular or commercial thought—the unnatural, or mystical use of words. Common sense and the practical experience of every-day unite in teaching us the necessity of giving the right name to the article we wish to purchase from the shopkeeper or merchant. Common sense likewise guides our understanding in reading a book of history or travels, or the editorial commentary in a newspaper on the events of the day. The author or editor says what he means, and we understand him to mean what he says. It is only—mournful perversity of our boasted intelligence!—when we come to that book which, with Divine authority and infallibility, speaks of the nature and destiny of man, that we lose common sense and teach that punishment means probation, destruction means preservation and death means life! In the history of the race, with all its astounding mistakes, blunders and delusions, there is nothing to equal this amazing folly. When God says, "They are dead," how dare we say, "They are alive"? This "speaking against God" has for some time been, and is increasingly becoming, a habit among men whose piety is unquestionable, but who are, without knowing it, swayed by a theory of human nature for which there is no evidence whatever in any region of testimony, physical, mental or supernatural.

And it is here that the theory of a church, or school, or evangelistic system in hades comes in. As a theory it is absolutely without Scriptural foundation. There is not a word in the Bible to give it the shadow of support. The Bible teaches us that we are mortals, that when we die our being ceases, and that without resurrection we can never live again. And, of course, a theory which is contrary to Scripture must be dangerous to men. Tell the man who will not yield his heart and mind to the loving Redeemer that there will be a scheme of probation, evangelization and restoration in the underworld after "the death of the body"—error is fertile in the invention of phrases!—and he will roll his sweet morsel of sin under his tongue and thank you for the delightful gospel which assures him of ultimate safety though he revel in present iniquity.

This doctrine cannot be true. It is self-condemned by the terms which define it. Its lawlessness thunders its doom. Its immorality declares it rotten at the heart. That poor, noisy, empty thing, Antinomianism, the remnants of which still linger in a few dark corners of the island, is a sweet child of heaven compared with this Protestant delusion of reformation in hades. We understand the nonsense of "indulgences" in Popish regions. The thing is profitable as an article of merchandise to the holy men who sell, whatever it may be to the simpletons who buy. But we do not understand the modern Protestant purgatory which proclaims deliverance after death to men who rejected salvation whilst in life. It appears to us irrational and unphilosophical, whilst we are certain that it is anti-Scriptural and glaringly immoral. Preach a post-mortem salvation, and if the Spirit of God does not graciously counteract the delusion, your hearers will adopt hades as the most agreeable road to heaven. Alas! that we should be compelled to write thus, but fidelity to God and conscience and love to men make it imperative. We have narrowly noticed the doctrine of Universalism, and its younger sister, partial restoration, in England and America, and the result is, let the servants of Christ denounce both with holy vehemence!

We may not dismiss this part of our subject without an expression of unfeigned surprise that some writers who have rejected the error of man's natural immortality nevertheless teach evangelization and recovery in hades. Terribly delusive as this subterranean gospel is, there is no difficulty in seeing how it commends itself to the humanity of men who believe that every human creature possesses a "never-dying soul." We sympathize earnestly with the humane feeling that recoils—and which, we boldly say, God himself has taught to recoil—from the idea—we do not say conception, because the thing is altogether inconceivable—of suffering protracted through endless cycles of time, for which we generally use the awful word "eternity." If we believed the dogma of immortal souls we should—under the pressure of moral and mental necessity, under the impression that justice would be outraged by endless woe as the penalty of, say, seventy years of sin, and, above all, under the holy conviction that our heavenly Father's character must be vindicated from the terrible aspersion of implacable tyranny—we should, I say, cry aloud, pray earnestly and call the intelligent universe to join us in the agonizing petition for universal restoration! But there is no need for this distress in relation to men, for they are all mortal by nature, or for the loyal anxiety for the Divine reputation, for that is safe in the estimation of those who know the truth, and will continue to gather fresh lustre and glory through all the ages, "forever and ever!"

But how writers who see clearly that man is destitute of inherent immortality, and that "eternal life is the gift of God in Christ," can plead for the Protestant purgatory, this "evangelization in hades," is to me altogether inexplicable. What does it, what can it mean? There is no mystery about a "never-dying" or "immortal soul" existing after "the death of the body"; in other words, if this imaginary entity be deathless it can and must exist, although we are altogether ignorant of the mode or conditions of its existence; but the survival of a mortal soul after "the death of the body" is a thought for which we have no mental lodging. It may be possible, it may be true, but to us it is neither. So far as we are concerned, it is simply an intellectual blank. We affirm fearlessly and logically that if "disembodied souls" can live anywhere for even the short period that we dwellers on the world's surface call a day, they can live forever. Men who teach that all souls are by nature immortal, and that therefore God, who is Love, will redeem them all through the fires of purgatory or of hell are consistent with themselves, though in error on both sides of their doctrine; and men who teach that all souls are by nature mortal, and that salvation in the intermediate state will reach those of them who were not saved whilst in the body, are inconsistent with themselves as well as in error regarding "the intermediate state."

But what a cloud of thick darkness all this time hangs over the work of our blessed Redeemer! LIFE ETERNAL ONLY IN HIM! Understand these words and the fog vanishes from the theological region as it does from hill and dale when the sun ascends the heavens. But it is here that our grand difficulty confronts us, the very citadel of orthodoxy, with its troops and cannon. In Luther's day the nations were sick at heart from the immorality and tyranny of holy church, and myriads who durst not whisper their convictions prayed in their hearts for victory to the reformer. The Church was so shamefully and notoriously corrupt that the world was ashamed of it. All this silent influence helped the reformation. "But we are Protestants and reformed. We are clean escaped from the errors and corruptions of the days of Tetzal. You cannot bring any charge against us of concealing truth or teaching unscriptural doctrine. The Bible, open to every man, is our text-book and standard, and our honesty and morality are unimpeachable, the world being witness."

Just so. It is the old cry, "The temple of the Lord are these," that makes it so extremely difficult to awaken the Church at large to the fact that she may be wrong on one or two matters of extreme importance, casting suspicion upon the rectitude of the Divine Ruler, both in relation to justice and mercy, and obscuring the good news with a cloud which makes the multitude shrink from it as anything but a message of unmixed mercy. It is this assumed doctrinal perfection of the orthodox churches that makes so painfully difficult the task of convincing them that natural immortality and endless suffering are twin falsehoods, grievously dishonoring to God and a stumbling block to men. But, the Lord graciously upholding, we do not mean to shrink from duty notwithstanding the obloquy and ostracism which it involves, for this work has been assigned to us by the beloved Master, in whom alone is eternal life, whose approbation is splendid wages, and, in the words of our correspondent, it is indeed "A GLORIOUS WORK."—Ed. Rainbow, for January.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR OF "BIBLE EXAMINER."

The general character of the foregoing article is in harmony with the views I have promulgated from the outset of my present position; and, indeed, ever since I first came out against inherent immortality and endless torment," in 1840.

My faith has been unshaken in the fact that the dead are dead; that there is no consciousness in the death state; that "there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in sheol, whither thou goest."—Eccl. ix. 10. "The dead know not anything," verse 5. "The dead praise not the Lord."—Psa. cxv. 17.

When my friend, DR. LEASK, therefore, speaks of the doctrine of salvation being preached to men in hades, or the death state, as being held "in England and America," I am not disposed to believe he includes myself and those who entertain the same views; but some may think he does. I understand him to include only those who hold to a conscious state in death and the preaching of the Gospel to them in hades.

I know not of a single individual "in America" who holds to the doctrine DR. LEASK condemns. There may be such, but I have no knowledge of any, nor any fellowship with that view; nor with the view that any who have had the knowledge of "the only true God and Jesus Christ," which "proclaims deliverance after death to men who rejected salvation whilst in life." I do not believe in any "subterranean gospel."

I do believe that the Gospel is to be proclaimed "to every creature"; and if any of the human family have been deprived of it by unavoidable circumstances in this life, it will be proclaimed to them, not in hades, but, after their revival, by the resurrection from the dead at the voice of "Jesus Christ, who gave himself a ransom for all men, to be testified in due time."—1 Tim. ii. 5, 6. God's time has not yet come to all men, but it will as surely as that He "cannot lie," nor make oath to a lie.

THE GLORY TO BE REVEALED.

THE Father would not permit his face to be seen in ages of imperfection. Hence he taught Moses that no man could see his face and live; and putting him into a cleft of the rock, he permitted him to behold his back-parts—the trail of retiring splendor. Yet there were visions of a man—from time to time, as Angel of the Presence, or Captain of the host, or Lord over cherubim or seraphim—seen by Isaiah and Ezekiel. We shall not be far astray if we declare that the person seen, by flesh or in the spirit, was he whose goings forth have been from of old, even from everlasting, or the days of eternity. When finally revealed, not as Angelus Redemptor, but as the man Christ Jesus, he could say to one who, like Moses, desired to see the Father, “Have I been so long with you, and hast thou not known me? he that hath seen me hath seen the Father.” The character of sinless purity, the words and works of power and glory, revealed a Divine One whose abode was in heaven, and who was one with the Father.

2. “The Scriptures speak of the fulness of the Godhead, of the riches of the glory of God. They call him the Father of glory, and apply to him other similar names. Into this very glory Jesus has entered; this fulness of God dwells bodily in him. From the glory of the exalted Christ we may therefore infer the glory of God. Biblical realism has its roots here—the realistic conception of spirit, instead of the idealistic and spiritulastic one which prevails in philosophy and theology. Spirit in the biblical full sense of the word, is not simply being, not even mere perceptive or thinking being; it is personality which is self-moved, and which, in the fulness of power, manifests its life and assumes form: so that spirit and a higher bodily or a glorified nature, do not exclude but include one another.—1 Cor. xv. 44; 2 Peter i. 4. This conception of spirit is true, above all, of God; whose self-revelation in the fulness of his powers, the Scriptures describe mainly by the word ‘glory.’ ‘It is a fact on which the whole revelation rests that there is above this visible world another world; a kingdom of God which was in existence even at creation, a perfect spiritual world, a world of light, life, and love. This is the ideal world, which is, indeed, rather the true and real world.—Luke xvi. 11; Heb. viii. 2; ix. 24. There reigns in it a purity, holiness and harmony of life, compared with which our life in the flesh is darkness and death. There is therefore a fulness, power and blessedness of life, compared with which our present life on earth is poverty and weakness, and such a life is in its nature eternal; such a kingdom is one that stands firm, immovable, indestructible, glorious in undecaying bloom and beauty.”

3. Doubtless the author is right, and it is likewise true that the Beloved of the Father was the chief glory which could be revealed from that high dominion. As the brightness of the divine glory, as the express image of the invisible God, he has been here to charm us into love and life, and train us for a more unveiled and sublimer revelation. The old distinction between heaven and earth shall come to an end when the King and the City descend, and the Shekinah glory burns out in sovereign splendor among glorified immortals. The fair and lovely and fragrant things in the visible are employed in Holy Scripture to set forth the perfections of our Lord; for though they be perishable, there is something in them of exquisite beauty and grace, faintly representing our life. He is the Rose of Sharon and the Lily of the Valley, but with bloom and fragrance unailing. But in other departments of nature there are elements, ordinances and orbs which are splendid without being frail, which appear to be enduring, and may be so, depending upon the will of God. Our Lord is both the Morning Star and the Sun of Righteousness, with brighter beams than either. As a rule, the things which have intrinsic value and endurance, have likewise external radiance—the sun and the constellations, the silver and the gold, the jasper, the sapphire, and the diamond. When God, who in his essence is pure spirit, assumes form, that form is the human, for man was made in the image or likeness of God, and when his essential holiness becomes objective, the necessary revelation is glory. His holiness is invisible glory; his glory is visible holiness. The holiness of God is truly the sublime and indestructible reality which underlies all moral law and all responsibility, all imperishable truth and goodness, all foundations of realities or possibilities of higher life; and as it is the deepest and firmest reality, it is likewise when suffered to come into external manifestation—the most glorious and resplendent. The purest gems, the stones which burn like fire, the brightness of the morning star, and the splendor of the sun are all beggarly when compared with the glory of his unveiled countenance. We shall need no sun or moon when the holy light of his face rests upon us, nor shall we need to be covered in any clefts of the rock until the supreme glory passes by. There will be open vision without veil or cloud in Jerusalem, the city of the golden.

4. From the first to the last work of the Lord, his holiness was the root of his glory, and his glory was the instrument of his power, though never permitted to come into full, triumphal, flambeauant lustre, except on the holy mountain. Crowned with light and power, and attended in glory by the greatest ones of the preceding dispensation, that revelation was verily a rehearsal of kingdom power, majesty and glory never to be forgotten. Hence there were a few chosen witnesses not permitted to "taste of death" till they beheld the Son of Man "coming in his kingdom."

5. The consideration of the whole doctrine places the reality of personal holiness in the most impressive light. There are persons in the world still encompassed with disease and mortality, and by no means sure that they will not sink down under the iron mace of death. Yet they have full assurance of future glory and power, of a reign in life eternal. In them, as in the Master and Lord, holiness is the invisible glory. Were there not obstructions, which can only be removed by the presence of the Lord, their true glory would shine out even now, and it would be manifest to what family they belong by visible splendor and power. But though the outward may not be seen, yet the transformation is surely advancing—from glory to glory; and every victory over sin and satan is another pledge and assurance of more lustre and majesty in the age of unveiling. In proportion to the holiness such will be the glory, and as the volume of glory, such will be the power and dominion.

6. In the kingdoms which have only an earthly history—which are born, and live and die here, and are lost in the ruins of time—we could not seek or find power without losing spiritual lustre. But how sweet and gracious it is, that while by prayer, humility, reverence and self-denial we gather inward spiritual grace, we are likewise growing into the inheritance of substantial power and glory in the kingdom which is everlasting. There is nothing visionary about it, it is no cloudland prospect, but the political power and regalism is as sure as the life and the blessedness.

7. We can easily understand why the unholy must perish. Where there is spiritual preparation, by new birth and supernatural advancement, a life growing up in God—the revealed glory finds plastic material, and falls upon it sweetly in quickening and transfiguration. The power of the holy light transforms and glorifies into its own nature.

But where there is only the corrupt flesh and the alienated soul, all naked and defenceless, the glory is an unquenchable fire which burns to the destruction of the ungodly. The necessary, the inevitable doom is "everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his power."

Of what prime importance it is, then, that we should work out what God is working in—attaining the holiness where that perfect love can reign which casteth out fear, that we may have boldness in the day of judgment.—G. GREENWELL, in The Rainbow.

HALF HOUR STUDIES OF SCRIPTURE. NO. I.

"God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."—John iii. 16.

GLORIOUS truths are taught here! God's unlimited love for a perishing race led him to send his dearly beloved Son into the world to suffer, die, and be raised from the dead as the LIFE-GIVER—as "a ransom for all" (1 Tim. ii. 6)—that "whosoever" believeth on him should not perish. We are forced to believe in the universality of God's love from the fact, plainly revealed in the Scripture, that he is an impartial being, and also from the language used in this passage. We must believe that the expression "the world" meant all men—the whole race of Adam, irrespective of age, color, nation, or condition; otherwise we do not know that his love embraces us. When we cannot determine whom his love does embrace, we are left, as it were, upon a broad sea of uncertainty, without compass or chart to guide us into the haven of everlasting rest.

The term "whomsoever," as well as the expression "the world," clearly shows the universality of his love in the gift of his Son. As God's love for the world embraced all men, we must conclude that the privilege, or opportunity, of believing on the Son to everlasting life will accordingly be given to all men. To limit the meaning of the term "whosoever" to embrace only some particular class of the human race, we must also limit the meaning of the expression "the world." To do this involves us into an irreconcilable conflict with one of the clearest revealed attributes of God's character, that he is no respecter of persons, is impartial in his dealings with the children of men, and immutable in his purposes.

Then look at the grand design of that gift! It was to save all from "perishing" who would "believe" on the Son. Here "perish" and "everlasting life" are placed in contrast. Christ came to save mankind from perishing; an everlasting life—an eternal abode with God—is the blessed boon to be obtained by believing on the Son of God. You may have it, I may have it, the whole world may have it if they will.

"THE TIMES OF RESTITUTION."

BY FOLLY G. PITTS.

O! OUR blessed God, we do bless Thy holy name for thy wonderful works to the children of men. Again we are made glad by Thy stately goings, and Thy marvelous works in these last days; and in the opening our eyes to see so plainly that the signs are thickening around us that our Lord and Saviour is at hand. While meditating on God's word, and his long-suffering and mercy to the children of men, my thoughts turned on the preaching of Peter on the days of Pentecost, and with what demonstration and power he convinced the hardened Jews of their sin in denying the Holy One and the Just, and desiring a murderer to be granted unto them; and killed the Prince of Life, whom God hath raised up from the dead; whereof we are witnesses, etc. But Peter says, "And now, brethren, I know that through ignorance ye did it, as did also your rulers. But those things which God before had shewed by the mouth of all his prophets, that Christ should suffer, he hath so fulfilled. Repent ye therefore and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord; and he shall send Jesus Christ, which before was preached unto you, whom the heavens must receive until the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began."

Have not the times of restitution commenced? Let us see. We will take the prophet Ezekiel on the restitution of Judah and Israel—Ezek. xxxvii.: "The hand of the LORD was upon me, and carried me out in the Spirit of the Lord, and set me down in the midst of the valley which was full of bones, and caused me to pass by them round about: and behold, there were very many in the open valley; and lo, they were very dry.

And he said unto me, Son of man, can these bones live? and I answered, O Lord God, thou knowest. Again he said unto me, prophesy upon these bones, and say unto them, O ye dry bones hear the word of the LORD. Thus saith the Lord God unto these bones; Behold I will cause breath to enter into you, and ye shall live; and I will lay sinews upon you, and will bring up flesh upon you, and cover you with skin, and put breath in you and ye shall live; and ye shall know that I am the LORD. So I prophesied as I was commanded: and as I prophesied, there was a noise, and behold a shaking, and the bones came together, bone to his bone." . . . "And when I beheld, lo, the sinews and flesh came up upon them, and the skin covered them above; but there was no breath in them. Then said he unto me, prophesy unto the wind, prophesy, son of man, and say to the wind, Thus saith the Lord God, come from the four winds, O breath, and breathe upon these slain, that they may live. So I prophesied as he commanded me, and the breath came into them, and they lived, and stood upon their feet, an exceeding great army. Then he said unto me, son of man, these bones are the whole house of Israel; behold they say, our bones are dried, and our hope is lost; we are cut off from our parts. Therefore prophesy and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God; Behold, O my people, I will open your graves, and cause you to come up out of your graves, and bring you into the land of Israel. And ye shall know that I am the LORD, when I have opened your graves, O my people, and brought you up out of your graves, and shall put my Spirit in you, and ye shall live." (O! bless the Lord for the gift of His holy Spirit, which is life; O! give me thy blessed Spirit, every moment to guide me into the living truth), "and I shall place you in your own land: Then shall ye know that I the LORD have spoken it, and performed it, saith the LORD." Is not this the beginning of the restitution?

Let us see what Paul says about it. In Rom. xi., when writing under the influence of God's holy Spirit, he says, "Behold therefore the goodness and severity of God on them which fell severely; but toward the goodness" (that is the gentile church), "if they continue in his goodness; otherwise thou shall be cut off. And they also, if they abide not still in unbelief, shall be grafted in, for God is able to graft them in again." Then Paul reasons with the gentiles thus, "For if thou wert cut out of the olive tree which is wild by nature, and wert grafted contrary to nature into a good olive tree; how much more shall these, which be the natural branches, be grafted into their own olive tree?" After reasoning with them he says, "For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits, that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the gentiles be come in. And so all Israel shall be saved; as it is written, There shall come out of Zion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob." (See Is. lix. 20, 21.) "And the Redeemer shall come to Zion, and unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob, saith the LORD. As for me, this is my covenant with them, saith the LORD; My Spirit that is upon thee, and my words which I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of thy seed's seed, saith the LORD, from henceforth and for ever." Amen; bless the LORD.

Oh, who can say, in the face of all God's holy words and promises, that there is no probation, after the Redeemer comes and turns away ungodliness from Jacob? For "this is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins." (See Jer. xxxi. 33, to the end of the chapter.) And as Paul goes on to say, "This is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins; as concerning the gospel, they are enemies for your sakes: but as touching the election, they are beloved for the father's sakes. For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance." (Bless the Lord for that.) "For as ye in times past have not believed God, yet have now obtained mercy through their unbelief": (mark this) "even so have these also now not believed, that through your mercy they may also obtain mercy." When? ANS. When the Deliverer comes, and the fulness of the gentiles have come in. Where are they now? Truly we can say, in their graves in the dust of the earth, but our God has promised to open their graves and bring them into the land of Israel. See Jer. xxxii., beginning at the 37th verse: "Behold I will gather them out of all countries whither I have driven them in mine anger, and in my fury, and in great wrath, and I will bring them again unto this place, and I will cause them to dwell safely; and they shall be my people, and I will be their God; and I will give them one heart, and one way that they may fear me forever, for the good of them, and their children after them: and I will make an everlasting covenant with them, that I will not turn away from them to do them good; but I will put my fear in their hearts, that they shall not depart from me. Yea. I will rejoice over them to do them good, and I will plant them in this land assuredly with my whole heart and with my whole soul." Amen. And if our God does this for Israel after the Deliverer comes, shall not his love through Jesus, give every creature, in due time, the knowledge that Christ tasted death for every man, and that he is the way, the truth and the life?" Yes; and let all holy beings say AMEN.

May God bless the BIBLE EXAMINER and its Editor and contributors, and all its readers, for to me it is full of good things.

A REVIEWER REVIEWED.

BY ELDER S. W. BISHOP.

ONE of the editorial board of a religious paper in reviewing an article written against the non-resurrection theory uses Rom. v: 12, after this manner. He says in the passage of Scripture that the brother quotes Paul says, "So death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned."

The brother says that death passed upon all men because they partook of Adam's fallen nature. Paul makes it a personal transgression, and one for which the person pays the penalty; and our brother makes it a transgression of one (Adam), for which all pay the penalty. Paul makes it clear that by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; not that we all die directly for Adam's sin, but that death is the result of sin. Adam introduced sin into the world; we all sin; hence we all die." If there is anything in the above paragraph that is tangible, anything that can be understood, it is this: We die; die what is termed a natural death; die the death brought into the world by Adam's sin, as the direct penalty for our personal transgressions. That is what the paragraph reads, and that is what the writer believes if he understands the meaning of the words he uses. I wish to notice what are the only logical conclusions from such premises.

1. If that doctrine is true, and the old score of sins is canceled, justice demands that we should not die. Can we stop sinning? Let the word of the Lord settle the question. My first text is Ezek. xviii: 21-22: "But if the wicked turn from all his sins that he hath committed, and keep all my statutes, and do that which is lawful and right, he shall surely live, he shall not die. All his transgressions that he hath committed, they shall not be mentioned unto him; in his righteousness that he hath done he shall live." This text tells the whole story, and that too in unmistakably plain language.

Again, John i: 7: "But if we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ, his son, cleanseth us from all sins." V. 9: "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." One text more will suffice—Titus ii: 14: "Who gave himself for us that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works." I thus prove that all who embrace the offered salvation through Christ, will in this life be made absolutely free from all the guilt of sin, through the pardoning love of God, to all who believe on our Lord Jesus Christ.

When we are "made free from sin," and have "become servants of God," and "have our fruit unto holiness," I ask, are we still subject to the penalty for that sin which God has pardoned? When through faith in Christ, and his atoneing blood, our sins are all covered, and God remembers them no more against us, will he inflict the penalty for those sins upon us just the same? What would you think of that governor who should issue his pardon in favor of the man doomed to die, and all the time after that act, hold the penalty of the broken law threateningly over his head, and after the lapse of days or years decree the infliction of the death penalty upon the pardoned man? Would not all his talk about pardon be mockery of the most cruel character?

Most surely if the death that all men die, is the penalty for personal transgression, none but the unrepentant, and unforgiven ought in justice to die. All do die, both good and bad; therefore the death we now die is not the penalty for personal transgression.

The penalty of the law given to Adam is not eternal death, and cannot be in the nature of things. I am told that the result of the Adamic sin would have been eternal death if God had not arranged a plan to save him out of it. Well, what of it? That same arrangement fixes the penalty of the Adamic transgression to be temporal death, instead of eternal death. Mark, that plan was laid before man had sinned; yes, before man was created. Christ was "a lamb slain from the foundation of the world" (see Rev. xiii. 8). When Christ came into the world, he is declared to be "the lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world" (see John i, 29). He was that by the divine arrangement, by that arrangement that was decreed by an infinite God from the beginning. The one great difficulty with the man I am reviewing is the difficulty into which many fall in the investigation of the divine plan. They talk, and write as if God, in the first arrangement, in the trial of Adam, merely entered on an infinite venture, and that venture proved a failure, and a supplementary arrangement was inaugurated to save a little out of all that was lost by the first venture! They forget that, "Known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world" (Acts xv. 18). It must cause a fearfulness in the hearts of those people who limit the knowledge of the "Holy one of Israel," and claim, virtually, that he has made mistakes, and has been disappointed in the past; lest by same slip, or some unforeseen contingency, the whole thing fail at last. I worship not a god that is liable to mistakes. With the God of revelation "There is no variableness, neither shadow of turning."—James i. 17. He knew when he put the man in the garden that he would transgress, and he made this arrangement according to that knowledge. There was no failure, or change of purpose with the Almighty, on account of Adam's sin, the arrangement was all made, in its perfection, before man was put on trial. God arranged, at the outset, that Adam's sin should not result in eternal death. All this talk about ifs and ands is outside of the divine plan, and is purely human. I repeat, the penalty of the Adamic sin is not eternal, but temporal death.

2. If the loss of this present life is the penalty for personal transgression, why do infants die? They have not sinned personally. It is true, nevertheless, that they have been dying for near six thousand years, and every one that has died has proved the notion advocated by the man I am reviewing to be wholly fallacious. God is an infinitely wise and just judge, and he will not inflict the death penalty on unoffending infants and children. Even in our imperfection of judgment we would be horror stricken to know that an earthly judge has doomed a child of one year or of six months to the gallows, because by some inadvertent act he had killed somebody. Still our friend's theory says that an infinitely wise God inflicts on unconscious innocents, millions in number, the penalty of a law that they know nothing about; a penalty that is decreed against actual, personal transgression only. Away with such incongruous attempts at manipulating the divine plan into a humanitarian theological system.

It is not at all strange that the fifth chapter of Romans should seem to non-resurrectionists to need fixing over. It is evidently in their way. Let us look at it. Paul does not say singly that "sin entered the world and death by sin." Here is what Paul says: "And not only so, but we even boast in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom we have now received the reconciliation."—Rom. v. xi. Why do you thus boast Paul?

Vs. 12: Because, or, "For this reason—as through one man sin entered into the world (in whom all sinned), and through sin death, and so also, death passed upon all men. See EM. DIA. The above is the literal reading from the Greek text, and fixes the matter unmistakably sure, that the only way we sin as brought to view in this text, is in him—in Adam. There is the point of starting, and it is this sin in Adam alone that the "reconciliation" spoken of in verse 11 concerns. That reconciliation, as applied by St. Paul, in this connection, does not touch redemption in immortality. It concerns redemption from the death introduced into the world by the sin of that first man, the sin of Adam; in which sin verse 12 positively asserts, we are all involved—not by our own choice, for we were involved in it before we had any choice. Adam's transgression cannot, of course, make us morally and personally guilty before God; for the act of no man can defile another's conscience. That we, as a race, did sin in Adam is clearly stated by Paul; but that sin is not a personal transgression, for we were not there personally, and personally our will, or choice was not consulted. The law transgressed by Adam was not given to us personally. We were there in our representative; and he represented us faithfully. He fell, and the race fell in, and by him. The question now is, how can the race be recovered out of the difficulty in which, without their personal consent, they are involved by the Adamic sin? Let Paul answer—Verse 15: "But not as the fall, so is also the gracious gift. For if by the fall of the one, the many died, much more the favor of God, even that gracious gift by the one man, Jesus Christ, abounded to the many." In this verse it is distinctly stated that the many—the race—died by the fall of the one man, Adam; yes, died as the direct result of the sin of Adam. What will Reviewer do with that statement? Will he yield to Paul? Or will he still dispute Paul, and abide in his own opinion? It is also just as clearly stated that the gracious gift abounded to the benefit of the many who died by the fall of the one. All is plain and easy if we let Paul speak for himself.

Verses 1-8: "Therefore, indeed, as through one offense, sentence came on all men to condemnation, so also through one righteous act sentence came on all men to justification of life." What life? Not eternal life, for this reason: we cannot justly be condemned to eternal death as the result of the sin of Adam, and the text declares explicitly that the condemnation is in consequence of the sin of the one man, Adam. Our eternal life does not depend, so far as its loss is concerned, upon what any one has, or has not done, except it be our own selves. Adam never forfeited eternal life for himself even, much less for the race. Adam was not put on probation for eternal life in the garden. He could not obey a spiritual law if it had been required of him, for he was utterly destitute of spirituality. He was possessed only of an animal nature, and the law that was given him in Eden, was addressed directly to his animalism. The life of which the apostle speaks in the text, is the life lost through Adam; and he declares plainly and positively that to that life the many will be justified through Christ.

To sum up, Adam by his personal fall entailed death upon his entire posterity; that posterity, or the many of our race, die because of Adam's fall. From that death we are saved, as a free gift, through the death of the Son of God. Our salvation from death, temporal death, through Christ is just as independent of conditions on our part, as was our fall through the transgression of Adam. This is the plan of God through Christ. That plan brings redemption from the Adamic death to the entire race. The plan of reconciliation brings the race out of death. If one soul, or more, is left in death; passed by in the great resurrection work, those left must be an exception to the plan. That exception is not named anywhere in the plan. If there is to be an exception, so be it, but at most, if it be so, it will be only an exception. I repeat, the plan of God takes hold of the race to lift that race out of death; to save the race out of the difficulty into which it has been thrown through the transgressions of the first man, Adam, to close up the breach made by Adam's sin. The same truth is taught most plainly in the following Scripture—1 Cor. xv. 21, 22: "For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead"; "For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." The literal translation from the Greek, by Prof. Wilson, reads, "For as by Adam all die, so by the Anointed also, will all be restored to life."

Prof. Murdock translates verse 22, from Syriac, as follows: "For as it was by Adam that all men die, so also by the Messiah they all live." With every man who has not a human theory to sustain, there can be no question, but 1 Cor. xv. 21, 22 plainly declares that the all who die in or by Adam will be made alive in or by Christ. I know all the criticisms that have been offered on this text to make it favor a limited resurrection; I have studied those criticisms in their technicalities, and have become fully settled that they amount to nothing more than an ingenious invention to rob the text of its obvious meaning. I have nothing whatever to say as to motives that influenced these critics; they were doubtless just as honest as was Paul when he persecuted the saints unto death; but Paul's honesty did not change the character of his work. This Scripture declares plainly that all, the entire race, die in, or by Adam; and that the same, all THE RACE, will be made alive by Christ. It teaches salvation from the Adamic death. When I say, salvation, I do not mean penal, when I say, redemption, I do not mean retribution; when I say, restored from the Adamic death, I do not mean raised to a hopeless condition; for I cannot comprehend how that could rightly be termed salvation or redemption. I can see how God's justice, mercy and love, would prompt him to give back that temporal life which the race have lost by no will of theirs, to every son and daughter of the race who has not knowingly, wilfully, and with wicked intent rejected Christ, the LIFE GIVER, that they may have what has never before been given them, an opportunity to know the only true God and Jesus Christ his son; believe on him if they will, and secure an endless life; or reject him, and die the second death.

"Shall not the judge of all the earth do right"?—AMEN.

CHRIST UNDER OATH.

FAILING to secure witnesses against Christ, and finding that he was nobly silent under the accusations brought against him, Caiaphas, the high priest, had recourse to the judicial adjuration: "I put thee on oath by the living God, that thou tellest whether thou be the Christ, the son of God."—Matt. xxvi. 63. An answer in this case was indispensable for the law required it (Lev. v. 1); and Jesus obeyed the law, though he knew that violent lawlessness awaited him. The grand avowal, with its accompanying prophecy, has stirred and thrilled many a heart since then: "Thou hast said; nevertheless, I say unto you, Hereafter shall ye see the Son of Man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven." Then, in affected horror, the high priest rent his clothes, saying, "He hath spoken blasphemy. What further need have we of witnesses? Behold, now ye have heard his blasphemy; what think ye? They answered, he is guilty of death."

To attempt an analysis of the state of mind of the Jewish priest and his brethren on the bench is quite unnecessary. The thing has been done with profitless frequency. The envy, jealousy and hatred with which the officials of the Temple regarded the great Teacher need no minute tracing at this hour of the day. They meant murder, and succeeded. God meant life through the death of the; Holy One, and he, too, has succeeded: blessed be his name.

The object of this paper is to remind those who are exposed to the charge of heresy for teaching that the Second Advent of Christ takes place before the world is subdued, that for this very doctrine he was condemned to die. To suffer reproach for that which he affirmed under oath is no great hardship, and is not by any means likely to cause regret by and by.

Caiaphas and his official associates, when they heard the reply of Jesus, must have instantly thought of the vision of their illustrious prophet Daniel. In fact, they could not avoid it: for if the holy prisoner at their bar did not actually say "Daniel spoke of Me," His words are substantially the same as those used by the prophet: "I saw in the night visions, and, behold, one like the Son of Man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given him dominion and glory and a kingdom, that all people, nations and languages should serve him. His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed."—Dan. vii. 13, 14. He was the Christ, the Son of God, and the destined head of universal and enduring dominion. He said all this—his prophet predicted it five centuries before—he said it in the highest Jewish court, before the highest Jewish official, and under the sanction of a solemn oath, appealing to the living God for its truth ! And God soon after sanctioned the appeal by raising him from the dead. "He was declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead."—Rom. i. 4.

But his resurrection is the seal of his royalty as well as of his filial relation to the Father, not to speak here of the precious inner circle of doctrine, respecting justification and the gift of eternal life which it demonstrates. The latter is not the subject of remark at present, but the universal royalty claimed by Jesus of Nazareth, as he stood, a forsaken and seemingly helpless man, before the court of Caiaphas. This is the way that Paul understood the related doctrines of resurrection and regal authority: "And the times of this ignorance God overlooked; but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent; because he hath appointed a day, in which he will judge the world in righteousness by the man whom he hath ordained; whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead."—Acts xvii. 30, 31. So Peter, on the wonderful day of Pentecost: "Brethren, let me freely speak unto you of the patriarch David, that he both died and was buried and his sepulchre is with us unto this day. Therefore, being a prophet, and knowing that God had sworn with an oath to him that of the fruit of his loins he would set one upon his throne; he seeing this before spake of the resurrection of Christ, that he was not left in the grave, neither did his flesh see corruption."—Acts ii. 29-31.

No one who has not made the matter a special study would think of the supreme place which this regal power of Jesus occupies in the Bible, and of the frequency with which it is mentioned. It is so interwoven with the arrangements of redemption, that it cannot be separated from it without destroying its consistency and divine meaning. You must not look for the full blessing of the High Priest without recognizing the anointed King. The Lamb that was slain must be fully acknowledged, as also the heir of the tribe of Judah who has the sole right to break the seals from the title deeds of the inheritance, and thus to prove his exclusive claim to the throne. But this separation between the offering of the sacrifice for sin and the wielding of the sceptre of righteousness in the regeneration when the Son of Man shall sit upon the throne of his glory, is constantly made. It is not an exaggeration to say that out of a hundred preachers, ninety-nine dwell habitually on the cross, "the agony and bloody sweat," for one that delights to expatiate on the glories of the throne and the mighty blessings that will flow it to all the nations of the earth. The cross is the divinely appointed meeting-place between the sinner and the Saviour, but the man who thus receives the reconciliation and becomes an adopted child of God's redeemed family, ought not to remain there all the days of his Christian life. He can never forget the place of his acceptance, but acceptance being a ratified fact, he must henceforth be about the King's business. It is this extremely partial teaching of what God has testified concerning his Son that accounts for the feebleness of many Christians. They lisp the A B C of the faith, but do not comprehend the soul-strengthening fact that their Lord is Alpha and Omega. All the letters of the alphabet of redemption—to carry on the metaphor for a single sentence more—and all the words which those letters can form, are employed in relation to the Son of Man and Son of God. The cross and the crown, the office of a servant and the throne of the King of Kings, the Man of Sorrows and the glorified Messiah, the abhorred of the nation* and the adored of the universe,† are all predicated of this glorious Person, one of whose names—how appropriate!—is "Wonderful." Language is glorified when its powers are taxed to describe him; but as language cannot do it, let him see the unspoken emotions of the heart that loves him, and longs for his appearing.

His appearing? Under oath he declared that he would return. We were about to say promised it; but whether an assurance of some future event is a promise of gladness, or a threatening of terror, depends, of course, upon the state of the individual hearing it. How the President of the Sanhedrim felt we need not inquire. It is sufficiently clear from his eager haste to compass the death of the Speaker; but we have in the prophetic Scriptures vivid illustrations of the different effects on different minds of the actual coming of the Lord.

Some will say with exulting joy:

"Lo, this is our God!

We have waited for Him, and He will save us;

This is the Lord, we have waited for Him;

We will be glad and rejoice in His salvation."

(Isa. xxv: 9)

Others will cry with overwhelming terror:

"Mountains and rocks! fall on us and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on * Isa. xlix. 7.

† Rom. xiv, 9, 11; Phil. ii. 9, 11.

the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb; for the great day of his wrath is come: and who shall be able to stand?"—Rev. vi: 16-17. And so far as the Church is concerned, that is to say—alas! that the explanation should be necessary—that part of the Church whose heart is in sympathy with the aspiration of the apostle, the second advent is "that blessed hope, the glorious appearing of our great God and Saviour, Jesus Christ."—Tit. ii: 13.

It is now time to inquire whether the Lord—before his testimony at the bar of Judaism, and his "good confession" immediately afterward (1 Tim. v: 13) in the presence of Cæsar's representative—had said anything to his disciples about this return in the power of a divine royalty; for it is certain, in that case, that they would cherish with intense interest the hope inspired by his words, and make it a prominent article of their teaching as evangelists or pastors. It is beyond question that they did this. The return of the crucified One, in the glory of the Father and of the holy angels, was a prospect too splendid, and a triumph over their Master's enemies too glorious to be concealed. And they did not conceal it. It was the vital force which gave energy to their hearts and their ministry. They fix no dates, for they had no revelation about times and seasons, but they dwell upon the coming of the Lord as the crowning glory of the faith. Human chronology has no place here; it is one of the secrets in the safe-keeping of God the Father!

Here are the proofs that the disciples were informed of the great purpose: "Then"—after his prediction of suffering, death, and resurrection—"said Jesus unto his disciples, If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow me. For whosoever will save his life shall lose it; and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it. For what is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world, but lose his life? or what shall a man give in exchange for his life? For the Son of Man shall come in the glory of his Father, with His angels, and then he shall reward every man according to his works."—Matt. xxv: 24-27.

"Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, . . . and then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven, and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn; and they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory."—xxiv: 29-30.

"When the Son of Man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory; and before Him shall be gathered all nations; then shall the King say," &c.—xxv: 31-34.

After his resurrection, also, he returned to the great theme, and spoke of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God. Well, he has gone to his Father and our Father; he will receive the kingdom and dominion under the whole heaven. Who so worthy? He was set up from everlasting to be Ruler over men. The troubles of the world increase with alarming rapidity; from the wisdom of human governments nothing more is to be expected; they have done their best and their worst, and their day is at an end; The princes of this world are to be set aside (1 Cor. ii: 6); and the time comes when the last tremendous mundane revolution shall herald the advent of the glorious King and the rest of a groaning creation.

CONVERTED JEWS.

The following is an extract from a statement of D. T. TAYLOR, in the Bible Banner, in relation to conversion among the Jews. I thank him for the information, but draw my own inferences from it.—ED. OF EXAMINER.

Religiously, the condition of the Jews grew better in the ratio of their political freedom. In giving to the German Jews the books of Moses in the German tongue, Mendelssohn, at the close of the last century, broke a shackle that had bound them long in Judaism and superstition. The Rabbis lost their power. The Targums and Talmuds were laid aside. The so-called "Reformed Jews" sprung up. The split never healed. Many went to Christianity, some to Infidelity and Deism. On the continent secret societies of Jews were formed to undermine the fabric of Judaism. Conventions were held to discuss the authority of the Rabbinical Books. Jews newly translated the Scriptures, and forty years since the British Jews adopted a prayer-book free from all reference to the oral law. New Reformed Jews are everywhere. Then Christians commenced the work of evangelizing the Jews, and in meeting the claims of Christ the Jew to to-day is not a whit behind the Gentile. This statement may startle some, but the proof is not wanting.

The "London Jews Society," I have said, was formed in 1808. It is now in operation seventy years. The opulent and good gave it aid. In 1835 the Society had in the field forty-three missionaries, of whom thirteen were converted Jews. They had a "Missionary Seminary" with nine students, also a school of thirty boys and thirty-seven girls—all Jews, and the Society's receipts were $70,000 yearly. In 1848 they had thirty missionaries all over the continent and in India and Palestine. Of their eighty missionaries, forty-five were converted Jews. In 1854 the Society had ninety-eight missionaries in Europe, Asia and Africa, and of these were fifty-one converted Hebrews, who were zealously proclaiming the gospel of Christ, while the annual receipts now reach $800,000. Thousands on thousands of Israelites began to "fear the Lord and his goodness." In 1863 there were fifty-nine converted Jews in gospel work. Since the year 1813 there have been more than a hundred ordained clergymen of the Church of England who were converted Jews; and as the glad result of this missionary work, we are told that in all the world at the present time the converted Israelites have passed up to the grand number of 200,000! In Germany, Russia, Hungary, Poland, Italy, Palestine, India, Africa, the United States, and everywhere else where the Bible is read, Israel has during the present century "sought the Lord." In Berlin rare progress was witnessed. Jews came over to Jesus by the thousands. Thirty years ago the city had a thousand Christian Israelites. Fifteen years ago this number had doubled. In five years nearly two thousand came into the fold. The Orthodox Rabbis were desperate, but could not stay the work. Old and young crowded the missionary rooms. Youthful Jewish students stood up boldly for Jesus of Nazareth. A Jew in Russia came bringing his wife a distance of four hundred miles to receive the ordinance of baptism. Can any Gentile boast of more zeal?

It is an extraordinary fact that in lands where a century ago no interest was felt for the Jews, and no Jew could be got inside a Christian church, now four hundred converted Jews are ministers and missionaries for every denomination, and one hundred of these are laboring in the special work of seeking to evangelize their own brethren, on whose eyes blindness yet broods. I quote here the remarkable statement of Rev. Dr. Tholuck, a statement worthy of serious reflection, viz, that "more Jews have been converted to Christ during the present century than in all the previous seventeen hundred years! 'What hath God wrought!' we may all well exclaim." To offset this mighty return to God, a society was formed at Paris in 1860, with the title of "Universal Hebrew Alliance," and the true Jews throughout the world were summoned to unite with it, and still maintain the old Judaic faith. All in vain. There are twelve million Jews, and two hundred thousand of them are converted to Christ. This is one in sixty. There are one billion, five hundred million Gentiles, and of these twenty-five million is a fair estimate of the number who are truly converted. This, also, is one in sixty.

We are therefore constrained to believe that there are to-day as many of the Jews converted in proportion to the whole number of the Jews, as there are converted Gentiles in proportion to the whole number of the Gentiles; in other words, the converted and unconverted of Jews and Gentiles stand in the same ratio—one to sixty souls.

Rev. Ridley Herschel, D.D., of London, Dr. Joseph Wolfe, the celebrated traveler and writer; Dr. Capadose, of Amsterdam; Rev. Drs. Lee and Stahl of Berlin; Dr. John A. Neander, the historian, were Jews. Dr. Da Costa, of Holland; Dr. Alexander, the first Anglican Bishop to Jerusalem, and a host of others well known as scholars, translators, writers, editors, etc., were Jews. Jews now foster the Christian religion; Jews aid in the erection of Christian chapels; Jews edit Christian papers; Jews write Christian books; Jews in Jerusalem to-day wait for the second advent of Christ in a warmth of admiring love not a wit behind Gentile Christians. There are enough Christian Jews in Mount Zion to fulfill Matt. xxiii. 39, were the Messiah to come to-day. The famous city has become a centre of attraction to the nations, as well as the Hebrews, and the latter in our times ride on the high places of the earth; and though possessing no nationality, yet powerfully influence the destiny of nations, while the names and deeds of their famous men are in everybody's mouth. The hated Jew is at the front. Is not God's hand in it? Are not the latter days here? And what next? Surely, Messiah cometh quickly.

[The following article goes to support my position that every true Christian has the same right and power to consecrate the bread and wine for the Lord's Supper that a "priest" has; though the article was not written in reference to that subject. It is from an English writer and taken from the Bible Banner.—ED.]

"CLERGYMEN."

"It is not generally known that the term 'clergyman,' given by a proud and apostate ecclesiasticism to a single order of men, is the common property of all the people of God.

Rome, in Latinizing the Greek form of the word, presumed to confine it exclusively to her priests; which is a robbery from the Church of God of no small proportion. The Holy Spirit, as he gave it in its Greek form, used it to designate all the disciples of Jesus, to the poorest and the least. But Rome dared in her audacity to limit its designation, and she invented another word to describe the commonality of Christians—namely, laymen. With Rome, therefore, there were two distinct orders in the church, clergy and laity; with the Holy Spirit there was but one, and every member of Christ was a clergyman. The Greek word is kleros, which in the Latin became clericus, and in the English clergy. It occurs a few times in the New Testament. We quote one of its usages: 1 Peter ii. 3: 'Feed the flock of God which is among you, taking the oversight thereof; not by constraint, but willingly; not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind; neither as being lords over God's heritage [the Greek word Anglicised—clergy], but being ensamples to the flock.' Here the flock of God is called his clergy. The state clergy and the clergy of apostasy are a distinct class of men; whereas, God's clergy are all his people. We are indeed sorry that our sturdy ancestors did not purge out this old leaven at the time of the Reformation; had they done so we should not have had the assumption continued in our Protestant churches. However, as they failed to do this, we ask every Christian reader, in the name of Him we serve, to spread it everywhere, that every believer is on God's clergy list. We may add that the meaning of the kleros is lot, inheritance, heritage; and surely every man set apart to God in His way, and ruled by His Spirit, is equally His inheritance, whether a silent member or a minister of the church in word and doctrine. The Lord has the same possession in each; and each is a clergyman—according to God W. KELLAWAY."

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.

R. H. SHERRELL, now in California writes—Some time having elapsed since I wrote you, I desire to express to you again the gratitude of my heart for the learned expositions of many scriptures hitherto to me intricate and abstruse.

After months of close and continued investigation of the Promise and Oath of God to Abraham, to Isaac and Jacob, I am forced to conclude that as sin and corruption began first in Eden by transgression, or by the disobedience of one and the same being transmitted to all the descendants of the first transgressor, so likewise will the SACRIFICE, of necessity begin at the same place. Seeing that Christ, the Sacrifice, was as a lamb slain or sacrificed from the foundation of the world—Rev. xiii. 8.

The long, continuous chain of sin, death and corruption, and all things connected therewith, occasioned by the disobedience of the one, is evidently to be followed in successive order by the obedience of the other.

The Sacrifice for sin having given Himself a ransom for all, and having tasted death for every man, has truly verified the scripture: "As by Adam all die, even so by Christ shall all be made alive."

In fact, all the grand and beautifully sublime themes of the Bible seem to be dependent upon the one common centre, the promise and oath of God to Abraham.

Indeed, we have abundant reasons whereof to rejoice and give glory to God for his revelation, so resplendent with glory, so effulgent with divine intelligence, so radiant with unbounded love, as is couched in the plan of redemption provided for poor, fallen, mortal man.

Ample provisions are made, which are indeed adequate, to restore by Christ, our risen and exalted Saviour, all the sad and disastrous casualties incident to the transgression in the garden by the redemption of man from sin, death and the dominion of the grave.

When we contemplate that "God is Love," and that he is pleased to lavish forth His redeeming love upon the works of His own hands, we are led to exclaim: "What is man that thou art mindful of him, and the son of man that thou visitest him? for thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honor." "Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands, thou hast put all things under his feet; all sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field, the fowls of the air, the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas. O Lord, our LORD, how excellent is thy name in all the earth!"

"He maketh wars to cease to the ends of the earth. Be still, and know that I am God. I will be exalted among the heathen, I will be exalted in the earth, for my word is gone forth out of my mouth and shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that whereto I sent it."

The decree has gone forth; the Lord hath spoken in truth that "unto Me every knee shall bow and every tongue confess. The knowledge of the glory of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters do the sea. The Lord hath made bare his holy arm in the eyes of all the nations, and all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God."

"Oh, that the salvation of Israel were come out of Zion; when the Lord bringeth back the captivity of his people Jacob shall rejoice and Israel shall be glad. And to Jacob saith the Lord God, thy seed shall be as the dust of the earth, and shall spread abroad to the west and to the east, to the north and to the south, and in thee and in thy seed shall all families of the earth be blessed; and behold I am with thee, and will keep thee in all places whither thou goest, and will bring thee again into this land, for I will not leave thee until I have done that which I have spoken unto thee."—Gen. xxviii. 14, 15.

God will then perform his promise and oath to the faithful patriarchs of old, according to which the earth will be redeemed from the curse that is now so heavily burthening it. Jerusalem, restored, will then become the throne of the LORD, the city of the great King, man redeemed from sin and death; for it is evident that all must come to the knowledge of the truth of the atonement of Jesus the Christ. Oh! speed that glorious day when God's will is done in earth as in heaven, when there will be no more sorrow, sickness, pain and death; a perfected kingdom, a perfected race of beings, having right to the tree of life, eat and live forever.

ELD. JOHN H. MAY, Benton Co., Arkansas, writes: "I was connected with the Campbellites 18 years, and was ordained by them to preach. Being an independent thinker I found myself radically wrong, so I joined the Adventists, not "Seventh day," who number in our vicinity about 40 members and four or five preachers. I have been with them six years. A short time since, by a thorough investigation of the prophecies and the teachings of our Saviour and his apostles, and also your Magazine, and hearing Bros. John Foore and J. S. Lawver, of Kansas, preach, I was led to the firm conclusion that this life does not end probation to all men; and I now make the confession to you and all who may read what I say, that since this light has entered my mind I have enjoyed the love of God, and have loved His creatures more than during all my past life, and have borne more verbal persecution, had more hard things said about me, and to me, and borne it with more patience than in all my former life. I am not putting my light under a bushel, but letting it shine by precept and example. I intend by the favor of God to gain the crown that fadeth not away. I preach all I can, and perhaps more than I ought, as I have a large family to support. The Advent Preacher has forbid me to preach in his meeting-house; they say 'it is Universalism, the devil's doctrine and the devil's preaching, infidelity, that I am a traitor,' etc. But none of these things move me, they only make me stronger. I say as our blessed Master did, 'Father forgive them, for they know not what they do.' I want the EXAMINER. I have read many papers and tracts, but your sermon, 'GOD IS LOVE,' in the EXAMINER, January, 1877, gave me more light and real comfort than all other productions of men I ever saw. May God spare your life to spread the light till murky night shall fold its raven wings and sectarianism's fires grow dim before the sun of righteousness. AMEN. There are four of the Lord's poor out here that want the BIBLE EXAMINER, but can't pay. Can you send it to them?"

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—As you have sent me all their names and addresses I send it to each of the four. May the Lord make it a blessing in your far-off region. Let the light shine.

D. J. ELLSWORTH, Windsor, Conn., writes: "I enjoy the EXAMINER more and more, and each succeeding number proves richer than the preceding one. It is a cause of thankfulness to our heavenly Father that He has lengthened out your life to vindicate His loving character and His promises of future good to the whole race of man. Surely it is 'tidings of great joy,' yet to be made known 'to all people.' When the minister was reading to-day portions of Revelation, where the Spirit was speaking 'unto the churches,' my eye fell on chapter (iii: 9), and I thought how rarely a reader's attention was arrested by what was really expressed in the text. This text says, 'Behold, I will make them of the synagogue of satan, which say they are Jews, and are not, but do lie; behold, I will make them to come and worship before thy feet, and know that I have loved thee.' Now we can look back over the way we have come and realize how the deep and seemingly hidden meaning and truth has been revealed to us, until we are ready to exclaim with the Apostle, 'Oh the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out.' Still, while it is a fact, that we 'know nothing as we ought to know,' and that 'we see as through a glass darkly,' earnestly longing for a brighter light, yet have we reason to bless and praise the Lord for his goodness and mercy for the light that shines on our pathway; and those aged saints, whose faith and hope is so richly expressed by them in their letters to the EXAMINER, may well rejoice that their days have been lengthened out to see what they have seen, to hear what they have heard, and know what they have known of the good-will and loving purpose toward our race of Him who has been the strength and comfort of their old age. My mother, now in her 82d year, expresses kind regards for you, and that she receives great satisfaction and profit in reading the EXAMINER. I am your young brother in Christ."

G. B. STACY, Va., writes: "Since I sent you my last the Lord has broken to my mind a better formulation in the symbols we use for conveying our thoughts, namely—words of the subject of the two articles already published. I would formulate the expression thus: The Christian Church is 'the New Creation' in process. As the first, the natural creation was accomplished by the brooding of the Spirit on 'the face of the deep,' and its life developed in impenetrable obscurity before it was called forth for manifestation. So 'the New Creation' is being produced in the same manner by the brooding of 'the Holy Spirit' upon 'the face of the deep' of the chaos of wicked or fallen humanity. Thus the race are unconscious of what the Holy Spirit is accomplishing out of its ruined relics; nor will the result be known until the Bride is welcomed to the marriage supper of the Lamb. As in the natural creation, the Spirit only created pairs of each genus, and left the reproduction of their kind to each of these pairs; so in 'the New Creation,' the Holy Spirit is only creating the one pair, the Lord and his Church, or the Christ and his Bride, that they may regenerate the race in a manner corresponding to the reproductive process of the natural creation. You will remember what Brother Rotherham said about 'the dark genesis of life,' and apply his ideas to mine and you will comprehend my meaning. But I must conclude with many good wishes that this may prove the best of all years to you and all our brethren, and may our blessed Heavenly Father bless you and yours abundantly."

JAMES H. JACOBS writes: "If what the BIBLE EXAMINER teaches be true, in whole or in part, then Christianity will not be a failure: but if, as most Adventists teach, now is the day of salvation, and no salvation for any after this age closes, and no one to teach the nations to learn war no more; no one possessing power to break in pieces the oppressors; no one to rule the nations in righteousness; no time to live and labor, and not do it in vain; no time to bring forth, not to sorrow and trouble; no time when 'all nations shall call Him blessed;' no time when 'the wolf and the lamb shall lie down together;' no time for the saved to be as innumerable as the sand on the sea shore; no time of restitution in the future; no time to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ after his return to our world; then, it seems to me, evil will be victorious and the prophets have prophesied falsely; but in the midst of the conflict of opinions, I rest on the promises of God, believing what He has spoken, and that He will make it good."

JAMES H. MILLS, Iowa, has heretofore taken but one copy of the EXAMINER; he now sends for two copies, and writes:

"It is good to be zealously affected always in a good thing."—Gal. iv. 18. These words ought to sink deeply into the hearts of every friend of truth. A right-minded Christian cannot have a heart to do anything against the truth, but is ever ready to work for it.—2 Cor. xii. 8. Let all that believe in the teaching of the BIBLE EXAMINER do according to their ability and not fail. If able let them subscribe for two or more copies, circulate one or more by mail, or otherwise, to friends, with the request to read and return; then send it again. Be constant in season and out of season; be ever active. Heroism in the cause of truth is the most honorable warfare known under the sun.

P. S.—Cannot five friends be found that will donate ten dollars each to get out another addition of the "Vindication, or the Promise and Oath of God to Abraham"?

DR. J. F. LEE, Monroe, N. C., writes: "The BIBLE EXAMINER comes to me regularly every month. Thank you. 'Be ye thankful.' Four score years and upwards of nine months (Jan. 30, 1879) the Lord has preserved me mercifully, and now reminds me of not only past scenes, but of such feelings as are known to those of my age, who trust in the Lord at all times, and realize the power of Divine Truth, the Grace of God that brings salvation, enabling them to be thankful and conformed to His holy will. Some things are indelibly impressed on my mind, and the impressions—the sorrow I realized when you ceased to be Editor of the Herald of Life, I am forced to cherish as the influence of the Spirit of God, the Comforter, for I was, in the depth of my grief, relieved by the consolation that it would terminate in blessings to you and many others. And so I have found it.”

GEO. P. BLACKWELL, Maine, writes : “The February EXAMINER came to me laden with rich food, of which I partook with good relish ; it was really a feast. I believe you have been the means of turning many to righteousness ; may He help and sustain you, is my prayer, in your work of love. Through God’s grace you have caused the glorious light of truth to shine on many hearts. Oh, that there were more fathers and mothers in Israel. But whereas many ought to be teachers, they have need that one teach them even the first principles of the doctrine of Christ. Pray for me that I may be able to stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ has made me free, and let my light shine in this dark place. The minds of the people are darkened here by the traditions of the elders of orthodoxy ; so much so that they dare not believe anything nor admit one fact without first consulting their minister. Bless the Lord ! he ‘will have all men come unto the truth’ here or hereafter.”

GEO. P. ELLIS, in Southern Iowa, writes : “The cause is gaining here, and many belonging to the different churches are becoming believers in the doctrine of ‘the Ages to Come.’”

TRUE CHRISTIAN LIFE.

DID a holy life consist of one or two noble deeds, some signal specimens of doing, or enduring, or suffering, we might account for the failure, and reckon it small dishonor to turn back in such a conflict. But a holy life is made up of small things. It is the little things of the hour and not the great things of the age, that fill up a life like that of Paul, and John, like that of Rutherford, or Brainerd or Martyn. Little words, not eloquent speeches or sermons ; little deeds, not miracles, nor battles, nor one great heroic act or martyrdom, make up the true Christian life. The little constant sunbeam, not the lightning ; the waters of Siloam “that go softly” in their meek mission of refreshment ; not the waters of torrent, noise and force, are true symbols of a holy life.

The avoidance of little evils, little sins, little inconsistencies, little weaknesses, little follies, little indiscretions and imprudences, little foibles, little indulgencies of self and the flesh, little acts of indolence or indecision, slovenliness or cowardice, little equivocations or aberrations from high integrity, little touches of shabbiness and meanness, little bits of covetousness and penuriousness, little exhibitions of worldliness and gayety, little indifference to the feelings or wishes of others, little outbreaks of temper or crossness, or selfishness, or vanity ; the avoidance of such little things as these goes far to make up at least the negative beauty of a holy life. And then attention to the little duties of the day and hour in public transactions, or private dealings, or family arrangements ; to little words, and looks, and tones ; little benevolences, or forbearances, or tendernesses ; little self-denials, self-restraints and self-forgetfulnesses ; little plans of quiet kindness and the thoughtful consideration for others ; to punctuality, and method, and true aim, in the ordering of each day, these are the active developments of a holy life, the rich and divine mosaics of which it is composed.

What makes yon hill so beautiful ? Not the outstanding peak or stately elm, but the brights ward which clothes its slope, composed of innumerable blades of grass. It is of small things that a life is made up ; and he who will acknowledge no life as great save that which is built up of great things, will find little in Bible character to admire or copy.—Dr. Bonar.

PROTESTANTISM ARRAIGNED—MARTIN LUTHER DENOUNCED.

BY A ROMAN CATHOLIC PRIEST.

THE Rev. Father Parker, of Hyde Park, lectured in St. Teresa’s Catholic Church recently. “To whom,” he said, “does the Protestant Church owe its possession of the Bible, which they wish to place in the hands of every ignorant person and child ? To monkish hands that laboriously transcribed it before the age of printing. Protestantism has produced dissension in church, rebellions and outbreaks in state, unsoundness in social life, and will never be satisfied short of the downfall of the Bible ! Protestants must admit that the Roman Church has done more to scatter Christianity and extirpate idolatry than all their sects. From one pulpit it is said that there is no hell, and from another that there is immediate and unmitigated damnation. One says that Jesus Christ was only a man; another that you must be plunged bodily into water to be baptized, and refuses the rite to infants. Most of them have no prescribed form of worship, no sacred vestments, and their doctrines are as undefined as their service is informal.

"The founder of Protestantism, Martin Luther, was the worst man in Europe. The advent of the Reformation was the signal for civil war, and from that time to this the world has been in a restless state—uneasy in regard to governments, and every day becoming more skeptical. The ultimate tendency of Protestantism is clearly nothing less than the destruction of all respect for the Bible and the disruption of government and society."—Selected.

THE KINGDOM.

THE careful student may notice, in the first place, that a kingdom is the very burden of prophecy. In the brightest pages the prophets portray the Divine regalism of a King above all kings reigning on Mount Zion before his ancients gloriously, eclipsing the sun and moon by his grandeur and life-giving radiance. The splendor of his power, the vastness of his territory, the purity of his administration, all are spread before us in coloring which fadeth not away. And though we may easily perceive that such a dominion will exceed in majesty and glory all that has been seen or experienced by man, we can perceive, with equal clearness, that it is a kingdom upon the earth, with all the attributes of substantial reality in throne, country, laws and people, which are involved in the idea of a kingdom. It bears no resemblance to an ecclesiastical federation, with an invisible head and a hidden life.

He may notice, in the second place, that the proclamation of that kingdom was strictly limited. "Go not in the way of the Gentiles; into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not." Had the message any immediate relation to Gentiles or Samaritans, most assuredly the preaching would have gone through all their cities; and had it been concerning a Christian assembly, they were as well qualified as Jews to understand such a matter and far more likely to be interested in it, because it would have been a call to equality with the ancient people, thus demolishing the exclusiveness and haughtiness of spiritual pride. But, in truth, the proclamation concerned the Jews only, and concerned solely that great visible kingdom of justice and inviolate lustre which all the prophets had promised.

He may notice, in the third place, that after it became woefully determinate that the people were not prepared to receive the monarch the kingdom was veiled in mystery. It had been proclaimed, "The kingdom of God is at hand," which was verily true; for the King himself was present, revealing the powers of the world to come; and, by all his force, grandeur and sanctity, wooing the people to open wide their gates.

But, alas! when the banquet of life was provided the guests scorned the invitation; so the great kingdom which has descended and drawn near, ascended and receded far away and is certainly not yet revealed.—Selected from the Rainbow.

FALLEN ASLEEP IN JESUS.

I take this opportunity to impart to you the sad tidings of the death of my dear mother, SALLY DILLINGHAM, who passed away very gently, without a sigh or groan, January 12, 1879. She would have been 80 years of age if she had lived to the 4th of this month. Her disease was a difficulty of the heart, to which she had been subject for years. She said, 'I feel happy, and if I die I shall be at rest.' The BIBLE EXAMINER was a source from which she derived much comfort and consolation in her declining years. Yours,

ABBIE NICKERSON."

South Dennis, Mass., Feb. 9, 1879.

REMARKS OF THE EDITOR.—Sister DILLINGHAM was one of my warmest friends, and has paid each year $5 for the EXAMINER. I became acquainted with her 35 years ago. She was a sincere and earnest Christian. I saw her for the last time at Springfield, Mass., in company with her daughter, on whose arm she leaned; her quiet, peaceful look has never been effaced from my mind. That was in the Fall of 1871. May her "mantle fall" on that daughter who so affectionately attended her.

The kingdom of truth the Lord came to establish, is a kingdom whose subjects should have been admitted as such, in consequence of their being "of the truth"; that is, not mere adherents of truth by accident, but votaries of truth. "Every one that is of the truth heareth My voice."

"The Alliance of Roman Catholicism with Protestantism Against the Kingdom of God." By H. Brittain. I have several copies of the above-named tract still on hand. Price, six cents single; five copies for twenty cents.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—It is impossible for me to prepare and publish long articles that are badly written: my present strength will not bear the strain.

If any subscriber fails to receive a number of the BIBLE EXAMINER, please inform me and I will supply it.

THE BIBLE EXAMINER is a Monthly Magazine. Terms, $2 00 per year, in advance.

Subscribers' Names should be written very plain. Do not neglect this. It is utterly impossible sometimes to decipher names, and mistakes must occur in consequence. As to their Address, give simply the name of the Post-Office and State.

Let all Correspondents be careful to address me as follows:

All "Postal Money Orders" sent me should be drawn on Brooklyn, N. Y.

To Clubs the BIBLE EXAMINER will be supplied on the following terms:

Two copies to one address,	$3
Four " " " "	5
Ten " " " "	10

The ten may be divided and sent to the address of two persons, if desired. The prices fixed above are expected to be paid in advance and the money sent at the risk of the subscribers.

Any person wishing either volume of the EXAMINER in sheets—that is unbound—shall have it on receipt of one dollar. The volumes that I can supply are 18, 19, 20, 21, and 22; only a few, however, of volume 20.

BOUND VOLUMES.—The BIBLE EXAMINER, bound, can be now furnished at $2 per volume in neat, plain binding; in morocco, with gilt edges, $3.25. Volumes 18, 19, 20, 21 and 22 can be had of me at the prices named per volume.

PAMPHLETS.—The only one I can furnish is the "DIVINE DISPENSATIONS: or, The Divine Plan in the Government of our Race." Price 15 cents single copy; $1 25 per dozen.

REMITTANCES.—In these times of theft and robbery no one should venture money by mail except by a "Postal Money Order," if you can get one. If that cannot be done have your letter "Registered" at the office where mailed. Even then its safety depends on the honesty of the officials who take charge of the letter. It is, perhaps, just as safe to send small sums in a letter, sealed and properly directed without registering, as with.

The next best thing to a "Postal Money Order" in remitting money is a Draft on some Banking House in New York City, payable to me or my order —GEO. STORRS.

LETTERS RECEIVED TO APRIL 1.

WM LINDSEY, Michigan, writes: The EXAMINER for March has come laden with substantial food for all who hunger and thirst after sanctifying thirst. Yes, thank God, I and doubtless many others, can say we are being filled with precious food, spread on our table (under God) by the BIBLE EXAMINER in our traveling from barren Egypt to that land flowing with milk and honey, then further on to the glorious table spread out by Isaiah xxv., under God, a great "feast of fat things," where we shall feed on Love Divine. Well may we cry without ceasing, "Come Lord Jesus, and come quickly."

"THE LOST TRIBES OF ISRAEL."

I MADE some remarks on this subject in the EXAMINER for March, closing with the suggestion of my intention to make further research on the question whether the Indians of this country may not be the descendants of one of the tribes.

My attention has been called to this question by a friend who has sent me some extracts from an old book on the subject, published in 1826. The extracts I may publish hereafter; my object now is to consider from what tribe of the ten they originated if they are of the lost ten. In doing this several transactions and prophecies will be noticed. The Indians are notorious for their cruelty. They cannot possibly be of the tribe of Ephraim, or Joseph.

Let us look at the prophecy in relation to Joseph—Gen. xlix. 22-26: "Joseph is a fruitful bough, even a fruitful bough by a well; whose branches run over the wall; the archers have sorely grieved him and shot at him; but his bow abode in strength. . . . The blessings of thy father have prevailed above the blessings of thy progenitors unto the bound of the everlasting hills," etc. Please turn to the Bible and read all here said of Joseph; then turn to Deut. xxiii. 13-17, and read all their blessings; especially the 17th verse: "His horns (power) are as the horns of unicorns; with them he shall push the people together to the ends of the earth," etc. On only one tribe of the ten have these things been accomplished: they have been by the "Anglo-Saxons"; which clearly identifies them as the posterity of Joseph.

Let us see if the conduct and prophecy concerning Simeon does not seem to indicate a people like the Indians of America. I call attention to the deceitful and murderous character of Simeon.—See Gen. xxxiv. See there his hypocritical and murderous character in the case of King Hamor and Sheehem, his son, whom Simeon first deceived and then murdered them and all their people. Please read the whole chapter. Then turn to Gen. xlix : 5-7, and see what Jacob's prophetic utterance concerning Simeon was. Levi was coupled with Simeon, but Levi was a younger brother and probably led into sin by the more powerful mind of Simeon; hence the "curse" did not fall so heavy on him as on Simeon. Says Jacob, "Instruments of cruelty are in their habitations. . . . Cursed be their anger, for it was fierce; and their wrath, for it was cruel; I will divide them in Jacob, and scatter them in Israel." In further illustration of Simeon's character, see the case of the sale of Joseph.—Gen. xxxvii. It seems that Simeon, who was the second son of Jacob by Leah, conspired to kill Joseph, when sent of his father to see after his brethren at Dothan; but Reuben, the oldest brother, did not consent to the deed, and persuaded them to cast Joseph into a pit, intending to deliver him to his father; then being called away, for a time, on his return found Joseph had been taken out of the pit and sold to merchantmen going into Egypt. Who could have been the projector of this deed? It was unquestionably Simeon, who was the next oldest to Reuben, and therefore next in authority among his brethren, and most likely to be the grand agent in the deed, though his name is not mentioned, yet a subsequent event makes it highly probable; for, years after, when Joseph's brethren came into Egypt to buy corn for their families, Joseph knew them and treated them as spies; and when at length he permitted them to return to their father, he "took Simeon and bound him before their eyes."—See Gen. xlii : 21-24. Thus it seems Joseph recognized Simeon as the leader in the sin, first in the attempt to murder Joseph, and afterwards of his sale into Egypt.

Well then did his father Jacob, in speaking of the future of his twelve sons, say what he did of Simeon, that he was of a hypocritical and murderous character, and that a "curse" would follow him. See again Gen. xlix : 5-7. And it is a little remarkable that Moses, in his prophetic utterances concerning the tribes of Israel, does not mention Simeon at all. See Deut. xxxiii. Jacob, it seems, had fixed his fate unalterably.—Gen. xlix. Simeon was to be "scattered" from Israel and left to act out his propensities of hypocrisy and murder. It may therefore be found to be a truth that the Indians of America have descended from the "cursed" Simeon. If so, they may, in due time, be both identified and civilized.

In my next article I may give some extracts from the old book I have spoken of, going to show the probability that the Indians are of Israelitish origin, but of one tribe only, with a sprinkling of Levites among them. ED.

LITERAL FULFILMENT OF PROPHECY.

THE promise to Abraham was twofold. The promise to the literal seed of a certain land was fulfilled to them, as seen in Joshua xxi. 43. I now call attention to the threatenings against them in case of disobedience.

Lev. xxvi. 27-29: "And if ye will not for all this hearken unto me, but walk contrary unto me: then I will walk contrary unto you also in fury: and I, even I, will chastise you seven times for your sins. And ye shall eat the flesh of your sons, and the flesh of your daughters shall ye eat." This was literally fulfilled at the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians. See Lam. iv. 9, 10. "They that be slain with the sword are better than they that be slain with hunger: for these pine away, stricken through for want of the fruits of the field. The hands of the pitiful women have sodden their own children: they were their meat in the destruction of the daughter of my people." So also was it when Jerusalem was destroyed by the Romans, as appears by Josephus.

Lev. xxvi. 32, 33: "And I will bring the land into desolation: and your enemies which dwell therein shall be astonished at it. And I will scatter you among the heathen, and will draw out a sword after you: and your land shall be desolate, and your cities waste." Will it be denied that this prophecy has been fulfilled to the letter? Has not their land been made a "desolation" and their "cities waste?" Dr. Hawes said there were four hundred and sixty-six ruined cities in the desolate and fruitful land beyond Jordan.

Deut. xxviii. 25, 63-66: "The Lord shall cause thee to be smitten before thine enemies: thou shalt go out one way against them, and flee seven ways before them: and shall be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth. And it shall come to pass, that as the Lord rejoiced over you to do you good, and to multiply you; so the Lord will rejoice over you to destroy you, and to bring you to naught; and ye shall be plucked from off the land whither thou goest to possess it. And the Lord shall scatter thee among all people, from the one end of the earth even unto the other; and there thou shalt serve other gods, which neither thou nor thy fathers have known, even wood and stone. And among these nations shalt thou find no ease, neither shall the sole of thy foot have rest: but the Lord shall give thee there a trembling heart, and failing of eyes, and sorrow of mind: and thy life shall hang in a doubt before thee; and thou shalt fear day and night, and shalt have none assurance of thy life."

Here is a prophecy published fourteen hundred years before the birth of Christ, yet so exact has been its fulfilment that the page of history could not more accurately state the fate and condition of the Jews; and it stands as an impregnable bulwark against all the attacks of infidelity; and a monument of the truth and inspiration of the Bible that no human effort can demolish; a monument, also, against all the spiritualizers of the prophecies, and of the truth of the literal interpretation.

Before proceeding further let us notice the division of Israel into two nations, as this is an important point in understanding many of the prophecies of the Old Testament. See 1 Kings, chapters xi. and xii. The reader is desired to turn and read these chapters before he proceeds. Here we see, that for the wickedness of Solomon God threatened to rend ten tribes from his house in his son's days. This threat was fulfilled in the very commencement of the reign of Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, and ten of the twelve tribes went with Jeroboam the son of Nebat. Thus were the posterity of Jacob divided into two nations; one called Judah, and the other Israel. From that time they were never again united in one nation, but had continual wars with each other. After this Judah is seldom called Israel in the Old Testament. And Israel, or the ten tribes, are never called Jews in the Bible: that name is applicable only to the nation called Judah, either in the Old or New Testaments. These facts are important to be borne in mind as they will help us much in understanding the Scriptures, and in determining what prophecies have been fulfilled, and which remain to be fulfilled.

The latter part of the 12th and the 13th chapters, 1 Kings, give us an account of Jeroboam's and Israel's sin. Then comes the threatening to remove Israel, chap. xiv. 15, 16: "For the Lord shall smite Israel, as a reed is shaken in the water, and He shall root up Israel out of this good land, which he gave to their fathers, and shall scatter them beyond the river, because they have made their groves, provoking the Lord to anger.

And he shall give Israel up because of the sins of Jeroboam, who did sin, and who made Israel to sin."

Let us now look at the fulfilment of this prophecy concerning Israel. See 2 Kings xvii. 5, 6: "Then the king of Assyria came up throughout all the land, and went up to Samaria, and besieged it three years. In the ninth year of Hoshea, the king of Assyria took Samaria, and carried Israel away into Assyria, and placed them in Halah and in Harbor by the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes." Then after enumerating their sins it is added, verses 18:24, "Therefore the Lord was very angry with Israel, and removed them out of His sight; there was none left but the tribe of Judah only. Also Judah kept not the commandments of the Lord their God, but walked in the statutes of Israel which they made. And the Lord rejected all the seed of Israel, and afflicted them, and delivered them into the hand of the spoilers, until He had cast them out of His sight. For He rent Israel from the house of David; and they made Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, king; and Jeroboam drove Israel from following the Lord, and made them sin a great sin. For the children of Israel walked in all the sins of Jeroboam which he did; they departed not from them, until the Lord removed Israel out of His sight, as He had said by all His servants the prophets. So was Israel carried away out of their own land to Assyria unto this day. And the king of Assyria brought men from Babylon, and from Cuthah, and from Ava, and from Hamath, and from Sepharvaim, and placed them in the cities of Samaria instead of the children of Israel; and they possessed Samaria, and dwelt in the cities thereof." Here let it be observed, the nation of Israel are said to be "removed out of his sight—cast out," etc.; which expressions denote an ejection from the land of Canaan; a land concerning which Moses speaks, thus (Deut. xi. 12): "A land which the Lord thy God careth for; the eyes of the Lord thy God are always upon it, from the beginning of the year even unto the end of the year." To be cast out of his sight, then, is to be removed from that land. That, as we have seen, was done by the king of Assyria, as the Lord said. This captivity of the nation of Israel took place about seven hundred and twenty years before Christ; and more than one hundred years before the nation of Judah went into its final captivity in Babylon. Let it be kept in mind that the nation of Israel, or the ten tribes, never returned from their captivity in Assyria; so that, if we find any prophecy of their return from captivity, it has either utterly failed, or there is yet to be a fulfilment of it in the future. It may here be objected, however, that no such future return of Israel can take place, because the ten tribes are lost. I answer—They may have been hidden from Christendom, but they are not lost. The developments of the few past years show that Israel, or the ten tribes, are as really in being and a distinct people, as Joseph was alive and prospering though Jacob thought him dead. Let it be recollected that they went far off into Assyria beyond Babylon; and the fact that they did not return when Judah, or the Jews, returned from the captivity in Babylon, shows that they must have been far removed from the scene of Judah's captivity. ### THE THREE BEWILDERED SISTERS.

WHO, or what are they? Theologically they are born of one parent, their mother being Mrs. False-conception. Her children are all "daughters," and of the same peculiar mode of thinking, though varying in the form of expressing themselves. They have one family name, i. e., "FALSE-CONCEPTION." Their peculiarities are expressed thus: Miss Eternal-torment, Miss Torment-awhile-then-die-again, and Miss Don't-care. To avoid quoting their names at length, I will use the figures 1, 2, 3.

1. She believes, or holds, that the whole race of Adam, except a few, are to be eternally tormented, being possessed of immortal souls, so that they cannot die, and live only to suffer endless torture for the glory of their God in the vindication of his justice.

2. Believes none of Adam's race are immortal by nature, but all of them will have a resurrection from the dead; a few only to be made happy and immortal; all the others, a vast majority of the human race, will be tormented a longer period, or more or less severely according to their sins, and then be literally destroyed, made an end of in the lake of fire, or die a second time.

3. "Miss Don't-care" thinks that only the few who form a spiritual union with Christ, in this present life, will ever be revived from the dead; that all the rest of the race will utterly and forever perish in death, and be as though they had not been.

It is not to be questioned all three of these sisters are sincere in their views, but as they were all born of "MRS. FALSE-CONCEPTION," is it marvelous that they have a family likeness? "Miss False-conception" is manifest in each of them; and each places the God she worships at war with the God of the Bible; not wilfully, but through a "false conception" of the character and government of the RULER of the world. The eldest sister had for her father Paganized Christianity, called the Apostacy. No wonder that being begotten by such a monster she should see eternal torments continually blazing before her eyes, and her concern was to escape the terrible ghost if possible. Her mind was filled with distress for herself, her friends, and perhaps for others. She was told that "God is love," but it was "all dark, dark" to her how that could be; but the dreadful fear of eternal torments kept her from uttering a word of her misgivings as to the truth that "God is love." She dreaded the possibility that endless woe might be her fate if she indulged even the thought that love could not be reconciled to the idea that the CREATOR was to be also an eternal TORMENTOR! In proportion as she really believed in eternal woe she cried out:

"I sink under the weight of this subject; and I declare, when I see my friends, my relations, the people of my charge—when I think that I, that you, that we are all threatened with these torments—when I see, in the lukewarmness of my devotions, in the languor of my love, in the faintness of my resolutions and designs, the least evidence, though it be only probable or presumptive, of my future misery, yet I find in the thought a mortal poison, which diffuses itself into every period of my life, rendering society tiresome, nourishment insipid, pleasure disgustful, and life itself a cruel bitter—I cease to wonder that a fear of hell has made some melancholy and others mad; that it has inclined some to expose themselves to a living martyrdom by fleeing from all commerce with the rest of mankind, and others to suffer the most violent and terrible torments."—REV. JAMES SAURIN. Am. Tract Society—Tract No. 277.

Such is the natural result of a sincere belief in the theory of the oldest "Miss False-conception." Those who choose to wed that lady will be likely to have experience not dissimilar to that of the "Rev. J. Saurin." To such a theory no homage is due from a true worshiper of the God of the Bible: it is wholly a "false conception" of his character and government.

2. The second sister has made a great improvement on the views of her elder one; but she retains one of the important principles of the first, viz., God's justice claims torment more or less in an after life; not with any view to benefit the tormented; which really appears to be a mere matter of revenge; and how a loving, Christ-like heart can contemplate such a hopeless scene of torment and despair without being in a large degree exercised in mind much as Saurin was, it seems impossible to tell. To the supposed author of such an administration over the creatures He has made, and determined beforehand under what circumstances they should come into life, and the many unavoidable circumstances with which they should be surrounded; who, that thinks, can bow, undoubtingly, to the idea that He is just and merciful, or that such an administration is worthy of an almighty being, possessed of infinite wisdom and knowledge? Surely, serious doubts must arise as to such a being having any claim to be called "LOVE."

3. The third sister, "Miss Don't-care," was supposed, for a time, to be a twin of the preceding one; but a few years developed the fact that she had become alarmed or disgusted with the idea of hopeless torments in a future life, as a reproach on the Divine government of an all-wise, good and loving God; so she concluded no such torments could possibly occur under the administration of God, whose name and nature is "Love." Her sense of right and wrong, justice and injustice, love and revenge, carried her out of the company of sister No. 2, and the twin-ship terminated. But her maiden name remained unchanged; she was "Miss False-conception" still; and she soon drank in the spirit of I "Don't care" what becomes of the "ignorant and out of the way"; of the heathen, millions on millions, who have died without any knowledge of the true God and of his Christ; no, nor what becomes of the little ones who have died in infancy, so long as there is no future torment and a few of us are made immortal and happy! All this is the genuine family likeness—it is "false conception" of God's character and government; into which many were led by the horrible doctrines of sisters 1 and 2.

The three sisters now live in a regular family quarrel; the nature of which is clearly seen in the family name. They differ widely on some points, but are united firmly in their mother. They associate and are bound together in "false conceptions" of the character and government of God, and his designs toward the creatures his hands have made; for "he hath made of one blood all nations of men, for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed and the bounds of their habitation; that they should seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after him and find him, though he be not far from every one of us; for in him we live and move and have our being; as certain also of your own poets have said, "For we are also his offspring."—Acts xvii. 26-28.

Such being the facts, what provision did God make to meet the necessities of the "one blood," which He had made? Did He not foresee that the race would, as fleshly and animal beings, fall short of a perfect state of conformity to his commands? Did He make provision to overcome that want of conformity, so that no man should have occasion to say his failure, if he finally failed, was the lack of Divine provision and aid? Can any man give any other than an affirmative answer to these questions? Did not God so love the world (the entire race of Adam) that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life? Did not that Son give himself a ransom for all the race? Did he not taste death for every man? Dare any say, He did not. Will they venture thus to impeach the veracity of God, of Jesus Christ, and of his apostle to the Gentiles? Shall God's love for "the world" be proved only a mere pretence, as it must be, if only a few will ever have the knowledge of that love and of the redemption in Christ provided for them? Shall the vast majority, including all little children who have died in infancy, utterly perish because, notwithstanding God's love, they never had the means nor opportunity to believe? and that from no fault on their part?

Are all God's professions of love for the world, and his acts which demonstrate the sincerity of that love, to pass for idle professions, because He has not seen fit in this life to impart the knowledge of it to the millions on millions of heathen, and an innumerable multitude of little ones, who have gone in death without any knowledge of Him who said, "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven?"

What shall be thought of the teaching of the "Misses False-conception," if God's professions of love to and concern for the race of Adam are to be set aside by such disastrous results as either of their theories present? Had we not better let God be true, whoever may be proved to be a liar from a "false conception" of His character and government? Had we not better admit that all who fail by unavoidable circumstances of obtaining a knowledge of God's love for them, and of Christ's love in ransoming them, will yet in the future have that knowledge, and an opportunity to improve it unto an endless life of joy and pleasure? and if they fail to secure that end, the sin will be a wilful one of their own, and their condemnation be made manifest to all as just? Is not such the result to which the reason God has given us will lead every unbiased mind? Scripture harmonizes with this result. Not one text in the Book of God affirms that the work of God's grace terminates to all the human race at death. Ed.

WHAT A BLESSING!

A CERTAIN writer endeavored to show that the blessing on all families, all nations, promised to Abraham, had been fulfilled by God's driving the literal seed of Jacob, the Jews, out from Palestine into all nations, thus carrying the truth to all, so that if the Gentiles are not blessed it is their own fault. That is, God has made those who were rejected by him, as a punishment for their sins, idolatry, and contempt of his Son, the grand missionaries to "bless all families of the earth." A strange missionary company truly; but, as nothing is impossible with God, except to lie, let us see what he has said about these missionaries. Listen: "I will deliver them to be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth for their hurt, to be a reproach and a proverb, a taunt and a curse in all places whither I shall drive them?"—Jer. xxiv. 9. "I will deliver them to be removed to all the kingdoms of the earth to be a curse . . . among all nations whither I have driven them."—Jer. xxix. 18.

Wonderful missionaries, truly. The time will come when God will gather to "their own land, wherein their fathers have dwelt" (Ezek. xxxvii.), the now scattered Israel and Judah; but he says of them: "I scattered them among the heathen . . . and when they entered into the heathen, they profaned my holy name," etc. "But I had pity for my holy name which the house of Israel had profaned among the heathen, whither they went. Therefore say unto the house of Israel, Thus saith the LORD God; I do not this for your sakes, O house of Israel, but for my holy name's sake, which ye have profaned among the heathen, whither ye went; and I will sanctify my great name which ye have profaned among the heathen, which ye have profaned in the midst of them."—Ezek. xxxvi. 19-23.

Not much missionary work done by Judah and Israel in their scattered state. Instead of being a blessing, they have been a curse, if we believe God; and have profaned his holy name. Does this look like a fulfilment of God's promise and oath to Abraham? The theory which is compelled to resort to such a method to avoid the conclusion of a future blessing of the families of the earth, not yet realized, must be hard pressed for argument.

The time will come when God will gather that scattered people into their own land, and make them "one nation upon the mountains of Israel"; and then the Lord will cleanse them from their sins (see Ezk. xxxvi. 24, to the end, and chap. xxxvii.); then "He shall cause them that come of Jacob to take root; Israel shall blossom and bud, and fill the face of the world with fruit."—Isa. xxvii. 6. Then shall their missionary work begin in deed and in truth.

"Thus saith the LORD of host; there shall come people: and the inhabitants of many cities; and the inhabitants of one city shall go to another, saying, Let us go speedily to pray before the LORD; and to seek the LORD of hosts: I will go also: yea, many people and strong nations shall come to seek the LORD of hosts in Jerusalem, and to pray before the LORD. Thus saith the LORD of hosts. In those days it shall come to pass, that ten men shall lay hold out of all the nations, even shall take hold of the skirt of him that is a Jew, saying, We will go with you; for we have heard that God is with you."—Zech. viii. 20-23.

That looks like missionary work and success. But to go out and be a curse among all nations does not look like it at all.

But "There were dwelling at Jerusalem Jews, devout men, out of every nation under heaven; and, on the day of Pentecost, they heard the Gospel and carried it into every nation." Where is the evidence that these devout Jews carried the Gospel into the nations from which they had come to dwell at Jerusalem? There is no record of it in the Bible; and where is the historical proof that they did it? If they did, it must have been very short-lived; and those nations, centuries since, sank into the grossest idolatry: and then, even Christendom, by the writer's own showing, for "fourteen centuries," was sunk into as great ignorance of the true God as the darkest pagans, and have hardly emerged from that ignorance to this day.

But "the Bible has been translated into every known tongue within the present century." What if that be true? Does that cover the large promise and oath of God to Abraham and his seed? What have become of the millions on millions who have lived and died without the Bible? Were they not covered by the promise and oath of God? or, did he leave the mass of the human race out of the pledge by some sort of mental reservation? Is that God's method in his promises, confirmed by an oath? If so, what reliance on his words? Who can tell what he really means by what he says?

Let it be remembered the things impossible to men are possible with God. "Is anything too hard for God?" Be assured not "a jot or tittle" will fail of all that God hath spoken concerning the blessing of Abraham and his seed coming on all families of the earth; all shall be fulfilled in spite of death and Hades. Ed.

AN INQUIRY.

WILL you explain Heb. xii. 22, "You are already come to Mount Zion," etc. Are there to be two—one in Jerusalem and one in heaven?

The occasion of this inquiry was that a writer in Canada made use of the following language:

"We are in Mount Zion when we enter into Christ's kingdom by the new birth." "We go up to Zion when we go to God's throne, and to the throne of Jesus, and submit to his authority!"

The writer then quotes Heb. xii. 22 in support of his view, and asserts that they "had already come to Mount Zion." If this assumption is true, then Paul contradicts himself, and his testimony is worthless. Why so? Because he tells us in the previous chapter, after giving a long list of worthies who "having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promise. God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect." Did he tell us in the next breath that we "had already come to Mount Zion" and "to the spirits of just men made perfect?" Paul told the Phillipians that he had "not already" attained to perfection, but was "following after" it; and it is clear he did not expect to attain to it till Christ returned from heaven and the saints were raised from the dead and clothed with immortality.

The word "come," in verse 22, might with equal propriety have been rendered coming, then there would have been harmony in Paul's statements. Then it would read, "Ye are coming," etc. The events to be reached were in the future; but the persons were on their way to reach them, when "the general assembly and church of the first-born" would meet in their perfected state. Till then, "the Body of Christ" is not made perfect. Then and not before, will the union Paul speaks of be completed. The living saints are now on their way, and are "to come" to that glorious meeting; but are yet to go through discipline to prepare them for it, so are exhorted to "lay aside every weight, looking unto Jesus, who for the joy set before him endured the cross, despising the shame," etc. Ed.

THE CRY OF "INFIDELITY."

ALMOST every advance from stereotyped theology is met by Sectarians, of all classes, with the cry of "infidelity." The Priests of the Sects are aroused much as "Demetrius" and the other silversmiths at Ephesus were at the preaching of Paul, and cried out, "for the space of two hours, GREAT IS DIANA of the Ephesians."

No the worshipers of a petrified theology, no matter how absurd or even blasphemous it may be, cry out if any one presumes to go in advance of their "creeds." Their craft, by which they live, is in danger. Many of them, no doubt, are sincerely afraid that truth is imperiled by any effort to show that some of their tenets are mere "traditions of men," and without foundation in the "Word of God."

When the Editor of the BIBLE EXAMINER, after several years of careful examination of the subject, came out with his conclusion that inherent immortality was unsupported by the Bible, and that deathlessness could only be attained by a union with Christ, he was soon saluted with the cry of "infidelity." In 1840 was the time he first announced his conclusion. This reproach he had to bear for several years.

In 1853 the real "Infidels" met in Convention in Hartford, Conn., to put down confidence in the Bible. They had challenged ministers of all denominations to meet them in debate; but none appeared to take part. The Editor of the BIBLE EXAMINER had no thought of being at that Convention; but being strongly urged by a friend, who knew his views, he finally visited it, little thinking of taking any part in the debate; but he was impelled to come to the rescue of the Bible and its God.

The Infidels in that Convention opened their attack with the following resolution, presented by Henry C. Wright, formerly a Congregational minister, after that a Non-Resistant and Peace man—

"Resolved, That the Bible, in some parts of the Old and New Testaments, sanctions injustice, concubinage, prostitution, oppression, war, plunder, and wholesale murder; and therefore, the doctrines of the Bible, as a whole, are false, and injurious to the social and spiritual growth and perfection of man."

The Report of the Convention says:

"Mr. George Storrs then arose and said:

"Mr. Chairman, when a Court is in session, or opens its session, and a person is brought before that Court charged with crime, it is important to understand, at the outset, by what law that person is to be convicted of crime. The Bible is arraigned, charged with crimes, but we have not yet been told by what law the Bible is to be tried. This is a point I want our friends to define. It certainly seems reasonable, that if any individual is to be tried on a charge, he should not only have the charges specified, but it should be specified against what law he has transgressed. What is the use of standing up and testifying against a man ten thousand things, until you have told us by what law the charges are to be tried? Where is the law that proves that theft, oppression, and lying, and murder are crimes? Just let us have it. If that can be established by our friends, to the understanding of the audience, we are prepared to come and see whether the Bible is guilty of the crimes charged, or not; and until that has been done, I maintain that every word that has been uttered here against the Bible, is without any force or weight; because it has not been shown that the Bible has transgressed any law. I do not stand here to advocate and defend everything we find in our translation. I shall not stand here to defend the Bible against interpolations. You have charged the Bible with crimes. Point us to a clear law by which the Bible is to be tried, and we are ready to defend it." (Applause.)

After these remarks the Convention seemed at a dead stand; but Mr. Wright endeavored to extricate them by talking of "the law" of inward consciousness. Mr. Storrs was desirous to bring the Convention to say the Bible and its God were to be tried by natural religion, or the god of nature; but the leading infidels appeared unwilling to give a rule of trial, and seemed determined to evade this point. After much talk by Mr. Wright and others, Mr. Storrs again came forward, and said:

"I would again ask, if a person be brought before a Court, charged with crimes, if it is not right that the law should be defined by which he is to be tried—a law by which it can be judged whether he is a criminal or not? In reply to this question, my friend Mr. Wright, very prettily indeed, appeals to our feelings. 'The law is planted in here [touching his breast]—in the constitution of our nature.' Is that the law by which the Bible is to be tried, and its morality or irreligion to be tested? Is that the law by which this Book is to be proved a wicked thing, or to be justified? Is the Bible to be tried by this law in our nature, which says that murder, theft, slavery, etc., are wrong? I understand that the position my friend [Mr. Wright] has taken is, after all, that the Bible is to be tried by natural religion."

Mr. Wright responded, "Yes, by natural religion." Then Mr. Storrs proceeded as follows:

"I am glad he has said it is natural religion. We come now to the point—we have something tangible. It is natural religion by which we are to try the Bible. All that you can prove by natural religion, with reference to supreme powers, is, that there may be one God or many, and that the God or gods possess intelligence and power; and, for aught that you can know by natural religion, this God or these gods may have just the character which it has been contended by our opponents the God of the Bible possesses. Does natural religion teach you that God is good, when he suffers so much misery, and war, and woe, oppression, and blood, and sickness, and death, filling graveyards with human beings? Now, where is your good God? Do not touch the Bible—stand off from that—let revelation alone. Just take your natural religion, and you cannot prove that God is good; and for aught you know, therefore, he is just such a character as sanctions war, oppression, polygamy, etc. I see no possibility of avoiding this conclusion. By natural religion how can you know but that it is right that God should destroy one class of men by another? How do you know that it is wrong for one nation to rise up against another nation, and to commit depredations and destroy one another by war? How do you know that it is wrong to practice polygamy? How do you know it is wrong for God himself to interfere with my rights as a man, having created me? What does natural religion teach you about the animal creation?"

"See your neighbor take the calf and cut its throat before the eyes of its dam. She moans—she feels bad, don't she? Ah, it is a sin to take the calf and cut its throat—is it not? But natural religion says it is right—you want it to eat; but, perhaps my friend Wright will say it is wrong. [Laughter.] Again, a man finds a swarm of bees in a tree, and cutting down the tree, he takes the bees and puts them in his bee-house, and tells them to work for him. They work all summer long; but finally the man comes along who says that he is the 'slaveholder,' and that he wants the honey. He lights his match of brimstone under them, destroys their life, and takes the honey. He is a robber! Does natural religion say so? 'Oh, no; but they are inferior to me.' Indeed, sir, how inferior you are to God! How do you know but that the God that made you has a right to command you to be slaughtered! Does natural religion tell you that he has not? No. The fact is, that natural religion can prove nothing; but that there is a God—whether one or many cannot be determined—and that God possesses power and intelligence; but cannot lead us one step farther in determining his character. Hence, I say, that the rule by which it is claimed that this Bible should be tried, is a defective one, and that the Bible cannot be tested by it. But, perhaps I shall hear some one saying, 'You are not going to compare us to the lower and inferior animals?' But, sir, what are you but an animal? I was glad to hear my friend Wright say, that if he did not have any brain, he would have no life; but take away his brain and he would be dead, just as dead as any other animal. Now, I ask, if natural religion allows us to enslave the lower animals—and a great portion of the community take their life out of mere sport—and if the law of natural religion were the same and unchangeable, if it would not condemn every man that takes the life of the meanest insect that crawls upon the earth? Our friends have been building upon a foundation that has been laid for them by some theologians, that man has an immortal soul—that he is a part of God. Whatever else may be charged upon the Bible, this can not. Man is only an animal till there is a development of moral powers by the application of a moral law. What, 'a part of God!' Why, sir, if man is a part of God, there is no such thing as sin; for sin being a departure from God—a violation of some law, there can be no such thing as sin, unless a man should deny himself. Man, 'a part of God!' No, sir, that is an assumption of the human heart in its pride. They would be as gods. I maintain that man by his creation is only an animal of the highest order, and capable of higher development than any other animal; but as to his having an immortal soul, there is no such thing taught in the Bible; therefore, the Bible is clear of that charge. Whatever else they shall claim is taught by the Bible, it never taught that man is possessed of an immortal soul."

"The old theological notion of there being 'infants in hell not a span long,' has been adverted to. Suppose we throw the Bible away, and not let a ray of its light shine upon us, and I ask you, where infants go when they die? They go down into the grave, don't they? Then all the infants that die, go into hell—your natural religion hell [applause and laughter]; and you cannot demonstrate by your natural religion but that every infant goes into hell! The infant comes into the world a suffering being, travels on in pain and suffering, and drops into the grave. Now, where is your natural religion to comfort you? 'Oh, I guess it has a soul that goes off in progression.' 'I guess!' I guess it is all guess work. It is the Bible that brings to our view another state, and that by a resurrection through Jesus from the dead.

"The question in regard to the Bible is not, in fact, whether that Bible is a revelation, but it is whether it is a faithful history of revelations, and certain transactions connected with those revelations; and, therefore, the whole question turns on the credibility of the Bible witnesses, and whatever charges you may bring against hireling priests, these witnesses are to be judged in their testimony, according to the motives under which they may be reasonably supposed to have acted; and if it appears that their whole course was one of self-sacrifice and pain—that they jeopardized their very lives in giving their testimony, and nothing can be shown to the contrary—then you must accept them as credible witnesses. Further, when it is shown that this suffering and trial was foretold them by their beloved Master, there is no reason that can be given for supposing that they were designing men—men that would palm off on the world a falsehood. So, if we go back to the Jewish priesthood—who may be considered as Bible witnesses—do we find them men of selfishness? Did they frame those laws?" [turning to Mr. Wright.]

MR. WRIGHT—"Yes."

MR. STORRS—"Let us see whether they were knaves or not. Is it anywhere evinced in these laws? Did they [the laws] reserve any portion of the land for the priests?"

MR. WRIGHT, interrupting Mr. Storrs, said—"They reserve to the priest one-tenth of all the other property."

MR. STORRS—"Does it look like knavery, I say, to cut themselves off from all possessions in Israel? Yet the people were to give them only one-tenth of their crops, etc., and where was the law compelling the people to give it, if they did not do it voluntarily?"

"Now, I say, that the priests did not make the laws, and I call upon my friend Wright to prove that they did; and if they did, they made just such laws as 'knaveish priests' would not have made—they made a law to prevent their holding possessions in Israel. They made a law by which it was made a voluntary affair with the people to pay them one-tenth of their crops, etc., or not; and there was no law compelling them to pay this tithe."

A VOICE, interrupting—"The people were not to have any wine the next year in case they did not pay this tithe."

MR. STORRS—"I ask if the priests themselves caused that there should be no wine the next year, after the failure of the people to pay tithe, or did he who caused the herb of the field to grow, cause that there should be no wine? Were you to give knaveish priests now the power to make laws to regulate their own salaries, do you think they would exclude themselves from having inheritances among the people, and not make any provision for compelling the people to pay tithes?"

A VOICE—"No, they would pay more attention to their bread and butter." [Laughter.]

MR. STORRS—"No, indeed; but such was the fact in regard to the Jewish priesthood; they were excluded from having inheritance among the people, and there were no provisions made for enforcing the payment of tithes—there were no pains or penalties to be inflicted on the people in case of their failure to pay. Now, I ask, if such a code of laws gives any evidence of having been gotten up by a corrupt priesthood? No; there is every evidence of the purity and goodness of their motives. So with reference to the witnesses of the New Testament. You say of a corrupt priesthood, nowadays, that they keep a good look-out for their bread and butter; but these sacrificed all—being stoned, whipped and imprisoned, and were assured by their Master that they should come to a violent death. They went out in the face of public opinion—against a corrupt priesthood—against a corrupt world, civil and ecclesiastical, with their lives in their hands, and proclaimed the great truths and facts of the New Testament. And what are these great facts? Why, the great fact—the solar beam of the New Testament, is a resurrection from the dead through our Lord Jesus Christ—that God has given us eternal life, and that this life is in his Son, and not in ourselves. Amid all their trials, these witnesses maintained their integrity to the end.

"These witnesses went forward testifying to the truth, namely, that Jesus is the Son of God—that Jesus died—that God raised him from the dead—that he ascended into heaven—that he is coming again to judge the world, and to give to his people eternal life. They preached Jesus and a resurrection from the dead, and they went forward in their testimony, faithful to the end; and, mark you, they did not, as hypocrites and dissemblers do, conceal their sins. Dissemblers and hypocrites do not tell their sins. No, no, sir, they cover up their sins. The New Testament witnesses did not cover up theirs, as is evinced by the very fact that we have a knowledge of them; and that is another argument in favor of the credibility of the witnesses. All these witnesses testified to facts and truths which they promulgated to the world at the hazard of their lives.

"Now, sir, we are going to test the God of the Bible by the God of nature, and see how the God of the Bible stands by this law in respect to the God of nature. Now, shut up the Bible and look at the God of nature. The God of nature is cruel. What, 'the God of nature?' Yes, sir, outrageously cruel, barbarously cruel. 'How do you prove that charge?' Go yonder, sir, see where that city stood. All were in the enjoyment of blessings and sympathy of friendship, rejoicing in each other's love, the love of society, and the God of nature marched through by his earthquake, shook the foundation of the city, and buried them in ruin! Is the God of the Bible worse than that? What has he done worse? (Applause.) Here is a populous country that spreads itself along the pleasant river, and the fields are whitening for the harvest. The inhabitants dwelling along the borders of that river are flourishing and in prosperity. Their families are happy; but the God of nature pours down the waters, and the river rises and swells, and sweeps away their dwellings, and destroys the inhabitants. Ah! did the God of the Bible do anything worse than that? Come, God of nature, stand up and defend yourself. We charge you with being a cruel God. (Applause.) We see men spread abroad over the land, pursuing the business of life, and not interfering with the God of nature; but the God of nature travels along through the country with the cholera, and calls off thousands upon thousands. Does he not sanction 'wholesale murder?' We are trying the Bible by the God of nature, and I will ask you, as a jury sitting on the trial, if, so far, the God of nature is not likely to be quite as bad as the God of the Bible? But, sir, we do not stop here—we go further. You complain perhaps, that the God of the Bible authorized Moses to exterminate whole nations—wholesale murder you may call it, if you please. How has the God of nature acted in this respect? I beg leave to refer to Bolingbroke.*

* He was an infidel but not an atheist.

It is in his views on the subject of evil, in his Works, vol. v., pp. 403, 404. He says:

"True it is that men are sometimes involved in general calamities, which they can neither foresee nor prevent, such as inundations, earthquakes, pestilences, and the entire devastations of kingdoms or provinces by savage and barbarous people, like the Huns of old, or the Spaniards, in later ages. But these calamities are rare. They may be considered as chastisements, for chastisements are reasonable when there are any to be amended by partaking of them, or by being at least spectators of them. They may be considered as mere effects, natural, though contingent of matter and motion in a material system, put in motion under certain general laws. If they are seen in the first light (i.e., chastisements) they should teach mankind to adore and to fear that Providence which governs the world by particular as well as by general dispensations. If they are seen in the second (i.e., as mere effects, etc.), they should suggest some other reflections which are not without their utility neither.' On page 438 Bolingbroke says: 'Cotta, who exercises greater injustice toward God than any of the tyrants he quotes did toward men, is much scandalized that those two eyes of the Mediterranean coast, Corinth and Carthage, were put out, etc. But how did he know that Mummius and Scipio (the Roman generals, by whom these cities were destroyed) were not instruments of the justice of Providence, as well as of Roman policy and passion? The worst men, and the Romans were none of the best, are employed to punish the worst. None so fitted to the task. They are the instruments, and in their turn the examples of divine justice. The wealth, the splendor, the magnificence of Corinth were great, but Corinth was a sink of iniquity. Carthage was a great and powerful state, but the Carthaginians were a faithless, factious, and cruel people. Might not these be the remote and true causes (of the judgment of God upon them), whatever the immediate and apparent were of their destruction?'"

"Now, sir, here is one who is talking of the God of nature. He admits it right, and undertakes to justify the God of nature in suffering those two eyes of the Mediterranean Sea to be put out. For what reason? 'Why,' says he, 'they were abominably corrupt.' Therefore the God of nature was justified in causing them to be destroyed, and destroyed, too, by the wickedest of men. Now I ask this intelligent congregation, whether the cases are not parallel with the God of the Bible; and whether the God of the Bible is to be condemned by the God of nature? What was the reason which the God of the Bible himself assigns, why Abraham was not yet to possess the land of Canaan? Why his posterity were to be kept out of that land for centuries to come? Turn to the Bible itself and hear what it says, Genesis xv. 13-16. After speaking to Abraham of the bondage of his children in Egypt, he says, 'But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again.' Now mark, 'For the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full.' What is that, sir? Why, the God of the Bible did not allow Abraham to possess that land, or injure its inhabitants, for the reason that their iniquity was not yet full; but when it was full—as Lord Bolingbroke says, the iniquity of Carthage and Corinth was full—then, sir, the God of the Bible did the same thing that the God of nature did.

"Now, sir, how are you going to condemn the God of the Bible by the God of nature? Whoever will take the history of the world will find that the God of nature has suffered and countenanced the same crimes which it is affirmed the God of the Bible has; and without spending time to go into details, we will say that the God of nature has countenanced, sanctioned, and sustained (exterminating war, Lord Bolingbroke himself being witness on the subject; so the God of nature is a 'wholesale murderer.' Sir, if the God of the Bible was, so is the God of nature; and once judged by that law, the Bible stands at least on an equality with the God of nature, or with natural religion, if you like the expression better.

"But 'the God of the Bible is a very cruel God.' The God of the Bible is represented as 'commanding parents to stone the child to death; Abraham is commanded to butcher his son'; and, says my friend Wright, 'I have been asked if I would do such a deed, if God commanded it? No, I would not; but I would cut the throat of such a God.' Well, I was a little surprised at that remark of my good friend Wright, because, formerly, when a follower of Jesus, he was a peace-man—a non-resistant. (Applause.) Formerly, if a man should take his child and dash out its brains before its eyes, he would not strike him to keep him from doing it; but he has changed since he has become a worshiper of the God of nature, and is now a war-man to the knife.

"But my friend Wright will have to butcher his God, and cut his throat, as sure as life; because the God of nature has given the command to delicate mothers, and compelled them to butcher their own children, and eat them too! Is it, or is it not a fact, that in sieges of cities, where they have been driven to desperation for lack of food, mothers have killed their own children, and eaten them to preserve their own life? What was it that commanded them to do this? 'The God of nature!' (Applause.) The God of nature, when he saw that they were like to starve to death, commanded them to 'butcher' their children, and they actually did butcher them! Has the God of the Bible done anything worse than that? No, sir. The God of nature has shown himself to be altogether as guilty as the God of the Bible; and if my friend Wright is true to his declaration, he will have to take his knife and cut the throat of his God of nature. 'The God of nature,' he says, 'never did send earthquakes to kill men—earthquakes are natural omens.' They are then the natural actions, I suppose, of the God of nature; are they? If it is not understood in this way, I confess myself incapable of telling how it is understood.

"But our friend Wright is very accommodating to the God of nature. If he were half as accommodating to the God of the Bible, he would not find so much difficulty. I should like to know what can be found in that manifestation of the God of nature that goes to prove his goodness. Can the God of nature speak to men really in any way possible? If he can, why did he not give them some notice that he was going to destroy such a section of country, and that they must move away from it, else he would destroy their lives? How good he must be to destroy all their labors, and destroy their families? 'But the man would not have been hurt when the lightning fell from heaven, if he had not been in the way of it.' Indeed he would not! But did the God of nature tell him, when he was walking along, that he was going to get in the way below? Did he not suffer him to go on, and dash him to death in a moment?

"There is one other point that I shall notice in the remarks of my friend Wright this morning, particularly. He tells us that Jesus was good—a good man. Thank him for that. He says that Jesus founded a sect. Any harm in that, friend Wright? [MR. WRIGHT—'Yes.'] Very well, how did he found it? In any other way than you are founding a sect now? [MR. WRIGHT—'Yes.'] No. Well, but what of that? Was the sect good at the outset? Yes; my friend Wright acknowledged that the persons concerned in it, at the outset, were good men. [MR. WRIGHT—'Yes.'] I thank him. The men that were first concerned in founding this sect were good men, true men, faithful men, Christlike men; and they demonstrated their integrity to the truth, by contending for the truth even unto death, at the hazard of their lives. What then? Since that period this sect have become corrupt and done certain things injurious to society. I am rather glad my friend Wright said, that 'those who assume to be this sect have had an injurious influence upon the world.'

"He says these men do not belong to Jesus. What, then, have they to do in pouring contumely upon this sect or the system Jesus introduced? Why bring them to this stand, when he says himself that 'they have no affinity to Jesus?' He has given us the argument. He has told us that Jesus was good—that the men to whom he committed this work were good and true men. He has now told us that those who assume to be of that class, 'act just as contrary to Jesus and his first ministers, as Satan does to God.'"

The sense of the community at Hartford on the subject of the defence may be seen in the following resolution, passed, among others, at a large meeting of the citizens held the evening after the Convention adjourned, at which Leonard B. Griffin, a Methodist minister, presided :

Resolved, That the sincere and hearty thanks of Christendom are due to the Rev. Messrs. Storrs, of New York, and Turner of this city, for their able, manly, fearless, laborious and triumphant defence of the Holy Scriptures, during the recent Convention.'

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—That Convention on its first meeting had determined when it adjourned to do so to meet in the same place in January following ; but for some reason that plan was not carried out. After its close the President of the Convention, JOSEPH BARKER, an Englishman, came out an Atheist, and preached "There is no God" for a few years. I am glad to say that finally he renounced atheism and infidelity and returned to Christianity with a sorrow-stricken heart for his past course, and confessed the barrenness he had felt in his infidel career.

The editor of the BIBLE EXAMINER has never, for a moment of his life, doubted the truth of Christianity and of its invaluable character ; but he has expunged from that pure fountain, what he has been convinced was only the "traditions of men" ignorant of the true character and government of the God of the Bible, who is "A just God and a Saviour" (Isa. xlv. 21), and whose name and nature is "GOD IS LOVE."—1 John iv. 8, 16.

THE DIVINE DISPENSATIONS. OR, THE DIVINE PLAN IN THE GOVERNMENT OF OUR RACE.—No. I.

BY THE EDITOR OF BIBLE EXAMINER.

INTRODUCTION.—That God had a plan for the government of the race of Adam before the world began, will scarcely be denied by any believer in His being and attributes : that such plan was matured in a perfection and with such wisdom as to forbid the idea of change or disappointment must, also, be admitted ; for with God there "is no variable-ness, neither shadow of turning" (Jas. i: 17) : and Jehovah himself says, "I am the LORD, I change not."—Mal. iii: 6. Men are prone to think that God is, like themselves, liable to mistakes, and under the necessity of altering or changing his plan to suit circumstances unforeseen. But no such idea is admissible in the administration of that Being who is infinite in all his attributes ; and, hence, cannot but be perfectly acquainted with all the possible workings of a system which is altogether of his own production and arrangement, "declaring the end from the beginning" (Isa. xlv: 10) ; and has challenged false gods, saying, "And as I shall call, and shall declare it, and set it in order for me, since I appointed the ancient people ; and the things that are coming, and shall come"—Isa. xlv: 7. "As for God, his way is perfect."—2 Sam. xxii: 31, and Psa. xviii: 30.

Enough testimony has been presented to show that the idea of failure in any part of God's plan at creation, or that it has been changed is without foundation, and is, in fact, an impeachment of the Divine attributes ; also, it is a reproach on the divine government, which is not becoming in a creature born of the dust by the Divine power and wisdom. Let it then be a settled point with us all, that there has not and never will be nor ever can be any failure in the creative or administrative work of God, or any cause arise for which his plan from the outset, should need or has received any supplement, alteration or amendment. The whole work of creation and redemption was as fully in the Divine mind before the work began as it is to-day or ever will be. Yet the development of His plan has been, and will continue to be gradual ; so that of any age it may still be said, it knows only in part. These gradual developments are what I call "DISPENSATIONS," succeeding each other in God's appointed times, until, "according to the purpose of Him who worketh all things after the counsel of His own will" . . . "that in the DISPENSATION of the FULLNESS OF TIMES He might gather together in one all things in Christ."—Eph. i: 10-11.

That God has "times and seasons" for all these developments, is true; but they are "in his own power" (Acts i: 7); and the veil is only taken off at such periods as He chooses. The manifestation of his purposes have all been gradual; suited to the age or dispensation then opening.

THE ADAMIC DISPENSATION.

This was the first relating to our race. It embraced the entire work of creation and the trial of the first man. The period, at first, is marked off by days: each successive day bringing forth some new development of creative power and wisdom; all speaking forth the goodness of God and manifesting Divine love. When the finishing work was brought forth, and man stood up on the earth as its lord, God manifested his love for man by giving him "a help meet," or one suitable for a companion in the trial that was before the race. A residence was provided for them as a source of joy and comfort, and as a symbol of that designed as their final habitation; thus giving them a foretaste of "the joy set before" them, when the full work designed by the CREATOR should be accomplished. But how was the new-made man, whose eyes were just opened on the works of God, to know the value of his possessions and the love of the CREATOR, while as yet he had no experience of evil—no contrast of the state he was now in?

What should we think of the parent who, having a child born to him, should keep that child always in the state or condition of a helpless infant, a toy in his house, and never send him forth to learn for himself how to live and how to appreciate his father's kindness and love? Would not all say, "That father is ruining that child, and he will never be good for anything if kept wholly indoors as a mere pet?" The cry would go forth, "Send him to battle his way for himself, and let him learn to provide for himself. In that way he will appreciate the goodness and love of his parents, and be possessed of an amount of happiness to which he must have been an entire stranger all his days, had he not been sent forth to the work of conflict where all his powers and faculties could be developed; thus arriving at a knowledge of himself and his capabilities which he would otherwise never have known. And though he might have thought his father dealt hard with him when he put him in the school of trial and development, he will at length see, feel, and confess that it was love in that father that led him to deal with him in what seemed so severe a manner while he was inexperienced.

Adam's childhood was in a Paradise—a garden of delights. But he was not yet prepared to appreciate it; for he knew no contrast: all was enjoyment from the commencement of his existence; and it was thus impossible to understand the greatness of his CREATOR's love, or the unbounded happiness God designed for him in the future. Hence, he must be taught by contrast with evil. "The knowledge of good and evil" was the lesson to be learned. How could this be accomplished? Not by making evil impossible; nor by forcing man to do evil; but by a simple prohibition (temporary, of course) not to eat of that tree. He should have waited till the prohibition was removed; for there is no evidence that it would never have been removed; for to be perfect in the highest degree the time must come when man would know evil, because that is essential to a moral training; and God says, "I form the light and create darkness; I make peace, and create evil; I the LORD do all these things."—Isa. xlv: 7. The introduction of evil, then, was of God's appointment; but sin is another matter. Man's SIN was in not waiting God's time for the knowledge of the evil; he ate before the injunction was removed, and learned evil in a way to make it far worse to him than it would otherwise have been; but not in a way which infinite wisdom and love had not made ample provision to overrule for the highest good of the race, in the end.

Of this latter fact, God gave, on the spot and at the time, a promise, though under a veil, of the entire reversal of all the evil that had been introduced. "The seed of the woman" was to be the RESTORER. He should undo all the evil resulting from the first transgression—"take away the sin of the world" (John i: 29); "Bruise the serpent's head" (Gen. iii: 15); "Destroy the work of the devil" (1 John iii: 8); "Destroy death."—1 Cor. xv: 26; Heb. ii: 15, and Rev. xx: 14.

Adam's transgression has been magnified by theologians, and God represented as exceedingly angry, taking vengeance on the whole race for the one offence of Adam, etc.; all of which representations give a false view of the MAKER's character and designs toward the race. True, Adam and all his posterity were excluded, temporarily from the tree of life, and subjected to death; but with the assurance of an ultimate restoration of the tree of life and a deliverance from death. All this was promised, it is true, under a veil in that dispensation; but no less real on that account, as God has more or less veiled all his promises and designs toward the children of men; which veils are removed in His own time, as we shall learn as we proceed. The exclusion of man from the tree of life, and subjection to death, as, also, his expulsion from Paradise, were all acts of love, and not of anger, as a depraved theology has long maintained, to the dishonor of the CREATOR, as if he had been a blind adventurer who undertook a work which he had neither skill nor power to accomplish and did not know what the result would be. Such thoughts of God, the CREATOR of all things, are worthy only of the dark ages of paganism and papal superstitions, when men's passions gave their gods a like spirit with their own. It is time there was an end of such blasphemy against God and his works.

Man at his creation was blind as to moral evil. His moral faculty, though existing, had no development—"his eyes were" not "opened" to a sense of right and wrong. A command was a necessity to bring the moral faculty into action. That command might relate to something that was right or wrong in itself; or it might relate to an action which was not wrong in itself, but made so by a command.

Eating of the tree of knowledge of good and evil was not wrong in itself, but it was made so by a command given. Hence, if it had not been given, man might eat thereof innocently; or, if he had waited his MAKER's time for withdrawing that prohibition, he would have come to the knowledge without the entrance of death. Adam's sin, then, was not of the highest character; i. e., it was not doing that which was evil in itself; but it was evil because he was commanded not to do it; he sinned not against a moral precept, but against a positive one; yet this was sufficient to "open his eyes" to a knowledge of good and evil, though the act was not, in the design of his MAKER, to fix his final state; as a RESTORER was provided "before the foundation of the world" (Eph. i: 4, 5, 9, 10), and proclaimed immediately after the transgression (though veiled) in the declaration of the triumph of the "seed of the woman."—Gen. iii: 15.

Man sent out from Paradise, goes forth to learn evil by experience, and is sustained by the remembrance of that garden of delights, to which he had a promise of restoration after a season of painful trial, which, under Divine grace, shall prepare him for a higher enjoyment than he ever could have possessed without it.

It must be apparent to all that the plan was to be opened by various stages, as the work of creation was; though both contained a grand whole, or an ultimate perfection, when evil should have an end, and the glories of the whole plan be fully opened, justifying the means and stages employed to bring about the consummation; and manifesting the infinite wisdom, power, and love of the CREATOR to all created minds; thus bringing glory to God and producing unlimited confidence or trust in him by all intelligent creatures; so that unhesitating and cheerful obedience to his will, will ever after be yielded as our highest joy and happiness. A glorious result to our race.

I have brought my subject beyond the Adamic Dispensation into what, by distinction, may be called,

THE ANTEDILUVIAN DISPENSATION.

This extends from the knowledge of good and evil to the flood; and seems to be little else than a manifestation of the animal nature of man; though there are sufficient exceptions to show that man is capable of a spiritual development. The main persons of this last class were Abel, Seth, Enoch and Noah. These doubtless had many of their posterity to go with them in the service of God; for we are told, after a son was born to Seth, "Then began men to call upon the name of the LORD"; or, as the margin reads, "Then began men to call themselves by the name of the LORD."—Gen. iv. 26. "Enoch walked with God; and died not; for God took him."—Gen. v. 24. I have supplied the word "died" for "was," because Paul thus interprets the language in Heb. xi. 5, "By faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death," etc. Noah was a righteous man, and survived the antediluvian dispensation. All others of that dispensation, except the four persons named and their immediate descendants, seem to have lived after their animal nature, developing it down to a great age; thus showing that great age does not insure a spiritual development in men, but rather the reverse; the animal prevails, so that the shortening of life seems to be in mercy to man.

The general laws of the dispensation now under consideration are not revealed clearly; but some there doubtless were, or we should not hear of "the sons of God" in distinction from "the daughters of men."—Gen. vi. 2. It seems these "sons of God," or the class known as calling "themselves by the name of the LORD," were tempted and overcome by the "fair daughters of the sons of men"—men who had no higher object in life than self-gratification, like the vast multitudes in all ages hitherto. These connections among the antediluvians brought on a general apostacy from the service of the LORD, so that Noah, only, remained true.

That this dispensation was designed to fix or determine the final state of the antediluvians cannot be proved. God's great scheme of human redemption by a second Adam was yet under a veil; they, at best, had only intimations of it; sufficient, however, to involve them in personal guilt, which would be punished by the destruction of their animal nature; to the government of which they had given themselves up; which destruction was to be a warning to men in after dispensations against "living after the flesh."—See Jude 6-8; 2 Peter ii. 4-10; and Romans viii. 13. The multitudes of the antediluvians had no clear conceptions of God's plan for their deliverance from sin and death, and that they were among the "all men" for whom "Christ" would "give himself a ransom"; the revelation of this truth was reserved for them to a future state or period—it was to be made to them after the "ransom" was actually made. This is evident from the language of an apostle, which, however it may be veiled, or obscured, nevertheless shows that at some period after Christ's death something would be preached to these antediluvians. The apostle says, "Christ hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God; being put to death in the flesh [in which the sins were committed,] "but quickened by the Spirit: by which, also, he went and preached unto the spirits in prison; which sometimes were disobedient, when once the long suffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was preparing."—1 Peter iii. 18-20. As to the exact time when this preaching was done, or is to be done, there may be doubt; but that it has been done or will be done under the personal administration of Jesus at some time subsequent to his death in the flesh, there can be no reasonable doubt: besides, this view is confirmed by Peter's language in the following chapter, where he speaks of the "quick and dead" being judged. He says: "For, for this cause" (because they are to be judged) "was the Gospel" (to be?) "preached also to them that are dead, that they might be judged according to men in the flesh" (because it was in the flesh they sinned, and in the flesh Christ was put to death for them), "but live according to God in the spirit"; or by the Spirit, then to be given them, by which they come to see Christ as their REDEEMER and DELIVERER; and their final state will be determined by their reception or rejection of him when he is thus manifested to them.

In the antediluvian dispensation the works of the animal man were fully developed under a life-training; and it was shown that men need and must have aid, foreign to themselves, to enable them to rise out of the animal into the spiritual, in order to an endless life and immortality. Such a training seemed to be devised by infinite wisdom for the ultimate good in the highest degree; and evil in its worst form was suffered to be worked out in the animal man for a development of its incapacity to answer the higher state for which man was designed by his CREATOR. The animal has its use in the present state, and may be abused as well as used; whatever it may be, the CREATOR can and will overrule all to the advancement of the higher end He had in view at man's creation; and to bring about this result He will neither change, alter, nor amend His plan, made before the foundation of the world. This view removes all grounds of fear that God will not fully accomplish all that He designed or has promised. Nothing can possibly defeat His purposes concerning the race. "His counsel will stand, and he will do all his pleasure."

A KEY TO JOHN v: 28, 29.

BY MRS. L. R. K. BISHOP.

SEVERAL years after I embraced the "Life Views," I remember, in company with Sister Helen Robertson, entering upon a somewhat careful investigation of John v., with the object of getting a clearer view of the much wrangled over verses, 28, 29. Failing to see (after doing our best) the legitimate bearing of the context as related to our own, or any other view of the above named texts, Sister Helen exclaimed, "I do not believe we have got the key to this yet!" I have thought of that remark many times since with approval, and I feel certain she was right, now that I have found a key that seems to turn back the bolts easily, and without violence, and displays a harmony, not only of the different parts with each other, but with the great plan as revealed elsewhere.

Whether I shall be able to make this apparent to your readers may be doubtful; but with your permission I will try.

The occasion which called out the language we shall consider, every sentence of which is pregnant with meaning, was this: Our Saviour had just healed the man at the pool of Bethesda, and the Jews persecuted him because it was done on the Sabbath. He justified himself on the ground of having only followed his Father's example, who had worked up to that time. They thought this gave additional ground of complaint. "For he not only had broken the Sabbath, but said that God was his Father, making himself equal with God." The language which commences our subject, and which I will quote from the Emphatic Diaglott, was his reply to this charge; it is as follows: "The Son can do nothing of himself, except what he may see the Father doing, for whatever He does, these things also does the Son in like manner. For the Father loves the Son and shows him all what he himself does, and greater works than these will he show him that you may wonder. For, as the Father raises up and makes alive the dead, so also the Son makes alive whom he pleases."

In view of the custom, unhappily so prevalent in some quarters, of mercilessly wrenching and squeezing certain prophecies until their own authors would not know them, in order to force them into niches they were never designed to occupy, for the reason, that to accept them, according to their plain and obvious import, involves the resurrection of their subjects to natural life. We may well stop here and enquire, not only who gave natural life in the first place, but who restored it to the son of the Shunamite, and to the man whose stilled pulses beat again as soon as he had touched the bones of Elisha? Certainly the power was not in man, much less in the bones of a dead man, to restore life. If this was the work of the Father, and all things which he does the Son does in like manner, even to making alive the dead, examples of which he will yet give them, or "greater works" than healing the sick that they may wonder, who will dare affirm that "Christ has but one kind of life to give," that he is not "thoroughly furnished" to every work the plan requires of him! But what does the plan require? The next two verses give us the key to the situation. "For the Father does not even judge any one, but has given all judgment to the Son; so that all may honor the Son even as they honor the Father. He who honors not the Son honors not that Father who sent him." Much depends on a correct answer to the questions what judgment is this which is so entirely committed to the Son, and when does it take place?

That this is the judgment which decides the final destiny of the race is certain from two considerations: First, the very fact that it is given into the hands of the Redeemer proves it to be that judgment contemplated in the redemptive plan which is being wrought out by him, and as that plan is never to be followed by another, man's final destiny must depend on his acceptance or rejection of its provisions.

Secondly, in this judgment the Father does not participate, he "does not even judge any one" in this judgment. But that judgment which "came upon all men to condemnation" was the direct work of the Father; so also those judgments of both nations and individuals, the history of which forms so large a portion of the sacred records. What an argument is this to prove all past judgments but temporal, and not designed to fix the final destiny of those concerned; the judgment which does that having been committed to the Son.

But when does that judgment take place? Let Paul answer: "It awaits men to die once, but after this a judgment." Again, "He has established a day (a period of time) in which he is about to judge the habitable in righteousness, by a man whom he has appointed, having furnished a proof to all by raising him from the dead." Once more. It was through no inadvertency of his that in enumerating the foundation principles of the Christian system, he places "eternal judgment" after "the resurrection of the dead." But I hear my brother saying, "Now is the judgment of this world," putting peculiar emphasis upon the word now.

All must admit that while the word now is often used as an adverb of time, it can be just as legitimately used in this sense, in consequence of something said or done before. The only question is, in what sense is it used in the text under consideration? This the context must decide. Allow me to suggest, then, that if the sentence quoted teaches that the judgment of the world is now taking place, the next clause teaches just as certainly that the Ruler of this world is now cast out. And as this was said more than eighteen hundred years ago, and as the age to which it is applied is nearly ended, I submit whether for the entire period named, "the Ruler of this world" has not held the balance of power in the world to a remarkable degree; and whether he is not yet particularly lively for a "cast out" Ruler? But let us bring the text "to the spot where it claims parentage" and see if we can learn its real significance. It will be found in John xii. 31. In a previous verse Christ says, "If the grain of wheat, falling into the ground should not die, it remains alone; but if it should die, it bears much fruit." The thought of death evidently distressed him, for he says, "Now is my soul troubled, and what shall I say? Father save me from this hour. But on this account I come to this hour. Father, glorify thy name. Then a voice came from heaven, I both glorified and will glorify again." Turning to the crowd he said, "This voice has not come on account of me, but on your account. There is now (in consequence of the fact that the Father's name will surely be glorified by the death of the corn of wheat, so it may bring forth much fruit), there is now a judgment for this world; the Ruler of this world shall now be cast out. And I, if I be raised on high from the earth will draw all (his subjects) to myself." Surely this is all plain and very satisfactory.

Let us turn again to chapter v., and in the verse following those we have been considering we read, "Indeed, I truly say to you, he who hears my word and believes Him who sent me, has eternal life, and comes not into judgment, but has passed out of death into life." This presents a new phase of the subject. It brings to view a class who hear the words of Christ, believe Him who sent him, receive the regenerating principle of spiritual life and do not come into the judgment of the preceding verses—the judgment of the world, having passed out of death into life before that judgment takes place.

Is it an isolated text of Scripture which thus teaches the prior preparation of an elect "people for a purpose"? Is it not rather like the "goodly bough" of Joseph, "whose branches run over the wall?"

The Bible seems full of allusions to such an arrangement, and it was even declared from the beginning in a figure. I am not a patron of "home industry" when it takes the form of type manufacturing; but I accept with pleasure those types which the Scriptures clearly prove to be such. That the first Adam "was the figure of him that was to come" is plainly stated, and is also proved by calling Christ the "Second Adam." As the first Adam could not enter upon the work of generation committed to him, until he had been first cast into a "deep sleep" and a helpmeet for him prepared, who was bone of his bone and flesh of his flesh, so the second Adam does not enter upon his great work of regeneration until he has first tasted death for every man; and his bride, who is also his body, "of his flesh and of his bones," has been fitted up for her work in the divine arrangement. It can with propriety be said that Eve was created in Adam; but her development as "the mother of all living" was subsequent, and was entirely exceptional; no other woman ever had such an espousal! So the Church, the elect bride of Christ, was "chosen in him before the foundation of the world." Is it strange then that her development as such, during the time of her espousal, should also be exceptional? Had it been the plan of God that Christ should administer the judgment of the world alone, this might not have been necessary. But "know ye not that the saints shall judge the world"? Hence the necessity of a prior preparation. But when the marriage of the Lamb shall have come, his wife having previously made herself ready, then "The Spirit and the bride say come! and let him who hears say come! And let him who is thirsty come; let him who wishes, take freely of the Water of Life." That very "Water of Life" which John had just seen proceeding from the throne of God and the Lamb; on either side of which was the "Wood of Life," whose leaves were for the healing of the nations; thus fixing the chronology of the invitation.

This invitation commences the great work of the world's regeneration; and "In the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit on the throne of his glory, ye also (the twelve) shall sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." There we see the time of judgment is also the time of regeneration; and somebody has had a prior experience of both, inasmuch as they sit on thrones as judges, instead of coming into that judgment as the subjects of it. How the magnet of a true exposition, when thrust into the mass of divine testimony, attracts everything on the given subject harmoniously to itself, nothing is repelled—nothing stretched because too short or cut off because too long.

The next verse reads, "Indeed I assure you, that an hour comes and now is, when the dead will hear the voice of the Son of God, and those having heard will live." That this language refers to those examples of the restoration of natural life. He was about to give in the resurrection of Lazarus, the widow's son, and the daughter of Jairus, which would fulfil his previous promise to show them "greater works" than healing the sick, that they might wonder, I have no question; and the next verse seems to confirm the idea: "For as the Father has life in himself, so he gave also to the Son to have life in himself."

That the Father is the great source of both natural and spiritual life no one will question; and that he has given the Son to partake of his fulness in this respect seems clear, and the two preceding verses furnish examples of his ability to bestow both spiritual and natural life as occasion requires.

The necessity of being thus thoroughly furnished for the work before him becomes apparent when we consider the true import of the next verse: "And He gave him authority also to execute judgment, because he is a Son of man." That it is in consideration of his being the Son of God that he has received life to bestow, and it is as the Son of God that the dead hear his voice and live, is certain; but this administration of judgment is put into his hands because he is the Son of man. And why? For this reason: when he took upon him our nature, he became the "kinsman" of the race; and though it cost him his life, ours being a condemned nature, he thereby secured the "right to redeem," according to the Father's own arrangement. Now his necessity as a Redeemer of having the power to bestow both natural and spiritual life becomes evident when we consider the difficulties the race is involved in, with which he has allied himself.

It has sometimes been argued, that man's great crowning difficulty is death; that death which has hung like a pall over the race since "by one offence (in which all were represented) judgment came upon all men to condemnation." But this is a mistake. The great difficulty lies in whatever made that death a necessity. This was animalism, pure and simple, of which the first transgression was but the legitimate development. It was the work of the first Adam as a generator to produce a purely animal nature; but God never designed to preserve it unto life eternal, unless there was first added to it that element of spiritual life which from the very beginning was for this purpose vested in the Second Adam as a regenerator. And for this reason the natural—carnal—or animal nature "is enmity against God, it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be"; and the only way to bridge the chasm is to engraft on to the natural stock a principle of spiritual life, which will by the very operation of natural law produce fruit, not in harmony with the nature and character of the stock, which is animal, but of the scion grafted into it, which is spiritual; thus producing an at-one-ment.

Now as in the wisdom of that God, who can neither err nor be unkind, death has been permitted to sweep into the charnel house millions of the race before they have reached an age making it possible for them to comply with the conditions on which the above named principle is bestowed, and other millions have gone down in death, having never heard that there was such a principle to be secured, the necessity becomes apparent to every thinking mind for the "Kinsman" to possess the power to bestow natural as well as spiritual life; otherwise the majority of the race must perish through no fault of theirs, but in consequence of this weak spot in the plan. Let us thank Heaven that such weakness is all in men's theories, as the next two verses will abundantly prove. "Wonder not at this (at the principles laid down for they will be demonstrated), because an hour comes in which all those in the tombs will hear his voice and will come forth: those having done good things, to a resurrection of life, and those having done evil things to a resurrection of judgment."

This paper is headed "A KEY TO JOHN v: 28, 29," and now that we have reached, in our investigation, the designated verses, so plain and obvious does their import appear in the light of what precedes them, that nothing more seems necessary to be said. But lest some inattentive reader should still be wondering why a class, acknowledged as doers of evil, should be raised to judgment, with all that word intrinsically means; first, a trial, and then a decision, with its results, instead of being raised for punishment, which is the last act of judgment when it results in condemnation? I remark: We have already seen that the only way that any member of the race can be fitted up so as to make it possible for him to "do good," is through the power of the regenerating principle deposited in the Second Adam; all others "do evil" as a result of their connection with the first Adam only. "That which is born of the flesh is flesh"; and "they that are in the flesh cannot please God." Now to resurrect them (or leave them in the grave) for punishment, is to punish them for being born of the first Adam, unless it is claimed that they have all had an opportunity to avail themselves of the remedy provided in the Second Adam, to help them out of the flesh into the spirit. This idea no sane mind will, in the light of facts, for a moment entertain.

How then can this lack of opportunity to obtain what is so essential be explained only on the principle named by Paul: "The earnest expectation of the creature (all mankind; Prof. Wilson) waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God." On this very principle Christ did not pray for the world, but only for those who had been given him out of the world, for they only were having their final trial, or judgment, the result of which is the resurrection to life brought to view in the 29th verse. And those deemed worthy to obtain that resurrection of the dead cannot die any more; for they are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection named. In other words, that principle of spiritual life which had previously renovated their moral nature, at last takes hold of the physical, and changes it from mortal to immortality. This change, it is my settled conviction, is an attainment that will only be reached by the bride, "which is his body, the church," that she may be like her head, and fitted for that close union, and familiar association with the Father, "who only hath [underived] immortality," and his only begotten Son, "the first-born among many (adopted) brethren," which such a relationship implies.

Let me close by asking those who talk as though they thought the exceptionably severe preparation of the bride for her position, will hardly say if the world is to have a probationary existence afterward. Is it nothing that the Royal Bridegroom will in that day acknowledge his Bride before the Father and his holy angels? Is it nothing to be received as an honored member into such a family circle?

PRE-MILLENNARIANISM.

THE ARGUMENTS OF PROF. BRIGGS AND "THE NEW YORK EVANGELIST" AGAINST IT EXAMINED.

BY P. ALLING.

In the Second Advent movement of about forty years ago there was an "eye to see and an ear to hear" upon this great subject. There was then (as well as now) laborers in the field whom the Lord honored and blessed with a large measure of His Spirit wherever they went. The proclamation then made stirred up all classes to inquire and to search the Scriptures "to see if those things were so." Many honest-hearted and devoted Christians from the various denominations believed—as also not a few of their ministers—its truthfulness, and were quickened and greatly blessed in its reception and in aiding forward the work. These things were witnessed by the orthodox churches of the land, which brought to the front the presidents and the learned professors of the theological institutions of the denomination, with the D.D.'s and other clergy in hostile array against it. Prof. Stewart, of Andover, Mass., took the lead, and threw out his "Hints upon Prophecy," assuming that all the periods and the events, measured by those of the Book of Daniel, had their fulfilment prior to and in the wars of Antiochus Epiphanus against the Jews and Jerusalem; and those of Revelation were fulfilled by Nero and other Roman emperors of the first century, and that the prophecies of Christ, pertaining to his second coming, in Matt xxiv., Mark xiii., and of Luke xvii. 21., were all fulfilled at the destruction of Jerusalem.

These interpretations were endorsed by, and echoed and re-echoed throughout the land by all classes of the clergy, as an effectual quietus to his hated doctrine.

The promulgation of such arguments were, to honest and intelligent minds, much as expressed by Prof. Charles Finney, when asked why he did not stand up with President Mahan and Profs. Coles and Morgan in their opposition to Elder Charles Fitch when he discussed this question with them in 1842 at Oberlin, replied: "Their arguments are so weak I am ashamed of them." This opposition continued till after the time movement of 1843-4 passed, when their mode of warfare was changed to a dead silence. From that time to the calling of the Prophetic Conference last summer, they were apparently as lifeless as the turtle with its head and feet drawn in under its shell; but the announcement of that meeting and its action was, to them, like applying a coal of fire to the turtle's back, which at once stirred up the latent fire of opposition to this doctrine. This renewed energy brought again to the front the same class of learned professors and of D.D.'s and other clergy, armed with weapons quite different from their predecessors. It is true that in their published history of Pre-millennarianism they have jumped entirely over this eventful epoch as beneath their notice (as also did the New York Prophetic Conference); yet, nevertheless, their former inglorious defeat is not forgotten. That experience taught them this long-to-be remembered lesson, that the literal reading of the inspired word is hard testimony to confute or twist, so as to make it teach an opposite doctrine from its natural import. This fact has led them to adopt this very remarkable mode of warfare, both aggressive and defensive, of dispensing entirely with Bible testimony, and to substitute in its place the historic faith and action of the Church, with her councils, decrees and confessions of faith, as proof positive why ortho-doxy should now repudiate this doctrine and not allow its introduction into their respective churches. Very soon after the publication of the call for that conference Prof. Briggs (of Princeton, N. J., if I mistake not) commenced a series of articles in the New York Evangelist (the accredited organ of the Presbyterian Church of the United States) against this doctrine, predicated wholly upon the standards of the Church, and ended in the number of the 9th January last. In the same number appeared an editorial endorsement of the Professor's arguments and conclusions as follows: "We hold to the doctrines and standards of the Presbyterian Church—the grand old historical faith"—and adds: "That the reader may understand precisely the points which Prof. Briggs claims to have established we restate them here: 1st. That the Westminster standards, in their historic sense, excludes Pre-millennarianism from orthodoxy. 2d. That the Reformers and scholastic divines of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries repudiated Pre-millennarianism. 3d. That the Ante-Nicene Church excluded Chiliasm by its various creeds, liturgies and Church authorities, and that the Post-Nicene Church knew nothing of it, except in a few heretics and obscure men, and that it was buried for a millennium of Church history. 4th. That ancient Chiliasm originated in Jewish and Ebonite Apocalypses, and that while it has been held in moderation by a few respected divines in ancient and modern times, yet its historic recurrence has been in connection with such heresies as Montanism, Anabaptism, the Fifth Monarch, Irvingism and Plymouthism. 5th. That the men in the late Prophetic Conference have set themselves in antagonism to the Evangelical Churches, by charging them with declension from vital doctrine and heresy, and through the organization of a permanent committee for the propagation of such a type of Pre-millennarianism as has ever been, and must now be, condemned by the historic churches."

The editor generously offered a limited reply to some few of the champions of this faith, but confined them "strictly to the historical question, and not to depart from it even to discuss the Bible argument." In subsequent numbers of that paper is published Prof. Craven's reply (who was a prominent member of the New York Conference) to Prof. Briggs' historic statements, and makes some important corrections, particularly in relation to the composition and action of the Westminster assembly in relation to this subject. From which it appears that, instead of that assembly excluding this doctrine, it was tolerated; that its moderator and quite a number of its members were Pre-millennarians, whose councils were in high repute. In the number of February 13, Prof. Craven quotes from the standards of the Westminster Confessions the following: "All synods or councils, since the apostles' times, whether general or particular, may err, and many have erred; therefore they are not to be made the rule of faith or practice, but to be used as a help to both." "The teachings of our 'standards' is that the first, the highest, the only infallible standard of our Church is the word of God." He also shows that for the first 200 years after Christ no other doctrine than the personal coming and reign of Christ during the millennium was known to the churches. He further shows that the declensions of the next two centuries and departures from this and other Bible doctrines laid the foundation for the development of the papal apostasy, etc. Now, as Prof. Briggs makes the Ante and the Post-Nicene Council the historic basis of his "historic church" to disprove Chiliasm (as specified in the editor's statement, No. 3), of course his historic church of that epoch, and onward for "a millennium," must necessarily include not only the basis of the papal apostasy, but also its superstructure, for at least one thousand years of its palmiest days! This claim certainly places the orthodox historic churches of that age, as well as of the present day, that have and do repudiate and condemn millennarianism upon such testimony in very bad company, and, if thus found in the final day, must be sharers with the mother Church in the judgments written against her.

Mark this. If the mother Church is to be condemned for the liberty she has taken of exalting the decrees and confessions of the Church above the Word of God, and then of trying and condemning as heretical doctrines, drawn from the Bible itself by those Church historical standards, was wrong, why is it not equally wrong for her protesting offspring to do the same thing?

Such action is at variance with their own acknowledged confession (above quoted), "that the first, the highest, the only infallible standard of our Church is the Word of God." By this standard are all honest-hearted, truth-loving and godly millennarians willing and desirous of being tried, but by no other. Till they thus do we, as a people, cannot be convicted from Pre-millennarianism, which they call heresy. We must continue to hold to "the doctrines and standards" of the Church of the living God as defined by Christ' its living Head, and His holy apostles. This, we believe, is just as much better than the standards of the historical Church, as God is greater and wiser than men.

Norwalk, Ohio, Feb. 27, 1879.

I give the following as an ingenious exposition without indorsing it. The text is surrounded with difficulties whatever view is taken of it. The following has as few, perhaps, as any other.—EDITOR OF EXAMINER.

THE SON OF MAN JUDGING THE NATIONS.

Our purpose now is to substitute an interpretation of Matthew xxv., which shall be free from the difficulties of the ordinary view. We hope to show that the entire paragraph applies not to the dead but to the living.

There are three classes of persons before us: those whom Christ calls his brethren, those He calls sheep, and those He calls goats.

Those whom Christ calls his brethren. We first inquire into their state, position, and circumstances outwardly, at or just before the appearance of Christ upon the throne of his glory. All this is by fair implication denoted by their having been hungry, thirsty, naked, strangers, sick, and in prison, representing a complication of unparalleled troubles, distresses and tribulations. Can we find in Scripture any people represented to be in those very distressing circumstances in the latter days of the present dispensation? For to such days obviously the prophecy refers. In Jeremiah xxx. are the following words in relation to the Jews: "Wherefore do I see every man with his hands on his loins, as a woman in travail, and all faces are turned into paleness? Alas, for that day is great; so that none is like it. It is even the time of Jacob's trouble, but he shall be saved out of it." This last clause forbids the application of the prophecy to anything in past history relating to that people, and must therefore point to the future.

To the same time reference is made in Daniel: "And at that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth up for the children of thy people; and there shall be a time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation even to that time; and at that time shall thy people be delivered; every one that shall be found written in the book." Now, every Christian knows that the prophet Daniel was a Jew—that at the time he wrote the Scriptures only recognized two divisions of mankind, Jews and Gentiles, that by "his people" was meant the Jewish people, and that at the time when Jerusalem was destroyed by the Romans, though it was a time of great trouble, yet that they were not then delivered, but were (those of them who survived the destruction) enslaved, and scattered among the nations and therefore that this prophecy remains to be fulfilled. The time of unparalleled trouble of Daniel's people is the time when they are to be delivered from the hands of all their enemies, and that by the coming and miraculous interposition of their long-rejected Messiah, leaving us to infer that the trouble will be the means of leading them to look for his appearing, and preparing them for saying: "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord."

Now, to this time the Saviour refers in Matthew xxiv., a chapter which ought not to have been separated from chapter xxv., as they are one continued discourse. What can be a fitter description of this time of trouble to these people than that which represents them as hungry, and having nothing to eat, as thirsty and having nothing to drink, as strangers and having none to take them in, as naked and having no clothing to put on, as sick and having none to visit them, and in prison and no one to come unto them? If this be not a description of a complication of calamities of a time and state of the unparalleled trouble, we know not what is. Here then is a prophetic description of a people looking, as to their outward state and circumstances, very much like those whom the Saviour calls "brethren." His brethren they are literally, according to the flesh.

The cause of this time of unequalled trouble to them will be their taking shelter under the power of one who will arrogantly assume the prerogatives of the Messiah. "I (said Christ, to the Jews) am come in MY FATHER'S name, and ye receive me not; if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive." (John v. 43.) In this passage the Saviour speaks conditionally. He does not affirm that another will come in his own name, but if one should thus come he would be received by the Jews. From other parts of Scripture, however, we learn that there is one to come "in his own name," and who is described as a monster, or beast, with several heads and horns, energized by Satan, and upon pain of death claiming the homage which belongs to God only, by whose tyranny will be developed the great tribulation through which the Jews as a body will have to pass. This is the last great "Antichrist," even as admitted by post-millennial commentators. Great allowance must be made for the old writers who supposed him to be the Pope of Rome. Antichrists, in the sense of opposition to Christ's authority, there have been in all ages; antichrists in this sense there are now, and many of them, and mixed up with all the professing Christian sects throughout Christendom, and in this sense most of the Popes of Rome have been antichrists for many centuries; but the antichrist is yet to come. How soon he may come or reveal himself it is impossible to say. But the present unsettled state of things all over the world seems to indicate the approach of the dreadful crisis called by the prophet Daniel "a time of trouble" to his people, such as they and their forefathers had never known before. And this, we believe, is the time referred to by the Saviour in the last paragraph of Matt. xxv., and that the people of whom Daniel wrote was the people whom he calls his brethren.

He says nothing here of the antichrist, or of the subordinate kings with him, or their armies, or of their doom. These matters are revealed in other parts of Scripture. They being guilty of direct acts of cruelty toward the brethren of Christ will by His coming be cut down at one stroke. These the Lord shall consume by the Spirit of his mouth, and destroy by the brightness of his coming. We would, however, notice that the Lord makes mention of no place where the gathering of all nations shall be. But in the last chapter of the prophecy of Joel the place of gathering is mentioned, and the object of it, and all in favor of Israel and Judah in the future. "For, behold, in those days and at that time, when I shall bring again the captivity of Judah and Jerusalem, I will also gather all nations, and I will bring them down into the valley of Jehosaphat, and will plead with them there for my people, and for my heritage, Israel, whom they have scattered among the nations, and parted my land." And if you attentively consider the remainder of the chapter, you will see that the whole scene, as to place, refers to Mount Zion and Jerusalem, which we understand literally and as to persons, refers to Judah and Israel, which we also understand literally; and that this prophecy points to the future is obvious from the great moral change to be produced upon the minds and hearts of the Jews when they shall be again fully recognized as the people of God, and Christ will not be ashamed to call them his brethren.

We do not say that the prophecy of Joel and that of the Saviour are identical, only in this that both relate to living nations, and not to the dead. The prophecy of Joel, no doubt, refers to the great Antichristian confederacy, and is identical with the slaughter of Gog, as described in Ezek. xxxix., and the battle of Armageddon, described in the Revelation, and which will end in the total defeat of the assembled hosts, and the casting of the antichristian beast and false prophet alive into the lake of fire.

But in immediate connection with this there are other nations to be dealt with, namely, those who in the time of Jacob's trouble sympathized with them, and those who withheld their sympathy. In Ezek. xxxix., after describing the great slaughter of the open enemies of Israel, it is added: "And I will set My glory among the heathen, and all the heathen shall see my judgment that I have executed, and my hand that I have laid upon them." And in verse 27, the Lord, referring to Israel, speaks of being sanctified in them in the sight of many nations. And the same thing is said at the close of the preceding chapter: so that even after the great slaughter there will be many nations still in existence. And these we submit are the persons referred to, and not the dead, by the Lord when he says of himself: "Then shall He sit upon the throne of His glory, and before him shall be gathered all nations, and He shall separate them, the one from the other, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats," &c. This gathering it is fair to assume will be a national gathering, but whether the separation will be national is not stated. But as soon as the separation is made, those on the right are called "sheep," and those on the left are called "goats," to denote their conduct towards those whom Christ calls his "brethren."

To those on the right hand He says, as the King: "Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." A great deal might here be said about the "kingdom" in relation to which we are persuaded there are very great errors in the minds of millions of professing Christians. Here is a subject which would furnish matter for many articles. All we understand here by the expression "the kingdom," is what the disciples meant when they said to their Master; "Lord, wilt Thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" Mark the word "again," and you are carried back to the days of David and Solomon, when the kingdom of Israel was high above all other kingdoms, was in fact the head of all other kingdoms, and was as much an outward literal kingdom as are the kingdoms of England, France, and Russia in our day. That this kingdom of Israel will be restored, or again restored, ought to be no matter of doubt to any man who takes the Scriptures for his guide. The prophecies on this head are too numerous to be quoted or even referred to. And there never would have been any doubt on this subject had it not been for the practice of "spiritualising" the proper names of persons and places to answer sectarian and pre-conceived views on this head. We understand by the kingdom of which the Saviour speaks the kingdom of Israel restored, and that not in mystery but in open manifestation, as in the days of David and Solomon.

The disciples asked Jesus about the restoration of the kingdom; no one need be at any loss to understand what they meant. Unquestionably they meant the literal kingdom of Israel upon earth, as it existed in the days of David and Solomon, both of whom were illustrious types of Him who is destined to be the King of the restored kingdom, and at the same time the King of all the kingdoms of the earth. If such a restoration literally was never intended we are perfectly satisfied the Saviour would have told the disciples so. But such a restoration does not rest upon the silence of the Saviour; there are hosts of prophecies which prove that such will be the case. But the restoration of the kingdom implies something more than the restoration of the Jews to their own land, something more than the building of the City of Jerusalem, and the Temple. All this may be done in their own strength, or under the patronage of the Antichrist, whom, coming in his own name, they will receive. All this then, is evidence from prophecy to show what they will do in a state of self-righteousness, and unbelief, and thereby bring upon themselves the trouble spoken of by Daniel, and alluded to by the Saviour himself, through the instrumentality of which, under the mighty working of the Holy Spirit, they will be enlightened as a people; and then comes the restoration of the kingdom with all the earthly blessings promised. Israel will again be recognized as the people of God, again be received into God's favor and friendship. And what will such a receiving of them be, but life from the dead, both to them and the Gentile nations who shall survive the great slaughter which shall introduce the millennial age?—Selected.

THE RAISING OF LAZARUS.

THE miracles of Christ were illustrations of the truths he taught; or rather they were the facts upon which his teachings were based. We are prone to theorise, and having prepared our theories we adapt the facts to suit them. The truer way is to deal in facts and let theories and doctrines spring from them.

Man is dependent and subject to many limitations, but one of the most definite lines which mark the limitation of human powers is the line of life. Men can invent, plan, contrive, adapt, produce, perfect, and discover, but they cannot give life. Wisdom, wealth, and power alike stand dumb and helpless in the presence of this great problem. All the engineers, mechanics, architects, and inventors of the world could not produce a living fly. All the sages, philosophers, theorists, alchemists, and scientists that the earth has ever seen, could not give life to a single worm. All the kings, princes, potentates, millionaires, and statesmen of the world could not give life to a weed, a leaf, or a plant. All of these men together, with all the resources of the world at their command, could not restore to life a dead insect.

"The Father hath life in Himself," and we are not to trust in ourselves, but in "God which raiseth the dead." Ancient philosophers, poets, and sages dreamed and guessed and hoped for some sort of future existence. The necessities of justice and the inequality of human affairs led them, nay, almost compelled them to believe that somehow in the future, earth's wrongs would be righted, and this thought made future existence a necessity. But the idea that man once dead should be restored, re-vivified, brought back from dust and darkness and decay, was too grand for their minds to grasp, too distant for their eyes to see. It lies outside the domain of science, reason, and human discovery. It is only revealed through the illumination of the eternal Spirit, and the revelation of Him who has "abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel."

Our Saviour did not spend much time arguing about the resurrection of the dead. It is true He confuted the Sadducees by a quotation from the writings of Moses, teaching them that the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob was not a God of mere names, nor of mouldering clods and mummied forms reposing in Machpelah's cave, but that they, his servants, his friends, his children, hear his call and come forth at his command. In clear and definite statements our Lord predicted his own resurrection; but his words were as idle tales to the careless multitude, and even his own disciples only learned to read them aright in the light of the resurrection morning. But there were certain facts that occurred during His ministry, of a character which could not be mistaken, which tended to set the matter in its true light.

One day as Christ was busy healing and teaching there came a ruler begging his help and saying: "My little daughter lieth at the point of death." The Saviour turned to go to her relief, but there were thronging multitudes surrounding him, and helpless ones beseeching his aid, and trembling hands stretched forth to touch the hem of his garment, and He tarried by the way until at length a messenger came to the anxious father saying: "Thy daughter is dead; why troublest thou the Master any further?" But from the lips of Jesus there was no utterance of regret or exclamation of sorrow, but the gracious word: "Fear not: believe only, and she shall be made whole." And then going to the desolate home and looking on the little maiden, He said she is not dead, but only asleep, and when "they laughed him to scorn, knowing that she was dead," He excluded from the room the mourners who were filling the air with plaints and wailings, and then speaking in the same language in which her mother used to call her daughter in the morning, "Talitha cumi," the little girl arose, death was vanquished, and the captive restored; for at last One had come who could do what man unaided had never been able to accomplish.

Again we see the Saviour drawing near to the little city of Nain, and as he approaches it a funeral procession comes forth, bearing the body of a young man, an only son, followed by his widowed mother, broken-hearted and distressed. What a meeting! Christ the Prince of Life, and death, the king of terrors, face to face! Death dragging away the captive, Christ interposing His life-giving word. He commands them to set down the bier, and then at that word, "Young man, I say unto thee, arise!" the pallor of death departs, the glow of health steals on the leaden countenance, the closed eyes open, and look wonderingly on the scene, and in a moment the boy is clasped in his mother's arms. That funeral procession went no farther, but on the ear of the "Father of the fatherless" and the "Judge of widows" arose such a thanksgiving as mortals do not often hear.

But the most remarkable instance of Christ's victory over death, aside from his own resurrection, occurred at the little village of Bethany. There in that quiet home of Martha and Mary, where Jesus found congenial spirits, loving hearts, gentle hands, and the quiet which he longed for in the midst of care and toil and turmoil, the two sisters watched by their brother's sick and dying bed. Away beyond Jordan they sent a messenger to the gracious Master, saying: "He whom Thou lovest is sick." The answer came: "This sickness is not unto death, but for the glory of God, that the Son of God might be glorified thereby." And the messenger brought back the gracious word, but "Jesus abode two days still in the same place where he was." Meanwhile the sisters watched and waited until their brother heaved his last sigh, and left them in anguish and desolation.

At length the master said: "Our friend Lazarus sleepeth; but I go, that I may awake him out of sleep." And so at last, calmly and leisurely, he made his way to Bethany, and found that Lazarus had lain in the grave four days already. The quiet cottage was a house of mourning; sympathizing friends gathered to comfort the afflicted sisters; but Martha, as she heard that Jesus was coming, went out to meet him with words that told the sorrow of her anguished heart: "Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died." And yet mid the shadows the lights of faith were shining, for she said: "I know that even now, whatsoever thou wilt ask of God, God will give it thee." "Jesus saith unto her, thy brother shall rise again. Martha saith unto him, I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection, at the last day. Jesus said unto her, I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth on me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die. Believest thou this? She saith unto him, Yea, Lord: I believe that thou art the Christ, the Son of God, which should come into the world. And when she had so said she went her way, and called Mary her sister secretly, saying, The Master is come, and calleth for thee."

When Mary heard the tidings that the Master was so near, she rose up hastily and went out, followed by her friends who said: "She goeth unto the grave to weep there." She hurried to the presence of the teacher, and "when she was come where Jesus was, and saw him, she fell down at his feet, saying unto him, Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died." Sympathizing with her in her sorrow, sharing the griefs of those who were around him, taking upon his own soul the burdens of the bereaved and broken-hearted world, which weeps and wails above its dead, "Jesus wept," and groaned in spirit; but when they came to the cave on which the stone was laid, he said: "Take ye away the stone." Martha shrank from the loathsomeness of death and decay, but Jesus said unto her: "Said I not unto thee, that, if thou wouldst believe, thou shouldst see the glory of God? Then they took away the stone from the place where the dead was laid. And Jesus lifted up his eyes and said, Father, I thank thee that thou hast heard me. And I know that thou hearest me always: but because of the people which stand by I said it, that they may believe that thou hast sent me, and when he thus had spoken, he cried with a loud voice, LAZARUS, COME FORTH! And he that was dead came forth, bound hand and foot with grave clothes: and his face was bound about with a napkin. Jesus saith unto them, Loose him, and let him go." On the instant friendly hands tore from his limbs the bandages of the tomb, and Lazarus went free in life and strength once more. "Then many of the Jews which came to Mary, and had seen the things which Jesus did, believed on him."

There was no theorising on this subject, no discussion, no disputation. There was simply the fact! Lazarus dead and in the grave, Lazarus living and in his home. The Jews did not attempt to argue the case while the living Lazarus was before their eyes. Nothing but the death of Jesus and the death of Lazarus would avail them now. They had passed beyond the realm of speculation and argument, and were dealing with facts. And when six days before the passover the family of Bethany made him a supper and Martha served, and Lazarus sat by his side, and Mary poured her precious ointment on his feet and wiped them with the hair of her head, there was a fact which no subtlety of logic could evade and which no shrewdness of argument could dissipate. At last the King of Life had come, the Conqueror of death was among them. He who rebuked disease and banished pain, and hushed the storms, and ruled the winds, and calmed the waves, also had power to batter down death's mightiest dungeon gates, and call slumberers from their graves to life.

And when a few days afterward Christ hung upon the cross and heard the jeering cry, "He saved others, himself he cannot save"; when he went down into the darkness of the tomb and came forth again in glorious life and immortality, he laid the foundation for that faith which, despite the oppositions of science, the questionings of scepticism, and the contradictions of unbelief, still says with a voice that echoes through the ages, "I believe in the resurrection of the dead!" Precious faith, blessed hope! Infidelity may write above the graves of those it loves: "Death is an eternal sleep," but Christ hath said to Martha of Bethany, "Thy brother shall rise again;" and faith inscribes upon the tombs of those who rest in Christ and rest in hope, "The trumpet shall sound, the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed."—Selected.

HALF HOUR STUDIES OF SCRIPTURE. NO. II.

"There shall be no more curse."—Rev. xxii: 3.

THESE words of prophetic import from the inspired lips of the beloved disciple were designed to show us the final victory over evil in the restoration of our world to its paradisiac condition. It presents to us the grand consummation—the fullest realization of the Christian's hopes and prayers.

Made "in the image of God," man was the crowning work of creation—a perfectly intelligent earthly being. Although man was the master-piece of all created perfection, yet, as a moral agent, possessing a perfect free will, he could only attain moral perfection upon which depended eternal existence, by the development of a perfect moral character under the discipline afforded by probation. Nor are we left without a pattern of such perfection. Christ in his sermon on the mount sets before us the character of God as in all respects the pattern of perfection, and tells us that "the pure in heart" shall be blessed as privileged to "see God"—i. e., to dwell with him.

We must admit (1) that God had a well formed purpose in creation; (2) that he has not lost sight of that purpose for a single moment in the permission of all that has occurred since the first act of creation; and (3) that evil in all its dire consequences can do nothing to defeat that purpose. God will finally be the victorious party in the fullest sense.

The removal of the curse which John saw in vision on the Isle of Patmos, was clearly foreshadowed in that germinal promise given in Eden, that the seed of the woman shall bruise (literally crush) the serpent's head.—Gen. iii: 15. Man fell and the present state of disorder was introduced by the serpent's influence; and therefore, when God reveals his determination to destroy the agent of the evil, it is in substance a promise of the removal of the evil which came thereby. In other words, in this germinal promise God reveals his purpose to finally achieve a complete victory over evil which can only be accomplished by its utter destruction. In just so far as evil fails of being removed will God fail of triumph over it. Whatever had a beginning may have an end. Then how futile to believe that evil is immortal, and hence will forever war against God and goodness. God only hath immortality, and from him must all immortality spring. He is the fountain head of immortality and light and goodness. Then how fallacious to assert that evil is immortal when in every feature it is antagonistic to and unlike the fountain-head of immortality. And so we cannot for a moment think of failure on the part of God to completely remove the curse; and the conclusion is forced upon us that whatever evil has come into the world through the serpent's influence, "the seed of the woman" (Christ) will utterly destroy. The First Adam has done nothing that the Second Adam will not completely and forever undo. "For this purpose the Son of God was manifested that he might destroy the works of the devil.—1 John iii: 8. Therefore, unless the Son of God fails to accomplish the purpose for which he was sent into the world, evil will finally be eradicated from the universe, and there shall be no more curse." SENEX.

"CONCERNING THE KINGDOM OF GOD."

BY D. J. ELLSWORTH.

It is recorded of our Saviour, and of His apostles, "that they went about preaching and teaching the things concerning the kingdom of God." This is a simple fact, about which there is no dispute.

I will now state another fact, which is accepted and believed by the readers of the BIBLE EXAMINER, and in so doing anticipate that a great truth is coming out, which I believe will prove an antidote to the jarring and conflicting opinions and theories, as regards the fulfilment of prophecy in the past, as well as to what is being done in our own day.

The fact, in addition, is that the kingdom of God was not set up in the apostles' day, nor has it been set up since, but is an event to be accomplished at some time in the future.

Such being the case, the utterances of our Saviour and of his apostles, of things that would hold, or have place in that kingdom, also termed the "Day of the Lord," can have no literal fulfilment whatever in this present dispensation.

The same stubborn fact also holds in regard to what all the old prophets prophesied, as recorded in the Old Testament, which did not have its fulfilment up to the time of the destruction of the Jewish state, and end of that dispensation.

For they testified of the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow," and were not cognizant of the Gospel dispensation, but looked forward and wrote of matters "concerning the kingdom of God" and "Day of the Lord."

In this light the conflicting interpretations and diverse understandings concerning the visions of Daniel, as to time and application will vanish; for he was made to see things by vision, which should have their fulfilment upon his people in the "last end of the indignation," for "AT THE TIME OF THE END—THE VISION." What profound blindness has been upon us in the past, that we have placed a partial or even the beginning of their fulfilment at a period hundreds of years before the latter days began.

The angel comes to Daniel to show him what should befall his people in the latter days; tells him the time appointed was long; that it should take place in the last end of the indignation; that the vision he was seeing should be in the time of the end, and so on of like import, fixing it so plain and decided that Daniel or any one else need not to stumble over it, and lo! what has been done in our day by the wisdom of men?

Simply to begin the fulfilment of these visions away back in the time of Queen Esther, hundreds of years before the latter days began! Daniel, in contemplation of the vision, sees a "ram" performing a certain act, and the angel in explanation tells him that "the ram which thou sawest having two horns are the kings of Media and Persia." And then we take that word "are" and sweep the vision back a few thousand years, and say, it refers to the then reigning kings of Media and Persia!

What consummate stupidity we have developed in the past! May the good Lord deliver us all. We need just such a deliverance in these days that we may not be disappointed at the failure of beautiful spun arguments and theories of past interpretation on this line.

As for me, I had much rather "right about face," humbling though it may be to confess to being in error, than hold on to popular, pet theories, and train with the multitude. We may unlearn rapidly if we are willing and ready to follow our convictions. It may be very much in these matters as it is in many other things brought to our notice; we believe, if we are a mind to, or do not, if we are unwilling. Let us watch and see if it is not so. Truth may come to us through a despised channel, but let us appropriate it; it is gain to us; and give credit to whom credit is due.

I will now notice some other Scriptures which open up in a clear light, heretofore I could not understand. I turn to Ezek. xviii. 4: "The soul that sinneth, it shall die."

The Lord had just asked the prophet concerning a proverb then in use among His people; and this was it: "The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge." And the Lord declares that the occasion for that proverb should cease.

Might it be in five years, or five thousand? The time has not come yet; but we can see its place in the "day of the Lord." Much of the psalms are written "for the time to come." The Psalmist saw the "day of the Lord" afar off, and prophesied wonderful things concerning it. He saw the great central orb of prophecy—the Morning Star, the lineal descendant of his royal line—sitting upon his throne, ruling and reigning and executing justice and judgment in the earth. He could glory in such an one and realize the paucity of his own attempt at government not only of himself, but of a single nation. He also had great travail of soul, but shall yet see and be satisfied. Hear him: "O clap your hands, all ye people, shout unto God with the voice of triumph; for the Lord most high is terrible; he is a great King over all the earth. He shall subdue the people under us, and the nations under our feet. He shall choose our inheritance for us, the excellency of Jacob, whom he loved." "God is gone up with a shout; the Lord with the sound of the trumpet. Sing praises to God, sing praises; sing praises unto our King, sing praises." "For God is the King of all the earth; sing praises with understanding." "God reigneth over the heathen; God sitteth upon the throne of His holiness." "The princes of the people are gathered together; even the people of the God of Abraham; for the shields of the earth belong unto God; He is greatly exalted." "The mighty God, even the Lord hath spoken, and called the earth from the rising of the sun unto the going down thereof. Out of Zion, the perfection of beauty, God hath shined. Our God shall come, and shall not keep silence; a fire shall devour before Him, and it shall be very tempestuous round about Him. He shall call to the heavens from above, and to the earth, that He may judge His people. Gather my saints together unto me; those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifice."

Such is a sample of the glorious anthem the inspired psalmist sung of this "day of the Lord" whereof we write. There need be no mistaking its place in the history of the world, although written in advance.

I will now call the reader's attention to the "revelation" made to St. John by our Saviour after his ascension. The apostle writes, "I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day." Now, if we all could get in the way of reading the Bible as we read all other books, i.e., in a common sense and natural understanding of it, it seems to me we should get at the truth much sooner and easier than we do. But this passage under consideration must be distorted to read like this: The Spirit of the Lord was in me on a Sunday morning, and then the fulfilment of it brought about at once, and some part of it carried back over sixty years before it was given, and that, too, right in the face of what is said in the beginning of fourth chapter where the scene is transferred to another locality, and a representation given of events which should take place hereafter. We have something parallel to it in the viii., xxxvii. and xl. chapters of Ezek.; but we as a people have such an abhorrence of "spiritism," that perhaps in these cases we had rather believe that the prophet was carried away bodily hundreds of miles than that he was in a "trance state" and saw in vision what was taking place far away in the land of Israel.

It is true that St. Paul, in his own case, when he received his revelation, expressed a doubt as to whether he was carried away bodily or not; but he was so completely lost to himself in rapture and the experience of the revelation was so new and wonderful to him, it is no wonder that he should say that he did not know whether he was in the body or out of it.

The foregoing is submitted to the candid consideration of the readers of the BIBLE EXAMINER. The writer attaches a deal of importance to it; it has weighed upon his mind for years, been presented several times through the EXAMINER, and challenges any one to prove the falsity of the position. Truth is what I am after, let it cost what it may.

DARKNESS AND SUNRISE.

"My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death."
—Jesus.

"He is not here; he is risen."—The angel's announcement.

How feebly we can realize the depth of the shadows of approaching darkness which hung over Gethsemane like a mighty pavilion when the Son of God, earth's light and joy, went there to pray, as just before him lay the dark valley of death into which he must enter! How did Peter and James and John see and realize the sad, deep and painful emotions of their beloved Lord and Master when he bid them to tarry while he went out and prayed, telling them, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death." Their eyes were heavy, sleep having captured their senses; for had even a single shadow of his sorrow reached their hearts he would not have been left alone in this sad hour without a ray of comfort and sympathy, and he would not have returned to find them asleep.

Here commenced the sad hour of earth's darkness. The gloom even enveloped his heart companions. When they should have watched with their loving and heart-burdened Lord, instead "their eyes were heavy," and they were in the mighty embrace of sleep. Finally he tells them, "Sleep on now, and take your rest; it is enough, the hour is come."

The Son of God prays, but the bitter cup cannot pass from him. The shadows of the dark valley hover over his soul. None can bear the agony for him. His friends—his heart companions, those to whom he would naturally look for comfort and sympathy—are sound asleep. They neither see the gathering gloom nor know his sorrow. He must drink the cup alone, even to its dregs.

As the darkness deepens the painful shadows of the cross rise up before him. The Jews become his accusers and the Romans his executioners. Faint from carrying his cross and sick at heart with their tortures, in his loneliness and sorrow his disciples forsook him. To darken his glory and blast his name he is nailed to the cross between two malefactors. The forces of nature seem combined to crush him. The sun withdraws his light, rolls back his chariot and midnight darkness spreads her mantle of sackcloth over his brilliant disc, and the world is shrouded in mourning. Earthquakes shake the universe, the rocks are rent, graves are opened, and all nature seems convulsed as the great, magnanimous Sufferer expires. Did ever such darkness shroud the world? Nay, nor will again.

But this is not all. Though he was left to die alone, yet loving hands assist to entomb him. He finds a resting place in a newly-made sepulchre. Men trained on the tented field—trained from childhood to face the fiery shafts of battle, and who knew not what it was to quail before any danger—Roman soldiers, whose business it was to die, were placed to guard the sacred tomb and hold the Son of man in death. But "An angel's arm can't snatch him from the grave; legions of angels can't confine him there."

The scene changes. The guardian angel of Jesus once more wings his way through space from the eternal throne. An earthquake shakes creation in announcement of his descent. He stood before the tomb of the holy sleeper. "He rolled back the stone from the door of the sepulchre and sat upon it. His countenance was like lightning, and his raiment white as snow; and for fear of him, the keepers did shake and become as dead men."

When the Jews' Sabbath had ended, and while it was yet early in the morning upon the first day of the week, loving women came with sweet spices to honor the dead. "They came unto the sepulchre at the rising of the sun." While they were conversing among themselves as to who should roll away the great stone which closed the sepulchre, they looked and behold the stone was rolled away. Their perplexity and sorrow in failing to find the body of Jesus was soon turned into unspeakable joy. The two angelic messengers thrilled their hearts with the announcement, "He is not here; he is risen." Then remembered they with joy the words of Jesus that He must be delivered into the hands of sinful men, and be crucified, and the third day rise again.

Earth's sunrise had come. He that was dead had burst the bars of the tomb and is alive forever more. Sinful men had crucified him, loving hands had entombed him, but the power of God broke the chains of death, and the mighty captive came forth, triumphant over death and the grave as the Prince of Life. His disciples met him face to face, listened to his heavenly words with burning hearts. He walked with them, talked with them, ate with them, and finally opened their understanding as he expounded to them all the law and the prophets concerning himself. "And he said unto them, Thus it is written, and thus it behooved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day; and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem." This truly was earth's sunrise; and what was the darkness that preceded it compared with the resplendent light of salvation now illuminating our world! But as darkness precedes sunrise, and sunrise precedes the full-day light, so we are yet in but the early morning light of the glory of the ages to come.

But earth could not keep the conqueror of the grave. He found a glorious welcome at the right hand of the Father in heaven. Into his hands have been committed all power in heaven and earth. Like the nobleman he has gone into a far country, after giving each their work to do. But he will return. He assured us, "I go to prepare a place for you; and if I go to prepare a place for you I will come again, and receive you unto myself, that where I am there ye may be also." Blessed assurance! His loving disciples are to see him again. We shall behold his glorified brow. He will come again. His feet shall stand once more on Mount Olivet. His voice shall shake the earth and the dead shall come forth into his presence. Every eye shall see him and every tongue confess him Lord to the glory of God the Father. He is now our Mediator, our Advocate at the throne of God, but he will soon become our King on David's throne. SENEX.

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.

FROM ELDER J. S. LAWVER.

BRO. STORRS: Another load of well-digested thought has arrived in the ship EXAMINER; and, true enough, it is causing a revolution in theological circles—a revolution in thought; it has shaken Pagan Christianity (Churchianity) to the bottom. A few only will take heed and believe on the Lord Jesus "as the Scriptures have said: a few only will believe the record God gave of His Son, "that He hath given unto us eternal life, and this life is in His Son," and not inherently in us; I say, then, Churchianity does not believe on the Lord "as the Scripture hath said"; they do not "believe the record God gave of His Son"; for, Churchianity believes that they (the real man) are already immortal; therefore they cannot believe that it is in Jesus Christ to give them. They believe on Jesus, thinking thereby to keep out of everlasting torment; which, emphatically, is not what "the record" requires us to believe. I say therefore that they will end in "the ditch" with their blind teachers.

I warn all to believe the record God gave of

His Son: "And this is the record that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in His Son."—1 John v. 10-12. Take heed, remember, "if a man strive for masteries, yet is he not crowned except he strive lawfully?" (2 Tim. ii. 5) and forget not the admonition of God to Moses when he was "about to build the tabernacle: for see, saith He, that thou make all things according to the PATTERN showed thee in the mount."—Heb. viii. 5. Truth only will save; error never will, even if we be ever so pious and honest. Every person saved in this age will only be by a strict belief of the truth, and not some other truths or fables; therefore do not deceive yourselves. It does not say, "He that hath good intentions, and does the best he knows how, and is baptized shall be saved." But he that "believeth"—believeth what? "The record God gave of His Son," and not what He never gave, such as "Immortal-soulism" and "Spiritualism."

I have been a great sufferer from my boyhood, by a disease of the stomach. Some physicians call it "Neuralgia of the stomach," which gives me pain night and day, and causes me to be melancholy at times, and more so since in my present faith, when I look back over my work and see that preaching the "blessing of all nations" causes the breaking up earthly ties—disruption of human church organizations, and sets one neighbor against another, and husband against wife, etc.; it does not bring peace to the masses, collectively; but to individuals it does—great and deep peace, as a river; and an abiding confidence in the promises of God; showing that His love permeates every artery of all systems, and so knit together that you could not say, "This is system and that is love": but like that of pricking our bodies with a pin, blood would exude in any part thereof. So prick God's ways and works and the first thing that shows itself is LOVE.

Columbus, Kan., March 11, 1879.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—The idea that the "preaching 'the blessing of all nations' causes the breaking up earthly ties," etc., reminds me of the Saviour's words: "Think not that I am come to send peace on earth; I came not to send peace, but a sword; for I come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother," etc.—Matt. x. 34—read to verse 39. If we expect to make peace with world-loving men and women, and popular organizations, we will sooner or later find we have made a mistake and are not following our Lord, but have turned off the way of heirship to the kingdom of God and his Christ. Be kind to all men and women; return love for hate; but keep close to our Redeemer and Lord at whatever cost, if we would not have Him "ashamed" of us, at his return from heaven for his "jewels."

S. S. CALL, Iowa, writes: As I have been confined to the house by sickness for the last two weeks, but am now convalescent, I wish to tell you how I improved the time. First, I took my BIBLE EXAMINERS and reviewed them; and O what a flood of light they contained. They seemed to be all new, even to me. I supposed that I understood them, but I was astonished at my own stupidity and ignorance. Truly I ought to have charity for those who are out of the way; they not having the facilities or privileges that I have enjoyed. May God help us all to exercise charity towards our fallen brethren in helping them up and assisting them to a better understanding of God's purpose and designs, of blessing the world through Abraham and his seed.

DEATH STILL REIGNS.

My dear husband, BENJAMIN ELDRIDGE, departed this life Feb. 6th. As he was a constant reader of the BIBLE EXAMINER, I feel it a duty to let you know of his decease. He was not looking to go to sleep. He was always watching and praying that the Saviour would come. He was all ready to receive Him. His last prayer was, "Lord, receive me into thy everlasting kingdom," and fell asleep in the Saviour's arms, aged 78 years. My heart is sad, but my hope is strong, sure and steadfast that I shall meet him where parting is no more. He was a faithful watcher for the Saviour's coming for over 40 years, and he never became weary, but his hope grew stronger till the last.

MRS. ARMENIA C. ELDRIDGE,
Yarmouth Port, Mass., 1879.

Our Friend and brother, GIDEON R. LEDERER, of New York City, died Feb. 25th. He was a Hebrew, born in Hungary in 1804. His father was a Rabbi, and educated his son for the same position; but the son, after some experience, became satisfied that JESUS, though crucified, was the Christ, the King of Israel. After laboring some years as a Christian Missionary amongst the Jews in Hungary, and being arrested in his work by Jesuites, he left for England in 1853, and came to this country shortly after.

In the employ of the New York City Mission, his work was chiefly among his own people. His hearty sympathy with them and devotion to their welfare, won their respect and confidence, and they opened to him their houses, and in many cases their hearts, as he taught them out of Moses and the prophets, showing them that Christ must needs have suffered all these things, and entered into his glory; and that this Jesus, whom he preached unto them, is Christ.

Among his spiritual children are several Hebrew preachers of the Gospel. One of these is Bishop Shereshewsky, of the American Protestant Episcopal Mission in China, and translator of the Bible.

Brother Lederer believed the kingdom of God on earth to be nigh at hand; and he lived to see the beginning of the restoration of Israel.

He was a great sufferer in body, and endured hardships from those who should have treated him with kindness. But he rests from his labors and trials.

ED.

ELDER JACOB BLAIN, Buffalo, writes: Our beloved Bro. BENJAMIN ELDRIDGE sleeps in Jesus. He lived here most of his days, and was one of our oldest Advent brethren. Some two years since he removed to Yarmouth Port, Mass., where most of his relatives lived. He was 78 years of age, and was cured of deafness in January last. This gave him great joy; but in about a month he was cut down by disease of the kidneys, after suffering only 3 or 4 days. I know not that any Advent friends live there, so I send you this notice. He was a warm friend of the BIBLE EXAMINER. He died in the glorious hope of "the ages to come."

The Lord still prolongs my days, though afflicted with a general weakness which nearly prevents my going into the street; but I am free from pain and disease. For this I am thankful; but more specially so for the blessed hope given me as to the eternal future. This hope prevents life from yet being a burden, and leads me to praise God for my existence and the character of my being. My faith tells me "all must work for good." Though I can do but little more for our glorious cause, I still ask brethren to remember me, in my solitude, in my temporal wants; 87 years make my eyes dim, and I can read but little. This is my greatest trial at present. I again exhort brethren to sustain the BIBLE EXAMINER, as it gives us more valuable truths than any periodical I know of in Christendom; and I trust to die knowing it is sustained.

of God and his Christ. Be kind to all men and women; return love for hate; but keep close to our Redeemer and Lord at whatever cost, if we would not have Him "ashamed" of us, at his return from heaven for his "jewels."

S. S. CALL, Iowa, writes: As I have been confined to the house by sickness for the last two weeks, but am now convalescent, I wish to tell you how I improved the time. First, I took my BIBLE EXAMINERS and reviewed them; and O what a flood of light they contained. They seemed to be all new, even to me. I supposed that I understood them, but I was astonished at my own stupidity and ignorance. Truly I ought to have charity for those who are out of the way; they not having the facilities or privileges that I have enjoyed. May God help us all to exercise charity towards our fallen brethren in helping them up and assisting them to a better understanding of God's purpose and designs, of blessing the world through Abraham and his seed.

DEATH STILL REIGNS.

My dear husband, BENJAMIN ELDRIDGE, departed this life Feb. 6th. As he was a constant reader of the BIBLE EXAMINER, I feel it a duty to let you know of his decease. He was not looking to go to sleep. He was always watching and praying that the Saviour would come. He was all ready to receive Him. His last prayer was, "Lord, receive me into thy everlasting kingdom," and fell asleep in the Saviour's arms, aged 78 years. My heart is sad, but my hope is strong, sure and steadfast that I shall meet him where parting is no more. He was a faithful watcher for the Saviour's coming for over 40 years, and he never became weary, but his hope grew stronger till the last.

MRS. ARMENIA C. ELDRIDGE.

Yarmouth Port, Mass., 1879.

Our Friend and brother, GIDEON R. LEDERER, of New York City, died Feb. 25th. He was a Hebrew, born in Hungary in 1804. His father was a Rabbi, and educated his son for the same position, but the son, after some experience, became satisfied that JESUS, though crucified, was the Christ, the King of Israel. After laboring some years as a Christian Missionary amongst the Jews in Hungary, and being arrested in his work by Jesuites, he left for England in 1853, and came to this country shortly after.

In the employ of the New York City Mission, his work was chiefly among his own people. His hearty sympathy with them and devotion to their welfare, won their respect and confidence, and they opened to him their houses, and in many cases their hearts, as he taught them out of Moses and the prophets, showing them that Christ must needs have suffered all these things, and entered into his glory; and that this Jesus, whom he preached unto them, is Christ.

Among his spiritual children are several Hebrew preachers of the Gospel. One of these is Bishop Shereshevsky, of the American Protestant Episcopal Mission in China, and translator of the Bible.

Brother Lederer believed the kingdom of God on earth to be nigh at hand; and he lived to see the beginning of the restoration of Israel.

He was a great sufferer in body, and endured hardships from those who should have treated him with kindness. But he rests from his labors and trials.

ED.

ELDER JACOB BLAIN, Buffalo, writes: Our beloved Bro. BENJAMIN ELDRIDGE sleeps in Jesus. He lived here most of his days, and was one of our oldest Advent brethren. Some two years since he removed to Yarmouth Port, Mass., where most of his relatives lived. He was 78 years of age, and was cured of deafness in January last. This gave him great joy; but in about a month he was cut down by disease of the kidneys, after suffering only 3 or 4 days. I know not that any Advent friends live there, so I send you this notice. He was a warm friend of the BIBLE EXAMINER. He died in the glorious hope of "the ages to come."

The Lord still prolongs my days, though afflicted with a general weakness which nearly prevents my going into the street; but I am free from pain and disease. For this I am thankful; but more specially so for the blessed hope given me as to the eternal future. This hope prevents life from yet being a burden, and leads me to praise God for my existence and the character of my being. My faith tells me "all must work for good." Though I can do but little more for our glorious cause, I still ask brethren to remember me, in my solitude, in my temporal wants; 87 years make my eyes dim, and I can read but little. This is my greatest trial at present. I again exhort brethren to sustain the BIBLE EXAMINER, as it gives us more valuable truths than any periodical I know of in Christendom; and I trust to die knowing it is sustained.

EDITORIAL NOTICES.

ERRATA.—On page 352, second column, last line of "Editorial Remarks," instead of the word "warth," read wrath.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—It is impossible for me to prepare and publish long articles that are badly written; my present strength will not bear the strain.

If any subscriber fails to receive a number of the BIBLE EXAMINER, please inform me and I will supply it.

THE BIBLE EXAMINER is a Monthly Magazine. Terms, $2 00 per year, in advance.

Subscribers' Names should be written very plain. Do not neglect this. It is utterly impossible sometimes to decipher names, and mistakes must occur in consequence. As to their Address, give simply the name of the Post-Office and State.

Let all Correspondents be careful to address me as follows:

GEO. STORRS,
72 Hicks Street,
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

All "Postal Money-Orders" sent me should be drawn on Brooklyn, N. Y.

To Clubs the BIBLE EXAMINER will be supplied on the following terms:

Two copies to one address,	$3
Four " " " "	5
Ten " " " "	10

The ten may be divided and sent to the address of two persons, if desired. The prices fixed above are expected to be paid in advance and the money sent at the risk of the subscribers.

Any person wishing either volume of the EXAMINER in sheets—that is unbound—shall have it on receipt of one dollar. The volumes that I can supply are 18, 19, 20, 21, and 22; only a few, however, of volume 20.

BOUND VOLUMES.—The BIBLE EXAMINER, bound, can be now furnished at $2 per volume in neat, plain binding; in morocco, with gilt edges, $3.25. Volumes 18, 19, 20, 21 and 22 can be had of me at the prices named per volume.

REMITTANCES.—In these times of theft and robbery no one should venture money by mail except by a "Postal Money-Order," if you can get one. If that cannot be done have your letter "Registered" at the office where mailed. Even then its safety depends on the honesty of the officials who take charge of the letter. It is, perhaps, just as safe to send small sums in a letter, sealed and properly directed, without registering, as with.

The next best thing to a "Postal Money-Order" in remitting money is a Draft on some Banking House in New York City, payable to me or my order

GEO. STORRS.

LETTERS RECEIVED TO MAY 1.

Hereafter no letters will be acknowledged except those containing money, or some inquiry that can be answered in few words. Such as are acknowledged will be accounted a receipt for whatever is said to be enclosed, unless I state to the contrary.

Dr. A. D. Tagert, N. D. Warren, Mrs. Genie, A. Bertholf, Julia A. Dodge, Christine Micklish, S. N. Pike, S. B. Emmons, George W. Kemp, Thomas Apthorpe, Jos. Laciari, L. H. Whitney, Adelia B. Danforth, Lucretia B. Lamb, William G. Edwards, Eld. J. Lewis, Byron Ambrose, Mrs. M. A. Battersby, K. S. Pettibone, J. S. Haskett, John R. Scott.

PARCELS SENT TO MAY 1.

Dr. A. D. Tagert, Jos. Laciari, Sherman Hitchcock, William G. Edwards (two parcels), George H. Waterhouse (two parcels), Mrs. Ann F. Lamb, G. P. Watson (present volume EX'R), Frank E. Watson, Dr. L. R. Ambrose, Mrs. Ann M. Dickinson.

For some weeks past the Editor has, through bodily affliction, been unable to give due attention to matters relating to the EXAMINER. Rheumatism in his loins and side seems to have immovable hold. But afflictions are necessary, in some form, to perfect our graces; and the "Captain of our salvation was made perfect through sufferings."—Heb. ii. 10. We can only know the strength of our faith, or trust in God and his Son, by the trials we are called to endure. Paul tells us that "tribulation worketh patience; and patience, experience; and experience, hope; and hope maketh not ashamed," etc.—Rom. v. 3-5.

"The Infidel Silenced by the Most Irrefutable Evidence Relating to the Authenticity and Credibility of the Holy Scriptures," by William H. Wilson, Chicago.—This is the title of a pamphlet recently published by Bro. Wilson, apparently not with a design to supplant the many excellent works which have been written in defence of the Bible, but rather to utilize them by furnishing a work in size and price suitable for free circulation. It is neatly printed, and its concise, logical arrangement gives evidence of much care and labor on the part of the author. Price, 25 cents. Address, William H. Wilson, 182 S. Clark Street, Chicago, Ill.

"God's Plan of Salvation, or His Purpose Concerning Man and the Earth," by J. M. Stephenson.—The author, under this suggestive title, has given us a work in his usual clear and forcible style, which cannot fail to be read with interest and profit by all Bible students, though its value would have been materially enhanced as a work of reference had the publisher given an index to topics. It is a work of over 300 pages, handsomely printed and bound in cloth. Price, $1.00. For sale by George W. Young, 10 Murray Street, New York.

THE CHARACTER AND WORK OF A HIGH PRIEST.

Paul tells us, "Every High Priest taken from among men is ordained for men in things pertaining to God . . . who can have compassion on the ignorant, and on them that are out of the way." Heb. v. 1, 2. From this presentation he goes on to say, "Christ glorified not himself to be made a High Priest," etc. He was made such by him who said, "Thou art my Son," and who also said, "Thou art a Priest forever after the order of Melchisedec." He, "though he were a Son, yet learned obedience by the things which he suffered."

Such an High Priest was exactly suited to the work to which he was "ordained" of God. "He ever liveth" (Heb. vii. 25), and therefore is the High Priest without limitation to his office. He is "ordained for men in things pertaining to God;" and what is essential for the race, he has and ever will have "compassion on the ignorant, and on them that are out of the way;" so that none shall ultimately perish for the want of the "knowledge of the only true God and Jesus Christ" (John xvii. 3) whom "God sent," to "seek and to save that which was lost." Luke xix. 10. This High Priest knows what suffering is; and his pity for the suffering of such as are ignorant and out of the way fits him to undertake their case; and "he will not fail nor be discouraged till he has set judgment in the earth; and the isles shall wait for his law." Isa. xlii. 4.

His work is no temporary effort at redeeming the race whose nature he assumed; it will be carried on till "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the LORD, as the waters cover the sea" (Isa. xi. 9); and the prayer of David is answered, viz., "Let the whole earth be filled with his glory." Psal. lxxii. 19.

Till "the ignorant" have all been enlightened with the knowledge of God and Jesus Christ, and "them that are out of the way" have all been shown the way of life, Christ's Priesthood remains and cannot cease, else that cannot be true which the Apostle states concerning the High Priest's character. But it is true: all glory to God and the Lamb. What is not accomplished in this age, will be in "the ages to come;" and the fact that multitudes have died in ignorance, and consequently out of the way, is no barrier to the High Priest's work. He "is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever" (Heb. xiii. 8); and those who suppose this age, or death itself ends his mediatorial work, or priestly office, are as greatly mistaken as the Jews were who mistook Messiah's work at his first advent, and most likely will find it out when too late to remedy their misapprehension of the comprehensive work of God's High Priest appointed with an oath, of which he says he "will not repent" or change. Psal. cx. 4.

I am asked how I know there is a state of trial for "the ignorant, and those who were out of the way," in a future life? I answer: First, the Scriptures nowhere, or in a single instance, say that death ends probation to all men. Give me a "Thus saith the Lord" for such an assumption. It is not to be found in the Bible, any more than the phrase "immortal soul." One assumption is just as baseless as the other; they are both human and opposed to Divine testimony.

Second: The High Priest's sacrifice for "the world"—"the whole world" (1 John ii. 3)—his giving "himself a ransom for all" (1 Tim. ii. 6), is a pledge that all men shall at some period of their existence have the benefit of that sacrifice set before them for their acceptance. Multitudes have died without it; therefore, they will as surely have it as that God's words do not return to him void.—Isa. lv. 11.

Third: Christ "hath poured out his soul unto death;" for which the Lord hath promised "He shall see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied."—Isa. liii. 11, 12. Can he be satisfied with anything short of the entire race, for whom he gave himself a ransom, having the knowledge of his love and sufferings for their redemption? Impossible; for that would be to suppose he had no love for those who perish through "ignorance," and who were "out of the way" in consequence of that ignorance. Where, then, would be his "compassion" for such? Would not his character as High Priest be impeached by allowing such ignorance to remain unremoved?

Fourth: Christ came into the world "to seek and to save that which was lost." If the vast majority of the race live and die in utter ignorance of his coming into the world at all, how is his mission accomplished unless another age, or "ages to come," is appointed to finish that work? Can any man tell me?

Fifth: Jesus said, "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me."—John xii. 32. This surely indicates that all men were in the plan, which was Divine, for the redemption of the race; and to suppose that the multitudes, or a vast majority of the human family, were to be left to perish in their "ignorance" of the offering of Christ for their salvation, is to suppose a want of power or disposition, on God's part, to carry out his scheme of redemption. Either supposition is a blasphemy. Yet it is clear multitudes die, go out of this life, without the knowledge of "the only true God and of Jesus Christ whom he sent" into the world "to seek and to save that which was lost." Hence a future life is as certain, to such, as that Abraham, must live again to have God's promise of the inheritance of the "land," he saw, fulfilled to him, because that Patriarch has never yet inherited a foot of it, yet God promised to "give it to him," as well as to his seed.

The High Priest's "compassion for the ignorant and them who are out of the way" will never fail till "he shall see of the travail of his soul" by the enlightenment of all for whom he "gave himself a ransom." It is impossible that anything short of that can make him "satisfied," unless he and his Father are to be charged with duplicity, professing a love for "the world" which they never had. Who is willing to make such a charge against God, who is love, and against his Son, who is "the way, the truth, and the life?" A future life, then, and probation in that life, is sure to all such as have by any unavoidable circumstances been deprived of the means of knowing "the only true God and Jesus Christ," whom "the Father sent to be the Saviour of the world."—1 John iv. 15. No other view can vindicate the government of God over the world. No other view ever has been presented that the human understanding could accept as commending itself to that faculty which God has implanted in man to preserve him from destroying errors. To demand assent to any theological system which insists the understanding is to be silent, and not pass its judgment upon it, is to ask men to despise the grandest faculty the Creator has bestowed on man, and thus to impugn his wisdom in bestowing a faculty unreliable for the purposes of life. Who dare thus to charge his Maker?

God has made no revelation of his purposes relating to the government of the race of men and their final destiny that violates their moral sense of right and wrong. "Why even of yourselves judge ye not what is right?" said Jesus, Luke xii. 57. Why give this reproof or injunction, if man is destitute of understanding to form a judgment in regard to what is presented to him? And why did the Lord, the Creator, say, "Be ye not as the horse, or as a mule, which have no understanding" (Ps. xxxii. 9), if, after all, the understanding is of no use in determining what is truth, when we are called upon to receive what purports to be a revelation? And why are men so often reprov'd and rebuked for not having the understanding in exercise in relation to the things of God? Let any one examine the Scriptures and they will find many rebukes of those who do not use that faculty.

Do not all unbiased understandings revolt at the idea that Christ ceases his work as Mediator and High Priest before all men have received the knowledge of the true God and himself, when he has "tasted death for every man," and "gave himself a ransom for all," yea, became "a propitiation for the sins of the whole world;" and seeing "The Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world?" Is our understanding to be outraged by the assumption that the Father and his Son have opened such a magnificent and glorious work to leave it less than half finished? to leave it unfinished as if too great for Omnipotence and Infinite love to accomplish? Believe such an idea who may; no unbiased understanding can accept such a theory; it revolts from it.

—♦—♦—♦— "HOW SHALL I ACT?"

A young man, convinced of the truth of our views, tells me he is in trial, because his friends are grieved at the idea that he should leave the orthodoxy of the sect in which he had been educated. Before him he has the prospect of some eminence in the ministry. The parents are full of entreaties, to persuade their son not to cast himself away by avowing such unpopular views, and entreat him to keep in the old paths wherein they have so carefully and prayerfully educated him. In these circumstances he asks, whether he ought to renounce his new views out of respect to his parents, or whether he ought to go forward embracing the truth and reducing it to practice, notwithstanding the affliction of his parents?

I answer, I know of no consideration that can justify a person in going contrary to his own views of truth and duty. According to the doctrine of Christ, we ought to go contrary to every one, rather than to go contrary to our own convictions, or our own consciences. A young man circumstanced as our friend appears to be, should do everything to meet the views and wishes of his parents that he can do with a good conscience; but he ought on no account to do violence to his own conscience. Let our friend give every proof of respect and affection to his parents that he can consistently with his views of Christian truth and duty, and then let him leave the rest with God. If we are never to give up old errors, and set ourselves against long standing errors and superstition, till our parents and wives, and other friends and kinsfolk give us their consent, we may be slaves forever. If we are never to advance in the knowledge of truth till our friends and kindred give us their consent, we may never increase in knowledge at all. Where would the reforming efforts of Jesus have been, if he had allowed himself to be influenced by his relations and friends? Even his disciples themselves savored not the things that were of God, but the things which were of men; and if Christ had hearkened to their counsels, he would have shrunk from death, and left the glorious work to which his Father had appointed him unfinished. If we wish to have eternal life, or if we wish to be the means of life to others; if we wish to see a Christian reformation; if we wish to see error and craft and profligacy succeeded by truth and purity and joy, we must rise above every influence but a regard to truth and righteousness, and be content to lose the respect and affection of every friend or relative on earth.

We have had too much temporizing; there has been too much endeavoring to accommodate the views and wishes of friends and relations. It is time to act on a higher and nobler principle. Parents should not be encouraged to expect their children to prefer their will to the will of God; and friends should not be encouraged to expect their friends to buy their favor at the expense of truth and conscience. It is time to let all men know that we can accept neither friendship, nor wealth, nor reputation, as the price of our spiritual freedom, or of the approbation of our conscience and our God. If people can love us and befriend us with the understanding that we judge and act in all things for ourselves, as the servants of God alone, and not of men, we can accept their love and friendship with delight; but if they cannot love us or befriend us unless we can give up our judgment or our conscience and make their will or their opinions our law, then we must forego their love and friendship, and be content to have our nearest relatives our foes. These are my views; and I accordingly advise my friend, and advise all who may be placed in similar circumstances, to be faithful to the truth, to be faithful to that God who has revealed the truth to their minds; and to be content to suffer the loss of all things rather than be unfaithful to the truth for a single moment.

I am persuaded if they follow this advice, they will find great reason to rejoice in having done so in the end. That which is right will always have the best results. Whether we wish to promote the welfare of our friends, or the spread of truth, or to secure our own advantage, we ought always to be faithful to the truth. We can gain nothing worth having by complying with the will of friends in opposition to the truth; and we can lose nothing worth keeping, by unbending, unflinching adherence to principles. Be faithful to truth, to conscience, to God, and all things will work for your good.

AN IMMORTAL SOUL A PAGAN NOTION.

SOME time since, The (German) Reformed Church Monthly contained an article on "The Middle State," from which I make the following extract:

"I read the funeral discourse on Mr. Buchanan," by Dr. Nevin, with much interest, and feel strongly impressed to make a few remarks about it; and, in doing so, I shall commence at the top of the tree and come down.

"In the last part of the discourse, Dr. Nevin declares that 'Christianity' knows nothing of the immortality of the soul, and that 'it is a pagan view—Platonism at best.'"

[This agrees precisely with the views which I have held for nearly forty years as the true doctrine of the Bible; yet for this I was branded as a heretic by some, and as an infidel by others.—EDITOR OF EXAMINER.]

"Dr. Nevin's treatise on the Apostle's Creed contains the following sentence: 'The immortality of the soul, as it is called, in the common sense of the doctrine, is not taught in the Bible; on the contrary, it is heathenish, and tends to subvert the fundamental idea of Christianity.' [See Nevin on the Creed, page 66.]

"This one thing, then, appears plain to Dr. Nevin, and I agree with him on this point, viz., that no immortality is taught in the Bible until the resurrection of the dead takes place. But then, according to the second division of the funeral discourse, he says: 'Between death and the resurrection all is awful and mysterious; even with the light of revelation we are bewildered and confounded, when we attempt to picture to ourselves the condition of our departed friends. 'Where they are,' he continues, 'the Bible does not say, and we cannot tell.'"

Dr. Bomberger, the editor of the magazine from which the above is quoted, says:

"Our readers need not be told, of course, that these views of the state of departed saints until the resurrection are entirely at variance with the doctrine of the Catechism and the established faith of the church. Dr. Nevin does not claim for them any ecclesiastical authority. They are offered simply as private speculations. How he and his disciples will reconcile the indulgence of such private opinions with their very exalted theory of the church is hard to guess."

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR OF "BIBLE EXAMINER."

What mind, that calmly and without prejudice examines the question, can come to any other conclusion than that arrived at by Dr. Nevins I cannot see, viz., that "Christianity knows nothing of the immortality of the soul," and that "it is a pagan view—Platonism at best." It is paganism, baptized and tacked on to Christianity by some of the Roman Popes with the aid of their councils, and forced on Protestantism (though Martin Luther fought against it for a time) through fear that the Popish church would load Protestantism with the reproach of "no-soulism."

Thus Protestants submitted to be loaded down with that Roman and Pagan incubus which has shorn them of their strength, and brought in the scourge of Christendom, "Spiritism," which goes on in the strength of this corruption of Christianity; a corruption which was essential to the life and being of Romanism, but which is every day paralyzing Protestantism, and will be found to destroy its power in suppressing or overcoming the various forms of error spreading in the land, and prevent its advocates from making inroads on Romanism or Heathenism.

MODERN JONAHs.

JONAH was not unwilling to proclaim God's message to Nineveh because of any love he had to its inhabitants, as the event showed. But he was afraid he might lose reputation, which he was more concerned about than for the destruction of a city whose numbers were so great, that there were "more than a hundred and twenty thousand persons" in it that could not "discern between their right hand and their left." If he only knew they would all be destroyed, according to his word, and his reputation thereby be saved, he would never have fled to "go to Tarshish." This is evident from two facts: 1. He was angry when the Ninevites repented and God did not destroy them. 2. From the reason he assigned why he fled to go to Tarshish: "O, Lord, was not this my saying when I was yet in my own country? Therefore I fled before unto Tarshish; for I knew that thou art a gracious God, and merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness, and repentest thee of the evil."

It seems he was quite willing to preach the doctrine of "destruction;" that would be pleasing to him, as is evident from the fact "he was very angry" because the Lord spared the city. But to preach destruction to that wicked city, when he knew the Lord was so merciful and gracious that he might not destroy them, was involving Jonah's reputation; and that he could not endure; and when he found the city was spared he was so angry with the Lord that he prayed, "Therefore, Oh Lord, take, I beseech Thee, my life from me; for it is better for me to die than live."

It is difficult to tell wherein the Lord's merciful spirit is most wonderful, whether in sparing Nineveh or the angry prophet; but in both cases, it demonstrates the fact that he has "no pleasure in the death of the wicked," and will rescue all from such a final catastrophe that infinite wisdom, power and love can do to accomplish it.

Modern Jonahs are numerous. They are afraid too many will be ultimately saved, and their stereotyped idea, of only a "few," will be proved an error, and they lose reputation for infallible knowledge. They would much rather the millions on millions that have gone down to their graves, in utter ignorance of God and Jesus Christ, should hopelessly perish, including all that have so gone not able to "discern between their right hand and their left," than that their theory of few only to be saved, here or hereafter, should be shown to be an error. They are horror-struck with the idea that the Lord God can be "merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness," beyond their own narrow theories that he is so only to a few, and the idea that it may be extended to those who have died in ignorance of his love to the world in the gift of his Son to redeem them from sin and death. Such an extension of God's mercy and long-suffering, toward any of our race, is more than these modern Jonahs can endure, and they seem to be "very angry" with such a God; and especially with those who contend for this God as "the only true God" and the Father of "Jesus Christ, who gave himself a ransom for all" men, "to be testified in due time"; that is, in God's time.

That time has never yet come to unnumbered millions who are now slumbering in the dust of the earth; but they will yet "hear the voice of the Son of man, and come forth" and see and hear him "who gave himself a ransom" for them. Then will their faith in him, or their willful rejection of him, decide their final state, and "God's mercy and great kindness," etc., will be manifested in a light that will astonish all the Jonahs of this and all preceding dispensations. Let our thoughts of God, and his tender mercy over the creatures he has made, no longer be restrained and cramped by human traditions and the superstitions of fallible men. Let each one go to the fountain of truth for himself, and put off the "iron shoes" from his "feet," and remember "the ground" of God's word is "holy ground." Listen to the "all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began" (Acts iii. 21). So shall men learn the truth and find life.

A QUESTION.

"ARE the same persons, or class of persons, referred to by Paul in (Rom. viii.) when he speaks of the 'Sons of God' and of the creature? If not, what is meant by the creature?"

That the "sons of God" are another class from "the creature," as used in that chapter, is evident from the Apostle's language, "Not only they but ourselves also which have the first-fruits of the Spirit," etc.

The terms creature and creation are from the same Greek word, viz., ktisis. Why the translators in (Rom. viii. 19-22) should three times render the word creature and only once creation may be uncertain. The word in its various forms is used many times in the New Testament. In verse 39 it is used in connection with "height nor depth;" adding "nor any other creature," etc. In Colossians i. 15, Christ is said to be "the first-born of every creature." Heb. iv. 13, "Neither is there any creature that is not manifest in his sight." Rev. iii. 14, "The beginning of the creation of God."

Those samples are sufficient to show that ktisis may properly be used to signify "creation" as well as "creature." The text (Rom. viii. 19, 20, and 21) if so understood, refers to all things of earthly creation on which the curse came after Adam's sin,—all "was made subject to vanity," but "in hope" of final deliverance; the groaning creation is not always to be in this state of disorder; after the manifestation of the "sons of God" all this present state of disorder is to come to an end. But now all things are in a suffering condition, not excepting those who have the "first-fruits of the Spirit," for not only does creation suffer, but "we also," saith Paul, "groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, viz., the redemption of our body."

The groaning creation is represented as waiting for the manifestation of the sons of God; though not necessarily possessing the knowledge of the means by which the deliverance is to be effected.

By the creature—the ktisis—then, is meant the creation, whether sensitive or insensate. By the sons of God is meant a class who have become such by becoming a "new creation in Christ Jesus," but have not yet received the redemption of their body.

BEARING THE CROSS.

Much has been said among professed Christians, about bearing the cross; but I fear little is understood or really practiced in this matter. Men are all naturally in love with this present world. To this world we must become crucified. Crucifixion is a hard death; but few persons are willing to die such a death; there is, however, no other way of entering into the kingdom of God. We must be "crucified unto the world, and the world unto" us. Most professed Christians, it is to be feared, have made a covenant with the world, not to part with it; and the tempter satisfies them if they speak in meeting some times, and give something to support the Gospel, they may keep their covenant with the world: but, "If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him."

How, then, are we to be separated from the love of the world and be crucified unto it? First—By a believing view of the Lord Jesus Christ, who became poor—was despised of men—a man of sorrow, acquainted with grief—endured reproach—resisted temptation, though he “suffered, being tempted”—when he was reviled, reviled not again—murmured not, though wounded, bruised, put to grief, and his soul made an offering for sin, scourged, spit upon, his hands and feet pierced with nails, his soul in agony—all this he bore and no lisp of impatience ever escaped him. Would we be crucified unto the world? Learn of him: contemplate his poverty—his life—his sufferings—his resignation—his patience—his loving and forgiving spirit, till the whole mind is humbled within us; and then realize this truth—“If so be we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together.”—Rom. viii. 17. Do any ask what it is to suffer with him? I answer—To suffer with the same meek, patient, forgiving, resigned spirit that he had. This leads me to say—

Second—If we would bear our cross and be crucified unto the world, remember, every trial of our life—whether temporal or spiritual, personal or family, from friends or enemies, direct or indirect, great or small, of short continuance or long, or whatever be the nature or character of it, is by the appointment or permission of that God who willeth not the death of the sinner, but who is seeking by all these trials to crucify us unto the world, and fit us to be glorified with his Son Jesus Christ. How shall the design of our heavenly Father be accomplished? It cannot be, unless we bear our cross. Do you ask again—What is it to bear my cross? I answer—It is to suffer all the trials of which I have spoken, patiently. We are not to quarrel with the instrumentality God may employ, nor indulge in fretfulness under it. If we do, we do not bear the cross. And though we should speak like an angel in meeting, yet if we fret and complain under any of the trials of life, by which God is seeking to crucify us unto the world, it is hypocrisy for us to talk about bearing the cross; we are but deceiving our own souls. God has assured us, “all things work together for good to them that love him;”—Rom. viii. 28. Do we murmur, fret and complain at those things which God has permitted or appointed. Alas, alas! Do not dream we are running for the kingdom of God while this is the case. Saith our Saviour—“In your patience possess ye your souls.” Those words are of solemn and awful import. It we indulge in murmuring, complaining, or impatience at any trials, insults, sufferings, or injuries, from whatever instrumentality they may come, and that spirit is increasing upon us, we are just as surely travelling in the road to death as God has said—“The soul that sinneth it shall die.” I speak not now of one “overtaken in a fault,” to which all are liable in the hour of temptation, but of him upon whom this spirit is not abating but increasing. Happy the soul who is constantly looking to God for grace to bear every cross. We may pray to have the cross removed; but we may not pray for it only in submission to the will of God. “If it be possible let this cup pass from me; nevertheless not my will but thine be done.” That is our example; and we cannot safely follow any other. “My grace is sufficient for thee,” will often be the answer; and did we know now what we shall know hereafter, we should praise God for every trial and every cross we have to bear: yea, a living faith will praise God even now, that he does not leave us to our own way, lest we should be like children of Israel, whose impatient murmurings were answered by giving them “flesh;” but “leanness” was “sent into their souls.” “Be patient in all things:” that is, bearing the cross; then, when Christ appears, we shall have a crown.

ETERNAL LIFE AND IMMORTALITY.

“He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself; he that believeth not God, hath made him a liar, because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son: and this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath—teen zoen—the life: he that hath not the Son hath not—teen zoen—the life. These things have I written unto you that believe on the name of the Son of God, that ye may know that ye have eternal life.”—John v. 11-13. “Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer, and ye know that no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him.”—1 John iii. 15. From these passages we learn that some do have “eternal life” abiding in them while they are yet in the mortal body. Hence “eternal life” and “immortality” are not synonymous. It is nowhere said or implied in the teachings of Christ, or his apostles, that men have “immortality.” Immortality is something that the mortal body will put on at some future time; while eternal life is something that abides in the true believer while he is yet in the mortal body, and is his title to joint heirship with Christ, and being “clothed upon” with immortality at the coming of his Lord.

THE DIVINE DISPENSATIONS,
OR, THE DIVINE PLAN IN THE GOVERNMENT
OF OUR RACE.—No. 2.

BY THE EDITOR OF BIBLE EXAMINER.

HAVING noticed the Adamic and Antediluvian dispensations, I pass to that which extended from Noah to Moses; and, for the sake of a name, I call it

THE PATRIARCHAL DISPENSATION.

The history of the race and the dealings of God with men, during this period, till the call of Abram, is very brief. Enough is given, however, to show that human nature was not much changed by the lesson of the flood; for we find men soon forgetting the judgment on the antediluvians and determined on making themselves "a NAME" to prevent being "scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth." In this respect they are like most men in all ages: a desire to build up themselves, instead of carrying out God's requirement of Adam and Eve to "multiply, and replenish the earth and subdue it."—Gen. i. 28 They would have massive TOWERS that should "reach up to heaven," as a centre of attraction, because "Union is Strength"; and so, instead of having God himself as a bond of union, they would have "brick and mortar"—the work of their own hands—the bond to unite and keep them together; they were the prototype of various sects and parties in religion in all ages since that time; building up themselves A NAME, instead of trusting in the NAME of God alone. The result was a "confounding of their language"; so that "confusion" followed, and their selfish work was defeated: God thus giving the race a lesson, for all time to come, that they should pursue no more selfish purposes, but follow implicitly His commands. To these Babelites, that command was to "spread themselves abroad upon the face of all the earth" (Gen. xi. 8, 9); thus to carry out the intention of God as expressed to Adam and Eve. This was a part of God's plan, to people "all the earth"; which plan the Babel builders thought to prevent; but God knows how to defeat all counsels adverse to His own, and in "due time" will show that He has done so.

Notwithstanding their dispersion, men continue their idolatry, or deification of themselves or some work of their own devising. Hitherto but little spiritual development had been made; men seem, for the most part, to have been left to develop their animal nature, that the race might first be multiplied and the earth filled with inhabitants, prior to a full exhibition of the Divine wisdom, power and grace in changing to a spiritual—or, rather bringing out a spiritual nature that should harmonize with the Divine nature and yield a willing obedience thereto: an exaltation in the Divine plan, when he said, "Let us make man in Our image after Our likeness."—Gen. ii. 26. That plan, in its perfection, will only be completed in "the ages to come," as will be fully shown before closing these articles.

At length a period arrives when God's purpose to bless the race by an elect or chosen people, began to be more perfectly unveiled. This development commenced with the call of Abram to leave his kindred and his father's house and go into a land that God would show him; and Paul says, "By faith . . . he went out not knowing whither he went."—Heb. xi. 8. This strange—or foreign—land was that which he was afterwards to "receive for an inheritance." In the promise to him, when God called him thus to leave his father's house, was contained the great purpose of the LORD to bless, by him and his seed, all the families of the earth.—Gen. xii. 3. The design of selecting Abram was not simply to bless him, but to make him a blessing, also, to others in God's "due time." Abram was not the most eminent for devotion to the service of God, for "Melchisedek, king of Salem, . . . was priest of the most high God. And he blessed him, and said, Blessed be Abram of the most high God" (Gen. xiv. 18, 19); and Paul, speaking of this act of Melchisedek, says, "Without contradiction the less is blessed of the better."—Heb. vii. 7. The selection of Abram, therefore, was not because he was great or good above all other men; but was a sovereign act of the CREATOR and RULER of the world, and teaches us that all favors are bestowed according to the counsels of infinite wisdom in a way and manner to firmly impress all men with a sense of their entire dependence on God, and thus lead them to cleave to Him with all their heart, and to trust Him unwaveringly in all their affairs temporal and spiritual.

The trials that Abram passed through after this first promise, when called to leave his father's house, were many and great, and the reasons for all of them were in a great measure veiled from him. After waiting for the promised son, to be called to sacrifice him; and to be told that his posterity should be in bondage to a strange nation four hundred years, before they should inherit the land that God had promised they should possess, and that Abram himself would die before he would have fulfilled the promise that to him, as well as to his seed, was the inheritance to be given: all these things were grievous to be borne; but his faith triumphed; for dark and veiled as many of the transactions were, at the time, he staggered not, being fully persuaded that what God had promised He was able to perform, and would, in "due time," verify all his words, though death to himself and many of his posterity would intervene before the final consummation. He became a model of faith to all future generations. What God did not perform in his lifetime he fully believed would be in, to him, an unknown period in the future: he did not stumble into "conditional prophecy," to unravel what seemed so improbable or impossible of fulfilment. No; he believed God, and left the way, manner, and time of fulfilment to infinite wisdom. So should we, in all that seems veiled, yet promised. In "due time" God will verify the truth of every word that has proceeded out of His mouth.

The history of the other Patriarchs, together with the bondage of Israel in Egypt, I pass over by simply remarking, here was a veil of long continuance, which looked much as if God had abandoned them or forgotten His promises concerning them made to Abraham. But where unbelief would have seen nothing but failure, faith discovers light through the veil: the people must be multiplied; they must learn to bear discipline and hardships; they must come in contact with the learning of Egypt and its princes: a school of training important to a people who were to be entrusted with the knowledge of the true and living God for the benefit of "all the families of the earth"; for all kindreds, tongues, and peoples.

It may here be asked "Why did not God manifest Himself to all people, directly, as well and as early as to Abraham and his posterity?" I can give but one answer, viz.: Infinite wisdom and love chose that plan which He knew would ultimate in the highest good of all the race; every one of whom were the objects of His love. It might as well be asked, Why did not God put Abraham at once into possession of the promised land, instead of letting him die without possessing a foot of it (Acts vii. 5), and reserving the fulfilment of the promised inheritance till a resurrection at some unknown and distant period? Faith says, The MAKER knew best. His wisdom planned, His love guided, and His power will in "due time" execute and make all plain to the astonishment and joy of earth and heaven: and faith can wait till the consummation vindicates the wisdom and love of the CREATOR, for all the works of His hands: and, "what" we "know not now," we "shall know hereafter."—John xiii. 7. Let these considerations suffice till the time comes "which God hath put in his own power."

In all dispensations, thus far, we have found much that is veiled, though light sufficient for the then present use; indicating, however, a glorious future of developments, which it is manifest must reach beyond the present life; for Abraham himself, as well as his Seed, is to act in blessing "all the families of the earth;" so that the promise, though veiled, embraced all dead ones as really as it embraced Abraham: for Abraham could not have the promises fulfilled to him without a resurrection; neither could he, personally, bless all, unless they also should have a revival from the dead. The same promise that secures Abraham's living again, secures the living again of all he is to bless. In no other way can they be blessed, in connection with his Seed, so far as I can see.

Hence, I now believe that every child of Adam's race must be revived from the dead to be blessed, who has by any unavoidable means failed to be blessed in Abraham and his Seed, while in this life. The Patriarchal Dispensation was one of selection or election; first, of persons, as Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and then of their posterity; not for their own sakes only, but as a means of blessing to the rest of Adam's race; for God's love extended to all "the world"; but the way, manner, and time of manifesting that love, infinite wisdom directed all, and devised that method which should ultimate in the greatest good to all; veiling very much of the great scheme established from the foundation of the world, till the best time should arrive for its further development. By this method of proceeding, faith—the foundation of all durable good in man—would be brought into constant exercise, and men learn to trust God's words, though they could not see "the end from the beginning."

Faith in God, from the time evil was manifested in the world, was to be the ground of man's justification; as it had been demonstrated men could not be justified by works before God; for, "By the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in His sight."—Rom. iii. 20. The law is to give men "the knowledge of sin"; and "the carnal [or fleshly] mind . . . is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be."—Rom. viii. 7. God has appointed faith, therefore, as the ground of our acceptance and justification; and this Gospel was proclaimed to and through Abraham. So it is said, "The Scriptures foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the Gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed."—Gal. iii. 8.

I have brought down our subject to the close of the patriarchal dispensation, and we see that while much was clearly revealed, much more was indicated in language over which there was a veil. One illustration of this fact may here be stated. Paul speaks of "the mystery"—i.e., of veiled truth—"which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men, as it is now revealed unto His holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit; that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, and of the same body, and partakers of His promise in Christ by the Gospel."—Eph. iii. 4-6. While this was a truth set forth in the promises to the Patriarchs, and is now perfectly clear to us, it was veiled for long centuries; "blindness" was upon the minds of all on that subject until after Christ's ascension to heaven; nor does there seem to have been an exception among Jews or Gentiles as to the subject being a veiled one, or a mystery. Shall we, then, doubt but what many great events, belonging to "the ages to come," are in the great and precious promises to the race, yet veiled, but to come fully into view as the time draws nigh for their fulfilment? With these remarks, I proceed to the consideration of

THE MOSAIC, OR LAW DISPENSATION.

This dispensation was fruitful in types or shadows; made up of great facts, but a revelation under a veil of "good things to come."—Heb. x. 1. Even the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt might be said to be a veiled prophecy of the final resurrection of the nation from the dead; showing the power and purpose of God to give them, with Abraham, the everlasting possession of the promised land; not a temporal possession, only, but an eternal one, after deliverance from the long bondage of death.

Their wanderings in the wilderness might be considered as typical of the trials to which all men are subjected in this life—a state of severe discipline, necessary to prepare them for an advanced state in "the ages to come." Passing this event in Israel's history, the laws given them were designed to train them to an entire submission to the will of God, and to educate them to be a blessing to the nations of the earth, and by this means carry out the promise to Abraham. The law given from Mount Sinai, commonly called "the moral law," was commanded because the main things therein contained were right in themselves, and essential to the highest happiness and well being of men. For this reason it is properly called the moral law.

The ceremonial law was a positive institution; not necessarily right in itself, but made right and obligatory because commanded by the rightful GOVERNOR of the people; and was designed to educate them for a higher state and more important service than as a people living only for themselves: they were to bless all nations. By these laws they were to be taught, but under a veil, the great scheme of human redemption and final perfection of the race. The whole system, under which their training was to be carried on, was "a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image" itself—(Heb. x. 1): it was the great things of the future ages, presented under a veil, which was symbolised by the veil on Moses' face; for the people could not endure the glory of the future dispensations without a veil. God, therefore condescended to their weakness; He gave them the shadow of those glories under a veil, to be removed as the things themselves should actually appear, or were about to take place. By their resting in the shadow, and allowing themselves to be contented in the forms of their religion without studying the Scriptures to find the substance, they were unprepared to receive the LAMB of God when the veil was so far removed by the personal appearance of the promised Messiah.

In this respect, how like most modern Christians, who are so taken up with the present dispensation that they see little or next to nothing of the dispensations still in the future, and which are so clearly shadowed forth by the ceremonial law; one of which is at the point of being unveiled before their eyes. May it not be feared that such, though, like the Jews, looking for the Messiah, may be as unprepared to welcome him as were that anxious people? May our eyes be opened in due time, and we be prepared for the work of glory then to be done to the honor and praise of God.

The law shadowed forth the good things of coming dispensations. To think otherwise is to suppose that Israel was cumbered with times and seasons and ceremonies of little or no real value. Why such regular divisions of times, seven days, seven years, seven times seven years? Why an Israelitish servant to go out free in seven years, and some others not till later periods; say, till seven times seven, or until the Jubilee? Is there no "good thing to come" veiled in this arrangement? May it not, and does it not "shadow" forth the deliverance of the saints, from the bondage of death, first, at the seventh thousand year? and the deliverance of others at various periods, or in various dispensations, until the great Jubilee of Jubilees shall bring the mass of the race "from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God"?—Rom. viii. 21. What mean all those laws relating to "first-fruit" and the final "ingathering," or great harvest? and those relating to the redemption of a lost inheritance, and the giving of the "first-born a double portion," and a brother ransoming a brother who has become poor and sold himself, and many other things that might be named? Did they not, under a veil, point to work to be accomplished in "the ages to come"? Are we to suppose these things were ordained simply for Israel's temporal affairs, in that age, and have no reference to something greater and higher in the future ages? Were they all to end with that dispensation and be of no future use? Paul says, "Whatsoever things were written aforetime, were written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope."—Rom. xv. 4. Are the Scriptures I have referred to an exception? Are they not for our learning, and the knowledge of their significance essential to our possessing a scriptural "hope"?

What of all the bloody sacrifices under the law? Were they not to teach, under a veil, the great offering of "the Lamb of God" to take away sin? Those who searched not into the significance of these offerings, but rested in the mere observance of these "shadows," or veiled representations of a great future offering by Messiah, were not prepared to receive the suffering One; in consequence of which, the "veil remaineth untaken away, in reading the Old Testament, unto this day."—2 Cor. iii. 14. Those bloody sacrifices were unveiled, or "done away, in Christ."

While the veil was removed from those offerings of blood, by Christ, in his "offering" himself "once for all" (Heb. x. 8-10), shall we not look for the veil to be removed by the "substance" to which those other "shadows" pointed? Is it not clear that the various periods for the release of those in bondage are yet in the future? and that the "first-fruits" are the pledge of the great "ingathering" to follow at a latter period? Shall there be no substance to the shadow of an inheritance lost, but restored by a kinsman? Space would fail me were I to attempt to go through and examine the various methods and times of purifications required by the law, all of which were "shadows of good things to come"; under a veil pointing to a time when, by various processes, the impurities of the mass of men shall be taken away; a "few" samples, only, of which have yet appeared in the world. The vilest and worst of sinners are within the range of these purifying influences, as the apostle shows, after enumerating a catalogue of the foulest sins, and saying, such "shall not inherit the kingdom of God," and adds, "Such were some of you; but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus and by the Spirit of our God."—1 Cor. vi. 9-11. Are these a "kind of first-fruits of His creatures" (Jas. i. 18), and is there to be no harvest? Certainly the harvest, or "ingathering" time is at a much later period; and not only a "few" are washed in the dispensations past and passing; yet an "innumerable company, which no man can number," are to be ultimately found "washed."—Rev. vii. 9-14.

Are we to suppose all the washings and purifications under the law of Moses, have no other signification than as relating to the "few" saved ones in what is called the Gospel dispensation? If so, is not the "shadow" greater than the substance? But if they are veiled ordinances, pointing to the washing of "an innumerable company" in the dispensations, or "ages to come," then are they full of instruction, and we may see light where all would be darkness, and seemingly a vast amount of useless ceremony.

Viewed, however, in the light of their relation to an "endless succession of ages" (Eph. iii. 21, McKnight's translation), and the work to be accomplished in the redemption of an "innumerable multitude" from sin, there is a grandeur in these washings and purifications which otherwise seem unworthy of a record in a revelation from God.

Without dwelling longer on the veiled teachings of the ceremonial law of the Mosaic dispensation (which might be enlarged to a volume), I proceed to notice the fact that, in connection therewith, the Lord spake "by the mouth of His holy prophets" concerning the "things to come," which had been, or were being, shadowed as future by the constant practice of the rites and ceremonies of the law; so that those whose minds were disposed to inquire diligently, would see that the ceremonial law was a great prophecy of things future, to be more fully understood by the utterances of their holy prophets, so that "the law and the prophets" were two witnesses concerning the works to be accomplished in "the ages to come"; or, the future dispensations. Those, therefore, who separated the teachings of the prophets from the ordinances of the law would not perceive the true significance of either, or only in a very imperfect manner; and to this cause may be attributed, not only the "blindness" of the Jews, but that, also, of a multitude of professed Christians, who see nothing in the law but useless lumber, and but little in the prophets except what they call "conditional prophecy"; i. e., prophecy never to have a fulfilment. Is it not true of these Christians, as of the Jews, that "blindness in part has happened to" them "until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in"? They seem not to "know the voices of the prophets" (Acts xiii. 27), and, hence, those prophecies of future events concerning Israel, and the future glory of Christ's reign over the Gentile nations; and his blessing all the families, kindreds, tongues and nations, they treat as if they were not spoken by the unerring Ruler of the universe, who knew "the end from the beginning."

Let the ordinances of the law be read and studied in connection with the prophecies of Israel's dispersion, punishment, and final restoration to their lost inheritance, and the glory that is to attend that promised event, when "Thy sun shall no more go down; . . . for the Lord shall be thine everlasting light, and the days of thy mourning shall be ended."—Isa. lx. 20. If "the law and the prophets" are thus read together, throwing light on each other, the Old Testament would not be so lightly esteemed as it now is by many; and the sacred teachings of Jehovah found therein would become a light and glory that would light up the coming ages like the glory on Moses' face when he came down from a forty days' communion with God on these matters, in Mount Sinai. But, alas, a great portion of spiritual Israel are as affrighted at the idea of the great things shadowed forth "in the law and the prophets," as literal Israel were at the glory that shone forth on Moses' countenance; and their teachers have managed to construct a veil over the testimony of "the law and the prophets," which renders them invisible to themselves and to those who follow them; and they have become "slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken."—Luke xxiv. 25.

I have not space now to refer to those prophecies which speak of future blessings on literal Israel and on the Gentile nations, and the various means and times in which and by which God's purpose to cleanse them from all their sins and make them sharers in the glory to be revealed under the reign of our Lord Jesus Christ and his "joint-heirs"—"the Church of the First-born," who, with their Head, are to "fill the earth with the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea" (Isa. xi. 9); for, "As truly as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord," says Jehovah himself (Num. xiv. 21).

IS THE HOLY SPIRIT A PERSON?

BY CHAS. L. IVES, A. M.

IT may be thought that to question the personality of the Holy Spirit is indirectly to question the divinity of the Lord Jesus Christ. By no means. The essential divinity of the latter is too prominent a doctrine of the Bible to be dependent upon any other issue. In holy writ our Lord is styled—never, "God the Son," but—"the Son of God." And what does that mean? We read, Heb. i. 3, 4, of the Son, "the express image" of the Father, "the brightness of his glory," being made [rather, having become, Gr. genomenos] so much greater than the angels, as he hath BY INHERITANCE obtained a more excellent name than they." That is, the redeemed are sons of God by adoption—that so "ye might be partakers of the divine nature," 2 Pet. i. 4—but by inheritance is our Redeemer the Son of God. The full meaning of this our finite minds may not grasp, as we thus grope after the infinite, but certainly, in this language of human experience, reference is had to the similarity in being of a son to a father. If the father is human, the son is human also; if the father is divine, the son also is divine. This truth of our Lord's divinity thus stands before us as a matter of revelation. Reason can only tell us that we need a divine Saviour, to be able to save to the uttermost, to know and to meet all our varied wants, to hold "all power" in his hands, to be present wherever two or three are gathered together in his name. We cannot stop here to argue with any for the pre-existence of a holy Being, who, when the question of his longevity comes up, himself declares, "Before Abraham was, I am."

While continued study of the Bible has thus but strengthened my belief in our Lord's divinity, a similar study into the Bible testimony on the personality of the Spirit, has had precisely the opposite result. That has convinced me that the holy Spirit, or Ghost, is not, like the Father or the Son, a distinct person. It is not, to use a phrase not found in inspiration, "God the Spirit"; but "the Spirit of God," "his Spirit," as the Bible expresses it. Yet it cost me a struggle to acknowledge this. I had insisted that, in speaking of the Spirit, we should say "he," not "it"; and although without Scripture precedent, I addressed prayer to the Spirit. When first I began to suspect that the evidence of Scripture was against my traditional belief, so disturbed was I that I dropped on my knees and prayed that I might not lose all my faith. But my anxiety was groundless. I could trust the word of God not to lead me astray.

As this subject has recently been before the readers of the Banner, I have thought they might value a concise yet somewhat exhaustive summary of the Bible evidences, as adduced on both sides of the question.

I. THE EVIDENCE AGAINST THE PERSONALITY OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.

1. Prominent stands the corruption of 1 John v. 7, 8, where our Bibles read, "in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost; and these three are one. And there are three that bear witness in earth." These words are beyond question spurious. They are found in no Greek MSS. before the 5th or 6th century, and in no early version. Alford says, "not a shadow of reason for supposing them genuine." Tischendorf, "that they should continue to be published as part of the Epistle, I regard as an impiety." Pres. Woolsey asks, "Do not truth and honesty require that such a passage should be struck out of our English Bible?" This spurious passage carries us back to the days when a corrupt church defined points of doctrine in her councils, by decrees often obtained by fraud or violence. Although the Council of Nice had pronounced for this dogma, those who here corrupted the text thus tell us how insufficient was felt to be all the Bible testimony on their side.

2. The Bible gives us no distinctive, no proper, name for such a personage. "But what," one may say, "is not 'the Holy Ghost' the proper name of this person?" So it appears in our English Bibles, but not so in the original. In our English version this is effected by a somewhat questionable mode of translating. When (except Matt. xxvii. 50, John xix. 30) the Gr. pneuma is unaccompanied by the adjective hagion, holy, it means spirit; accompanied by that adjective it means ghost. And then supplying the definite article "the," omitted in the original in half the instances, and printing holy with a capital H, we thus obtain in English the title, The Holy Ghost. Our translator's double rendering of pneuma is found in the same verse, where pneuma each time denotes the same object. E. g., "And Jesus, full of [the, not in Gr.] Holy [pneuma] Ghost, was led of the [pneuma] Spirit into the wilderness." So in 1 Cor. xii. 3, pneuma is first time spirit, "Spirit of God"; second time it is ghost, "the Holy Ghost." If, according to our translators, "ghost" is deemed inadmissible in the first instance, why not equally so in the second, when the same identical object is again spoken of? But the arbitrary rule of our version fails to meet all cases. In 1 Thess. iv. 8, although hagion and pneuma occur together, it is with the possessive pronoun; so, instead of his Holy Ghost, we have "his holy Spirit"—holy, without the capital H. [We find that in some copies of the Bible the word "holy" begins with a capital—in others not. So far as we have examined, the former usage is adopted in the English, and the latter, in the American Bibles.—Ed.] In Matt. xii. 31, our translators evidently were not satisfied with the original Greek which reads, "the blasphemy of the Spirit shall not be forgiven him"; they confess by their italics that they have supplied "holy," so that our English version might read, the Holy Ghost.

If it be a fact that the Holy Spirit—I will not use the conventional term ghost—is the proper name of a person, the inspired writers, in speaking of this person, strangely forget his proper name! Take Paul's epistle to the Romans; these are the names he consecutively uses—Spirit of holiness (i. 4), the Holy Spirit (v. 5), Spirit of life, the Spirit, Spirit of God, Spirit of Christ, Spirit of him that raised up, his Spirit, Spirit of adoption, the Spirit itself (viii. 2, 5, 9, 11, 15, 16), etc. In John xiv. 16, 17, our Lord himself promises for the first time to the disciples a spiritual comforter in his bodily absence, and explains to them what it should be. Surely here, if anywhere, we should have looked for the information of a third person of the Godhead and for the use of his proper name. Instead, he explains to them that it is the "Spirit of truth, which [not whom, as in English version] the world cannot receive, because it seeth it [Gr. auto] not, neither knoweth it." After this, in his further discourse, he uses once the phrase the holy Spirit, but twice more calls it the Spirit of truth. It would seem the latter has here, then, a better claim to be the proper name.

3. The silence of Scripture on the personality of the Spirit is an important point. We are told this is all because the Bible is not a treatise on systematic theology. But the Bible is the supposed basis of these treatises; and for it to ignore one of their most prominent dogmas under circumstances where, if a fact, it could not escape mention, is virtually to deny it. For instance, in Rev. v. 13 is recorded the universal ascription of praise from every creature in heaven, in earth, in the sea, "unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb"—to the Father and the Son; but no third person is mentioned. So, in chapter vii. 10, the great multitude of the redeemed "cried with a loud voice, saying, Salvation to our God who sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb." Could they thus ignore a third co-equal agent in their redemption, if such there were? In the description of heaven given us in this book, there certainly is no personal holy Spirit there. The Spirit is referred to under the impersonal symbol (chap. iv.) of seven lamps burning before the throne, and (chap. v.) of the seven eyes of the Lamb, which in each case, we are told, "are [or symbolize] the seven Spirits of God sent forth into all the earth."

To read the epistles of John it could not be thought that he who records Christ's statement of the Comforter ever suspected that to be a person. In these epistles he continually associates the Father and the Son as two persons, but never with them a third. His language is, "God hath given us of his Spirit."—1 John iv. 13. Indeed, in his second epistle, ver. 9, we find an omission amounting to a virtual denial of a third person. He says: "Whosoever abideth not in the doctrine of Christ hath not God. He that abideth in the doctrine of Christ hath both the Father and the Son"—that is, he hath God. And so of Paul. The frequency with which he associates the Father and the Son as distinct persons (please note in your future readings), but makes more marked the omission of the Spirit in such connection; for example, four times in the ten verses of the first chapter of 2 Thessalonians. He begins every epistle with the same benediction, "Grace be unto you, and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ." From this conjoining of Father and Son we argue for the divinity of the latter; from his never mentioning in this benediction a third person, we argue that Paul knew of none such. So in 1 Cor. viii. 6 we read, "But to us there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by him." In a statement so full and formal as this, that the apostle should fail to notice a third person, said to be "equal in power and glory," is explicable only on the understanding that Paul knew of none such.

4 In the Bible language utterly inapplicable to a person is used of the Spirit. (That sometimes the language is such as may be applied to a person will hereafter be considered in reviewing the arguments on the other side.)

As samples of inappropriate language, see Acts ii. 17. "I will pour out of my Spirit, saith God" (ver. 18, the same). Ver. 33: "He hath poured out [same Gr.] this, which," etc. It were hardly possible to pour out a person, unless in the sense of Isa. liii. 12, "he poured out his soul unto death." Besides, here is the idea of pouring out from a receptacle a portion of that which it contains, pouring out of something capable of division and distribution: "I will pour out of my Spirit." The same thought is expressed in Num. ii. 17: "I will take of the Spirit that is upon thee, and will put it upon them." John says, "God has given us of his Spirit."—1 John iv. 13. But he says of our Lord, "God giveth not the Spirit by measure unto him." It is only in finite measure that we can receive of the Spirit.

Acts x. 38: "God anointed him with [the Greek article not used here] holy Spirit [with a person?] and with power." Ver. 44, "The holy Spirit fell;" ver. 45, "was poured out." Acts iv. 8: "Peter filled with [no article] holy Spirit"; vi. 5, "a man full of faith and of Holy Spirit;"—of faith and of spirit; is one of the two a person? xi. 24, "full of holy Spirit and of faith;" xiii. 9, "filled with holy Spirit." But one may say, Is not "filled" used of a person? May we not say, "filled with Christ"? I do not find that phrase in holy writ. How "Christ" may be "in" us, Rom. viii 10, Paul explains by the preceding verse: "Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ." But if you make the holy Spirit a person, how then? Will you say, Filled with the spirit of the Spirit?

Acts xix. 2: Certain disciples say, "We have not so much as heard whether there be [no article] a [or simply] holy Spirit." A theologian of our day would have asked, What idea then have you of the Godhead? Instead, Paul asks, "Into [eis] what then were ye baptized?" It brings to him the same thought as to Peter, who says, Acts xi. 15, 16, "The holy Spirit fell on them as on us at the beginning. Then remembered I the word of the Lord: John indeed baptized with [simply Greek dative] water; but ye shall be baptized in [Greek en, no article] holy Spirit."

John himself says, Matt. iii. 11, "He shall baptize you in [en] holy Spirit and in fire;" the righteous in holy Spirit, the wicked in fire, as in last clause of the next verse. John's baptism was in water "unto repentance;" our Lord's is in holy Spirit "unto remission of sins." But can one be baptized in a person, as in water? or, can one be anointed with a person, as with oil?

In Heb. ii. 4, a word is used of the Spirit in which the idea of division into distinct parts is so clearly expressed as to be impossible of application to a person. Our version reads, "God bearing witness with divers miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost." But there is no article before "holy," and gifts is not the correct rendering of the original. The Greek is merismos, and occurs only once elsewhere in the New Testament, in the same epistle, chap. iv. 12, there translated, "dividing asunder." It is the noun of the verb merizo, to divide into parts, from the noun meris, a part. It then really reads, "God bearing them witness with divers miracles, and dividing asunder [or in parts] of holy Spirit." In 1 Cor. i. 13, Paul uses the verb merizo: "Is Christ divided?"—a question carrying its own negative answer. A person cannot be divided. Then the holy Spirit, capable of division asunder, is not a person!

The manner of its descent at Pentecost would seem to be a picturing forth of this division and distribution of the Spirit. We read: "There appeared cloven tongues of fire, and it sat upon each of them; and they were all filled with holy Spirit."—Acts ii. 3. Fire was the symbol of Jehovah's presence, at Eden's gate, at the burning bush, in the cloudy pillar; here, by an advance upon Old Testament times, this symbol appears distributed to each believer.

5. The illustrative teaching of our Lord. This we find John xx. 22; it might be called an object-lesson on this very question. At his first interview with his disciples after his resurrection, our Lord "breathed on them, and said, Receive ye the Holy Ghost"; thus by a visible sign showing that the Paraclete, helper, already promised them in his bodily absence, was a spiritual emanation—breath-like—from himself. Before this they had been told (John xv. 26) that the spirit of truth, or holy spirit, "proceedeth from the Father"; now they are to understand that it also proceedeth from their risen Lord, since now, the period of his humiliation was over, he has been "declared to be the Son of God with power by the resurrection from the dead."—Rom. i. 4. Henceforth the spiritual presence of our Lord was to take the place of his former bodily presence. Can we doubt this out-breathing was in mind, when a few days later, the fullness of the promise having been received, Peter declares that this Jesus had been raised from death, and "having received of the Father the promise of the holy Spirit, He hath poured out this which ye now see and hear?"—Acts ii. 33. Peter's discourse all hinges upon the resurrection of our Lord. And the multitude see the force of his argument. One, whom with wicked hands they had crucified and slain, is surely alive again; if he is able thus to manifest his spiritual influence, his unseen presence by the marvelous putting forth of his power in their sight. So before the Sanhedrim, we see why (Acts v. 32) Peter cites the holy Spirit poured out as a witness with them to the fact of the resurrection, since it is that which actually comes from one who, though once dead is thus proved to be dead no longer.

And so, also, we see why the Saviour must go away from his disciples, if the promised Paraclete, is to come to them.—John xvi. 7. It is not that the limits of the duties of two different persons are so rigidly defined and so jealously guarded, that one cannot take up the work until the other "has gone away." It is simply that the spiritual presence of their Lord could not be recognized by the disciples until he has gone away, so that they have lost the sense of his bodily presence. It is their Lord himself in either case; at first bodily, then spiritually, carrying on to its grand consummation his redeeming work among them—an ever-present Jesus! And this brings us to our final point.

6. The word of God actually teaches that the holy Spirit is the Father, or Jesus himself, present by his spirit. If we read aright the inspired word, God has his own proper dwelling-place—dwelling in the light inapproachable. How then is he present everywhere? By his Spirit. We get an idea what this means from 1 Cor. v. 3. Paul says, "For I verily, as absent in body but present in spirit, have judged as though I were present." Such is the language of the finite. But this for the Infinite is to be virtually present. If his mind be upon us so that he knows every act and thought, so that he can control and influence us at his will, this is not "as though present," but as actually present. So the Psalmist says: "Whither shall I go from thy Spirit, or whither shall I flee from thy presence?"—Psa. cxxxix. 7. Evidently this was the understanding of Old Testament times. And this understanding of God's presence, the New Testament writers transfer to Christ; which is certainly a strong argument for his divine nature.

In the Revelation, at the close of each letter to the seven churches, we read: "He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches." But it is the Lord Jesus that is the speaker.

In 2 Pet. i. 21, we read: "Holy men of old spake as they were moved by [no article] holy Spirit." The same apostle tells us this holy Spirit is the Spirit of Christ; "searching what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow."—1 Pet. i. 11.

In Rom. viii. 9, 10, Paul speaks of the Spirit as being God's Spirit, as Christ's Spirit, then as Christ himself: "If so be that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you. Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his. And if Christ be in you," etc. Next verse: "But if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you," etc. If one were to read the word of God without previous training, he would surely conclude that Scripture means just what it says; that the Spirit of God is the Spirit of God, not a third person, or part of God; it is simply God's Spirit. That thus we are to understand it Paul shows 1 Cor. ii. 11: "For who of men knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him? Even so the things of God knoweth no one (oudeis) but the Spirit of God." Here he compares man's spirit, used in the sense of mind or intellect, with God's Spirit, used likewise. And as if to define his use of the word spirit, he adds, verse 16: "Who hath known the mind of the Lord that he may instruct him? But we have the mind of Christ."

But in 2 Cor. iii. 17, we have the explicit statement for which we contend. We read: "Now the Lord is the Spirit"—to pneuma—not "that Spirit" as in E. V.; "and where the Spirit [to pneuma] of the Lord is," etc. How, we ask, is this? Just as we have stated it: The holy Spirit is the spiritual presence of the Lord himself, who bodily has gone away from our actual sight and presence. That such was Paul's idea is further corroborated by his language, Rom. viii. 26: "The Spirit itself maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered." To many readers this verse seems to designate a special office-work of the Spirit. But eight verses below, Paul says, it is Christ "who maketh intercession for us."

Even that apostle, from whom we should expect the utmost precision on the doctrine of the Comforter as a third person, John himself, in his first epistle (chap. ii. 1) applies the term "Comforter" to our Lord. He says, "We have a Parakleitos [Comforter, Helper] with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous." It may be said, Christ is our Paraclete in heaven; on earth it is another person, the holy Spirit. Then were Paul's statement in 1 Tim. ii. 3 incorrect: "There is one God and one Mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus." If Christ Jesus is one person and the Spirit of Christ another person, then there is one God, and two Mediators who are making intercession for us. Rather let us believe with Paul, "the Lord is the Spirit." He is our real Paraclete, bodily in heaven, spiritually with us on earth, as he says: "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world."

In a concluding article, we propose to consider the so-called Bible proofs for the personality of the Spirit.—Bible Banner.

POPERY AND THE GREAT I AM.

BY WILLIS JONES, ESQ.

IN A. D. 1877 there arrived in this country his Excellency, the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Ardah (Dr. Conroy) as Apostolic Delegate (or Ablegate) of the Pope to all the faithful throughout Canada. On his arrival in Toronto he was presented with an address by the (R. C.) Archbishop (Lynch), who addressed him as "Most Reverend, Holy and Illustrious Lord." (Sic.)

Thus these high dignitaries and leaders of the Romish (so-called apostolic) church render homage one to another (due only from man to his Creator) and "seek honors one of another."

The Saviour said to the Scribes and Pharisees (John v. 44): "How can ye believe which receive honor one of another and seek not the honor that cometh from God only?" The title Reverend is only used once in the Bible, and then it is applied to God. Ps. cxi. 9: "He sent redemption to his people. He hath commanded his covenant forever; Holy and Reverend is his name."

But to receive honor amounting to adoration, from their fellow-mortals, does not seem to satisfy this latter-day arrogance of the hierarchy of the Roman Church. For, say they, "Do not our Protestant daughters also do the same?" Hence they must needs go a step farther and blaspheme the holy name of God, by appropriating—for their harlot communion—the (as it were) especial Name which God gave himself, and by which he doth choose to be called.

God called Moses (Exo. iii.) and said, "Come now, therefore, I will send thee unto Pharaoh that thou mayest bring forth my people, the children of Israel, out of Egypt." But Moses made excuses and said, "When I am come unto the children of Israel and shall say the God of your fathers hath sent me unto you and they shall say to me, What is his Name? What shall I say unto them?" And God said unto Moses, "I AM THAT I AM,* and he said, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I AM hath sent me unto you." Compare Exo. vi. 2, 3 and Isa. xlv. 6.

On Sunday, 10th June, 1877, the aforesaid Papist Ablegate preached in St. Michael's (R. C.) Cathedral, Toronto, from the words, "And this is the testimony of John, when the Pharisees sent priests and Levites to ask him, Who art thou? . . . What sayest thou of thyself? He said, I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness," etc., and then proceeded to hold forth as follows:

"The office discharged by the precursor of Christ—St. John the Baptist—whose feast we celebrate to-day, is a type of the office belonging to the (R. C.) as a teacher of men. His it was to point to the Lamb. Hers it is to preach the same Christ and him crucified. Born in mystery, brought up in desert solitudes, marvelously austere in mien and garb and speech, he came upon a luxurious generation as an apparition, perplexing it with wonder and dismay. Who is this? men asked in astonishment, who dares thus sternly rebuke our pleasant vices and disturb our cultured ease with harsh summons to penance and threats of future punishment? Even so it has been with the (R. C.) Church. For now nineteen centuries she has traversed the earth—unearthly—in her origin and power, and like John she has ever answered, "I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness," etc. No two words are less becoming on human lips than these two words I AM. For God alone has a right to say I AM. WHO AM." (True.) "The history of man's greatness and glory must be told in other speech, Troja et ingens gloria.† Alone among all the institutions on earth the (R. C.) Church can say, I AM. For the I AM of her priesthood is contained in the eternal, "Thou art a priest forever." With this simple assertion of her existence she has triumphed over the enemies that have ever beset her path. When Pagan emperors arose to crush her, she answered I AM. When Arianism came forth and the entire world was enveloped by its hateful doctrines, the Church said I AM; and later on, when empires she herself had raised, would have laid impious hands upon her liberties, she broke their bonds by declaring she was the spouse of Christ, and triumphantly exercised the freedom he had given her. Later still, when at the so-called "Reformation," the nations of Europe rose up against their "Mother," and when thousands echoed Luther's boast that he was the death of the papacy, once more she said I AM, and lo she finds in the new world more children by millions than she lost in the old; and whilst Protestantism is crumbling around her, she lives victorious and triumphant. What then if the governments of the earth have broken faith with her"!!! "With whom the kings of the earth have committed fornication and the inhabitants of the earth have been made drunk with the wine of her fornication."—Rev. xvii. 2. Said papal delegate did not quote this verse but went on to say. "That the governments will perish while she will endure, and that they begin to see that without the Pope there is no Christianity," He says, "Ubi Petrus ibi ecclesia et ubi ecclesia ibi. Nulla mors sed vita sempiterna."‡ He then says "Christ uttered three mysterious cries and we find these cries reproduced in the (R. C.) Church, and that the Divine Comforter speaks only in the (R. C.) Church. Where else do you find the tribunal of penance? The absolving words are spoken, and what is "loosed on earth is loosed in heaven." Where else, save in her is faith found to-day? Faith is a belief not upon human but upon Divine authority, and is it not a simple fact that no other religious body claims to speak with Divine authority? Nay, do they not repudiate for themselves and for their rivals any share in the gift of infallibility, without which there is no certainty of faith even for God's written word; (!!) except the (R. C.) Church, who can say with confidence to men thirsting after truth, "If any man thirst let him come to me and drink?" She alone offers a rational basis of faith. Throughout the length and breadth of the earth, from the rising of the sun to the going down thereof, no sacrifice is offered to the living and true God save in the (R. C.) Church; she alone utters the dread sacrificial words and lifts up the unspotted host and chalice and bread of life, and as Christ was at once a priest and sacrifice, so she will have her priests sacrifice first themselves and then the body of our Lord, before she pours out upon the youthful Levite the unction that makes him a priest forever," etc., "and with a voice, thus one with the voice of Christ," how truly does she claim as addressed to herself the words of Christ, "He that heareth you, heareth me"!! and concludes by saying "Ages after the very names of her enemies are forgotten the (R. C.) Church will be chanting her eternal I AM."

*(I. e.) I AM to you, and to each of you individually what you think me to be—or make me to be.

†Troy and great glory.

‡(I. e.) Where Peter (is), there (is) the church; where the church, there (is) no death, but life everlasting.

Comment upon the above is almost unnecessary. It seems difficult to comprehend how arrogance and presumption can go further than this, even presuming upon the most benighted ignorance and superstition on the part of the listeners. Open infidelity of the Robert Ingersoll type is mild in comparison, and is far less dishonoring to God. Infidelity denies the existence of God. But it does not render unto him mock homage as a cloak to gain honor of men, neither does it insult man's intelligence by trying to enslave the mind and by commanding him to bow down to the most disgusting specimens of the race (the average papist priest).

But perhaps this aggressive, argus-eyed apostacy, which is all things to all men as occasion may seem to require to advance the temporal interest of her hierarchy; now fawning upon the rulers of this world, and again fulminating against them in the name of God, the most awful curses and anathemas, does not in the U. S. unmask herself with the same amount of presumption as she does in the Dominion. Hence, I presume, the U. S. readers of the BIBLE EXAMINER do not behold the great "MOTHER OF HARLOTS" in all her ancient arrogance revived in these latter days.

Here she insinuates her loathsome presence into all the legislative halls in the land and influences all legislation, and dictates all of it which by any possibility may be supposed to trench in the least upon the regal power of her luxurious, licentious priesthood, with whom it has become fashionable (with our rulers) to bandy compliments; and while the priests are rolling in wealth, their poor dupes, (especially the Habitant, pronounced Hably-taw, of P. Q.) must needs be fed at the expense of the government to keep them from starving.

But if in mind we wander back to the days of the so-called "Holy Inquisition" with its mock trials for no offence committed, its rending of families, its dungeons and fiendish instruments of torture, we are almost forced in agony of spirit to exclaim, "How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge," etc. Rev. vi. 10. But it is not so bad now, and we have great cause to be thankful. Nevertheless, while we are contending for the truth concerning God and our Saviour, as revealed to man through God's inspired prophets and apostles, in the Bible, it becomes us to deal plainly with understood error in all its forms; and especially so with this gigantic "mystery of iniquity" which has so spiritualized and mystified the Word of God as to "make it of none effect."

Castleton, Ont., Canada, March, 1879.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER:—If our friend JONES has given us a correct account of the language of the papal representative, there need be no further doubt that the papacy is the identical "Man of Sin, the son of perdition; who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God or that is worshipped; so that he, as God, sitteth in the temple of God, showing (or claiming) that he is God"; or, I "AM."* To what higher pitch can blasphemy rise? It is exalted, by its claim, "above all that is called God"; for, mark this papal representative says, "Without the gift of infallibility there is no certainty of faith even for God's written Word"; and he claims that his church has that gift! No wonder they so long strove and still strive to keep the people from reading the Bible; none but the "infallible" priest of Romanism can tell us what God means by what he says!

But, alas! do not Protestant sects virtually (though not by profession) do the same thing? What sect allows a member of their organization to hold and promulgate views differing from their "CREED" or "ARTICLES OF FAITH"? "How long, O Lord, how long" shall such a violation of the words of the Son of God, or blasphemous denial of his authority continue, when he has commanded "SEARCH THE SCRIPTURES"? etc. But I forbear; the subject is painful to contemplate. "Come, LORD JESUS, and come quickly."

*2 Thess. ii. 4.

BLIND SERVICE.

THERE are numberless facts in history, both sacred and secular, for which it is impossible to account on the theory of atheism. Let us suppose a man of ordinary intelligence, with the logical faculty fairly developed, reading a piece of ancient history in which actions are disclosed; and let us further suppose that after a number of years it is found that the actions referred to, instead of realizing the hopes of the actors, have, in some mysterious way, helped to bring about the thing they most feared.

You find this idea pervading novels, or books of fiction; but fiction is essential fact, or it would not be read. The novelist creates circumstances from imagination; but, so far as the essence of the story is concerned, inexorable law binds him to that which might happen. He must not do violence to nature. No strength of genius—if, indeed, genius could attempt it—can commend the unnatural to the public. Fiction must agree with human nature if it would find a market.

But what is human nature? It is the basis of human history. The story of the world is the story of man—the visible actor; and the instances in which his plans have matured in the very issues he deprecated are proofs of the overruling wisdom of an Invisible Worker.

Let us test this, not for our own satisfaction, which needs no help in this direction; for atheism is, to us, both moral and mental insanity—the renunciation of reason in its noblest offices. To us a personal God is the first necessity of the universe. Creation without Him is an absurdity. The things which are made proclaim the Maker. A personal God, possessed of every possible perfection, is the soul, and centre, and cause, and end of the world of matter and of mind. But this paper may be of use to some of our readers. It may serve the useful purpose of showing that historical facts form a powerful argument for the accomplishment of predicted events. If we find that things have taken place contrary to all selfish or political calculations, but in exact accordance with the will of God, as expressed by His servants, we are bound, as rational beings, to admit the supernatural as the solution of the mystery. If we will certain ends, and find ourselves foiled, notwithstanding our wisest efforts, it is clear to honest reason that a higher Will than ours has been at work. Whether that Will is friendly or otherwise must be determined by the result; and the result always proves it the friend of righteousness and truth.

It may seem a delicate point of argument to call the evil conduct of conspirators, murderers and tyrants “service,” even though qualified by the adjective “blind”; but the possible objection will be met at once when we say that such unintentional and unconscious service has no merit and can have no reward. The moral value of an action must be judged by its motive. If that motive was cruel, selfish, sinful, so was the deed. If God is pleased to counterwork or overrule human schemes for the accomplishment of divine purposes, the glory is exclusively His. Evil men have no share in the rewards of beneficent issues which they did their utmost to prevent, except, indeed, on the principle of “grace.” GRACE? O, yes, this does wonderful things in the hands of the Divine Ruler, and multitudes who had blindly fought against God have, by its anointing eye-salve, seen their folly and offered to Him the homage of contrite and loving hearts. But on this branch of the subject we enter not now.

Every reader of the New Testament must have noticed that certain actions of persons who knew nothing either of the Scriptures or of God are spoken of by the Evangelists as done “that the Scriptures might be fulfilled.” Matthew and John note a number of instances of this kind. “All this was done” that such a prophecy “might be fulfilled.” One of the most striking of these notes is that which accounts for the soldiers casting lots at the foot of the cross. “And they crucified him, and parted his garments, casting lots: that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet. They parted my garments among them, and upon my vesture did they cast lots.”—Matt. xxvii. 35. Of course, it is needless to say that in the class of cases to which this belongs, divine sovereignty is indisputable. The free agency of the executioners in relation to their perquisites is undisturbed, but without knowing it they fulfil a prophecy uttered a thousand years before, and thus attest the Messiahship of the crucified Jesus. It was the blind service of rough heathen men to the truth of God. If you ask for the reconciliation of Divine sovereignty with the unfettered freedom of men, here is a case in point; and this, it is needless to say to any Bible reader, is only one of many that teach the same great lesson.

Let us imagine ourselves at a place called Dothan, somewhere on the north of Samaria, not far from Shechem, and in the line of the caravan track from northern Syria to Egypt. Some shepherds, who are feeding their flocks in that region, have stopped a company of traveling merchants who are on their way to Egypt with spicery, balm and myrrh, as they have something to sell, out of which the traveling merchants may make a handsome profit, if the shepherds do not ask too much for it. No, they will not do that; they are disposed to be liberal on this occasion, and the bargain is struck for twenty pieces of silver. The owners of the caravan are delighted to have this article of commerce for such a trifle, and the shepherds are glad to get rid of it at any price or none. They have sold their young brother into slavery, and jeeringly say, "Now we shall see what will become of his dreams!"

Quite so; they have adopted their policy; they have disclosed their motive; they have gained their end without the crime of murder, of which they thought at first. Of course they must invent a story to deceive the old man; it may break his heart, but they cannot help that; one thing is certain now, and that is all they care about—they will never bow themselves down to the earth before Joseph. The thought of doing that was intolerable, and the dreams of the boy were the phantoms of his ambitious brain, which could never come to anything now, for had they not sent him as a slave to Egypt? They have done their work well—they will hear no more of Joseph. His agonizing cry for mercy will soon be forgotten; its very echo will die from memory; they will busy themselves with their pastoral and family duties, and the lad will no longer trouble them in the visions of the night!

Subsequent events, too, accorded exactly with what these cruel conspirators could have wished; for the poor youth, after a little gleam of sunshine had begun to fall upon him, is thrown into a prison for the crime of loyalty to the law of his God. A prison! The word is fearful, even in countries where something of the spirit of Christian kindness pervades legislation; but heathen dungeons were indescribably horrible—places of torture. Death in them was the coveted blessing. It was not simply confinement to a wretched cell, without a ray of heaven's blessed light, or a breath of heaven's pure air, but fetters in a foetid dungeon which fell to the lot of the miserable prisoner. "And Joseph's master took him and put him into the prison, a place where the king's prisoners were bound; and he was there in the prison."—Gen. xxxix. 20. "Joseph was sold for a slave, they hurt his feet with fetters; he was laid in iron."—Psa. cv. 17, 18. Talk of mysterious providences! Why this seemingly gratuitous suffering and ignominy? Is it not enough that his brethren (!) have sold the noble youth into slavery? Why permit a wretched woman, of whom the pure and lovely of her sex have been ashamed for thirty-five centuries, to drive him to that Egyptian pit of torture? Why—but we need not multiply such questions! They are old, old, my brother! Let them drop!

Let us search for an answer in that very dungeon itself, with its iron-bound captives. God's answer is there! Joseph has to meet a couple of disgraced servants of the King of Egypt in that prison, and through one of them God's answer comes. The sons of Jacob, the Ishmaelite merchants, and the wife of Potiphar, have all been rendering blind service to the blessed purpose of God; as the magnanimous ruler of Egypt put it—see that melting chapter, Gen. xlv.: "Now, therefore, be not grieved nor angry with yourselves that ye sold me hither; for God did send me before you to preserve life." Tried brother, wait? Don't murmur. You will find the solution of all your heart-aches in the Lord's time. To find it sooner will not be good for you.

A royal princess, with her maids of honor, is walking near her father's palace by the side of a celebrated river. Something unusual attracts her attention among the flags; she calls one of her maids to bring it; "and when she had opened it she saw a child; and, behold, the babe wept. And she had compassion on him, and said, This is one of the Hebrews' children." It was. Her father had issued a decree that every son born to the Hebrews should be cast into the river, for he had determined to prevent the further growth of this people. Rigor, oppression, hard service, slavery under cruel taskmasters all failed to wear them out; and now the royal mandate was to cast their male children into the river. But if the nation is thus suppressed, what becomes of God's promise to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, concerning an innumerable posterity, and the heirship of the world? Who will render blind service in this case? The despot himself. The very man who wishes to crush the Hebrews until they perish from the face of the earth listens to his daughter's plea for the life of the beautiful boy she had drawn out of the water. And Moses, chosen by God to deliver the covenant people from bondage, to overthrow the power of Egypt, and prove the impotence of its gods, is nourished and educated at the Egyptian court.

This is all in God's way of doing things in this mystic preparatory age. The Over Ruler touches with His finger the evil machinery of the mischief p'otters, and with a sublime satisfaction He sees a result which will confound them and glorify Him. In this wonderful passage in the chequered story of Abraham's children, it is manifest that the dire oppression to which they were reduced drove them to prayer. Tyranny forced them on their knees. From man they appealed to God. This was the blind service of despotism to the cause of liberty. It was a chapter in the ministry of evil from which thoughtful students may gather wealth. "The children of Israel sighed by reason of the bondage, and they cried, and their cry came up unto God by reason of the bondage. And God heard their groaning, and God remembered His covenant with Abraham, with Isaac and with Jacob. And God looked upon the children of Israel, and God had respect unto them."—Ex. ii. 23-25. "And the Lord said [to Moses out of the burning bush at Horeb], I have surely seen the affliction of my people which are in Egypt, and have heard their cry by reason of their taskmasters; for I know their sorrows; and I am come down to deliver them out of the hand of the Egyptians, and to bring them up out of that land unto a good land and a large, unto a land flowing with milk and honey; . . . Now, therefore, behold, the cry of the children of Israel is come unto me; and I have also seen the oppression wherewith the Egyptians oppress them. Come now, therefore, and I will send thee unto Pharaoh, that thou mayst bring forth my people the children of Israel out of Egypt."—Ex. iii. 7-10

He came unto His own possessions, and His own people received him not."—John i. 11. "This is the heir; come, let us kill him, and possess his inheritance."—Matt. xxi. 38. This is the story of all time, the story which men will reverently talk over in eternity. In it the mystery of godliness and the mystery of iniquity meet. The heir rejected and slain by his tenants, his subjects, his brethren "according to the flesh," who were eagerly longing for his advent, and habitually praying for it in the words of their royal poet (Psa. lxxii.), is a tragedy too dismal for description. "Now, from the sixth hour there was darkness over all the land until the ninth hour."—Matt. xxvii. 45. Darkness is the appropriate symbol for the state of the Jewish mind which led to the deed of Calvary.

But this marvelous infatuation of the Jews, then in possession of Immanuel's land, will not surely be allowed to cut off all blessing from poor lost Israel, wandering upon the mountains of Gentilism, as sheep without a shepherd, and from the Gentiles themselves crying for help to senseless idols. The Over Ruler is too wise and too loving to let this crisis pass without turning it to account in the outflow of His world-wide compassion. Here, happily, our poor logic from the necessities of men and the character of God is not needed; for inspiration anticipates our hopes regarding the blind service of treacherous Judah to the world at large. "Then Paul and Barnabas waxed bold and said, It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you; but seeing ye put it from you and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles. For so hath the Lord commanded us, saying, I have set thee to be a light of the Gentiles, that thou shouldst be for salvation unto the ends of the earth."—Acts xiii. 46, 47. We are forced to exclaim, "Oh the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and the knowledge of God! How unsearchable are His judgments, and His ways past finding out!"—Selected.

"THE LOST TRIBES OF ISRAEL."

In my previous articles I have been preparing the way to consider the question whether the Indians of America are the descendants of any of the lost tribes. The supposition that they are all the lost tribes, I consider a groundless assumption; but that they may be one of the ten tribes, with a sprinkling from one other tribe, is probable, if not certain; and, if so, they are of the tribe of Simeon, with a portion of Levites. The prophecy of Jacob (Gen. xlix. 5-7), with other texts referred to in my previous articles, seem to sustain this position. Let it be borne in mind that the ten tribes were not all carried into captivity at one time, and that at least one hundred and sixty years passed from the first carrying away captive to its final completion; so it is not probable that all the tribes left Assyria at the same time, nor will they all be found in one location. It is highly probable that some went into the farther East, and inhabit AFGHANISTAN, and now call themselves "Beni-Israel"; i.e., Sons of Israel: and who can say that it was not from them the "Wise men of the East" came following "His Star" to see and worship the Infant Saviour and pour out their treasures in offerings to him? But I leave that point now, to ascertain the probability that the Indians of America are also a portion of the lost tribes of Israel.

I proceed in this inquiry by the use of suggestions furnished me by a friend from a book in his possession, printed in 1826. The author, dwelling largely on the prophetic utterances of the restoration of Israel and Judah to "the land wherein their fathers dwelt," goes on to identify the North American Indians as descendants of Israel. He speaks as follows:

Let several suppositions now be made. Suppose an extensive continent had lately been discovered, away north from Media, and at the distance of "a year and a half's journey"; a place probably destitute of inhabitants, to have been lately discovered in that sequestered region, appearing, as we should rationally expect, the nation of Israel to appear at this period, had the account given by the writer in Esdras been a fact. Suppose them to be found in tribes, with heads of tribes, but destitute of letters, and in a savage state. Suppose among their different tribes the following traditional fragments are by credible witnesses picked up; some particulars among one region of them, and some among another; while all appear evidently to be of the same family. Suppose them to have escaped the polytheism of the pagan world, and to acknowledge one, and only one God: the Great Spirit, who created all things seen and unseen. Suppose the name retained by many of them for this Great Spirit to be ALE, the old Hebrew name of God; and Yohewah, whereas the Hebrew name for Lord was JEHOVAH; also they call the Great First Cause, YAH; the Hebrew name being JAH. Suppose you find most of them professing great reverence for this great YOHEWAH; calling him the "great, beneficent, supreme holy spirit," and the only object of worship. Suppose the most intelligent of them to be elated with the idea that this God has ever been the head of their community; that their fathers were once in covenant with him; and the rest of the world were "the accursed people," as out of covenant with God. Suppose you find them, on certain occasions, singing in religious dance, "Hallelujah," or praise to JAH; also singing YOHEWAH, Shileo Yohewah, and making use of many names and phrases evidently Hebrew. You find them counting their time as did ancient Israel, and in a manner different from all other nations: They keep a variety of religious feasts, which much resemble those kept in ancient Israel. You find an evening feast among them, in which a bone of the animal must not be broken; if the provision be more than one family can eat, a neighbor must be called in to help eat it; and if any of it be still left, it must be burned before the next rising sun. You find them eating bitter vegetables to cleanse themselves from sin. You find that they never eat the hollow of the thigh of any animal. They inform you that their fathers practiced circumcision. Some of them have been in the habit of keeping a jubilee. They have their places answering to the cities of refuge in ancient Israel. In these no blood is ever shed by any avenger. You find them with their temples (such as they are) their holy of holies in their temple, into which it is death for a common person to enter. They have their high priests, who officiate in their temples, and made their yearly atonement there in a singular pontifical dress, which they fancy to be in the likeness of one worn by their predecessors in ancient times; with their breast-plate, and various holy ornaments. The high priest, when addressing to his people what they call "the old divine speech," calls them "the beloved and holy people," and urges them to imitate their virtuous ancestors; and tells them of their "beloved land flowing with milk and honey." They tell you that YOHEWAH once chose their nation from all the rest of mankind to be his peculiar people. That a book which God gave was once theirs; and then things went well with them. But other people got it from them, and then they fell under the displeasure of the Great Spirit; but that they shall, at some time, regain it. They inform you that some of their fathers once had the spirit to foretell future events, and to work miracles. Suppose they had their imitation of the ark of the covenant, where are deposited their most sacred things; into which it is death for any common people to look. All their males must appear at the temple at these noted feasts in a year. They inform you of the ancient flood; of the preservation of one family in a vessel; of this man in the ark first sending out a great bird, and then a little one, to see if the waters were gone. That the great one returned no more; but the little one returned with a branch. They tell you of the confusion of languages, once when people were building a great high place; and of the longevity of the ancients; that they "lived until their feet were worn out with walking, and their throats with eating."

You find them with their traditional history that their ancient fathers once lived where people were dreadfully wicked; and that nine-tenths of their fathers took counsel and left that wicked place, being led by the Great Spirit into this country; that they came through a region where it was always winter, snow and frozen. That they came to a great water, and their way hither was thus obstructed, until God dried up the water; (probably it froze between the islands in Behring Strait). You find them keeping an annual feast at the time their ears of corn become fit for use; and none of their corn is eaten until a part of it is brought to this feast, and certain religious ceremonies performed. You find them keeping an annual feast, in which twelve men must cut twelve sapline poles, to make a booth. Here on an altar made of twelve stones, on which no tool may pass, they must sacrifice. You find them with the custom of washing and anointing their dead. And when in deep affliction, lying their hand on their mouth, and their mouth in the dust. Suppose you should find things like these among such a people without books or letters, but wholly in a savage state, in a region of the world lately discovered away in the direction stated by the aforementioned writer in the Apocrypha; and having been ever secluded from the knowledge of the civilized world, would you hesitate to say you had found some of the ten tribes of Israel? and that God sent them to that sequestered region of the earth to keep them there a distinct people during an "out-cast" state of at least two thousand five hundred years? Would you not say, we have just such kind of evidence as must at last bring that people to light among the nations? And would you not say, here is much more evidence of this kind, of their being the people of Israel, than could rationally have been expected, after the lapse of two thousand five hundred years in a savage state? Methinks I hear every person whisper his full assent, that upon the suppositions made, we have found the most essential pile of the prophet Ezekiel's valley of dry bones!

These things are more than mere suppositions. It is believed they are capable of being ascertained as facts, with substantial evidence. Good authorities from men who have been eye and ear witnesses, assure us that these things are facts. But you enquire, Where or who are the people thus described? They are the aborigines of our own continent. Their place, their language, their traditions, amount to all that has been hinted. These evidences are not all found among any one tribe of Indians. Nor may all the Indians in any tribe, where various of these evidences are found, be able to exhibit them. It is enough if what they call their beloved aged men, in one tribe, have clearly exhibited some of them; and others exhibited others of them; and if among their various tribes the whole have been by various of their beloved or wise men exhibited. This, it is stated, has been the fact. Men have been gradually perceiving this evidence for more than half a century; and new light has been from time to time shed on the subject, as will appear.

EDITOR'S CONCLUDING REMARKS.—The evidence given in the foregoing extract, if true, is strong presumptive proof that the Indians are some portion of the descendants of ancient Israel; but not "the ten tribes," as a whole; that is impossible. The prophecies of Jacob and Moses concerning the tribe of Joseph (Gen. xlix. 22-26, and Deut. xxxiii. 13-17) are a bulwark against such a conclusion. Please read these two prophetic utterances. But that the North American Indians may be the descendants of the "cruel" SIMEON, and partakers of his deceitful and murderous disposition, is strongly in favor of the idea that they are one of the lost tribes, and the offsprings of that wicked son of Jacob, whose warth he cursed.

SONS OF LIGHT.

"Ye are all the children of light, and the children of the day; we are not of the night, nor of darkness."—1 Thess. v. 5.

THIS is a great saying, a splendid eulogy both for knowledge and privilege on the part of the Thessalonian brethren. The statement acquires double strength from its twofold aspect, positive and negative: "Ye are all sons of light and sons of day; we are not of night nor of darkness." There is also a sharp double contrast between light and darkness, day and light, metaphors taken from the natural world with which every one is familiar, and which, therefore, no one can misunderstand. Light, as the symbol of knowledge, and darkness as that of ignorance, are so manifestly appropriate that they commend themselves at once without argument—"Light" as the revealing and "Darkness" as the concealing agent. And when the regularly recurring natural phenomena of day and night are imported as symbols into the mental region, we see how God makes use of his works to enforce the lessons of his word. Creation is his picture book by which he illustrates his "word of salvation"; and the mind of the student is helped to holy thought by the "wonderful works of God."

Language is founded upon the visible; you cannot move a step without it. The line just written contains no fewer than four metaphors: "founded," suggesting a building; "visible," that which is seen by the bodily eye; "move" and "step," physical acts. And if the phrase is varied to "intellectual progress," nothing is gained in the way of escape from our picture book; for the very idea of progress is founded on literal motion. Even in what is called abstract thought, if there be any such thing,—which is a legitimate question for a debating society,—however high you may soar in the intellectual heavens, you are still tied to the earth, like the school boy's kite; for the term "abstract" is undoubtedly borrowed from our excellent and useful fellow citizen, the chemist. Nay, more, as the kite could not float in the air at all without its guiding string, no more can we gaze on heavenly things without the aid of those that are earthly. Our senses are adapted to the material world, which is full of charming lessons to the sons of light. They wish to have, and they have, rich mental luxury in heaven: but the foot of the ladder by which they reach those dainties stands upon the earth. Paul's predicate respecting the Thessalonian believers richly merits, and will surely repay, earnest attention.

1. Those whom the Redeemer is "not ashamed to call brethren" (Heb. ii. 11), are "sons of light," notwithstanding personal infirmities.

If perfection, in any sense of that term, were essential to Christian fellowship, or a condition of adopting the Christian name, it is obvious that Christ could have neither Church nor individual follower upon earth. Let me crave close attention to this, for though the thing is simply a truism, yet it clears the way for some remarks which are greatly needed. There is a spurious spiritualism, the injurious action of which I have witnessed in hundreds of instances. It sometimes manifests its disagreeable presence by lamentations over headaches and heart-aches, the troubles of the world, and "this mortal clog" the body, all which things are deliberately set down as direct hindrances to piety, cruel enemies of that hearty consecration to God which is the privilege, and should be the characteristic, of all his children. And then, to show that this is perfectly right, the authority of some verse of pious nonsense is quoted about liberating the "immortal soul" from its "prison," such as

"Welcome sweet hour of full discharge
That sets our longing souls at large!
Unwinds our chains, breaks up our cell,
And gives us with our God to dwell."

We hope none of our readers require to be told that to find fault with our physical constitution as a hindrance to our spiritual life is to charge God foolishly. We are the work of his hands. We are fearfully and wonderfully made. And the grace he has sent us in the heart, and by the hands of his Son, our glorious Elder Brother, was intended to meet our case, here and now, just as we are—was intended for men with head-aches and heart-aches for men encompassed with infirmity. For perfect beings the Gospel of Christ is entirely unsuited. Let us, just because we are earthen vessels, broken pitchers, let the light shine through the cracks, that God may be glorified for kindling the Shekinah in such frail temples.

Frequently, too, this unhealthy spiritualism, this morbid piety, comes out in the prayer-meeting. It is really distressing to hear the names by which Christian men call themselves when speaking to God. Miserable offenders, great sinners, utterly worthless, hard-hearted, spiritually dead, hell-deserving rebels! Such are a few of the choice epithets which God's children bestow upon themselves when speaking to their Father who has called them by his grace, and adopted them into his family, and made them one with his dear Son. If they mean all this, where is their gratitude for what has been done for them? If they do not mean it, but have got into the habit of calling themselves bad names as an evidence of their deep humility, it is a bad habit, it is spurious piety, it is sickly spiritualism, and it is false humility. The prayer-meeting—of course, we are assuming that those who pray audibly are saved men—loses half its holy meaning if it is not essentially a praise meeting, a little gathering of children burdened with gratitude for the Divine things that have been done for them, and making their chief prayer an earnest petition for grace to glorify their God and Saviour. The sons of light must be light-bearers. Christ, the glorious central light from which all our little lamps are kindled, was in all points tried as we are, yet he never complained; why should we? His Father's glory was his supreme object; should it not be ours?

2. The sons of light should shine in the midst of surrounding darkness.

Repeated precept to this effect is found in the Book. "Ye are the light of the world. . . Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father, who is in heaven."—Matt. v. 14, 16. "Ye were once darkness, but now are ye light in the Lord; walk as children of light."—Eph. v. 8. "Shine ye as lights in the world."—Phil. ii. 15. The need of these precepts is implied in the fact that they are given; but, strictly speaking, there should have been no need for them. It is the nature of light to shine; and Christians in a healthy state will show forth the praises of him who hath called them out of darkness into his marvellous light. But the Lord saw what a guilty hiding of his light there would be under all sorts of coverings during the dark ages, and it was very needful to call attention repeatedly to the candlesticks and the stars. But the sons of light, whilst always under obligation to reflect the light that falls upon them from the Sun of the moral universe, should consider it their special duty and privilege now to shine in the midst of surrounding darkness. If they do not, who will, who can? If the trumpet give an uncertain sound, who shall prepare himself for battle? If the guides mislead, alas for the traveller? If the watchman sleep, woe to the city! The Lord has not committed his truth and character to the keeping of kings and governments, as such, but to saints, believers, sons of light. They are his witnesses. Upon them the wonderful honor devolves of guarding this Divine deposit. They alone can appreciate its priceless value, for they only have felt its enlightening and cleansing power. Witnesses in his high court of heaven, before the bar of the world, must be able to say, "We have heard him ourselves." To repeat what others have said is not evidence before an English judge. Legal testimony must be original, not second hand. So the light of Divine truth must shine in the world's darkness from men who are themselves "sons of light."

3. The sons of light are living proofs of the Redeemer's work.

There is no commentary on the Gospel equal to the holy life of a believer. Living epistles speak for themselves, and all classes and conditions of men alike can read them. The unlettered peasant, who has no conception what the word logic means, has, nevertheless, logic enough to trace a godly life to a believing heart. Even the man who has no nobler aspiration than rent-roll or fruitful investment has enough true perception to place Christian excellence to the credit of Jesus Christ. Here is a bold and conclusive argument for St. Paul's apostolic commission: "Do we begin again to commend ourselves, or need we, as some others, letters of commendation either to you or from you? Ye are our epistle written on our hearts, known and read of all men, manifestly declared to be an epistle of Christ ministered by us, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God, not upon tablets of stone, but upon the fleshly tablets of the heart." Every day brings forth unquestionable testimony that the work of Christ is a successful reality. You are welcome to a large margin for counterfeits, but there is still left much Divine gold, well tried in the fire, and bearing the image and superscription of the Great King. Besides, your counterfeits are themselves witnesses that the genuine exists. If it did not, what would there be to imitate? The existence of hypocrites is the world's testimony to the sons of light.

Our Lord failed not to instruct his disciples on this subject. He was about to leave them. This departure was expedient as an essential part of the arrangement for the Christian dispensation; but the absent Leader must have representative followers, hence: "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you, and ordained you that ye should go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain."—John xv. 16. "As thou has sent me into the world, even so have I also sent them into the world."—xvii. 18. "As my Father has sent me, even so send I you."—xx. 21. They went forth, therefore, under the impressive thought that they were commissioned representatives of the Holy One of God. Would the mere fact of apostolic, evangelistic, or pastoral office meet the requirements of the case? Most certainly not! Never, until the so-called Church had sunk into disgraceful degradation did the notion of official Christianity enter the mind of man. Nothing but Christ likeness could give evidence that the work of the adorable Redeemer had borne gracious fruit, and such fruit can only be found in the hearts and lives of the sons of light.

4. The sons of light are the sons of God.

"God is light, and in him is no darkness at all." (1 John i. 5.) The sublimity of this declaration is unsurpassed. It charms the mind with wonder and joy: God, our Father, light without any darkness—essential, perfect, holy, eternal light without shade or shadow. Or, as James puts it, a beautiful bit of New Testament astronomy and theology combined. "Every good gift and every perfect gift cometh down from above, from the Father of the lights of heaven, with whom is no variable-ness or shadow of turning." No change, no eclipse ("shadow of turning"), but always the same! The great, full-orbed splendor of the idea must be allowed to produce its proper impression on reverent hearts. Your firstly, secondly and thirdly here, about wisdom, purity, and omniscience, are irreverent intruders of the pedantic type. Keep back! Let the magnificent brilliant send its rays through all time, without either help or hindrance from man. God is Light! If men would but believe that, the frightful things that have saddened strong minds and maddened weak minds in connection with the gospel, would soon perish in the consuming fire of his glorious truth. To "know God" is life (John xvii. 3), and, of course, joy unspeakable and full of glory. In this knowledge the strong may brave all life's storms—in this knowledge the weak may nestle and sleep in peace!

But if such be their Father, what manner of men should his sons be? This question contains its own answer. But hear the guide Book on the subject: "I send thee to open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and inheritance among them which are sanctified by faith that is in me." (Acts xxvi. 17, 18.) "Ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people; that ye should show forth the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light." (1 Pet. ii. 9.) "If we say that we have fellowship with him and walk in darkness, we lie and do not the truth: but if we walk in the light as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth us from all sin." (1 John i. 6, 7.) This is enough. The thing is obvious. There is no room for argument. The sons of light, notwithstanding circumstantial infirmities, must be essentially like their Father, or the title to sonship is not produced.

5. The sons of light have a glorious future.

This is in the nature of things. The order of the moral universe must be sustained. It is not to be dislocated because of our purblind ecclesiastical theories, our exaltation of creed above life, and our sorrowful mistakes respecting the nature of man and the character of God. The Father will not lose sight of one of his children. The Saviour—the giver of immortality—must have a full reward. Hear, again, the Book of the Kingdom: "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever." (Dan. xii. 3.) "The path of the just is as the shining light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day." (Prov. iv. 18.) "Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father." (Matt. xiii. 43.) Glorious day when this illustrious company of the sons of light shall shine as the sun, without spot or wrinkle, or any such thing, to the praise and honor of their Father in Christ!—Selected.

REGENERATION.

BY LUCRETIA B. LAMB.

"Ye which have followed me, in the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit upon the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel."—Matt. xix. 28.

This precious work, all will admit, is yet future; so also is the regeneration. The generations descending from Adam on the plane of the flesh, are, past and present, of the earth, earthy; the head of the regeneration is the Lord from heaven, who took upon him the nature of the first generation, and was tempted that he might be a faithful High Priest in things pertaining to God, and be the first-born according to the flesh and the first-born from the dead, or regeneration; after his birth from the tomb manifesting the truth of his declaration to Nicodemus, when he came to inquire of him. Jesus said, "Ye must be born again." This surprised Nicodemus, and he inquired how this could be. Jesus said that which was born of the flesh is flesh, and that which was born of the Spirit was spirit, and declared the power of those born of the Spirit—or regenerated—to which he gave full proof after his resurrection, or regeneration, as the Head of a new creation.

He told Nicodemus that those born of the Spirit, or regeneration, would move about unseen by mortals as the wind moves unseen by mortals. So, Jesus would appear in the midst of the disciples, the doors being shut, and vanish out of their sight as readily. He was not an unembodied or a mere spirit, as he told his disciples when they were frightened at his appearance. He said "a spirit hath not flesh and bones," as he had. I conceive him to be a spiritual body that could take what form he pleased, and be present and yet invisible to mortals. So Jesus, I conceive, is with his people, the head of the regeneration, and has been, agreeable to his promise, ever since he was glorified at the right hand of the Father. "Lo, I am with you (said he) always, even unto the end of the age."

I understand John to be speaking of those in the regeneration, when he said those "born of God could not sin, because they were born of God," or were regenerated. To be consistent he could not say this, for he tells his brethren that "if any man say he has no sin, he is a liar, and the truth is not in him." We have abundant proof that not one of the generation of Adam has lived without sin, except Jesus Christ himself.

How rich the thought that, although we bear the image of the earthy, in our conflict with sin, tending to corruption, we are to bear the image of the heavenly, and, with our blessed Lord, behold the glory he had with the Father before the world was. This he desired of the Father to grant his disciples, and finally all that should believe on him through their word, which reaches down to us now living as one with him, as he and the Father are one, and also manifested to the world that the Father loves us as he loves his Son Jesus. We might well call this wild enthusiasm, were it not the very words of him who spoke as never man spake. In its contemplation the mind is filled with joy unspeakable. Oh! then, what must the reality be, when, with open face, we behold the glory of the Lord in the regeneration, and are changed into the same image, from glory to glory!

"Oh! soon may come that moment,
When brighter far than morn,
The sunshine of thy glory
Shall on thy people dawn."

LETTERS AND EXTRACTS.

FROM POLLY G. PITTS.

BRO. STORRS: I write to let you know that I still bless God for holding up and sending out the BIBLE EXAMINER, and in doing so he is conferring a great blessing on its readers and supporters in holding you up and strengthening you in body and mind to send it out laden with such precious truths, that it leads us on to know the Lord, whom to know aright is life eternal. There is in every EXAMINER as they come, some deep new view of God's precious living word that leads us lovingly on with a desire to know more and more of his glorious character. Oh how precious has my meditation of him and his justice and judgment been of late; thanks be unto our Redeemer for the gift of his holy Spirit! Oh, what sweet "songs in the night," and especially toward the morning watches, has that blessed Spirit opened my understanding to sing and feel and know, in my very inward life, the deep meaning! Oh, I shall bless God forever for giving me that free Spirit to show me that "God is love," that the atonement is sufficient, and Christ is willing; yes, it was his meat and drink to do the will of his Father in heaven, and the Father's will to give Christ power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as he had given him; and this is life eternal to know the only true God and Jesus Christ whom God hath sent. Oh! why do any eventually perish! Jesus says, "Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life." But we bless God that it is his will that all should come to the knowledge of the truth; and that his love and justice will give every creature one blessed opportunity to know God and Jesus Christ, whom he hath sent.

While meditating the other night on God's ways with the human family, and his mercy and longsuffering, I opened my Bible and read Psalm lxxix., which gave me much matter for meditation since. The writer, whether David or Asaph, must have spoken by inspiration, for as far as I can learn all these calamities had not come on Jerusalem in their days. The writer says, "Oh God, the heathen are come into thine inheritance; thy holy temple have they defiled; they have laid Jerusalem on heaps. The dead bodies of thy servants have they given to be meat unto the fowls of heaven; the flesh of thy saints unto the beasts of the earth. Their blood have they shed like water round about Jerusalem; and there was none to bury them. We are become a reproach to our neighbors, a scorn and derision to them that are round about us." It seems that the prophet, in deep anguish, asks the question, "How long, Lord? wilt thou be angry for ever? shall thy jealousy burn like fire? Pour out thy wrath upon the heathen that have not known thee, and upon the kingdoms that have not called upon thy name." Oh! prophet of the Lord, didst thou not know that Jerusalem had grievously sinned? and that our God is just and righteous in all he doeth? and therefore the punishment of the iniquity of the daughter of my people is greater than the punishment of the sin of Sodom, that was overthrown in a moment, and no hands stayed on her. While meditating the heartfelt sorrow of all God's holy prophets, when asking the important question, "How long? Oh Lord, how long?" Yes, "how long shall the enemy triumph and thy people mourn?" When looking at these things I feel what blessed food for meditation are these words of God. "For so he giveth his beloved sleep." And, "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord, from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them." Bless the Lord. And Job saith, "As the waters fail from the sea, and the flood decayeth and drieth up, so man lieth down and riseth not, till the heavens be no more; he shall not awake nor be raised out of his sleep. Oh that thou wouldst hide me in the grave, that thou wouldst keep me secret, until thy wrath be past; that thou wouldst appoint me a set time, and remember me! all the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come." Job xiv 11-14. Question, "Where will you wait, Job?" Answer, "If I wait, the grave is mine house; I have made my bed in darkness, I have said to corruption, Thou art my father; to the worm, thou art my mother and my sister," etc.

While meditating on many, yes, very many of those glorious passages of Holy Writ that prove conclusively that man is unconscious in death, and all his hope of living again is by a resurrection from the dead, through Jesus Christ our Lord, how surprising that any who read God's Word and are following on to know him, should believe in a disembodied spiritual existence for man after death, though not perfect as they will be after the resurrection, yet alive to the passing of time. Oh, it seems to me if so, it would be one vast assembly of sorrowful questioners, and their ceaseless cry would be, "How long? Oh Lord, how long?" and as the slow rolling centuries pass one after another, and their numbers are increasing, bringing sad account from this sin-cursed earth, how must the vehement cry of, How long, Oh Lord? how long? increase in volumes in the vast assembly? But, thank God, it is not so; it is only tradition, the effort of erring men to hold up the immortality of the soul. No, no; "we shall sleep, but not forever." There will be a glorious dawn; blessed be God, we fall asleep and the thoughts perish, but the next thought to us will be the glorious resurrection. All time is annihilated to the sleepers; if not, where is the blessedness and the rest from labors?

May God give us strength to follow on to know him continually, whom to know aright is life eternal. Your sister in the Lord, watching for the coming of our Lord.

Fredericksburg, Iowa, March, 1879.

FROM ELD. S. W. BISHOP.

BRO. STORRS: To me the last EXAMINER is the most interesting number that you have issued since the beginning of the present volume.

Your editorial, headed THE THREE BEWILDERED SISTERS, is truthful, pointed and good.

It has been a feast to both myself and wife to read the last issue of your invaluable Magazine. The thought often comes home to me, especially when I learn of your scanty means, what could we do without the monthly visits of the BIBLE EXAMINER? It is the only periodical published in which the government of God is fully defended from the odium cast upon it by the false teachings of the "THREE BEWILDERED SISTERS." It is the only publication in this great Republic that takes hold, with a firm, unawed (by man) and unsparing hand, to lift the veil of ecclesiastical fog that has for centuries obscured the true light of the glorious Gospel of the Son of God, and turned away the eyes of the masses from seeing the infinite loveliness of the Divine character, and has turned the heart worship of Christians to an extent, at least, from a holy, loving admiration of an affectionate Father, to efforts to propitiate an infinite tyrant.

It is true, indeed, that your sacrifices and unselfish labor of love in trying to enlighten the people and vindicate the Divine government, is not now appreciated by the multitude, or even by those who have profited in the past, under the blessing of God, by your searchings after truth; neither are you rewarded, as you should be, by the hearty co-operation of all who are now your friends; but you may rest assured that out from among the great mass of those who are wedded to "the three bewildered sisters," there have come a few whose hearts have been so warmed by the burning words of truth, that find an utterance through the BIBLE EXAMINER, that they are fed as with the bread of heaven.

Some of us would most gladly help the EXAMINER, pecuniarily, but we are poor. After having given the best years of our lives to a free dissemination of the light of truth, and having travelled so far over the road in the investigation after truth, that we have so far outstripped those who once entertained an ecclesiastical esteem for us, that we have lost their esteem, and brought down upon our heads their formulated anathemas, there is little else that remains for us in this age but to serve God faithfully, still walk in the light of truth, and suffer for the sake of the truth, always remembering that "If we suffer we shall also reign with him; if we deny him, he also will deny us."

The day of rewards is near, and if we are found, at its dawning, fully qualified, we shall receive "an incorruptible crown."

You have our most earnest prayers that our loving Father will bless you "with all spiritual blessings in Christ Jesus," and with an abundance of all things that are for your good in this life, and may we meet to rejoice and work in the eternal ages!

Your brother and companion in tribulation.

West Meriden, Conn., April, 1879.

FROM ELD. J. S. LAWVER.

BRO. STORRS: A theologian said to me, "The wicked will certainly be always in fire as a punishment." I replied, very well; what is the nature of fire? is it not to consume? The idea has to be formed first, then a name suitable to the character of that idea is formed by which to express it—to explain it—so that the idea can be made intelligible to others than the one who generated it. The Greek language contains no name for "steam engine," for the good reason that no such idea had ever entered the mind of man in its days, there not being such an engine in existence when the language was being formed and perfected. So where did the word fire originate? not till fire existed. Has there ever been but one kind of fire known, the nature of which is to consume that on which it feeds? If there were such a thing or element known that looked like fire, but the nature of which was to preserve, would the name fire express it properly as long as we have an element called fire which has a directly opposite nature, viz.: that of consuming? So, where did the word dead come from, if no one ever died? if it was not a total cessation of the vital functions? The word dead could not have been framed until some one had died, and then was called dead, as it is generally understood. The great law of antithesis governs all words. Life is the antithesis of death. If life does not mean life—a conscious being—then death does not mean being dead—unconscious.

The theologian replied, that "Death, when attributed to the human family, meant a separation of the soul from the body, and a second death a separation from God."

I answered him by quoting James v. 20, showing that, if he took the Bible to determine the meaning of the word death, it would destroy his own theory, viz.: "Death being a separation of soul from the body,"—"Let him know, that he which converteth the sinner from the error of his way, shall save a soul from" being "separated from the body;" and that to get the soul out of this prison-house, or body, they must continue in sin, or die sinners!

He said, that "it had reference to a death that never dies."

Then, said I, according to the law of antithesis, the opposite would be, "the life that never lived." What kind of a thing would that be?

Then he said that it meant, "to the righteous, the gate to endless joy; and to the wicked the gate to everlasting torment."

Said I, Do you mean that the righteous are recompensed in heaven?

He answered, "Yes."

Then, said I, You make Prov. xi. 31, read like this: "Behold the righteous shall be recompensed in heaven; much more the wicked and the sinner." Then it is a fact that the wicked and the sinner will be recompensed much more than the righteous in heaven, according to the teaching of the sectarian world. And more than that—Paul said, in Acts xx. 20, that he "kept back nothing that was profitable unto men"—and, in verse 27, he said, "For I have not shunned to declare unto you ALL the counsel of God." Now where do you ever read of Paul's preaching such a doctrine as death being everlasting torment or eternal misery to the wicked, and that death meant "die and go to heaven" to the good, or that it meant hell to the wicked, in the sectarian sense? Paul never once mentioned the word "hell;" much less, in "ALL the counsel of God," did he mention such a thing as everlasting torment or eternal misery in any of his fourteen epistles. If he declared the whole counsel of God, and kept back nothing that was profitable unto men, why do you declare "another gospel" that he never declared, and upon which he asked a curse? Gal. i. 8, 9.

The sectarian world puts me in mind of an old Indian chief who got lost when away from his wigwam. He could not find his wigwam. He sat down on a log to take a rest and to reflect; he smote his hand upon his breast and said, "Indian lost!" He reflected a moment, and thought such an acknowledgment would not become the dignity of a chief, and a happy thought struck him: "Indian not lost; wigwam lost!" and jumped up and gave a victorious shout—he wasn't lost, he was right there; but exactly where the wigwam was, was not quite so clear to himself.

So, my theological friend said, to quiet himself and to answer me:

"Well, just do right and it will be well with us when death comes."

The question then next to be discussed would be, what is right? What was the word "right," framed to express?

Yours for the truth, without fear or favor.
Columbus, Kansas.

ELD. J. H. MAY, Benton Co., Arkansas, writes: I wish to express my gratitude for the BIBLE EXAMINER. It gladdened my heart, causing joy inexpressible for such glorious light on the subject in which I am much interested. The light is spreading in this part of the country. I am preaching all I can. I preach for the brethren in South West City, Mo. They are a noble band of true-hearted, zealous soldiers of the Cross. They seem determined to be "overcomers" and fully answer the purpose of God in their high calling. This is a glorious hope. Let us be inspired by it to undergo all trials or persecutions in order to be sharers with our glorious Head in the Kingdom of God. If we gain that glory and honor we must now deny ourselves of all ungodliness, and become dead to the world, perfecting holiness in the sight of God. Says John, "He that hath this hope in him purifieth himself even as Christ is pure"—1 John iii. 3. If trials and persecutions come, let us meet them with a smile; for our Father tells us they are all for our good to those who are called according to his purpose. Let us be patient in tribulation, knowing that our Saviour had to undergo all this for a pattern, that we should follow his steps in order to be exalted with him in his throne. When he was reviled he reviled not again. Then let us look unto Jesus who is the author and finisher of our faith, as Bro. Lawver said to me, "follow our CONDUCTOR and we need fear no danger." I am doing all I can to spread the light by public and private talking. May both reader and writer, in "the dispensation of the fulness of times," be gathered together in Christ, to unite with the whole creation in ascribing praises to him who died for us: to whom belongs the honor, glory and the kingdom. Amen.

M. C. HARRIMAN, N. H., writes: I send one dollar toward my subscription for the EXAMINER. Had I the means that many have, I should rejoice to make it a thousand, as I believe by so doing the satisfaction and benefit would be far greater than in laying up, as many say, "for a wet day." Though it may not be my place to find fault with those who have plenty, an abundance is good; but how to do good with an abundance is very good. I expect the time will come when wealth will not be the all-absorbing idea; as it certainly will not with the chosen sons of God, with whom I hope to be numbered, although entirely unworthy; yet the seed of desire has been sown, not in my own will but by him who knoweth the end from the beginning; so that if unfit for that exalted place, the desire and hope for it can be nothing against me in whatever place the goodness of God sees fit to put me. "Seek earnestly the best gifts," and "wait patiently the coming of the Lord" and the reward he will bring with him.

DR. W. D. NELSON, Fulton County, Ill., writes: I would be lost without the BIBLE EXAMINER. According to my view of the Bible, it mostly divides the Word right. Our sectarian preachers are improving on the old heathen doctrine of eternal torment. It was once the rule to preach it; but now it is the exception. Our Advent friends are trying hard to prove that all who do not accept of Christ, from the creation to the second advent, are eternally lost. But if so, how can he be "the Saviour of the world?" How can he be "the propitiation for the sins of the whole world?" How could it be that he "tasted death for every man," and yet the great majority for whom he died be lost forever? That view does not harmonize with the Word of God, or I am no judge of harmony. Your arguments on the promise and oath of God to Abraham, are surely unanswerable. The only possible way to shake them, is to receive man's conjectures instead of the Word of God; and they would not shake but very little, even then.

MRS. L. H. WHITNEY, Mass., writes: I am edified in reading the many rich thoughts of the writers of the BIBLE EXAMINER; and my prayer is, God speed the right way; though oftentimes my mind is in a quandary to know what the truth is, there are so many seemingly different expositions of Scripture; but I expect the Lord will, finally, make all plain.

L. VON ESCHEN, Wisconsin, writes: We like the EXAMINER, and it is next to our Bible, and the precious Gospel truths are spreading. I might write you many things, but I forbear. I am doing all I can to be ready for the Master's coming, and also to gain others. I wish to work for the Lord all I can and as he has commanded. I hope the good Lord will guide us into all truth; I thank him for the light he has permitted to shine into my heart; may it ever increase till my work is done. May we all soon meet in the blessed kingdom.

DEATH'S DOINGS.

ROBERT STEELE, of Philadelphia, Pa., died suddenly at his daughter's, at Tacony, N. J., Sunday, March 23d. At twenty minutes to 8 o'clock A. M., he complained of feeling oppressed, then soon felt better, but fell to the floor insensible and died in a few minutes without a word or struggle. He was 68 years of age.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—Bro. Steele was one of my long and tried friends. He has been exceeding deaf for years, but has been a constant subscriber for my publications; and, I doubt not, fell asleep in Jesus, our coming Lord and REDEEMER.

WILLIAM EVANS, Lynn, Mass., died Feb. 22d, aged 72 years and 9 months. He was born in Shropshire, England, 1806, and came to this country in 1840, and first made his home in New York City. He was much interested in the Advent movement of 1843-4, and in the question of the "SIX SERMONS" on "inherent immortality," and became a believer in the doctrine that man was not immortal except by a union with Christ and the resurrection from the dead. He was one of the first readers of the BIBLE EXAMINER and its supporter; he continued to do so till his death. He was more and more interested in its teachings, and gloried in the consummation of God's great plan in the coming ages. He now sleeps in Jesus, but will come forth at the coming and call of his REDEEMER.

He leaves a wife, children and grandchildren to mourn his loss; Sister Evans is feeble in health, but strong in faith that "all things work together for good to those who love God."

G. H. W.

ANSON F. CRESSY, Oxford, Conn., fell asleep in Christ April 2d, 1879, at the age of 45. He had suffered with disease for some months past, which seemed to terminate in congestion of the lungs. He was able to be around till March 30th, but on the 31st he was taken very sick. On the first of April he became unconscious, and continued so till the next evening, when he gently passed away. He leaves a wife and three children. May they take comfort in the thought that they will meet again in due season.

A SIGN OF THE TIMES.

THE following paragraph, which recently appeared in the New York Sun, is significant as showing that devout and thinking minds are beginning to see and acknowledge God's character and government in its scriptural light, and to reject the God-dishonoring dogma of eternal torments. The action of the Congregational council in accepting Mr. Whiton with his open rejection of popular theology and his enlarged views of human destiny, shows a hopeful change in the public mind and that sectarianism is losing its power to suppress individual research and proclamation of honest convictions. The Sun says:

"It is now in order for the Rev. Dr. Dexter of the Boston Congregationalist and the other watchman on the walls of orthodoxy to blow as loud and shrill an alarm in Zion as their lungs are equal to. The Rev. James Whiton is best known as the author of a book entitled "Is Eternal Punishment Endless?" In this book he sets forth his reasons for hoping that those who have not heard the Gospel in this world, or have only heard it caricatured by erring or stupid preachers, will have a chance given them in the next world; also, that the incorrigible sinners, instead of being eternally tortured, will be annihilated, or rather will annihilate themselves. A Congregational church in Newark asked the Rev. Mr. Whiton to become its pastor, and a council was duly convened to pass upon his qualifications for that sacred office. The President of the largest Congregational college and one of the largest Congregational theological seminaries in the country took the chair. The Rev. Mr. Whiton, so far from recanting his heretical opinions, avowed and justified them. Yet the council by a vote of 29 to 3, decided to proceed with the installation. No wonder that the Rev. Dr. Dexter's heart is disquieted within him."

THE MYSTERY OF CHASTISEMENT.

• We glory also in tribulations.—Rom. v. 3.

Within this leaf, to every eye
So little worth, doth hidden lie
Most rare and subtle fragranccy.
Wouldst thou its secret wealth unbind?
Crush it, and thou shalt perfume find
Sweet as Arabia's spicy wind.

In this dull stone, so poor and bare
Of shape or lustre, patient care
Will find for thee a jewel rare.
But first, must skillful hand essay,
With file and flint, to clear away
The film that hides its fire from day.

This leaf! this stone! it is thy heart;
It must be crushed by pain and smart,
It must be cleansed by sorrow's art,

Ere it will yield a fragrance sweet,
Ere it will shine, a jewel meet
To lay before the dear Lord's feet.

—S. Wilberforce.

HUMAN approbation is a very good thing, when it happens to come incidentally; but it must never be made an object. The desire of truth must reign supreme, and everything else be welcomed only if coming in her train.

TERMS: $2.00 PER ANNUM, IN ADVANCE.

EDITORIAL NOTICES.

We are under great obligations to Bro. Spencer for assistance in issuing this number of the BIBLE EXAMINER. Although his time is fully occupied in his own business, he kindly volunteered his aid in helping us through. H. W. S.

The list of "Letters Received" is necessarily omitted from this No. of the EXAMINER, and, therefore, our friends must take it for granted that their remittances have been duly received, where they have not been acknowledged by mail.

BRO. JACOB BLAIN, Buffalo, N. Y., who is now 88 years of age, writes that, although very weak and can walk but little, he has no sickness and no pain. We hope our friends will remember our dear brother, whose heart is gladdened by the light of the blessed Word that "God is Love," which shall be "testified to all men in due time."

The pamphlets, "The Divine Dispensations" and "The Promise and Oath of God to Abraham," have both been reprinted in this volume of the EXAMINER, making it the most valuable volume yet published.

THE BIBLE EXAMINER is a Monthly Magazine. Terms, $2 00 per year, in advance.

Subscribers' Names should be written very plain. Do not neglect this. It is utterly impossible sometimes to decipher names, and mistakes must occur in consequence. As to their Address, give simply the name of the Post-Office and State.

Let all Correspondents be careful to address me as follows:

GEO. STORRS,
72 Hicks Street,
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

All "Postal Money-Orders" sent me should be drawn on Brooklyn, N. Y.

To Clubs the BIBLE EXAMINER will be supplied on the following terms:

Two copies to one address,	$3
Four " " " "	5
Ten " " " "	10

The ten may be divided and sent to the address of two persons, if desired. The prices fixed above are expected to be paid in advance and the money sent at the risk of the subscribers.

Any person wishing either volume of the EXAMINER in sheets—that is unbound—shall have it on receipt of one dollar. The volumes that I can supply are 18, 19, 20, 21, and 22; only a few, however, of volume 20.

BOUND VOLUMES.—The BIBLE EXAMINER, bound, can be now furnished at $2 per volume in neat, plain binding; in morocco, with gilt edges, $3.25. Volumes 18, 19, 20, 21 and 22 can be had of me at the prices named per volume.

REMITTANCES.—In these times of theft and robbery no one should venture money by mail except by a "Postal Money-Order," if you can get one. If that cannot be done have your letter "Registered" at the office where mailed. Even then its safety depends on the honesty of the officials who take charge of the letter. It is, perhaps, just as safe to send small sums in a letter, sealed and properly directed, without registering, as with.

The next best thing to a "Postal Money-Order" in remitting money is a Draft on some Banking House in New York City, payable to me or my order. GEO. STORRS.

SR. JANETT MAYO writes: I am thankful that I live to see the truth in regard to God's love for the race, his plan of saving them. The life I now live I live by faith on the Son of God, who gave himself for me. It is a great blessing to live where we can grow in knowledge and get acquainted with God. I love to think of his power and goodness; his willingness to save. I thank God I can see that he is love. Glory to his name! Things look very beautiful ahead.

REBUILDING JERUSALEM.

THE scheme for the rebuilding of Jerusalem seems to be now seriously contemplated. Sir Moses Montefiore and the Jews of the old school cast their longing eyes toward the ancient city of their solemnities. Not only has the great Jewish baronet repeatedly journeyed to Palestine, that he might improve the condition of the resident Jews, on whom he has lavished large sums, but he is now working away for the re-establishment of the Jews at Jerusalem, and with that view has recommenced the building of that city.

He has recently given orders to prepare for cultivation all the land in the front of the Judah Torah houses in Jerusalem. The rocks will be removed, terraces built all along, as it used to be in the time of King Solomon, and divided into twenty two partitions, so that every inmate of the Torah houses may cultivate the necessary vegetables, etc., for himself and family. Sir Moses has also caused a very large cistern to be constructed in the centre of the field, which will secure a full supply of water for all of them. There will be a beautiful veranda in front of the houses, so as to protect the inmates from the glare and light of a burning sun. The veranda was sent direct from London.

He has also had a new entrance made in the centre of the boundary-wall, built a lodge for a watchman, and had a large bell affixed to one of the houses, to give the alarm in case of emergency. The Jews in Jerusalem, on the whole, are very poor, and just now are suffering great trials and privations; but many of them are beginning to lift up their heads, believing that their redemption draweth nigh.—Presbyterian.

BIBLE EXAMINER.

"One Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time."—1 TIM. II: 4-6.

VOL. XXIII.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER, 1879.

No. 9.

THE EDITOR.

AFTER a suspension of the EXAMINER for five months, I again appear before my readers, though in great weakness of body, but strong in faith that God doeth all things well; and if the "Captain of our salvation was made perfect through suffering," shall we refuse to be? "If children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together." To suffer with him is to possess the same spirit of submission to our heavenly Father's will in whatever lot he shall appoint us. I think, blessed be his name, this has been my experience in what I have passed through in my trying sickness, in which I have endured more suffering than in all my previous life of nearly eighty-three years. The Lord be praised for the experience it has brought of the knowledge and love of God to my heart.

I can say little now, as this is the first time I have attempted to write a paragraph in five months, and I am too weak to say much more. My beloved daughter, and only child, has attended to all my correspondence for me till now; written several hundred letters and postal cards in answer to inquiries, besides constantly watching my bedside day and night five months with anxious care.

Before leaving the subject, the question comes up, Shall the BIBLE EXAMINER be revived?

This depends, mainly, on the answer of three others.

1. Will the editor's strength be restored so as to warrant his resuming the work?

2. Will his present subscribers be willing to cancel his indebtedness to them for the remainder of the present volume? When he was taken sick he had only sufficient funds to publish one number more; those have not been increased much since, and I have now expended nearly all I have received for the EXAMINER in the present issue.

3. Mainly: Will they take the risk of furnishing the funds for the next volume?

The money is not expected, whether subscriptions or donations, until sufficient is subscribed to go on with the next volume, but it is desirable to know at once what our friends will do. Should you send funds, please inform me what disposition you will have made of them in case the EXAMINER cannot be issued regularly hereafter.

A volume cannot be published short of sixteen hundred dollars. Eight hundred subscribers, at $2.00 each, would supply the needed funds; but many will take it in clubs. What may be lacking must be made up by donations, or the magazine cannot go on. Will the friends venture on the effort?

I now propose to start a new volume, to commence January, 1880; the first number bearing that date, but to be issued in December next, provided the amount can be secured necessary to proceed safely, either by subscribers or donations or pledges, to be paid in due time. The result must be arrived at, by an early day in December, whatever it may be.

The generous friends who have aided me personally, during my long and painful sickness, have my most hearty thanks; it has been a great relief to my mind during that time. May the Lord abundantly reward you all.

THE EDITOR'S ILLNESS.

MANY of the readers of the BIBLE EXAMINER will wish to know something of the nature of the Editor's severe illness, suffering, for months, the most excruciating pain, day and night. He has borne it all with unexampled patience, believing that the dear Lord, who saw it all, was thereby preparing him for a glorious work in the "ages to come." When, at death's door, and apparently beyond the reach of all human help, Providence—we have no doubt in answer to the prayers of many loving friends—directed us to Dr. Caroline Yeomans, of New York (now married to Dr. Lester Keep, of Brooklyn), who has treated him with marked success from the first. The following is a statement of the Editor's condition when she took charge of the case, as given by herself and husband.

HATTIE W. STORRS.

A SKETCH OF ITEMS NOTICED IN THE CONDITION OF
THE REV. AND VENERABLE GEORGE STORRS, AUG.
11TH, 1879.

At first sight a noted item was atrophy, an emaciation, and a cadaverous look commingled, that indicated a long decline. On motion, at once was manifested adynamia, a debility showing a state of very low vital powers.

On an effort to speak, asthenia designated a debility of the whole animal economy—a large diminution of all the vital forces. On a more minute examination, a remarkable deficiency in all the organs and functions of assimilation was noticed; nutrition everywhere being almost entirely suspended, life's forces could not be supplied with their natural tone and power.

Further on in the examination, there was discovered an unnatural condition of the functions of the stomach, the liver, the kidneys, and the bladder, and the skin, all unhealthy and wrong. Intimately associated with these sick organs, was a long-standing irritation and chronic congestion and inflammation of the mucous membrane lining the inner surface of the whole alimentary canal, involving seriously all of the mesenteric glands; obstructing thus most sadly all the channels through which nutriment, strength and life from food are conveyed to all portions of the system to give cheer and life and health.

Not only those organs above described, that build up and sustain the system, were thus in fault by the diseased performance of their assimilating functions, but their functions of elimination also, their acts in casting off from the system impurities and matters not wanted in the body, were bad, as all the excretions showed fully. Again the arteries, veins and nerves ramifying and penetrating all organs and tissues, were sadly defective in the performance of their important functions. They were congested and very much wanting in common vitality and all healing and vivifying influences.

This wasting away of life and all of its natural manifestations was very painful to behold, as all his friends have witnessed and testified. A name for such a complicated condition of the organs and functions of the human system cannot be given that embraces the whole case better than the different medical terms I have used and explained in this sketch.

The attending physician of Mr. Storrs, Mrs. Dr. Yeomans Keep, very carefully considers all these unhealthy organs and their functions, and skillfully adapts remedies for them all, as a reasonable success by a steady and gradual advance to a former more natural condition makes manifest, under their steady use by her advice and prescription.

These views of our friend, Mr. Storrs, were obtained in consultation with his physician, Dr. Yeomans Keep, on her second visit to her patient, by

LESTER KEEP, M.D.

Cor. Gates and Vanderbilt Aves., Brooklyn.

THE EDITOR'S PRESENT CONDITION.

He is still very feeble and devoid of strength, which is not strange, considering the utter prostration of his nervous system. His disease has not affected him mentally. His head has been entirely free from pain, and consequently his mind has been clear. In conversation with him a few days ago, a friend remarked, "Bro. Storrs, your mind is as clear as ever, which is a great consolation to know." We trust, with the Divine blessing, he will be restored to comparative health and usefulness.

THE DIVINE DISPENSATIONS; OR, THE DIVINE PLAN IN THE GOVERNMENT OF OUR RACE.—No. 4.

BY THE EDITOR OF BIBLE EXAMINER.

In our preceding investigations the subject has been considered to the close of the thousand years and the "little season" following it. That there is an "endless succession of ages" to follow seems clear, both from reason, Scripture, and the infinity of the Divine attributes and perfections; and that in some of those ages the mass of the human race will be brought, through judgment, to a state of harmony with the Divine will, is more than once asserted in the Scriptures of truth. Two of these testimonials are all that I shall introduce at this point. First: "Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth: for I am God, and there is none else. I have sworn by myself, the word has gone out of my mouth in righteousness, and shall not return, that unto me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear."—Isa. xiv. 22, 23. This is an Old Testament witness. Let us see a confirmation from the New Testament by the inspired apostle to the Gentiles, thus: "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings. . . . Having made known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure which he hath purposed in himself: that in the DISPENSATION of the fulness of times He might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are in earth; even in him."—Eph. i 3, 9, 10.

Here are two testimonies, full to the purpose, that somewhere, "in the dispensation of the fulness of times," the mass of the human race will be subjected to the government of God "in Christ." This same doctrine is shown through various expressions, ordinances, types, shadows, and "times," throughout the Scriptures; but men have made "the word of God of none effect through their tradition."—Mark viii. 13. They measure God's perfect and effective government by their own abortive ones; and they fancy, because they cannot see how perfect order can be brought out of what seems confusion, and light take the place of darkness, that therefore infinite wisdom, skill, love and power cannot produce such a change; and that, because men are so rebellious now, God's oath, that to him every knee shall bow, must have some other meaning than what the words clearly express, and that He cannot or will not, in the dispensation of the fulness of times, gather together all things in Christ. But God has said, "My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure."—Isa. xlv. 10.

*After that portion of this number of the EXAMINER had been printed which contained No. 3 of "The Divine Dispensations," it was thought best to complete the republication of the work in this issue, which will account for its appearance in the Editorial department, instead of following in its proper order on page 373.

Having thus prepared the way, I go on in viewing the dispensation to follow the thousand years and little season. I will call it,

THE JUDGMENT DISPENSATION.

I call it so, because it opens with the commencement of the resurrection "of the dead," who "lived not again till the thousand years were finished."—Rev. xx. 5. They had once lived—had died and remained in death's dominion till the end of the period spoken of; this was their "non-resurrection,"—they rise not till the saints, with their head, have a perfect dominion over all the earth, and the last rebellion is put down. They lost the life eternal, or life of the ages; i. e., they did not have "part in the first resurrection," which men must have to inherit that which is called "eternal life;" which includes all the ages from the return of Christ from heaven, or of his personal reign.

At the point now about to be spoken of, commences "the resurrection of judgment."—John v. 29. Our translation has it "damnation;" but that is manifestly an erroneous rendering of the word krisis: a word which often occurs in the New Testament, and several times in this same chapter, and is rendered judgment. The dispensation we are now considering, I judge, is the same as that embraced in 1 Cor. xv., where Paul, after speaking of the first-fruits—Christ, and they that are his at his coming—says, "Then the end" (telos). The end of what? To me, it is evident it is the resurrection, of which he had said, "Every man in his own order" (tagma), "band, cohort;" "appointed succession." The resurrection of the dead is not all at one time. Events, centuries apart, are often mentioned as though simultaneous. No one doubts this as respects the first and second advents of Christ; though the length of time intervening may be unknown.

So of the resurrection of the dead. It may be spoken of as though one event, yet the Scriptures speak of it as a series of events, more or less distant from each other. After "the first resurrection," no more of the dead will be raised, or "live again till the thousand years are finished." Nor does the text say that there will then be a simultaneous revival of all "the rest of the dead." From Paul's language—"every man in his own band,"—it seems most likely there will be various periods in the work after it commences, covering an indefinite period or periods, though presented under the veil of one scene, as in Rev. xx. 11–13. That scene may, and probably will, cover thousands of years, if not ages. The account here is brief, but it covers a work of such magnitude that no one can reasonably suppose the time is short in which it is to be accomplished. Paul tells us there is a future "in the day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ according to my gospel."—Rom. ii. 16. All men are, in this life, passing through a judgment; i. e., they are, under God's present government, forming a character which will have an influence on their future destiny, though it may not absolutely fix their final destiny. That will depend upon their reception or rejection of Jesus Christ after he is clearly revealed to them as their Redeemer and Deliverer from sin and death. The dispensation of judgment, then, "for the rest of the dead," will bring to view "every man's work," and the trial or judgment, will take him at that point and proceed till his name is found written in the book of life, or a record of its exclusion from that book, which can only take place after the knowledge "of the only true God and Jesus Christ" has been set before him. If then he does "despite unto the Spirit of grace" and has "trodden under foot the Son of God, and hath counted the blood of the covenant, wherewith he (the Son of God) was sanctified (set apart as a REDEEMER), an unholy thing" (or, a common thing); for such "there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins (i. e., no other sacrifice for sins); but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation which shall devour the adversaries."—Heb. x. 26–29. Such are not found, in the final trial, "written in the book of life;" i. e., they are not put on record to live, but are to be "cast into the lake of fire," or experience "the second death;" that death has "power over them."—Rev. xx. 6, 14, 15. At what period in the future this result is arrived at, we are not told and have no means of knowing. From the nature of the case this judgment dispensation must be a long period before its finale. During it, all those who have by any unavoidable circumstances been deprived of the means of knowing "the only true God and Jesus Christ," will have such means granted them as shall enable them to obtain that knowledge; and by the use they make of that opportunity will their final state be determined, either to have their names inscribed in the book of life, or, if not found there when that dispensation closes, they will be cast into the lake of fire, or be subjected to "the second death."

Till the dispensation here spoken of opens, the "due time," or God's time for vast multitudes of the race, had never come for them to hear the TESTIMONY that the "One MEDIATOR between God and men, Jesus Christ," had "given himself a ransom for all." Hence, not till then could their final state be determined; for it is by faith or unbelief of this great fact of human redemption by Jesus Christ, the second Adam, that men are to be finally justified or condemned. While in the death state this work could not go on, because "there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave (in sheol) whither thou goest" (Eccl. ix. 10); therefore, there could be nothing done for those who had died in the unavoidable ignorance I have spoken of, not till the thousand years were completed, and "the rest of the dead" live again. Hence, the message of God's love to them and Christ's giving himself a ransom for them must come into the judgment age or dispensation.

To suppose that dispensation is of short duration, because so briefly spoken of in Rev. xx., is contrary to God's method in all his works in ages past. The Gospel dispensation, which the apostles evidently supposed would be short, has already extended to near two thousand years; and six thousand years have been occupied in "taking out" of the nations "a people for God's name" to be "kings and priests unto God" (Rev. i. 6); a people called a "little flock" (Luke xii. 32), and a "few" who have entered "the strait gate" and walked the "narrow way."—Matt. vii. 13, 14. If such vast periods have been employed in this preparatory work, shall we conclude that less time will be employed in the Judgment Dispensation, when each one of the human family (embraced in the expression, "the rest of the dead") is to have his character brought into review and a final result arrived at? Rather, is it not highly probable, judging from the past of God's works, that the dispensation of judgment will be made up of various divisions of time, shadowed forth by the past, and by "the times and seasons" in the Mosaic dispensation; which "times and seasons the Father hath put in his own power" (Acts i. 7), and which "it is not for" us "to know" at present.

It seems impossible to come to any other conclusion than that the Judgment Dispensation or dispensations will extend through a vast but unknown period or periods, each employed, possibly, in disposing of the case of one "band" of the "rest of the dead," who are to "live again" at some period after the thousand years' dispensation is ended.

In relation to the work of the Judgment Dispensation, after all our thoughts on the subject, the language of Paul comes home to us with tremendous force, "Oh the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his JUDGMENTS, and his ways past finding out!"—Rom. xi. 33. Hitherto revelation has given us little more than the "shadows of things to come," sufficient, however, if properly considered, to excite in our minds an earnest desire for more light, and a diligent searching of the Scriptures, with earnest prayer to God to be guided into all truth; sufficient to show us the folly of that fond attachment to the things of time and sense which now so absorbs the minds of the mass of our race. "The whole world," as it now is, weighed in the light of God's truth concerning things to come, is but vanity; and the deepest folly a soul can be guilty of, is, to prefer these passing vanities to the great and glorious things of the endless future; and the greatest wisdom is, to use the present lifetime in searching out and seeking after the glories to come, which will not only be satisfying, by being filled with all the fulness of God's riches in Christ, but will be as unending as the existence of the CREATOR himself.

Before leaving the subject I would remark that the idea of the judgment being a grand assize, at which the whole race are at one and the same time present, I regard as without foundation in reason or Scripture. There is no reason why there should be. They would cover an area of hundreds of miles square, closely packed. Then, the time necessary to an examination of each individual is no small objection to such an idea. Said Jesus, "I say unto you, that every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment: for, by thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned."—Matt. xii. 36, 37.

This language, if not understood strictly literally, certainly implies a critical examination of each case irreconcilable with a judgment-day of any short period, and can only agree with Paul's statement of the resurrection of "every man in his own band" or class.—Cor. xv.

Nor does it necessarily follow that a judgment-day is a period in which no mercy will be extended; for mitigating circumstances are always taken into the account, even where the accused is proved guilty of a crime; and our "Advocate with the Father" (1 John ii. 1) will not have lost his interest in those for whom he "gave himself a ransom," because they are now being "judged according to their works."—Rev. xx. 12, 13. Besides, the final state of each is in the hands of the Redeemer. In this respect, "the Father hath given him authority to execute judgment, also, because he is the Son of man."—John v. 22. How wise, how merciful our heavenly Father thus to deal with our race: appoint one as Judge, both to determine and execute, who can be "touched with the feeling of our infirmities," having been "in all points tempted like as we are!"—Heb. iv. 15. What a heart is here in judgment! One who knows all possible circumstances and how to make allowances, and whose judgment is as certainly mingled with mercy, where it can be, as that he gave himself a ransom for all men, and became "the propitiation for the sins of the whole world."—1 John ii. 2.

I say, mercy, even in judgment, will be extended "where it can be." But that there will be cases where it cannot be, I do not deny; for, if men sin "wilfully after" they "have received the knowledge of the truth," and despise "the Son of God," expressed by the idea of having "trodden him under foot," marking a contempt of the Redeemer, which constitutes the sin that hath never forgiveness (Heb. vi. 6-8; x. 26-29, and Matt. xii. 31), then, no mercy can reach them, and the lake of fire must be their lot as the only act that love itself can perform, for them to extinguish both their sin and misery.

Next, following the judgment dispensation, is what I shall call,

"THE DISPENSATION OF THE FULNESS OF TIMES."

This, we have seen, Paul speaks of; a time when God, in "his good pleasure" hath "purposed . . . to gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven" (or, those who had been glorified as the "first-fruits" at the second advent of Christ), "and which are in earth;" the final harvest.

—Eph. i. 9, 10. Then "he shall have put down all rule and all authority and power. . . and put all enemies under his feet," and "destroyed death" (1 Cor. xv.), put an end to evil, or "destroyed the works of the devil."—1 John iii. 8.

The dispensation, now to be considered, opens thus: "I saw a new heaven and a new earth: for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; and there was no more sea: and I, John, saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband: and I heard a great voice out of heaven saying, Behold the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God: and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain; for the former things are passed away. And he that sat upon the throne said, Behold, I make all things new. And he said unto me, Write, for these words are true and faithful."—Rev. xxi. 1-5.

This dispensation brings to maturity or to a perfection the grand plan which has been carried on through all the previous ones, and makes plain the whole administration of the divine government from the foundation of the world, and will cause the triumphant song to be sung, saying, "Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints. Who shall not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name? For thou only art holy: for all nations shall come and worship before thee; for thy judgments are made manifest."—Rev. xv. 3, 4. The contrast between this perfect state and the former condition of the earth and race will call for eternal praise and rejoicing. Who can question but that the experience of the past and the enjoyment of the present will have secured an eternal obedience to God, that no other form of discipline or government could ever have so effectually secured? But this state, perfect as it will be, is but the opening of still greater displays of the wisdom and love of God; for the "endless succession of ages" is still in reserve. We may throw out the line to sound the depths of that sea of the love of God, and every effort will cause the exclamation, "O the DEPTH of the RICHES both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How UNSEARCHABLE!" etc. Search on and sound often, only increasing their amazement and their joy, till they realize it is truly "an ETERNAL WEIGHT OF GLORY."—2 Cor. iv. 17.

To this dispensation, it seems, belongs the New Jerusalem with all its glories—a perfect government, a perfect city; perfect glory, perfect intercourse with God; for his servants shall see his face, and his “name shall be in their foreheads” (Rev. xxii. 3, 4); “and the city has no need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine in it; for the glory of God doth lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof.” Rev. xxi. 23. It will be the object of attraction to the whole earth; “for the nations of them which are saved shall walk in the light of it; and the kings of the earth do bring their glory and honor into it” (verse 24). “And there shall be no more curse.”—xxii. 3. Such is the consummation.

In the order I have taken up the dispensations, it will be seen that the new heavens and the new earth are at the commencement of the last, considered. If, therefore, the earth that now is, is to be literally burned, it cannot occur till the end of the Judgment dispensation; which must be several thousand years subsequent to the second advent of Christ; for that judgment does not commence “till the thousand years are finished.” And when it does commence, the earth and sea are still in existence; for, those to be judged are collected from both elements: and if the language of Peter, relied on as proof of the burning of the world, is equally reliable as to the time of its burning, it proves it will not take place till “the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men” (2 Pet. iii. 7): that “perdition” does not take place till the judgment closes, as we have seen.

That when God shall create all things new, the disturbing elements of evil will be fully removed, I have no doubt; and hence that such changes will take place in the earth and heavens as shall affect this, I readily admit; and to convert “three-fifth of the earth’s surface” into land, so that there shall be “no more sea,” will be a change worthy to be called a new earth. Such a change must affect an equal removal of disturbing influences in the atmosphere, or heavens; so that it may truly be said, there is a new heaven and a new earth. But, be it observed, all this takes place at a period far distant from that assigned to it by the advocates of the literal burning of the world: and if they mistake the time so materially, may they not as materially mistake the manner of the change to take place? The promise to Abraham of “all the lands which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed forever” (Gen. xiii. 14, 15), forbids the idea that the land which he was commanded to look upon, and which was promised him for an everlasting possession, was to be literally burned and another land that he never saw, to be substituted. Such is not God’s method of dealing with his creatures, i. e., saying one thing and meaning another; as too many seem to think, who cannot see how a promise or a prophecy can be fulfilled which appears beyond their comprehension.

I have endeavored, in my remarks on the dispensations, briefly to outline the subject as it presents itself to my own mind; and to avoid too much detail, giving rather suggestions than expositions; leaving the reader to satisfy himself, by a careful examination of the Scriptures and the exercise of his own reason, judgment, and understanding, as to the general truth of what has been presented. If what I have written shall serve as a help to a better understanding of the “Divine plan in the government of our race,” and increase the love of God in their hearts, and a firmer trust in his love, for the life that now is and that which is to come, I shall praise him for the grace that enabled me to do something for the honor of his name and the benefit of my fellow men. I trust no other desires have influenced me in the presentation of the thoughts thus laid before the reader.

JAMES AUSTIN, Versailles, N. Y., writes: Dear Brother: My heart goes out to you in this your time of trouble. I need not remind you of Him who, in all our affliction, is afflicted, for you recognize the Lord’s hand and kiss it in love and gratitude. Brothers Fairchild and McIntyre unite in mingled sorrow and joy on your account—sorrow to learn of your painful affliction, but are glad you are better. Whatever may betide you it will be well, for the Lord doeth all things well. We pray that you may be spared for much useful work yet. Yours in Christ.

S. H. REEVES, Maine, writes: The EXAMINER continues to contain much food for the man in Christ. Regarding the “ages to come,” it rightly divides the Word of Truth. I pray that the Lord will bless you in continuing it, for the comfort and edification of his children.

BRO. W. A. HART, Plainville, writes: It grieves me to learn of your serious illness and acute suffering. May God, whom you have served all the days of your life and followed on to know, be very near to you, and grant your sufferings may be relieved, strength restored, and life spared unto the coming kingdom.

THE DIVINE DISPENSATIONS ;*
OR, THE DIVINE PLAN IN THE GOVERNMENT
OF OUR RACE.—No. 3.

BY THE EDITOR OF BIBLE EXAMINER.

IN the preceding articles this subject was brought forward to near the close of the Mosaic, or Law dispensation. The object, however, has been to give an outline, rather than a detailed notice, of the previous dispensations; to give or suggest thoughts for consideration, or to help in the examination of the Scriptures, and not an exposition. In other words, my object has been to help lift the VEIL from those portions of the Word which have given perplexity to inquiring minds, and to show that, though much is veiled in the Scriptures of truth, yet the great things of the future, concerning our race, stand out here and there in all parts of the Word by positive utterances, or by types, shadows or hints, which must be searched out and collected in order to be understood and used to profit. Jesus has taught us to "SEARCH the Scriptures." By not doing this we may fail, as the Jews did, of seeing "the great things of God's law," and be led to "count" them "as strange things" (Hosea viii. 12); or fail to see God's purpose concerning the perfection of a race that has hitherto seemed to be a failure in the work of the Divine Being, who is the CREATOR and GOVERNOR of all.

To prevent such a misapprehension in serious and thoughtful minds, the Scriptures have, throughout, interwoven facts, types, shadows and prophetic utterances which are certain to inspire faith in candid minds, who seek for light, that a glorious future is before the race, as a whole, and not merely to the "few" who have improved the past and present dispensations: a consummation which will manifest the love of God in a manner to make all say, with Paul, "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!" . . . "For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things" (Rom. xi. 34, 36): or, as will bring forth the song of triumph and praise which John heard and described in the following language: "Every creature which is in heaven, and on earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, Blessing and honor, and glory and power, be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever."—Rev. v. 13. Such is to be the consummation; but we are, at this time, looking at the developments that go before, but which, under a veil, point to that final result. The next to be considered is what is called,

THE GOSPEL DISPENSATION.

Strictly speaking, every dispensation, from Adam's, has been a Gospel dispensation; for all have spoken of a DELIVERER to come; the "Good News" of a provision made by the love of God to "bless all the families of the earth;" hence the Gospel is one, though it has had various shades of development, increasing in light. The present one opened with the personal appearing of the Son of God. But here, again, is a VEIL. "God was" now "manifest in the flesh."—1 Tim. iii. 16. "The Word was made flesh."—John i. 14. "Through the VEIL, that is to say, His FLESH."—Heb. x. 20. Had the Messiah appeared without a veil of flesh, how could he have been recognized as the "seed of the woman;" and how could men have looked upon him as having sympathy for us as flesh and blood? Had he always appeared to men as he appeared on the mount of transfiguration, would they not have fled from him, as Israel fled from Moses when he came down from the Mount, and the people and Aaron "were afraid to come near him," so that he was obliged to put on a veil to cover his face? Not, till that was done, could they be persuaded to come near him. The Son of God came veiled at the opening of the present dispensation; thus mingling with those he came to bless and save. The spiritually minded saw through the veil, like old Simeon and Anna, who hailed him with joy, though yet but a child in his mother's arms; and all, during his personal ministry, who received him did so from a spiritual preparation, called, in parable, by Jesus, the "good ground;" others brought no fruit to perfection—their hearts were not yet prepared. This unprepared state constituted their blindness; the "veil was on their hearts."—2 Cor. iii. 15. Such was the case of those who rested in the letter and forms of the Mosaic dispensation and did not look behind the veil to see the spirit and intent of all those ordinances, which were but a "schoolmaster to bring us to Christ."—Gal. iii. 24.

Up to the present dispensation little is recorded or known concerning the laws, if any, by which the CREATOR ruled the world outside of the laws given to Israel. The general fact is thus stated by Paul: "God, which made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and all things therein : who in times past suffered all nations to walk in their own way."—Acts xiv. 15, 16. It does not appear that they were put on trial for their final destiny, but were learning the lesson of their utter helplessness, preparatory to dispensations in the future, when God would have a body of teachers who should be both "kings and priests;" under whom the people and nations, who had been "suffered to walk in their own ways," should be both ruled and taught, till "all nations shall call him blessed."—Ps. lxxii. 17.

The dispensations, going before the present, did not fill up this body of "kings and priests;" therefore, the work is to be completed in this, before the great work of restitution begins: so James states the matter in the council at Jerusalem: "Men and brethren, hearken unto me: Simeon hath declared how God, at the first, did visit the Gentiles, to take out of them a people for his name; and to this agree the words of the prophets, as it is written, After this I will return, and will build again the tabernacle of David, which is fallen down; and will build again the ruins thereof, and will set it up, that the residue of men might seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles, upon whom my name is called, saith the Lord, who doeth all these things. Known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world."—Acts xv. 13-18.

Thus, it is seen, God has not been thwarted, disappointed, nor had to change any part of his plan of government "from the beginning of the world."—Acts xv. 13-18. The system has gone forward in perfect order from the first moment it was set in motion. Men have misjudged of the workings of the plan, by assuming that the destiny of all men is to be decided, for eternity, by their conduct in this life. With such an idea, what can be thought of the Creator, who, for centuries, "suffered all nations to walk in their own ways," without granting them any knowledge of the provision he had made or would make for their redemption and salvation? No wonder that men are bewildered under the theological teachings of this age; they are taught that, no matter what the circumstances are in which men are born and educated, their only opportunity for final salvation is in this present life. Such teachers can never harmonize the dealings of God with the race, nor reconcile their theory with justice, mercy, love, or truth. That Christ should "taste death for every man," and give himself "a ransom for all;" and "God so loved the world" as to give his Son to perform such a work of suffering and love—and yet keep unnumbered millions in ignorance of these acts of love and mercy, and condemn them to eternal death, is an absurdity (not to say blasphemy) that no sound mind, uninfluenced by creed or party, can for a moment accept, if reflection is brought into action.

The present dispensation is one of selection—to prepare "the first-fruits," and fit them for the great work of blessing "all the families of the earth," as God promised to "Abraham and his seed," and confirmed it by an oath. It is not a selection or election that leaves all others of the race under a curse; but an election to bless "all families, kindreds, and nations," by bringing them to the knowledge of the truth that "God is Love," and that all his dealings with them have been in love, and designed for their highest ultimate good.

How this view lifts "the veil that is spread over all nations" (Isa. xxv. 7); and which God has said he "will destroy," and, also, "the face of the covering cast over all people"—Christendom not excepted! Here are "glad tidings to all people."—Luke ii. 10. Yet how reluctant professed Christians are, in these days, to accept the good news; traditions have bound them, and they cannot or dare not move forward in the knowledge of God and of his love to the race. Those who have made some advance seem paralyzed with fear lest they should exalt the character of God too high in magnifying his love to the creatures he has made; and they seem quite content if they can be assured that he loves them; forgetting that "God hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation."—Acts. xvii. 26.

What if, instead of giving us our lot in these last days of light, he had appointed us to live in the ages past, or in the darkness of Sodom, or of the most benighted heathen? If we differ from them now, is it because, by nature, we are better than they? Is it not all of God's free mercy to us? Shall we, boasting, "thank God that we are not as other men," like the Pharisee? Cannot God's free mercy yet reach those lost ones of the dark ages? Did not Christ come into the world "to seek and to save that which was lost" (Luke xix. 10); and will he not "go after that which is lost, until he find it"?—Luke xv. 4. Are we to conclude that his mercies are shut up to this life, without regard to the unavoidable circumstances in which most of the race have been kept in ignorance of God's character and love; and that, too, without one testimony in the Bible that probation ends with all men at death? Such assumptions are no part of the revelation God has made either in the Old or New Testaments; they are a corruption of the Word of God, which the general tenor of that Word condemns.

There is no evidence in the Bible that the present dispensation, or the present life, was designed to fix the final state of all men. But it does appear that eternal life—that is, the life of “the ages,” embracing all “the ages to come,”—is secured by faith in Christ in this life; for, all such are to be changed, if living; and if dead, raised to life at the second advent of Christ, and made immortal (1 Cor. xv.), their “vile bodies changed” and “made like unto his glorious body” (Phil. iii. 20, 21); “be made like him” (1 John ii. 2), “neither can they die any more.”—Luke xx. 36. These are the high and exalted privileges granted to those who now believe in Jesus, and “make” their “calling and election sure.”—2 Peter i. 10. Such have the life of all “the ages to come;” but none of the unholy dead will have part in the age next to follow the present; for “the rest of the dead lived not again till the thousand years were finished” (Rev. xx. 5); while “blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection.”—Verse 6. Faith, producing holiness, then, has a peculiar reward; and this special reward is secured only in this life: such are the “FEW” who entered the “strait gate” and walked in the “narrow way,” and obtain the “life of the ages.” Those who neglect this course, are, for the present, “blinded:” or, as Paul says, “The election hath obtained it, and the rest were blinded.”—Rom. xi. 7. But this blindness is not to last eternally, for the Word assures us it has its limit: for “the veil” is to be taken away, and to be “destroyed” (Isa. xxv. 7; Rom. xi. 25-27); and “God will have all men to be saved” (from death) “and come to the knowledge of the truth” (1 Tim. ii. 4); and the final state of no man will be fixed till he has first had this knowledge and an opportunity to improve it; that time will be, to the mass of the race, when “the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea; and in that day there shall be a root of Jesse, which shall stand for an ensign of the people; to it shall the Gentiles seek: and his rest shall be glorious.”—Isa. xi. 9, 10.

It hath pleased God, hitherto, to reveal his purposes and designs more or less under a veil, to exercise our faith or trust in him, and make our knowledge progressive; thus inciting us to “search the Scriptures,” and compare Scripture with Scripture, and, as it were, surprising us with new developments of his wisdom, power and love: gradually raising us in a capacity to receive more and more of the heavenly and glorious things in the Divine storehouse, which are yet to be brought forth, in “due time,” by him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think;” and for which there shall be “glory in the church by Christ Jesus throughout the endless succession of ages.”—Eph. iii. 20, 21.

Let us, mortals, who are but as of yesterday, take heed that we do not “limit the Holy One of Israel,” or measure his vast plan for the salvation and exaltation of our race by our short vision; nor talk of things to come as if what bounds our sight must bind his hands.

All the dispensations are designed, strictly speaking, to educate men for a higher state and fit them to know God more perfectly, that they may be prepared to appreciate his love and rejoice in his service as their highest pleasure and joy.

Hitherto we have seen that his designs have been more or less veiled. It was not the purpose of the Creator that the whole race should be matured at once or under one uniform method of teaching, nor in one dispensation. Yet there is only “ONE God and ONE Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus;” and there is no other name nor way in which any of the race can have a final salvation, or redemption from sin and death, but by the “one Mediator.” This is true in all the dispensations, so far as revelation gives us information. The next dispensation to which our attention will be given is,

THE MESSIANIC DISPENSATION: OR, THAT OF MESSIAH'S PERSONAL REIGN.

The Messiah's reign extends endlessly; for, “Of his kingdom there shall be no end.”—Luke i. 33. It is, however, only the first dispensation of that reign that I am now to speak of, commonly known as the “Millennium,” or thousand years next to follow the present dispensation.

The assumption that the thousand years of Rev. xx. are in the past, I regard as a violation of the language of the Scripture statement that “the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished.”—Verse 5. “The rest of THE DEAD!” This expression shows that those who lived and reigned with Christ during the thousand years, had been DEAD and were made alive from the dead. It cannot, therefore, be applied to any of Christ's followers in the past without virtually "saying, the resurrection is past already; and overthrow the faith of some."—2 Tim. ii. 18. Without further arguing on an assumption so manifestly absurd and contradictory as the idea of the thousand years in the past, I proceed to the subject of Messiah's personal reign on the earth.

This dispensation opens with the coming again from heaven of the "same Jesus" who was "taken up into heaven."—Acts i. 11. He is to "come in the clouds with great power, and glory" (Mark xiii. 26); "with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God."—1 Thess. iv. 16. This is the signal of the opening of the coming dispensation. Then, the next act is, "the dead in Christ shall rise," and the living saints shall be changed from mortality to immortality (1 Cor. xv.), and all together meet their descending Lord, to be forever with him. "The Son of man" then receives, from "the ancient of days," dominion and glory, and a kingdom that all people, nations and languages should serve and obey him, and "the saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom and possess the kingdom (under the whole heaven) forever, even forever and ever" (or, for the age and for the ages); for, "His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed."—Dan. vii. 13-27. "He shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river (Euphrates) to the ends of the earth," and, "His name shall endure forever (for the ages); his name shall be continued as long as the sun; and men shall be blessed in him; all nations shall call him blessed."—Psa. lxxii. 8-17.

Thus opens to our view a dispensation in which the corrupt rule of men is superseded by a righteous and perfect government: "A King shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In his days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely." In those days it shall be said, "The Lord liveth which brought up and which led the seed of the house of Israel out of the north country, and from all countries whither I had driven them; and they shall dwell in their own land."—Jer. xxiii:5-8. Then shall "the law go forth of Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem; and he shall judge among many people, and rebuke strong nations afar off; and they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks; nation shall lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more; but they shall sit every man under his vine and under his figtree, and none shall make them afraid; for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it."—Micah iv:2-4. Then, it is stated, is the time of the gathering of Israel; for, "in that day, saith the Lord, will I assemble her that halteth, and will gather her that is driven out, and her that I have afflicted; and I will make her that halted a remnant, and her that was cast far off a strong nation; and the Lord shall reign over them in Mount Zion from henceforth, even forever."—Verses 6, 7.

Corresponding with this prophetic promise is the following language: "Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah; not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day that I took them by the hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt; which my covenant they brake, although I was a husband unto them, saith the Lord: but this shall be the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel: after those days saith the Lord, I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts; and will be their God, and they shall be my people: and they shall teach no more every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord; for they shall all know me, from the least of them unto the greatest of them, saith the Lord: for I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sin no more."—Jer. xxxi. 31-34.

Paul places this work thus: "There shall come out of Sion a DELIVERER, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob: for this is my covenant unto them when I shall take away their sins."—Rom. xi. 26, 27. This is done after the "blindness" that "happened to Israel" is removed, which was to continue to the end of the dispensation in which it occurred.—Verse 25.

Thus far I have given a sample of the events at the opening of the Messianic dispensation, and some of the extending works in the future of it. The Scriptures are too numerous to quote at large on the glory and fulness of the work to be done in that age. "The watchmen . . . shall see eye to eye," and "all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God."—Isa. lii. 8-10. The truth will no longer be hid from the people and nations of the earth, but be proclaimed in its purity and fulness: "The face of the covering cast over all people, and the VEIL spread over all nations" will be "destroyed" (Isa. xxv. 7); "The word of the Lord will run and be glorified," everywhere; nothing will obstruct its course. Not only will the immortalized saints be kings and priests, but restored Judah and Israel will join in the labor of subjecting and reconciling all "the left of the nations" to the service of God and his Christ; for, "Thus saith the Lord of hosts. . . . There shall come people, and the inhabitants of many cities; and the inhabitants of one city shall go to another, saying, Let us go speedily to pray before the Lord, and to seek the Lord of hosts in Jerusalem, and to pray before the Lord. Thus saith the Lord of hosts: In those days . . . ten men shall take hold out of all languages of the nations, even shall take hold of the skirts of him that is a Jew, saying, We will go with you; for we have heard that God is with you."—Zech. viii. 20–23.

This shows us that those who had been scattered among the nations, in the previous dispensation, are now employed among those nations as missionaries to bring them to the knowledge of the true God and the Messiah, and to induce them to accept the government thereof, and render a willing homage thereto. That age is one of conquest and subjection, in which all men everywhere will be subdued to Christ or be cut off from the earth; for "God hath put all things under his feet."—1 Cor. xv. 27.

That wars, pestilence, commotions, etc., will precede and attend the opening of the Messianic dispensation, is true; yet the conquest will be so complete, in its early history, that "all rule and authority," opposed to his reign, will soon be "put down," and the "Prince of peace" reign undisturbed to the close of that age; even the animal creation living at peace with each other. "The wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together, and a little child shall lead them."—Isa. xi. 6. And, adds JEHOVAH, "they shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain (government): for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea."—Verse 9.

Such is a glance at an outline of the coming age or dispensation: the glory of the filling up, what pen can tell or what tongue describe? "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection;" who will, also, be of the kings and priests that are to have "power over the nations" in the accomplishment of this great and glorious subjugation of the earth to Christ, and to be a partaker in the glory.

We are not to suppose that, during the thousand years, all those who are made subject to the government of Christ, are in heart willing subjects; but they are restrained from open rebellion by the glory and majesty of his rule: the existing evil, in the minds of some, waits to gain strength till "the thousand years are expired" (Rev. xx. 7); then the restraint is removed, and evil once more puts forth all its strength—personified by "Satan loosed out of his prison"—and the work of organized opposition to the reign of Christ and his Bride is set forth—probably in symbol—as Gog and Magog (referring to Ezekiel xxxviii. ix., though not literally the same), who are represented as gathered from "the four quarters of the earth." Their design evidently is to throw off the rule of the "King of kings." This project, however, is short-lived; it is only for "a little season" (verse 3); an undefined period, but a very short one; for they are defeated and utterly overthrown, while they are getting into position to attack the holy city, by a direct act of God manifesting his almighty power; as in the case of Sodom and Gomorrah, fire coming down from God, out of heaven and devouring them (verse 9); and the evil, or "Satan," receives a final overthrow among such as were then living on the earth. It will never again be able to take the shape of organized opposition to the government of God or his Christ.

I have placed this "little season" as a supplement at the end of the thousand years dispensation. It is not of that dispensation, but occupies a sort of transition relation between it and the one to follow. Hitherto there is no evidence of the resurrection of any dead ones except those spoken of in verse 4: those who "lived and reigned with Christ the thousand years," or, his holy ones. But in the age or ages to follow is the time for "the rest of the dead to live again."

In all the dispensations, thus far, we have seen the development of the plan of God increasing in clearness as they advanced; but still an endless future is before us, into which, even now, we see only as "in a glass darkly" (1 Cor. xiii. 12); but the dispensation will come when all will be more fully developed; yea, the perfect age will open with "all things new."

In Eph. i. 20, 23 Paul speaks of Christ's exaltation to God's right hand in words akin to a triumphal song.

NON-RESURRECTION.

BY ELD. S. W. BISHOP.

THERE was truth in some of the positions held by us as believers in the idea that the wicked dead will not be revived into life. Neither those who oppose non-resurrectionists, nor those who advocate that view, as it is held by non-resurrectionists, comprehend the real truth in the matter. With some of us there was a great principle underlying the idea entertained, that a portion of the human family would remain in death forever. When we embraced the great truth as set forth in the "Six Sermons," published almost forty years ago by our venerable editor, that there is no immortality in sin, we were led to that conclusion by believing, as it reads, that one short sentence penned by the beloved disciple, "God is love." We reasoned, and correctly, too, that a God who is LOVE, could never doom to an endless condition of intense suffering the creatures He has made. I, for myself, never endorsed the idea that some advocate, that there is a possibility that God may have been mistaken in the result of the great undertaking He entered upon when He made this world, and created man upon the earth. I have ever believed that He is not man that He should repent. I still most fully believe that with him there is no variableness, neither shadow of turning. I have no mental reservation when I say I believe that from everlasting to everlasting He is God. He is God in all his attributes. If in the finishing up of the great work that began when God spake the physical universe into existence, there is one thing done contrary to his great character of love, He knew before the commencement of the ages that it would be so. Yea, more, he designed that it should be so, and arranged everything in the Divine economy to cause it to be so. When in the far off years of the past God created the heavens and the earth, he did not institute a system of Divine chance-work. If he was God, he worked all by a definite plan and a certain arrangement; and he not only knew the end that would at last be reached in the grand consummation of the plan that he himself had devised, but the plan was devised by him with the express object in view of reaching that end.

He is God, and in the beginning he was God, and could therefore arrange just such a plan as pleased him. If the plan is faulty in its construction, or if, in its maturing, it shall result disastrously to that extent that God's love shall be forfeited in anything that shall befall a single member of the human family, it cannot be received as a mistake, for he being God, he cannot make a mistake. The disaster must come either as the result of cruel negligence, or actual design, He being a God of love, neither of these causes can exist. He being God, he will vindicate his loving character in his dealing with every child of our race. When I embraced the view that none but the righteous would be raised from death, it was for the following reason: I could not believe that a God of love would raise men from the dead merely for the purpose of inflicting torture upon them for a season, and that torture only to put them back into precisely the same condition from which they were taken by being raised from death. I believed that death—not suffering, not torture, not dying—but DEATH is the penalty of the Divine law. I believed that when a man is dead, he is just as dead as he can be. If, therefore, the only object in raising him from the dead is merely to inflict death upon him, the penalty of the law must be more than death, or else there is a mistake in raising him out of death, to torment him back into death. To fix such a penalty to the Divine law, is contrary to LOVE. There is no such penalty. "The wages of sin is death;" therefore God's love forbids that he raise any member of the race who is out of Christ, to a hopeless condition. If there is no probation beyond this life, it is a monstrous conclusion that God will raise dead sinners to life, merely for the purpose of flashing the lightning of eternal despair in their faces, as they shrink away into the torturing fangs of a second dying. The word of God does, however, teach that "all that are in the graves will hear his voice, and come forth;" that "the dead, small and great, will stand before God" when the great white throne shall appear. The word of God positively declares that all who are in the sea, and in death, and in Hades shall be delivered up. To deliver up is to grant a release, or a change, from one condition to another.

Webster's definition of the word deliver is as follows: "1. The leading idea is, to cause to pass from one state or place to another; as to deliver goods, to deliver a message. Hence, 2. To free from danger or restraint of any kind: as to deliver the oppressed."

The fact that the phrase "delivered up" is used in the text (Rev. xx. 13), is incontrovertible evidence that from whatever condition, state or place the people referred to are delivered, their case is not a hopeless one, else it would not be deliverance. Would the slave of former years, if transferred from a mild servitude in the noble old State of Virginia to the rice swamps of Georgia, call that deliverance? Is it deliverance to take a man from prison to the burning faggot? Neither is it deliverance to bring a host of men from death into a brief existence of intense torture to fall into the awful maw of a second dying. They will, however, be delivered; yes, delivered out of death and the grave, for thus saith our Lord Jesus Christ. When they are delivered from death, when they come forth from the grave, it will be redemption through our Lord Jesus Christ. Do any ask, how many are delivered? The answer comes from the Son of God, from him who is the resurrection and the life. "Death and Hades delivered up the dead which were in them." "All that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth." I are any of us dispute the record?

It may be asked, Is there no exception? If there be exceptions to this general rule, God's infinite love must dictate the exceptions. If there are beings whose condition can only be made worse by being brought back from death, the love of God will demand that they lie undisturbed forever.

For what purpose are they to be delivered—come forth? The record says, to be judged. How judged? It is recorded that they shall be judged "in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained." If righteous judgment is rendered, the millions of our race who have never had a good opportunity to believe in Christ, will not be doomed to the second death because they have not believed in Christ; for such a decision would not be a righteous one. By what are they to be judged? The answer from the inspired Apocalypse is, "Out of those things written in the books." What books? Answer, the books of the Bible. If those who are in death and Hades are to be tried under the teachings of these books (there can be no judgment without a trial), then must they have probation while they are on trial. They will have probation; for the same love that devised the plan for the good of the race at the outset, will so direct that the sin of the first Adam which entailed death upon his entire race, nor any other, to them, unavoidable circumstances, shall shut out, from uncounted millions of our race, the opportunity of securing a life that shall never end. Amen.

We are thankful to our loving Father that, after long weeks of waiting in sadness, doubt, and deep sorrow, the privilege is granted us of speaking once more through the columns of our beloved EXAMINER on this great and glorious theme. It is the earnest prayer of my heart that the improvement in the health of our dear editor, and father in the glorious Gospel of love, may culminate in a complete restoration, and that he may be spared to us till the end of the age.

IS THE HOLY SPIRIT A PERSON?

BY CHAS. L. IVES, A. M.

WE are now to consider the Bible evidences on the side of the personality of the Spirit. These, to overcome the arguments on the other side, must be overwhelming; else it will be evident that the general agreement of the Christian Church, Greek, Roman and Protestant, on this point, rests on the sands of tradition rather than on the rock of the Bible.

1. Our attention is called to the Apostolic Benediction: "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all."—2 Cor. xiii. 14.

But, first, this benediction is not what it is claimed to be: it is not the apostolic benediction. Here are the facts. Not one of the apostolic writers makes use of it except Paul, and he once, and once only, at the close of 2d Corinthians. With the following benediction he concludes nearly all his other epistles: "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you." Every one of his thirteen epistles (Hebrews not included) he invariably begins with the benediction, "Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ;" and one epistle, Ephesians, he concludes in nearly these words. Peter uses the same benediction in 2 Pet. i. 2. John uses the same, 2 John iii., each making mention only of "God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ." How came it that this, the true apostolic benediction, was passed over, and the title bestowed upon that exceptional benediction of 2 Cor. xiii. 14? The motive is evident. It was the work of uninspired, unscrupulous men, and although not precisely on a par with the interpolation in 1 John v. 7, it was in a similar spirit, as well as for the same purpose. A dogma that needs such support is a doubtful one, to say the least.

But let us consider the passage itself. How much has it to do with the question before us? It is not a direct statement, at best, but an inference; and one, we think, utterly unreliable.

A dogma that needs such support is a doubtful one, to say the least.

But let us consider the passage itself. How much has it to do with the question before us? It is not a direct statement, at best, but an inference; and one, we think, utterly unreliable.

The word translated communion—"communion of the Holy Spirit"—is in the Gr. koinonia. It is from the adjective koinos, common (Acts ii. 44), from which we have in the N. T. Greek the verb, koinoneo, to hold in common, to be partaker of, Rom. xv. 27; the noun koinonos, a holder in common, a partaker, Matt. xxiii. 30; and also the abstract noun here used koinonia, the holding in common, common participation. Koinonia is generally rendered in Eng. Version by fellowship, as Phil. i. 5, "I thank my God for your fellowship [common participation] in the Gospel." So Phil. ii. 1, "If any fellowship [common participation] of the Spirit." In 1 Cor. x. 16, 17, we read: "The bread we break, is it not the communion [koinonia, common participation] of the body of Christ; for we all partake of that one bread." In 1 John i. 3, we read: "And truly our fellowship (koinonia) is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ;"—fellowship, common participation, in what? In that Holy Spirit which proceedeth, comes, from the Father and the Son, "which [not whom, as in E. V.] God hath given to them that obey him."—Acts v. 32; so also Phil. iv. 28. Such is also plainly the meaning of koinonia in this so-called apostolic benediction: "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God, and the common participation of the Holy Spirit, be with you all." Instead of declaring, even inferentially, the existence of a third person, it simply expresses Paul's desire, or prayer, that those he addresses may have fellowship, common participation, may share with the Father, and with the Son, and with one another, in that spirit of holiness, which is (1 Cor. ii. 12) ek Theou, from God.

The suggestion of Rev. Dr. Chas. Hodge (Systematic Theology, vol. i., p. 448) that here is a separate invocation to each of the three persons of a Trinity, is evidently evolved from his traditional belief, rather than from the language of the benediction itself. The prayer of the benumbed traveller that he may share the warmth of our fireside, is not an invocation to that which he desires to share; while the Rev. Dr.'s statement, that to Christians the Spirit is an object of prayer, but marks the contrast between the present and the days of the apostles. In the inspired Word, the Father is addressed in prayer, and likewise the Son (Acts vii. 59, x. 14; 1 Cor. i. 2); but we find not one direct address to the Holy Spirit as a person!

2. The baptismal formula in Matt. xxviii. 19: "Go ye, therefore, and teach [Gr. make disciples of] all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."

From the association here of the Spirit with the Father and the Son, it is inferred that as the two former are each a distinct person, so likewise is the Spirit. The inference here to our present way of thinking is not an unfair one, and were it corroborated instead of contradicted by other Scriptures, it would be a strong point. But no doctrine of this importance can be built upon one inference, especially as we find that the inference loses instead of gains by closer examination of the passage itself. For, in the original, the Greek is not in the name of, as we should take it, by the authority of, but INTO the name of. What does this mean?

We notice that in the Sacred Scripture the word name carries with it a meaning it has lost at the present day. It was then not merely, as now, a handle we take hold of to address an individual by; it was an expression of character; it denoted some characteristic of that to which it appertained. In Ex. xxxiii. 17, the Lord says to Moses, "Thou hast found grace in my sight, and I know thee by name,"—not that his name was Moses, but what was really his character. So Ex. xxxiv. 5, "The Lord descended in a cloud and stood with him there, and proclaimed the name of the Lord." And this, as we learn from the two succeeding verses, was not merely what we should call the Lord's name, but it also included a somewhat detailed statement of his character, as merciful, just, and holy. So Prov. xviii. 10, we read: "The name of the Lord is a strong tower; the righteous runneth into it and is safe"—safe in those characteristics which cannot fail. So Abram, as he appeared in a new character, was called Abraham—a father of nations. Of Jacob it was said: "Thy name shall no more be called Jacob, but Israel"—no more a supplanter, but now Prince of God—"for as a prince hast thou power with God." With name thus taken as the expression of character, the preposition "into" may well be used—into the character of

Again, baptizing, Christian baptism, is more than the mere ceremonial to which some of our friends would limit it. The Gr. baptizo, as Rev. Dr. J. W. Dale has well shown in his most elaborate and exhaustive research into the classic and Scriptural use of the word, is a derivative from the primary bapto, which means to dip, and also to dye—formerly done by dipping. As a derivative, baptizo marks an advance upon the meaning of its primary; it expresses that change which takes place in an object brought under action of the primary bapto, especially in its secondary sense of dyeing—that is, a change into the character of that in which it has been bapt-ed or dyed. This change in the baptism in holy Spirit—in the real, not the ritual, but Christ's baptism—is into the character of holy Spirit. So then one really baptized “into the name of” the Father, of the Son, of the holy Spirit, is baptized into their characteristic; is changed into a holiness which is characteristic of the Deity.

Moreover, it is evident that the inspired record by no means holds the baptismal formula in as high an estimation as does church tradition; which therefore in this thing, I must believe, goes beyond what our Lord intended. This may seem a strong statement, but is borne out by facts. In the recorded cases of baptism by the disciples, after Christ's ascension, the baptismal formula, deemed by us indispensable, seems to have been not once used. Acts ii. 38, Peter exhorts the inquirers to “be baptized in [Gr. epi, upon] the name of the Lord Jesus.” Acts viii. 16, it is, “They were baptized into [eis] the name of the Lord Jesus.” Acts x. 48, “in [en] the name of the Lord.” Acts xix. 5, where “Paul found certain disciples who had not so much as heard whether there be a holy Spirit,” and where we should have expected our baptismal formula to have been prominently brought out, there “they were baptized into [eis] the name of the Lord Jesus.”

It would seem, then, that in Matt. xxviii. 19, instead of giving a set form for baptism, which was not understood by the apostles as such (and which the church now does not generally use as given!) our Lord was but stating in language, forcible because the idea was thrice repeated (as, e. g. Isa. vi. 3), the real baptism into holiness as the result of the enjoined discipling of the nations—the changing of their carnal nature into that holiness which appertains to the Father, the Son, and the holy Spirit. It was most natural to mention the holy Spirit in this connection, not because it is a person, but because it is that in which the inspired word tells us believers are baptized, when our Lord, the real baptizer, administers his, the real baptism. As John says, Matt. iii. 11, “He shall baptize you in [Gr. en] the holy Spirit.” And as our Lord promised, Acts i. 5, “John baptized with water, but ye shall be baptized in holy Spirit.”

3. Concerning the Spirit, the Bible uses language which unquestionably implies personality. This fact is most evident, and is the basis for all there is of valid argument for the personality of the Spirit. But the fact is as undeniable that the Bible also uses language of the Spirit utterly inconsistent with the idea of its personality. Now the Bible, containing only truth, must be one harmonious whole; and we must therefore reject any statement, or theory, of the Spirit which does not reconcile this apparent contradiction. This the popular theory wholly fails to do. I need only refer the reader to the “Systematic Theology” of Rev. Dr. Hodge, long the leading theologian of the Presbyterian Church of America. A careful analysis of his argument for the personality of the Spirit (vol. i., pp. 524–526) shows that it is based upon the three points we have already noted; the most stress being laid upon the one now under consideration. It will be seen that he simply ignores the Bible evidence on the other side; he attempts no explanation whatever of the fact that the Bible uses language of the Spirit totally inapplicable to a person. So one-sided an argument is radically defective. It cannot satisfy the earnest Bible student, who must have these apparently opposing statements harmonized.

But can this be? Is it possible to bring in a personality to meet the requirements of Bible language, and yet not attribute this personality to the Spirit itself? Not only possible, but necessary; and the word of God shows how.

We find that when the Bible makes a statement of the Spirit involving its nature, in a reference to what may be done to or with it, then the language is such as to preclude the idea of its personality. “Pouring out of” is not done to, “anointing with,” “baptizing in,” is not done by means of, a person. This is a strong point as to the nature of the Spirit. But when the Bible speaks of acts as accomplished by the Spirit, then the idea of a person comes strongly into view, as, “the holy Spirit saith.” So likewise is it, if the statement regards our relationship to such acts as, “resist not—grieve not—the holy Spirit.” In every-day life we similarly speak of that which is impersonal: we say, “The men construct a telegraph;” “The telegraph informs me,” etc. That means, some person, by means of the telegraph, informs me. In the case we are discussing, the person is God himself, acting through, or by means of “his Spirit, the Spirit of God.”—Rom. viii. 11, 14. God is conceived of by us as acting either in person, personally present; or as spiritually present, invisibly acting by his Spirit—his spiritual power or force. Now, as we have seen, if the mind is directed to the act accomplished by the Spirit, the thought goes back to the personal agent, God himself, and personality is attributed to the act in question. If the thought is on the operative force, which proceeds from the personal agent, then language is used of that utterly inapplicable to a person. The report of the same speech of our Lord by two evangelists shows that in that day they recognized the Spirit of God as another name for the power of God. Matthew writes (xii. 28), "If I by the Spirit of God cast out devils;" Luke (xxiv. 19), "If I by the finger [the power] of God cast out devils."

Test this explanation by the Bible. Take the strongest instance of apparent personality of the Spirit, where the personal pronoun in the first person is used: "The holy Spirit said, Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them."—Acts xiii. 2. We are here to understand (1) that the speaker is God, in the person of the Father or the Son, and (2) that he spake by his Spirit in one of his disciples.

(1) For proof of this point, so far as Paul is concerned, we have the authority of Paul himself. He says, Gal. i. 15, that it was "God who separated me [set me apart] from my mother's womb, and called me by his grace," who "revealed his Son in me," etc. Rom. i. 1, he says of himself, "separated unto the gospel of God concerning his Son." In the temple at Jerusalem he saw a vision of the Lord Jesus, who said, "I will send thee far hence unto the Gentiles."

(2) The utterance of the holy Spirit is the utterance of a prophet filled with the Spirit of the Father or of the Son. "It is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father that speaketh in you." (Matt. x. 20.) "They spake, as the Spirit gave them utterance." When Jehovah (was it not the Son? Compare John xii. 37, 41, with Isa. vi. 1, 9) spoke to Israel by the mouth of the prophet Isaiah, Paul declares (Acts xxviii. 25) that thus the holy Spirit spake to the people through Isaiah. And in Acts xxi. 10, we have the precise statement of this. The prophet Agabus binds his own hands and feet with Paul's girdle, "and said, Thus saith the holy Spirit," etc. How? Speaking by the mouth of Agabus himself. In these and similar cases, the holy Spirit is viewed as the spiritual presence of God himself.

And on the other hand, viewing the Spirit as an emanation of that "which proceedeth" from the Father or the Son, we find it spoken of as being poured out, as divided into parts to be distributed to different recipients, as imparted by measure, or without measure.

So in the language of every-day life, we at one time blend together the agent and that by which it operates, or again, we discriminate between the two. For example, we say, "Open the shutters, and let the sun come into the room." We mean, not the real, bodily sun, but the solar ray, that which proceeds from the sun. Or viewing the solar ray more precisely as an emanation of, and, so, distinct from the sun, we may speak of resolving it into its component parts, of measuring its vibrations—language utterly inapplicable to that great body from which the solar ray proceeds.

On the understanding, then, that the Bible means just what it says, that the holy Spirit is really God's Spirit, we thus reach a simple and easily apprehended solution of an apparent contradiction. And this, while those Bible references to the Spirit which are couched in language inapplicable to a person, present an insurmountable obstacle to any theory which would make the Spirit a person.

4. The masculine pronoun is used of the Comforter in John's Gospel. This is but a division of the last argument, but so much is made of it, that we consider it separately. It is really no argument at all! Every candid Greek scholar must confess that it has no bearing whatever on the question. It were as sensible to conclude that in France every tree is a feminine person, because the French word for tree, arbre, is of the feminine gender. Where the masculine pronoun thus occurs in John, chapters xiv.—xvi., it is because it is grammatically construed with parakletos (para and kaleo, "I call to my side a helper"—translated, "comforter"), a Greek masculine noun. So when the same object is referred to by the Greek neuter noun, pneuma, the pronoun is invariably neuter. This latter fact our translators have not always made evident. E. g. in John xiv. 17, they incorrectly (with a purpose?) translate the Greek "which," as English "whom"; Greek "it," English "him." So Acts v. 32, our English version "whom" is Greek "which," and so elsewhere.

So patent is it that whether we are to have the masculine or the neuter pronoun rests solely upon the grammatical connection, that I marvel to read the following in Rev. Dr. Hodge's Systematic Theology, vol. i., page 524:—

"Our Lord says, John xv. 26, 'when the Comforter (ὁ παρακλητος) is come whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit (το πνευμα) of truth, which (ὁ) proceedeth from the Father, he (εκεινος) shall testify of me.' The use of the masculine pronoun he instead of it shows that the Spirit is a person. It may indeed be said that as parakletos is masculine, the pronoun referring to it must of course be in the same gender. But as the explanatory words, to pneuma, intervene, to which the neuter ho refers, the following pronoun would naturally be in the neuter, if the subject spoken of, the pneuma, were not a person. (1) In the following chapter (John xvi. 13, 14) there is no ground for this objection. It is there said, 'when he (ekeinos), the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide . . . he (ekeinos) will glorify me.' Here there is no possibility of accounting for the use of the personal pronoun he (ekeinos) on any other ground than the personality of the Spirit."

Very strong language; but what are the facts? (1) We are told, "As the explanatory words, to pneuma, intervene, the pronoun would naturally be neuter, if the subject, the pneuma, were not a person." (?) Does not every scholar know that, in every language, a clause in apposition with the substantive "explanatory" of it has no effect whatever upon the grammatical relation of what agrees, or is connected with, that substantive? Take an English sentence: "A committee of public safety is doing its work nobly"—where "is doing" is singular, "its" sing. and neuter, because agreeing with "committee." Now interject an explanatory clause of different number and gender, thus: "A committee of public safety, twelve good men, is doing its work nobly." The grammatical relation of verb and pronoun remains unchanged. Or, transposing the substantive: "Twelve good men are doing their work nobly:—Twelve good men, a committee of public safety, are doing their work nobly."

(2) Again, "No possibility of accounting for the personal pronoun, except on the ground of the personality of the Spirit." Why, it is all a simple matter of grammar. The fact is, the demonstrative pronoun ekeinos, exactly rendered that one, is the nominative of the sentence, standing for, representing, the masculine substantive, parakletos, thus brought down from ver. 7 (a continuous line of thought), and of course it is of the masculine gender. And so the pronoun of the sentence agreeing with ekeinos must be of the same gender, since the explanatory clause, the Spirit of truth, in apposition to ekeinos, can have no more influence on the grammatical relation of what agrees with ekeinos, than if it was not there. I would not think to charge as good a man as Dr. Hodge with intentional error, but it shows that we must think for ourselves. Even great minds may be so full of a fancied truth as insufficiently to scrutinize their own arguments; especially when the logical faculty has not been sharpened by personal contact with an opponent, as is the case in the legal profession. Possibly Dr. Hodge accepted this supposed argument from a predecessor, and so transmits it to his pupils, who, I have found, receive it in a like unthinking way.

The reader has now had set before him the Bible evidence for and against the personality of the Spirit; let each judge for himself of the facts presented. For myself, I do not question that the Holy Spirit is divine—it is God's Spirit; but I cannot accept the human invention that it is a person, distinct from the Father and the Son. Such interposing of a third person but separates me from him who is the Vine, and of which we are the branches. I rejoice that I can recognize the Spirit as the Spirit of Christ, who thus by his spiritual presence is our Paraclete, our helper, protector, and guide through this wilderness world.

I know that a denial of the personality of the Spirit is so abhorrent to the traditional belief of many Christians, that they deny the religion of one making it. Rev. Dr. Chas. Hodge (Syst. Theol., vol. i., p. 443) writes: "The Church has always [?] refused to recognize as Christians those who reject this doctrine"—of the Trinity. (He seems to forget his statement, p. 117, that the difference between the views "of the early fathers on all subjects connected with the doctrine of the Trinity" and our present ideas "is as great almost as between chaos and cosmos.") But there is one higher than the Church. We read, John ix. 34, 35, "And they cast him out. Jesus heard . . . and found him;" ver. 38, "And he worshipped HIM."

Let me then say a word of my motives. I have written not for controversy, but as a duty. I am suffering from a painful disease from which I have but the slightest, if any, hope of ultimate recovery. Hitherto, although my views on this question have been long settled by much study of the Word and prayer, I have refrained from expressing them. But if the Lord sees best to bid me lay down my life—for a little while, ere he comes again—I must think it a duty to leave on record my testimony to the truth, to which, by his Spirit and his Word, he has called my attention. Thus may I, perhaps, help some struggling, doubting ones, who, not finding the personality of the Spirit taught in the Bible, have hastily inferred that they must also give up the Divinity of Him who is our only hope, whom "all should honor even as they honor the Father." To such, the facts herein presented from the Word of God may prove a blessing, in leading them to more exact views of his revealed truth. Our Lord prayed: "Sanctify them through thy truth: THY WORD IS TRUTH."

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.—The author of the foregoing article wrote it in view of his death, which occurred shortly after it appeared in the Bible Banner. It is worthy of the serious consideration of all who desire truth, and are willing to follow it wherever it leads. His argument is strong, if not irrefutable, and shows a clear light on a long and puzzling subject. Though of great length, it will well pay to study it thoroughly.

"THINGS WHICH MUST SHORTLY COME TO PASS."

REVELATION i. 1.

BEFORE considering the new heavens and the new earth, let us contemplate awhile the heavenlies and the glory of our new home there, as best we can from the description given us of Jerusalem descended, and what John saw her to be. Set forth under the similitude of "a city that lieth foursquare, the length and the breadth, and the height of it equal," we discern an aggregate of living stones, square every way and mathematically true—men whose ways are equal—always square and square all ways; earth's true nobility, each a temple of the living God, and together God's building, an habitation for God, in which he will eternally dwell, and through whom he will eternally shine. Once in nature's quarry they were in due time quarried, and roughly hewn awhile with hammer and chisel, plumbline and square in the hand of our Zerubbabel, they have become fitted to his purpose and their place in the great building. Not all of one size, but all in like proportion, squared each to its fellow-stone, angles are no more; the angular selfhood has, under the action of the fire, been burnt out of them, or by the hammer chipped and chiselled off them, and by long-continued friction becoming polished stones, they have at length been placed by God, according to his great plan, a fitting stone for every place, and a fitting place for every stone. For "now hath God set the members, every one of them, in the body as it hath pleased him." And, in the names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb inscribed on the twelve foundations, and, in the names of the twelve tribes of Israel inscribed on the twelve gates, we see the household of faith united and recognized as forming one bride. No longer two folds or two flocks, but one flock under one shepherd. And the building of lively stones, having Jesus Christ himself for the chief corner-stone, into whom the stones are built and fitly framed, we see the building now in its completeness grown into an holy temple in the Lord, having the glory of God in such sort and degree as to render each stone transparent; "Its light like unto a stone most precious; even like a jasper stone, clear as crystal." No temple is here, no candle is here, for every stone is a temple of transparent light and beauty, "the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple of it," neither hath it "need of the sun or of the moon to shine in it, for the glory of God doth lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof." What "its wall great and high" can mean, we must wait to see; what "pure gold like unto clear glass" means, we must wait to see; what "the measurement of a man, that is, of the angel," can mean, we must wait to see; whether twelve thousand furlongs bear any proportion to fifteen hundred miles square, as the extent and limit of the city, may be understood literally, we must wait to see. But, with three gates northward, eastward, southward, and westward, we see that "they shall come from the north, the east, the south, and the west, to sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of God," and that their numbers shall not be few, but many; we see not one gate, but three in either wall. That the foundations of the wall are garnished with all manner of precious stones, should make us very tolerant one of another. Not all jaspers, not all sapphires, not all emeralds, but all precious stones, and precious alike to Him who has paid one price for our redemption. And now, in all their blest variety shining in his light, and radiant with his brightness, for the glory of one God doth lighten it, and one Lamb is the light thereof.

Here Immanuel will hold his Court, and thither will saints as kings and priests resort for high commission, and then go forth to fulfil his high behests. And in glorified bodies, no longer bound by time or space, they shall traverse the infinite, rapid as light or thought, on their errands for the King.

When needful to converse with men in the flesh, they shall be able to make themselves appear as did our Lord on his way to Emmaus, and anon to vanish out of sight. Thus, holding his Court in Jerusalem descended, and sitting on the throne of his father David in Jerusalem restored, he shall, in the persons of his saints, "have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth." For then shall "the saints be joyful in glory, the high praises of God in their mouth, and a two-edged sword in their hand, to execute vengeance on the heathen, and punishments upon the people, to bind their kings with chains, and their nobles with fetters of iron, to execute upon them the judgment written: this honor have all his saints. Thus will he beautify the meek with salvation, and the Lord will take pleasure in his people."—Ps. cxlix.

Long has been the testimony of the Holy Spirit to the true worshippers: "Ye are come," but, hitherto, in spirit only. Now, shall it be manifestly true that we are come unto Mount Zion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels, to the general assembly and church of the first-born, which are written in heaven.

Egypt and Tyre and Greek and Jew,
Shall here begin their lives anew,
Angels and men shall join to sing,
The hill where living waters spring.

So much for the Jerusalem descended, but suspended over Jerusalem restored, after the manner of the cloud overshadowing Israel in the wilderness, a cloud by day and a fire by night, ever visible, verifying the name of the city Jehovah-Shammah. The Lord is there.—Ezek. xlvi. 35.

Now, let us consider millennial glory, in its sevenfold aspect, as it shall affect Jerusalem restored, and the material earth, of which it will be the City Metropolitan.

I. In relation to the heavenly bodies and the atmosphere surrounding our planet. As chief among these heavenly bodies we notice first the sun and the moon, concerning which we read, "The moon shall be confounded and the sun ashamed."—Isa. xxiv. 23. And, again, "The sun shall be no more thy light by day, neither for brightness shall the moon give light to thee, but the Lord shall be unto thee an everlasting light, and thy God thy glory."—Isa. lx. 19. And then immediately following, "Thy sun shall no more go down, neither shall thy moon withdraw itself,"—this we take to be figurative of joy and peace, because it is added—"for the Lord shall be thy everlasting light, and the days of thy mourning shall be ended." But then, again, we read, the light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun, and the light of the sun sevenfold, as the light of seven days, in the day that the Lord bindeth up the breach of his people, and healeth the stroke of their wound."—Isa. xxx. 26.

From all which we understand that the glory of Jerusalem descended will exceed that of the sun and moon; shining by night with a brilliance approaching that of the sun, and by day with the brightness of a sevenfold sun. And thus the sun would no more be needed by Jerusalem restored, neither for brightness would the moon give light to it. But, for the earth at large, the sun would still be in its light by day, and the moon by night; no change would appear in the laws affecting them or their relations to the earth.

In the promise of "new heavens and new earth" (Isa. lxv. 17), we understand the earth and the atmosphere surrounding it to exist under new conditions, and subject to new laws. And whether the glory of Jerusalem descended will be a presence of heat as well as of light, we can only suggest. But if rivers are to be opened in high places and fountains in valleys, where hitherto they have not been, so that the wilderness shall become a pool of water, and dry land springs of water; if he will plant in the wilderness the cedar, the shittah tree, and the myrtle, and the oil tree; if in the desert he will set the fir tree and the pine and the box tree together, that men "may see and know and consider and understand that the hand of the Lord hath done this, and the Holy One of Israel hath created it" (Isa. xli. 18-20); "if the wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad, the desert rejoice and blossom as the rose; if the glory of Lebanon shall be given to it, the excellency of Carmel and Sharon" (Isa. xxxv. 1, 2); well, then, may we expect such results to be accomplished by considerable changes in the laws that at present prevail. Moreover, the removal of the curse from the earth, from man and from beast, so that creation shall cease its groaning—expressed in thorns and thistles, fell diseases; and ravaging wolves—appears to necessitate some material change in the atmosphere upon which all life depends. But more of this anon, for we are far from thinking that He who framed the laws that now exist, has envied himself by those laws, or exhausted his resources for framing others when need appears.

II. In relation to art and science.

Whether the fiery ordeal, through which the world and its inhabitants shall pass in the day of the Lord's anger, will utterly destroy the treasures of art and literature with which the libraries and museums of the earth's great centres abound, may be fairly questioned, God's and man's estimate of true worth so widely differing. But in Isa. ii. 15, 16, we read that "the day of the Lord shall be upon every high tower, and upon every fenced wall, and upon all the ships of Tarshish, and upon all pleasant pictures, and the idols he shall utterly abolish"—"things of desire" (see margin). Whether these words contain sentence upon books and pictures and sculpture, the day must declare. That there are books, pictures, and sculptures, too, that righteous and pure-minded men would destroy now if they could, there need be no more question than that their teaching and tendency is immoral and corrupt. That the day of the Lord will be upon all such, we cannot doubt; but that the vandalism of Cromwell and his Ironsides, in their earnest but mistaken zeal, which turned cathedrals into stables and demolished sculptured sepulchres, will be repeated, we think not.

Whether the structures of ages long past and recently restored, with others newly raised in our own day, will abide still and become consecrated to the worship of the Most High, delivered from all the false and idol worship with which too many now abound, will be a question of deep interest to antiquaries. That some of the structures about which will cling most hallowed memories, and some of the compositions in music and literature, little less than divine, might be spared to see the light of millennial glory, we could even desire; to say nothing of the Bible in its hundred-fold form of arrangement and dialect, the monument of many laborious lives. That varieties of dialect will continue long into the period now under consideration, we think unlikely; for we read, "Then I will turn to the people a pure language, that they may all call upon the name of the Lord to serve him with one consent." (Zeph. iii. 9.) And if Israel restored, as priests of the Lord and ministers of our God, shall go forth unto the nations, "to Tarshish, Pul, and Lud, that draw the bow, to Tubal and Javan, to the isles afar off," and these from their far-off distance shall eventually send delegates who "shall go up from year to year to worship the King the Lord of Hosts, to keep the feast of tabernacles" at Jerusalem, it is most reasonable to think that one lip in a pure language shall express that praise.

But that art in music, painting, sculpture, and literature, will obtain development in millennial times far in advance of any preceding age, we doubt not. More especially when the pen, pencil, and chisel shall be in hands clean, the instruments of minds pure, expressive only of the beautiful and true in God and man. When heaven-born art shall be no more an earth-bound slave, degraded to minister to man's worst passions; for what else is the choicest work of art in painting or sculpture which, when executed, is veiled or ought to be? That the temple built at Jerusalem, after the pattern shown to Ezekiel, will be a gem of architecture the world has never yet seen, we doubt not. That the power of locomotion by land and sea will be some element more subtle than steam, and more readily applied than with our present cumbersome machinery, we doubt not. That the marvels of electricity shall be known and applied with perfect success, there need be no doubt. That the new atmosphere surrounding us will conduct sound with the rapidity of light, may be among its possibilities. And Jerusalem restored shall be the college that shall send forth its tutors for the regeneration of the nations afar off, so fulfilling their high destiny as God's witnesses among men. Already we are indebted to the Hebrew race for some of our finest compositions of music in modern times. Mr. Disraeli, in his "Life of Lord George Bentinck," written thirty years ago, inquires, "Who are the great composers who hereafter will rank with Homer, with Sophocles, with Praxiteles, or with Phidias? They are the descendants of those Arabian tribes who conquered Canaan, and who, by favor of the Most High, have done more with less means than even the Athenians. Forty years ago the two most dishonored races in Europe were the Attic and the Hebrew, and they were the two races that had done most for mankind. Their fortunes had some similarity; their countries were the two smallest in the world, equally barren and equally famous; they both divided themselves into tribes; both built a most famous temple on an acropolis; and both produced a literature which all European nations have accepted with reverence and admiration. Athens has been oftener sacked than Jerusalem, and oftener rased to the ground, but the Athenians have escaped expatriation, which is purely an Oriental custom. The sufferings of the Jews have, however, been infinitely more prolonged and varied than those of the Athenians. The Greek, nevertheless, appears exhausted. The creative genius of Israel, on the contrary, never shone so bright; and when the Russian, the Frenchman, and the Anglo-Saxon, amid applauding theatres, or the choral voices of solemn temples, yield themselves to the full spell of a Mozart or a Mendelssohn, it seems difficult to comprehend how these races can reconcile it to their hearts to persecute a Jew." And in these times that we are contemplating we expect to see Mozarts and Mendelssohns multiplied seven or, perhaps, seventy-fold, when music will be a main feature, even as praise shall be the main business of that age; when a fulness of meaning shall be felt, as never hitherto, in the words, "Make a joyful noise unto God all ye lands, sing forth the honor of his name, make his praise glorious. All the earth shall glorify thee, and shall sing unto thee; they shall sing to thy name. Selah."—Ps. lvi. 1, 2, 4. Then shall it be no empty, profane formality to say, "Let us sing to the praise and glory of God;" but as well the singers as the players on the instruments shall say, "All my fresh springs shall be in thee."—Ps. lxxxvii. 7: Prayer-book version.

And as to sacred literature, who shall say that the canon of Scripture is completed in the books of the Old and New Testaments? May it not be that, with the introduction of a new era, some newer Testament may supply a third strand to the cord of divine revelation which never can be broken? May it not be that from Jerusalem may yet again go forth a further transcript of the divine mind, containing some further light for the teaching of millennial times, the complement and completion of the whole? It may be objected, that when the Living Word has come, the written word will be done away. This will be true concerning the bride, the Lamb's wife, already with him in the glory, but not likely to be true of Israel restored, and especially the nations afar off, who have yet to hear his fame and see his glory. And when we consider the obscurity of the visions and prophecies of the Old Testament, and the "things hard to be understood" in the New, especially the closing scenes depicted in the Apocalypse, there might seem a need for a third Testament to illuminate the pages of the foregoing two. And to whom but the seed of Abraham, the honored conservators of the sacred oracles (see Rom. iii. 2), would such a work be committed? The entire book, as now we have it, is the fruit of their genius under divine inspiration. And when their minds are no longer blinded, but as a nation, "it shall turn to the Lord, and the veil is taken away, in the reading of the Old Scriptures," and the New (as our privilege long has been), the hearts of devout men, as subjects of a new inspiration, shall be ready to burst with desire to make amends for the past infidelity of their race in testimony to that Messiah long despised, but now their delight to honor as the King of kings and Lord of lords. For there, in the book they have so long set at nought and despised, they shall find it to have been long written, "They also, if they continue not in unbelief, shall be grafted in, for God is able to graft them in again. For, if thou wast cut off from an olive wild by nature, and in violation of nature wast grafted into a good olive, how much more shall these the natural branches be grafted into their own olive. For, brethren, that you may not be conceited with yourselves, I wish you not to be ignorant of this secret, that hardness in some measure has happened to Israel till the fulness of the Gentiles may come in. And then all Israel will be saved, as it has been written: 'The Deliverer shall come out of Zion and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob. And this is the covenant with them from me when I shall take away their sins.'"—Rom. xi. 23-27. (Emphatic Diaglott.)

Well may the apostle—inspired thus with prophetic visions of a bright future for his kinsmen after the flesh—exclaim, "O, the depth of the riches and wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable his judgments, and untraceable his ways. Because out of him, and through him, and for him are all things. To whom be the glory for the ages." Amen.

AN INTERESTING LETTER FROM ENGLAND.

[The following interesting letter from a new friend of the EXAMINER was received after the May number had been sent out.]

DEAR BROTHER:—It has recently become my blessed privilege to make the acquaintance of your BIBLE EXAMINER and to come into possession of Vol. 21 (minus No. 2), and so greatly am I delighted with the character, tone and aim of the publication, that I feel constrained to write you a few lines, which may possibly be a source of further encouragement to you in the blessed work in which you are engaged (at least, I presume you are so engaged).

My acquaintance with your work has come about in this wise: The numbers of the Vol. as above came to me along with a parcel of tracts, pamphlets and books, sent me a few months ago by the nephew of the late Henry Dunn; and, now, sir, having written this name, so dear and precious to me, as well as to many besides, both on your side of the Atlantic and on this, allow me to give you a little of my experience, as the result of my reading after that great and blessed man of God.

A little over two years ago I came across his work entitled, "The Limitations of Christian Responsibility." For some time previous to that, owing to a series of experiences in connection with church life and general surroundings, I had been finding myself somewhat out of harmony with views and feelings previously entertained and experienced. (I was reared and have lived for some 35 years, in connection with the Methodist Church.) In this state of mind and heart, the book I have named came to me as a God-sent message. I read and re-read with pleasure and profit, such as I had not known for a long time previously, if ever at all. And having so read, I became, as you will readily understand, anxious to read more of the productions of a mind so great, and spirit so devout and reverent. One after another of his books I procured and read, until, with two or three exceptions, I have in my possession, and have gone through, the whole of his books and pamphlets. The consequence of all this has been in my case, as it has doubtless been in multitudes of cases besides, a new and more blessed experience of life, enlarged views of its meaning, purposes and glorious possibilities in the present and in the future; clearer, juster, and more exalted, because more Scriptural, conceptions of the Divine character, government and purposes, concerning the great family of man in the several dispensations of the past, the present and the future.

God only knows how often I have risen from the perusal of these books, and fallen down before him in devout adoration and earnest thanksgiving for his great goodness toward me, in leading me and bringing me into contact with the great and glorious truths so calmly, clearly, earnestly and fearlessly set forth and illustrated by our departed friend and brother, or rather I should say perhaps, our aged father, in God. For a little while before his death it was my great privilege to have occasional correspondence with him, and his letters, together with a photo of him; which with great kindness he consented, after some considerable entreaty, to let me have, are amongst the most valued of my few earthly treasures.

From all this you will readily gather how thankful I am to have met with a few Nos. of your Magazine, some of which I have read with the greatest pleasure, and I trust profit also.

I need not say how entirely the contents, so far as I have seen as yet, are in accord with my own views and feelings respecting the great truths of our holy religion. Not the religion of churches, creeds, catechisms, traditions, sects, or parties, but the religion of the Bible, which is destined, in God's own time, to bless and save the redeemed race, through the instrumentality of the elect Church.

I am of course very thankful to find that Mr. Dunn's "Following after Truth" is reproduced in your columns. From a Note in No. 12. Vol. 21, I learn that it was to be continued in Vol. 22, so far at least as Part 3 was concerned. Whether any parts subsequent to this came into your hands, I know not, but presume it to be doubtful, seeing that he was taken away from us before that work was finished; and this to the great regret of those who were favored as among his private friends, one of whom wrote me the other day and stated his belief that, had the work been completed and published, it would have been one of the most valuable books extant.

For some time past I have been anxious to meet with a serial publication, in harmony more or less with my altered views of truth. "The Rainbow," conducted by Dr. Leask, is the nearest approach. I find you reprint from it; but your EXAMINER is much more to my mind, and if I had means at command to pay for the Vols. 18, 19, 20 and 22, I should ask you either to send them direct, or to inform me how to get them through an agent here. This, however, I cannot do at present; but if you still live and the work is continued, I should be most thankful to subscribe for the current volume and have it sent from you direct, as I presume that would be the best way to get it. May I therefore respectfully ask you to let me have an answer to this at your earliest convenience; and if you could send me a copy of No. 2, Vol. 21, I should be extremely obliged, and will see that you are paid for it. Meanwhile let me simply add my deep conviction that the work on which you are engaged is a great, blessed, God-honoring work, which, notwithstanding opposition, misrepresentation and indifference on the part of the great bulk of those who are the professed lovers of truth, shall yield a glorious harvest of light and blessing, comfort and strength to those who come directly within the circle of your readers, as well as indirectly to great numbers outside that favored circle. And I pray that whenever the Master may say concerning you, It is enough, and call you to rest, there may be found some able and devoted man of God ready to take up the work and carry it on. For the present I must stop my pen, but may possibly take the liberty to trouble you again at some future time. Meantime I am yours in the hope of the Gospel.

THE MESSIANIC COMMISSION.

BY WILLIAM H. SPENCER.

"As the Father hath sent me, even so send I you."—John xx. 21. "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature."—Mark xvi. 15.

The circumstances under which the chosen followers of Jesus were thus addressed; the plain, simple language used by the risen Saviour who was soon to be glorified at the right hand of the Father, assume the royalty of heaven, and wield the sceptre of "all power and authority" in heaven and earth (Eph. i. 20, 21; 1 Pet. iii. 22), clothe these utterances with peculiar interest.

Jesus, after his resurrection, showed himself to "the eleven as they sat at meat," in Jerusalem, with closed doors for fear of the Jews, "and upbraided them with their unbelief and hardness of heart, because they believed not them which had seen him after he was risen."—Mark xvi. 14. They were sorely troubled and perplexed with the recent scenes of Gethsemane, as well as disturbed by the startling tidings that Jesus had been seen by some of the brethren after the discovery of the empty sepulchre where loving hands had entombed him, "for as yet they knew not the scripture that he must rise from the dead."—John xx. 9. How natural, then, that in their seclusion, with bolted doors, when Jesus "stood in the midst of them," they "were terrified and affrighted, supposing they had seen a spirit," or apparition!—Luke xxiv. 36, 37. And when he had convinced them that he was the Christ, exhibiting "his hands and his feet" (vs. 40), which bore the nail-marks of his executioners, Luke says "they yet believed not for joy," and "wondered" at the strange things brought to their eyes and ears. "Then opened he their understanding, that they might understand the scriptures" (vs. 45); and John adds that Christ "breathed on them, and saith unto them, Receive ye the Holy Ghost."—John xx. 22.

Christ thus endued them to receive the great commission, cited at the head of this article, which should constitute them co-workers in the redemption of the world. They were graciously chosen to a work to which angels could not aspire, for they were destined to "judge angels."—1 Cor. vi. 3. "Ye have not chosen me," says Jesus, "but I have chosen you, and ordained you, that ye should go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain."—John xv. 16. As a fore-ordained part of the great plan of redemption, Christ was about to leave the world for a more exalted position and work in the redemptive scheme; and as an essential part of the Divine purpose to inaugurate a new dispensation, he must have chosen representatives in the world as co-workers with him; and as he was endued with the Holy Ghost at the commencement of his ministry, so he endued them with the Holy Ghost, as he sends them forth, which should bring all things to their remembrance which he had spoken unto them, and should "guide them into all truth."—John xvi. 13.

In that wonderful prayer of Jesus just before his betrayal, he says: "As thou hast sent me into the world, even so have I also sent them into the world. . . . Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on me through their word, that they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me and I in thee, that they also may be one in us; that the world may know that thou hast sent me. And the glory which thou gavest me I have given them; that they may be one even as we are one."—John xvii. 18-22. The grand and glorious truths here set forth form so large a part of the New Testament, that we need do little more than emphasize some expressions:

1. "As thou hast sent me into the world," points to Christ's mission. That Christ was sent into the world to accomplish a fore-ordained work in the plan of redemption must be conceded, when we consider that a revelation of this purpose has held a conspicuous part in God's communication with the children of men. Thus it is self-evident that God had a plan for the government of the race before the foundation of the world, "declaring the end from the beginning" (Isa. xlv. 10), and hath "appointed the ancient people, and the things that are coming and shall come."—Isa. xlv. 7.

The promise of God to the fallen pair in Eden revealed this purpose in pointing to the coming of One—"the seed of the woman"—who should triumph over the evil that had been introduced, and in due time deliver the world from its consequences by "bruising (literally, crushing) the serpent's head"—Gen. iii. 15. In accordance with this divine purpose, God sent his Son "in the likeness of sinful flesh" (John i. 14), as the second Adam, "the Lord from heaven" (1 Cor. xv. 47), who should reverse the evil introduced by Adam's failure. Paul clearly sets forth this in his letter to the Romans, which identifies Christ as the personage signified by "the seed of the woman." He says: "As by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned. . . . Therefore as by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so, by the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life: for, as by one man's disobedience [the] many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall [the] many be made righteous," i.e., delivered from the consequences of the first man's disobedience. On the 19th verse, Dr. Bloomfield, in his "Critical Notes on the Greek New Testament," remarks: "This verse is explanatory of the preceding, and oi polloi should be rendered 'the many,' which, as appears from the foregoing, is equivalent to pantes. It is very important to attend to this force of the article, and to bear in mind that throughout this whole passage it is (as Archbishop Whately observes), 'the main drift of the apostle to set forth the universality of redemption as being co-extensive with the evil introduced at the fall, which it was designed to remedy.'" Dr. Bloomfield, after a critical examination of this portion of the apostle's letter, adds: "The meaning, therefore, of verses 18 and 19 may be thus expressed (with Holden): 'As, by Adam's disobedience, all men are brought into a state of condemnation, so, by Christ's obedience, all men are brought into a state of justification and life, i.e., have the means of attaining that justification which will be crowned with eternal life.'" It is, therefore, clear that Christ, as the foreordained "seed of the woman," was constituted "Lord both of the dead and the living" (Rom. xiv. 9), which includes all the descendants of Adam, and in this respect he has taken "away the sin of the world" (John i. 29), so that all men, either in this age or in the ages to come, shall have an opportunity to secure eternal life by believing on him. The decree has gone forth, and none can change it.

2. A unity of purpose is shown by Christ's words. He says: "As thou hast sent me into the world, even so have I also sent them;" and he prays that "they also may be one in us"—may ever keep the divine purpose in view, embodied in their commission, to "preach the gospel to every creature" (Mark xvi. 15), that "the world may believe that thou hast sent me" (John xvii. 21). Hence it was God's purpose that all men should "come to the truth" (1 Tim. ii. 4); that Christ, "who gave himself a ransom for all," should be "testified" (made known) to all "in due time" (vs. 6). Hence we see that God's purpose in Christ was to place eternal life within easy reach of all men; that "as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness," even so was the Son of man lifted up, "that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life" (John iii. 14, 15). "And this is eternal life," says Jesus, "to know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent" (John xvii. 3). To accept, by hearty belief and obedience, "the only true God and Jesus Christ" whom he sent is the only means of obtaining eternal life. "The gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord" (Rom. vii. 23), and the opportunity to obtain this the immutable Governor of the universe has pledged to give to "all men in due time." We see, therefore, the unfolding of the Divine purpose in the Messianic Commission, "Go ye unto all the world and preach the gospel to every creature."

3. It was clearly not the object of Christ's personal ministry to preach the gospel to every creature. This is clear from his own words: "I have manifested thy name unto the men which thou gavest me out of the world. . . . I have given them the words which thou gavest me; and they have received them, and have known surely that I came out from thee, and they have believed that thou didst send me. I pray for them: I pray not for the world" (John xvii. 6-9). Christ's ministry was a preparatory work inaugurating and ordaining a human ministry, endued with the Holy Ghost, to proclaim "the glad tidings" into "all the world" and to "every creature;" that, as Christ says, as "they (his disciples) have believed that thou (the Father) hast sent me," so they are commissioned to preach the gospel to every creature "that the world may believe that thou hast sent me" (vs. 8, 21), "that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father" (Phil. ii. 10, 11). This points to universal worship. (See Rev. v. 13.)

QUERIES.

Is it not a clear fact that the divinely appointed agency for saving men, both the bringing of them to the sonship, and to the life of the future ages, is by the preaching of men who are especially called of God to that work? See 1 Cor. i. 21; Rom. x. 14, 15; Titus i. 3; Rom. i. 1; Acts xiii. 2-4; 1 Tim. iv. 4; ii. 2; Eph. iv. 11, 12; Col. i. 7; iv. 7; Titus i. 5-9; 1 Pet. v. 1-3; Acts xx. 28.

Is it not also revealed in the Holy Scriptures that the church has duties, especial duties enjoined upon its members, to supply the temporal needs of such preachers? See Luke x. 7; 1 Tim. v. 18; 1 Cor. i. x 7-14.

Is it not true that in all the past of this age every great principle of truth that has been borne to the people has been borne to them by God's chosen ministers—men who have been sent especially by him to do that work?

Is it not very strange that there is not one man in the Eastern or Middle States who is giving his time, by preaching, to the promulgation of the great truth that God has permitted us to see concerning the destiny of our race, unmixed with crude, erratic notions? Lest some may suppose that my object in making the statements that follow, is to secure the pay, I would say, my entire life for thirty-four years contradicts such a supposition. I have been refusing, for the past eight years, the oft-repeated offer of a good position in one of the most important church organizations in this country, from conscientious scruples.

That position is still open to me, and I could, by accepting it, gratify one of my nearest relatives, and secure a good living for life, and enjoy, as a minister in that church, more extended religious liberty than in any other ecclesiastical organization under heaven. I am, however, wedded to the whole truth of God, and cannot keep a good conscience and go into any religious organization, either simple or compound. Now for the proposition.

Could not our brethren keep a man constantly in the field with but little individual outlay? The gospel is a more liberal system than the law. Under the law they gave one-tenth of their increase to the Lord and the church. There are open doors for preaching in new places, and I would be glad to enter into that work, but have no means. I have done but little, aside from preaching, for thirty years. I have worked hard at that, so hard that I have broken down entirely twice in that time. I never have preached once in my life for a stipulated salary. I am now poor; my companion, after bearing the privations consequent upon becoming the wife of a preacher of a free gospel without a murmur, is now feeble, and unable to do her work. Our only remaining child is in poor health. I am cut off from the sympathy and fellowship of the people among whom I was ordained a preacher thirty years ago this present month, and for no other reason than that I believe in future probation.

It seems to me that nearly every brother and sister who holds our views, could have a meeting of one or two days in or near the place where he or she lives, pay the expense of such meeting, and, in doing so, suffer less privation and bear a lighter cross than my family has suffered and borne during every year since I embraced the truth concerning the great work to be done in the future ages. Suppose your brethren are opposed to your making such an effort? Are you to stultify yourself, put your light under a bushel, and suffer the people around you to remain ignorant of the great facts of Scripture that so fully vindicate the character of God from the blasphemous aspersions laid against it by ignorant wise ones, because those with whom you are associated in a man-made church are merely sectarian bigots? What, if you do have to step out alone? We have done so already. Will not a knowledge that you are following where God and His truth lead, be an amply sufficient compensation? Let us be men, men of God—Christians.

S. W. BISHOP.

West Meriden, Conn., Sept., 1879.

REMARKS BY EDITOR OF EXAMINER.—I had decided, before receiving the preceding article from Brother Bishop, to make a special appeal for himself and family. Their necessities and sufferings are sufficient to move every sympathizing heart to do something for their relief. Cast off, as they are, by their old friends in consequence of embracing the doctrine of the "ages to come," I am sure friends will not neglect to aid them at once, according to their several abilities. Address him, "Box 566, West Meriden, Conn."

LETTERS AND EXTRACTS.

FROM POLLY G. PITTS.

DEAR SISTER STORRS: The whole family of believers have felt that our dear Brother Storrs, through the blessing of God, has given us the truth as it is in Jesus, as far as it laid in his power to do. We feel that his trust is in God, and we know that our God will never leave him or forsake him, and our prayer is that our God will give him calm resignation and reconciliation to his holy will in all things, and make all his beds in sickness, and give him the peace that passeth all understanding.

My dear sister, I have thought lately that your father, our brother, was God's sword he was using in his own cause, and was fashioning on his own anvil, and oh! the suffering of those heavy blows to shape it according to his holy will, and the polishing until in its brightness the glorious face of its owner can be seen in its beauty. Then to think of the finishing process, when those powerful acids are applied to eat in, to engrave, to impress beyond the power of utterance the name of its owner and its maker. Happy brother, God will be glorified in thee, whether by life or death. If thou dost sleep in Jesus, may thy mantle fall on some Elisha that can plough with twelve yoke of oxen, or less, if he only broke up the ground so it would receive the good seed, and bring forth a glorious harvest. Oh! that God would revive his work in our midst, and bring forth the EXAMINER again, and hold it up, for many are looking and longing for its appearance. May God preserve you, all blameless, unto his heavenly kingdom. Your sister in the Lord.

Evansville, Wis.

FROM AMBR. RONDTHALER.

DEAR SISTER: The Lord is with our dear Brother Storrs a help, a present help, a very present help. "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble." —Ps. xlv. i. All will be well. It will be for the glory of God, and for his and our own good. Think of the past; did not his sickness, during the cold winter, years ago, prove to be the key for unlocking for him and for others "the promise and oath of God to Abraham"? And will not this sickness enable him to depend still more than he has ever done on the literal, yes, literal meaning of God's promises to his individual sons and daughters?

Amid the growing darkness of our times, his prayer in the BIBLE EXAMINER has hitherto been, "Thy kingdom come;" and, this, no doubt, continues to be his prayer on his sick-bed. And Christ's answer is this: "Surely, I come quickly." Let the answer of all be: "Even so, come, Lord Jesus." From morning to evening, from evening to morning, may my dear Brother Storrs become more and more willing, and more and more able to bear the burdens laid upon him, and to thank God for past trials and victories of faith. And may his and our hearts and lips overflow with gratitude, when we think on what the Lord has already done for him; and this thankfulness, or rather this thankful remembrance, will strengthen him and you and us with new trust in the help of God, our Saviour, our Life-giver, our all, amid the trials, sorrows and troubles of the present and the future.

Bethlehem, Pa.

FROM DAVID J. ELLSWORTH.

BRO. STORRS: I heard through one who takes the Herald of Life that you were very sick. We suspected here that you might be sick, as June EXAMINER had not come. It may be, and God grant it, that he will still keep your soul back from the pit of corruption and give you a greater revelation of Himself, than ever before. I do not know of another on this continent, whom, to my mind, the Lord would thus delight to honor. He did in a marvellous manner, years ago, at your great sickness and raised you up to vindicate his character and government as no other mortal, to my knowledge, has done. To God be all the praise for the honor bestowed, for I also have shared in the blessing with many others. The good Lord is still able to keep you and lengthen out your days and give you further opportunity to declare his great love and good will to the children of men. May the Lord sustain your faithful companion, and give you all great peace of mind in all his dealings with you.

FROM G. B. MARTIN.

BRO. STORRS: I received a letter written by your daughter informing me of your sickness. I felt sure that something was the matter, by the non-appearance of the EXAMINER. I trust, by God's blessing, you may recover soon. I miss the EXAMINER greatly. I have received much encouragement and light through its pages. There is but little religion here in Britt, and though it is a small thriving village in a good new country, worldliness holds sway. The old eternal torment doctrine is wearing out; not many believe it, and it will and must wear out. Immortal soulism is the original cause; eternal-torment the result. My faith never was stronger than now in the views advocated by the BIBLE EXAMINER. I praise God for the light I have received through its pages. I long to see the net of the Gospel drawn to the shore and the good gathered into the fold of Christ. Oh, what a meeting there will be when all the saints meet in his blessed and glorious kingdom! There no one will ever say, I am sick or I have pain, or I am tired, or I fear an enemy; all these things will be remembered no more at all, nor come into mind. Sweet morning, blessed moment, when the ransomed of the Lord will meet their Saviour in the air and become joint-heirs of his kingdom, and be kings and priests and reign with Christ on the earth. Amen, so let it be.

Britt, Iowa.

FROM CHAS. A. HASTINGS.

DEAR SISTER: I received your postal announcing the serious illness of your father. My companion and myself deeply sympathize with you in your severe trial. May the dear Lord give you an abundance of grace and strength. He is the great fountain to flee to in all cases; his great and precious promises are Yea and Amen to them that believe. I have known some of this in a few weeks in the past, for I have just got up from a severe fit of sickness, with which I was brought near the chamber of death. On the 4th of May I was attacked with scarlet-fever, and for a week or more was very sick: I had it in its severest form. The doctor said he never saw a worse case. He had little, if any, hope that I should get up again. But through the prayers of some of the loved and faithful ones, who claimed the promises that the "prayer of faith shall save the sick," and "where two or three are agreed in touching any one thing it shall be done." From that time I have gradually recovered, and am well, except I have not quite my usual strength, but am every day improving, for which I feel to praise the good Lord. O that Brother Storrs, or some one in connection with him, might know the faith and claim the promise.

It does seem as though we could not spare him, he is so much needed. Is anything too hard for God? All things are possible to them that believe. He who can create can rebuke and restore. May the very best blessings and love rest upon you all.

Springfield, Mass.

FROM WM. GIBBS.

DEAR BROTHER STORRS: I have just received information from your daughter of your sickness, which makes me feel very sad and sorrowful, and I long to meet you and express my sympathy in this your hour of affliction. I have never had the pleasure of meeting you or seeing you, but we have had some correspondence with each other, and it really seems to me as if I was well acquainted with you. I have had the pleasure for several years of reading the BIBLE EXAMINER, and have done what little I could to increase its circulation, feeling in my heart that the great doctrine and truths it taught ought to be made known to others by all who see God's love and mercy so clearly. I am more and more convinced every day of my life that "God is love," and that he has a plan to save the human race, and will give all a chance for salvation; and here let me say, my dear Brother Storrs, that your articles in the BIBLE EXAMINER have done me more good than those of any other person that I ever read. I can truly say that you are very near and dear to me, and I hope and pray that God will restore you to health, and that you may have the privilege of publishing the BIBLE EXAMINER some years longer; and you, I believe, have been the pioneer of all these great truths in America, and have advocated them honestly and fearlessly, and have had to bear the reproaches of the world for so doing, and what is worse, of those who ought to have been engaged hand in hand with you in this work. But God has blessed your labors abundantly, and you have many earnest and sincere friends in all parts of this country who have been blessed by your labor, and who sympathize with you. I remain, with much love, your brother in Christ.

San Francisco, Cal.

C. W. BUVINGER, M. D., Pittsburgh, writes: We are in hopes our dear brother Storrs will recover, but we leave him in the hands of our heavenly Father, knowing that "the Judge of all the earth will do right;" and this we know that, whether living or dying, he is the Lord's. Amid the thrilling events now transpiring, and likely to transpire, in the world, and the possibility of the Bridegroom soon calling for his bride, it would be our greatest joy that he should not go down into the dark valley, but would be caught away to meet our glorious Lord. For this I wait, for this I pray, when I pray, "Thy kingdom come," daily at the "family altar." O glorious thought! O happy day! when we shall all meet to part no more forever! "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know when he shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." Even so, come, Lord Jesus.

BRO. N. M. CATLIN writes: Dear Sister in Christ, the news which your postal card brings to me, though not altogether unexpected, is sad. Please say to Bro. Storrs, as from me, "Abraham believed God, and it was imputed to him for righteousness," and I verily believe his faith in unfolding the purposes of God's plan of redemption for the race will as assuredly prevail. I trust I may hear that Bro. Storrs "hopes to the end for the grace to be brought." We have received the EXAMINER regularly, and have read it with increasing interest, and now we greatly miss it.

BRO. JAMES LESLIE, Toronto, Can., writes: My Dear Brother in the Lord—I have often thought of your case, the afflictions incident to your advanced age and disease. I doubt not that you will realize the presence and support of the Comforter—the Spirit of the Lord—in this your time of trouble, and that he whom you have long and faithfully served, will be with you, your help even unto death, and your eternal portion.

WILLIS JONES writes: Dear Sister Storrs—I received your card on my return from Toronto, which relieved my anxiety, for I had begun to fear for the worst. I am very sorry to hear of the serious illness of your father, who is also my brother in the blessed hope of a resurrection from the dead, when sorrow, pain and sickness will be no more. I have learned to respect and love him from his manly, honest writings alone, never having had the pleasure of seeing or conversing with him; but have we not all thus learned to love and reverence our blessed Saviour, and not from his own writings either, but from the writings of his apostles? I hope and trust, and my prayer is that Israel's God and our Saviour, whom your father has so long and diligently served, may still spare him to his family and friends and the cause of truth. God's will be done, whose tender mercies are over all his works.

Castleton, Can.

W. K. EVERSON, M. D., writes: Dear Bro. Storrs—I to-day had business at Bro. Wilson's, in Chicago, and remarked to him that I feared you were sick, for the EXAMINER had not come to hand yet, and you had written me you were complaining of pains. He then informed me that you had been very low and not expected to live, but that the last Restitution said you were better. I felt sorry, and glad to know you were more comfortable; thank the Lord for this much, and I shall join the prayers of the brethren that your hands may be held up awhile longer. You no doubt have good medical advice; still I cannot help but desire to be near you. Try and be patient, dear brother; our good Lord will do all things well, and though few of us '43 pioneers may live to see the land without passing through the grave, the Word is sure. He will provide. Let us put all trust in his promises. He is faithful, and in a little while more we shall realize our reward. Praise the Lord! Hoping it may be the Lord's will that you may recover fully, I remain your brother in Christ.

LUCY E. WATSON writes: Dear Brother—We think of you so often, and wish we could help you, for we have tasted the cup of affliction enough, so that, in a measure at least, we can sympathize with others, and when we can do nothing more, it is a great privilege to take it to One that we know is able to take care of our friends, and he knows what is for the best, and more than that, he makes all things to work for our good. How can we help loving such a Father as this? I think it a hard matter to do it when we really understand his character.

I often think of you as I met you the first time in Springfield, and see how the Lord has led you and how he opened the way for the spread of light and truth. I am glad that the Lord takes care of his own cause, and can remove all obstacles or furnish means, just as the case may require.

We miss the BIBLE EXAMINER very much, and if the Lord will, we hope you may be restored to health to continue it. May the Lord bless and sustain you is our earnest prayer.

Northwood Narrows.

G. B. MARTIN, under date of Sept. 21, writes: I am glad to learn that your case appears more favorable, and hope you may fully recover. We miss the EXAMINER much. I am lonesome here in the Northwest, far from all my friends and acquaintances, and my mind reverts back to the days of my youth, the morning of my life, to youthful scenes and pleasures. But it is all passed as a shadow and a tale that is told. We hardly learn how to live till our days are past. There is, however, an eternal noon before us—a glorious future, when the wilderness shall bud and blossom as the rose, and the curse be removed from the earth with all its afflictions, pains and sorrows, such as you have been suffering since last May, and eternal happiness will take their place forever.

GEO. L. HART, Unionville, writes: We are more than ever rejoicing in the glory of the Star that glimmers in our heart's best affections, hoping that ere long the Sun of righteousness, the Metropolitan of the true centralization, shall arise from the dust and triumphant begin the everlasting reign which shall conquer death and disease that now prey upon God's dear children. We know that God will be with you, dear brother, and if the trial be extreme a greater glory lies beyond.

DEATH STILL AT WORK.

DANIEL HAWKES, Andes, N. Y., fell asleep in Jesus, April 13, aged seventy years. Five days later his wife followed him.

Brother Hawkes was one of my old and firm friends. His son writes me: "My father lived and died a Christian." The Andes Recorder, noticing his death, says: "Mr. Hawkes was one of the oldest residents of the town and will be kindly remembered. He was possessed of considerable means during life and had helped many in their time of need."

Many of my old friends have passed away in death recently. But they will be "delivered from the bondage of corruption," by the DESTROYER of death, into the "glorious liberty of the sons of God." Let us all be concerned to be in Christ, the "LIFE-GIVER."

[By the following correspondence the readers of the BIBLE EXAMINER will learn that another of God's aged standard-bearers has fallen. Bro. J. F. Lee, M. D., is no more. He was long a warm friend of the EDITOR, and an earnest expounder and defender of Bible truth. He finally yielded to the foe, firm in the faith that death's triumph would be short. His last work was to pen the following note, which was followed by that of his grandson announcing his death.—W. H. S.]

DEAR SISTER: You have said truly "you (I) will be pained, when I hear that your dear father is very ill." If any news could possibly intensify my sufferings, surely your postal card has done it. I received the news yesterday, and was informed of it by a friend two weeks ago, but as I myself was stricken down on the 6th day of May (four weeks ago), confined to my bed and suffering more than all the pain, misery and anguish I endured for eighty-one years, I got my grandson F. H. Wolfe, to answer the first news of your father's illness, and am this morning sitting up trying to write these lines. What can I say? How shall I write? I am utterly destitute of words to address my loved brother, Geo. Storrs. In his own language, I pray he may be perfected by suffering, and appear among the redeemed when Jesus comes in bliss to reign. I add no more. I may not live five days. This is all I am able to say at present; should I recover, you will hear from me again.

Sincerely and truly your brother in Christ Jesus,

June 6th, 1879.

J. F. LEE, M. D.

MISS HATTIE W. STORRS: Grandfather Lee died the 30th July. He had been very sick before he wrote to you, but was better at that time and we had strong hopes of his recovery, but he was a second time attacked with violent pains, suffering very much until very near the end. Nothing which we could do for him was left undone, but no relief came until he passed away. Yours truly,

FRANK H. WOLFE.

Monroe, N. C., August 22d, 1879.

ON Sept. 27, 1879, Bro. H. G. ARMSTRONG fell asleep in Jesus, after a very brief illness. He was one of the editor's warm friends and much interested in the EXAMINER. He will not have long to sleep, for soon the resurrection morn will dawn, and in answer to the summons of the Prince of life, he will come forth in immortal youth.

The following letter from Bro. Armstrong was received the early part of July, and was followed by a letter from his son in September announcing his father's decease.

W. H. S.

TRENTON, July 2d, 1879.

SISTER STORRS: I received your postal notifying us of your father's sickness. I am sorry and sincerely sympathize with you. Give my love to him. I would like to see his dear old face once more, but fear I never shall this side the resurrection morn.

Very respectfully, H. G. ARMSTRONG.

DEAR MISS STORRS: I write to inform you of the sudden death of my father, who died yesterday afternoon after an illness of about ten days.

Fully aware of the high veneration and esteem in which he held your aged father, I felt it to be my duty to let him know of my father's decease.

Many a time when a boy, I have walked up the aisle with my father, after the sermon was over, to your father's pulpit, for the warm grasp of the hand and the kindly smile which we were always sure to receive.

With great respect and sincere wishes for your father's speedy and full recovery, I am Very truly, SAM'L S. ARMSTRONG.

Trenton, Sept. 28, 1879.

THE following letter will also inform the readers of the EXAMINER that Bro. Jos. PARRY, another one of its friends, has fallen asleep during the editor's illness:

DEAR MISS STORRS: Your card is received, from which we infer your dear father has not yet heard that his friend and brother in Christ was at "rest in Jesus." He fell asleep June 7th, aged eighty-four years. He had heard of your father's suffering illness before his death and felt deeply affected, as his love and friendship for him was great. Say to Brother Storrs, that my dear husband died in the full hope of a glorious resurrection. Though not an extreme sufferer, he longed to be at rest. When told that his sufferings were nearly over, his last words were, "Thank God." We long for the time to come when death, our common enemy, shall be destroyed, and Christ, the Life-giver, will restore our loved ones to enjoy the fulness of a blessed immortality.

We truly sympathize with your dear father in his great sufferings. We know that his hope is firmly anchored on the "Rock of Ages," and soon he will reap the rewards of his labors and bless God through the countless ages of eternity. We much miss the dear EXAMINER, which has been read with so much comfort and profit by my husband and myself. Yours in the strong bond of affliction and sympathy,

MARY L. PARRY.

Sandy Hill, N. Y., July 4, 1879.

DIED.—At Salem, Mass., April, 1879, Nathan Putnam; aged 83 years.

For over sixty years Brother Putnam had led a Christian life, adorning his profession, and rendering himself a devoted friend to every good cause. During the greater portion of that period he was a member of the Baptist denomination, and, I believe, when he severed his connection with that body to join the Second Advent Church in this city, he was holding the office of deacon.

It was about this time that I became acquainted with Brother Putnam, and began to learn the depth and worth of his character. Our friendship since that time has been unbroken, although opportunities for social intercourse have not been so frequent as I have desired. But I look back upon the many seasons of delightful communion which I enjoyed with him with the most pleasurable emotions, for he was a man who delighted to converse upon divine truths. And so great was his love for truth itself, that no price was too great in his estimation for its purchase.

Business or church relations, friends, relatives,—all were as nothing to him when they threatened to hinder his advancement into the full enjoyment and benefit of new light on the divine scheme of human redemption. So, when he became convinced that the views advocated by the BIBLE EXAMINER were correct, he did not hesitate to step boldly out and confess his faith. And yet there was no bravado about his manner of doing it. He simply rejoiced in the truth, and grew stronger and richer in his spiritual development under the influence of increasing light.

But how shall I tell, in a few words, the worth of a good man who has passed from our midst,—a man whom no one could really know without loving and holding in respectful esteem? Permit me to say that his last days were full of peace and joy in the Holy Ghost. He fell asleep in an atmosphere of prayer, which few men have learned so well as had he, to enjoy.

At the last interview but one that I had with him, he spoke with loving remembrance of Brother Storrs and the BIBLE EXAMINER. The latter was, to use his own language, "next to his Bible." But he is sleeping in Jesus, an undisturbed repose. We miss his presence, but we could not wish him back to a life of pain.

Every circumstance of his last days was all that could be desired. He was served devotedly by a sympathizing companion, who, with a daughter and two sons, mourn his loss. Nothing that human sympathy could prompt for his relief and comfort was withheld. He was laid away in the beautiful Harmony Grove Cemetery in this city to await the summons of his Divine Master.

A BRIEF TRIBUTE.

GEORGE STORRS is a name around which cluster the brightest gems in memory's tablet; a name, the bare mention of which, brings to our mind, in bold relief, a character combining, in a rare degree, all the Christian graces, the greatest of which is "charity." His character was a model for imitation. From a long and intimate acquaintance I knew him as but few could. I was familiar with his struggles and sacrifices to advance the truth. All was laid on the altar. Few only know the sacrifices that he and his family made; and now that the shadow of death rests upon that home from which we have derived so much light, the sorrowing family should be remembered in our prayers and alms unto the Lord. They need our help and sympathy. It is but just this should be known, although I write it without their knowledge.

To GEORGE STORRS self was unknown. He was the most unselfish person I ever knew. To him Christ was all in all. LOVE was the soul of his being—the love of God in giving His beloved Son to be "the Saviour of the world," who shall "be testified to all men in due time," was his constant theme. But his mind was wholly free from a proselyting spirit. He never pressed his views upon others, but when opportunity offered he would freely give the reasons for his faith with such clearness, simplicity, earnestness and logic, and with such a loving spirit, as to win approbation, in spite of prejudice or preconceived notions to the contrary. His friendship meant more than human words. Benevolence was the mainspring of his being. He illustrated, by every means in his power, the truth of the inspired words, that "it is more blessed to give than to receive." In contributing to the happiness of others, and in bringing out the silver lining to the darkest clouds, was his supreme delight.

Often, during his painful illness, with tears of joy, he reaffirmed his confidence in the truth of the views of God's character and government which he had set forth in the BIBLE EXAMINER, and discoursed earnestly of God's purposes of love regarding the race in "the ages to come," and often expressed the hope that he might be a chosen instrument in the hands of God—be a member of the Lamb's bride—in fulfilling God's promise and oath to Abraham to bless all the families of the earth. As he approached the valley of the shadow of death this confidence and hope grew stronger, filling his heart with inexpressible joy. In life he earnestly sought to honor God by cherishing and promulgating Scriptural views of his character and government; and we cannot better honor the name of the dear departed than by thus following in his footsteps. God has given his beloved rest, but death's triumph will be short.

HENRY SEITZ, of Palmyra, writes: Your note informing me of the sad news of the death of our much-loved Brother Storrs is only received; but I am not surprised, for we all expected he could not remain much longer with us. I have known him since 1842 or 1843, when I heard him expound the prophecies concerning the Second Advent movement at the Landisville, Campville, Lancaster Co., Pa. Oh! how much I am indebted to him for the knowledge of the Scriptures at the time he first circulated his Six Sermons, declaring that man was not immortal; afterward came the glorious truth that all men should have an opportunity for eternal life, either in this life or in that which is to come. Please to keep me posted. What is to become of the BIBLE EXAMINER? Will it be continued? If so, send me one, and count me one who will help to support it.

BRO. GEO. H. WATERHOUSE, Lynn, Mass., writes: I have thought you would think it strange that I did not write before this, after being so kindly notified of the death of your dear father. The reason is this: As I have been very much interested in the writings of my beloved Bro. Storrs, for the past twenty-six years, when I learned his work was done for the season, I thought, O how sad and lonesome you, dear Sister Storrs, must feel, since the dark cloud of mourning rested over your dwelling! Remember, dear friends, there is a bright side to that cloud—bless God—and it is soon to be realized, thank the Lord. "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly," let the prisoners go free, is my prayer! I did feel sad for you, and you shall have our prayers and assistance.

BRO. G. B. STACY, Amelia C. H., Va., writes: Now we see through a glass darkly, it is extremely dim—the light we received, as though we only saw men as trees walking: our flesh which constitutes "the veil" which conceals from us the perception and realization of the full glories of the invisible world. Moses said of poor human flesh: "Every imagination of the thought of the heart is only evil and that continually;" and Paul says of the mind developed by it, that "it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be." And so he says of us Gentiles walking in the vanity of our minds, we have our "understandings darkened, being alienated from the life of God, through the ignorance (darkness) that is in us." It seems so very difficult for us to realize that our sensible existence is but the preliminary and mere temporary condition—a mere school-day period and condition.

THE BIBLE EXAMINER.

In consultation with a few friends, it was proposed as a conclusion to the last volume of the BIBLE EXAMINER, to issue the present as a memorial number to its late Editor, my honored father. Believing a compliance with such a request will be most gratefully accepted by his many friends and subscribers, and at the same time offering a very desirable medium through which my aged mother and myself can more fully express our gratitude and thanks to the many kind friends who have, during the sad period that has passed, aided us financially and also consoled us by kind words of sympathy: to one and all we tender our grateful acknowledgments, and believe that a brief account of my father's life, illness and death, followed by some of the notices of the press and letters received since his decease, will be fully appreciated and accepted by them as a solemn and interesting duty resting upon us.

And, in closing this last number of the BIBLE EXAMINER, a magazine, which in its chronology has covered a period of one generation, we can truthfully affirm that whatever of fault it may have contained in its history, its one object, end and aim in its publication has been to diffuse among mankind the knowledge and love of God, through Jesus Christ our Lord, to a suffering and dying world.

HATTIE W. STORRS.

MEMOIR.

GEORGE STORRS, the subject of the following memoir, was born in Lebanon, N. H., December 13th, 1796. He was the youngest of eight children. His father, Col. Constant Storrs, was originally from Mansfield, Conn.; and was an industrious mechanic, serving, for a time, in the American Revolution as a wheelwright. After the war of the Revolution he was married to Lucinda Howe, who was half-sister to the late Richard Salter Storrs, for many years minister of Longmeadow, Mass. After their marriage they removed to New Hampshire—the country being then a wilderness—and located in Lebanon, on Connecticut River; and by industry and economy became, what in those days, was called a wealthy farmer. To them were born seven sons and one daughter. The mother of these children was ever watchful over their religious instruction, while the father was most studious to promote their temporal welfare. The mother invariably gathered her children around her, particularly on the Sabbath, to give them instruction in things pertaining to God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ. She was not disposed to leave their religious education to the minister, or any other less interested in their welfare than a mother.

The Congregational and Calvinistic ministry was about the only preaching in Lebanon for many years. Very few of any other denomination ever preached there. The strong tendency to fatalism, in the Calvinistic preaching of that period, was a subject which the mother of these children did not fail to endeavor to counteract in the minds of her offspring, and to impress upon them unceasingly, that, if they would seek the Lord, he would be found of them. Such pious labor was not lost. Though this family of children grew up to maturity, four of them died before their father; and six had gone down to the grave before their mother: two only survived her.

George's mind was often deeply exercised on the things of religion from a child. Many anxious desires filled his heart that he might be a Christian. Early had his mother taught him to acknowledge "Our Father, who art in Heaven," and point him to "Our Saviour Jesus Christ." Experimental religion, however, was a mystery to his mind, though one that he often anxiously desired to solve. Secret prayer was often resorted to, but he heard sometimes from the pulpit that the man who cursed and swore was as likely—yea, more likely, to be converted than the who went to his closet to pray for the salvation of God. Such teaching made George feel sadly, as he thought his case was more hopeless than boys whom he knew to be very profane, while he feared an oath. This influence, however, was counteracted by the vigilant instruction of his mother. Happy for him that he had such a mother. But for her instruction he has often thought and felt that he would never have been brought to a saving knowledge of God and his Christ. The sweet and heavenly strains of prayer, poured forth by that mother when she took George to her closet, and sought the mercy of God in Christ for him, made him forget or disregard the false teaching of the mere theologian. Such scenes told on his heart, not to be obliterated.

The preaching of the torments of hell never won his heart, though it often filled him with a dread of God, which was calculated more to drive him from God than to draw him to such a being. From fifteen to seventeen years of age was the most thoughtless period of his life. None of the terrors of preaching had any tendency to win him to the service of God; but at the close of the time last mentioned, in meditation, alone, far removed from all excitement, he became so affected with a sense of the goodness of God to him, that he resolved henceforth to seek the Lord till he should find him. If he could pray for nothing else, he determined to pray daily that God would show him his need of a Saviour, which theoretically he understood, but experimentally he had not realized. His resolution being made, he pursued noiselessly and alone his purpose, light gradually breaking upon his mind till he was led to bow to Jesus, and come to God by him and found mercy. Months had passed away and no mortal but himself knew the exercises of his mind; he did not even communicate to his mother the revolution going on in himself. He took occasion, however, to listen to any persons who seemed disposed to converse on spiritual subjects, and often felt his heart encouraged by such conversation, though he took no part in it, but was an interested listener, unknown to them. This state of things continued for a year or more. During this period his only sister died. After her death his anxiety increased to be in a state of reconciliation with God, yet all his exercises were kept within his own bosom, except on one occasion to ask his mother—who was at the time confined by a fever—some indirect questions relating to God and Christ: after which he retired alone, and was overwhelmed with a sense of the love of God. Still he travelled on alone, sometimes believing and sometimes doubting. After months had passed away in this manner, he expressed to his mother, one day, that he much liked to hear a man talk who always talked sweetly about Jesus. His mother said to him—"George, do you think you are a Christian?" This was said with an anxious look which made him feel that a mother's heart was deeply interested. It was a question so unexpected that he almost faltered in answering it; but at length said his mind was much interested on the subject. His mother replied, "I have long thought it was." This was as unexpected as her question, as he had no suspicion that any one thought him specially serious.

From that time himself and mother had frequent conversations, and she often prayed with him and for him, being a mother indeed, in more senses than one. He has never ceased to bless God for that mother.

At the age of nineteen he united with the Congregational Church, and about twenty others near his age united at the same time, who were the fruits of a revival at this period. Three years afterward he was happily married to one of like faith in Christ. Two years passed and that wife was confined on a bed of sickness and suffering, which can never be known except to those who were witnesses of the scene. Four and a half long years of sickness, suffering and trial were then endured which terminated in her death. She died most triumphantly, though a most painful death. Her husband stood by her bedside and closed her eyes, when the dying struggle was over.

Prior to her death, Mr. Storrs had had his mind exercised with the conviction that God had called him to preach the Gospel of Christ. He had exercised his gifts in the prayer and conference meetings of the church for years; and the thought had often occurred, that possibly he might have to proclaim Christ more publicly, and as a minister.

During the time of his wife's sickness, he was induced to hear a Methodist minister preach for the first time since he was interested in the things of religion. That minister he invited to his house, and also another of the same denomination. Their visits became a source of comfort to himself and wife. Ever after an intimacy existed between him and the Methodists; and about the time of his wife's death he united with that Church, and soon after commenced his labors as a minister of the Gospel. He joined the Methodist Traveling Connection in 1825, being then twenty-nine years old. The same year his second marriage occurred with a daughter of Col. Thomas Waterman, of Lebanon, N. H. His father-in-law was the first child ever born in Lebanon, and to the close of a long life one of the most prominent men in that town, being highly esteemed by all. Mr. Storrs travelled and preached among the Methodists till 1836, when he took the relation of a Local Preacher, but travelled more extensively than ever. For three years he spent most of his time lecturing and preaching on the subject of slavery, in a time which tried men's souls; as nearly the whole Methodist E. Church was hostile to an agitation of that subject. That hostility manifested itself specially through the bishops, who endeavored by every possible means to suppress the discussion of the subject. That opposition convinced Mr. Storrs that individual responsibility was the true ground to occupy, and he could not submit to leave his responsibility in the hands of bishops, nor any body of men, however good they might be. Without going into details of matters which led to such a result, he withdrew from said church entirely, in 1840, after a connection with it of sixteen years.

At this point it may be necessary to say that Mr. Storrs never had a charge preferred against him for immoral or disorderly conduct at any period of his connection with the Congregational or Methodist Churches. And in severing his connection with them he was not actuated by hostility to them, but by a deep conviction that his responsibility was to God alone.

In 1837—three years prior to his withdrawal from the M. E. Church—his mind was first called to a consideration of the subject of the final destiny of wicked men as being, possibly, an entire extinction of being and not endless preservation in sin and suffering. This was by a small anonymous pamphlet put forth, as he learned, by Henry Grew, of Philadelphia. He read it to pass away a leisure hour while passing from Boston to New York. It was strange to him that so plausible and Scriptural an argument could be made in defence of a doctrine which he had always regarded as unworthy of a serious consideration; for he had never doubted that man possessed an immortal soul. A new train of thought had now been waked up in his mind; but he proceeded with great caution in examining the subject, and in conversing with any one upon it. He searched the Scriptures carefully, and sought every opportunity to get information from ministers in particular. As the inquiry continued, the strongest arguments urged against this, to him, new view, served to carry his mind into the conviction of its truthfulness and Scriptural basis. After several years' investigation, conversation and correspondence with some of the most eminent ministers, and looking to God for direction, he became settled that man has no immortality by his creation or birth; and that "all the wicked will God destroy"—utterly exterminate.

He had counted the cost before he came to this conclusion. He had stood high in the denomination with which he was connected, and was greatly beloved by the ministers in the conference with which he had passed so many years. That conference had given him, always, the most gratifying evidence of its confidence and esteem. Though he had, previous to the time now spoken of, taken a "local relation," he still enjoyed a high place in the affections of those ministers, and was ever happy to enjoy association with them.

To take a position, then, which should sever himself from them, and separate himself from the relation which had so long existed, with the certainty that he must forever after be excluded from their pulpits, if not from their Christian regard, was a trial to his mind which could not have been endured except under a deep sense of the truth of that position which he now felt called to advocate and defend. Relying upon God, he chose to follow his convictions of truth to any and all other considerations; and he took his stand in defence of the doctrine, that there is no immortality out of Christ, and therefore wicked men will be consumed—destroyed—or cease from life—be no more—"be as though they had not been."

He wrote three letters to a prominent and able minister of the Methodist E. Church, with whom he had been intimate. In reply, he acknowledged that he could not answer Mr. Storrs' arguments; and he never undertook it. On the contrary, after a few months, they had an interview, and examined the subject together, which resulted in his advising Mr. Storrs to publish the letters he had written him, but with a request to withhold his name. Accordingly, in the spring of 1841, four years after his attention was first called to the subject, two thousand copies of the "Three Letters" were issued from the press and sent abroad. This was not done without counting the cost.

At this period he was residing in Montpelier, Vt., and expected likely he would never be called to preach anywhere again only as he did so on his own appointments, and near his then residence. Contrary to this expectation, he shortly after had an invitation to visit Albany, N. Y., which he did; and after preaching in that city three Sabbaths concluded to remove his family to that place in August, 1841. There he ministered to a small congregation, who came together on the principle of "receiving one another as Christ had received them." The Bible was the only creed—Christian character the only test. For eight months he preached there without dwelling distinctly on his new views of Christian doctrine, though he had frankly told them what his views were, and circulated among them the "Three Letters" he had previously published.

He now felt called upon to come out more fully and distinctly on the subject, and he determined to do so. This gave rise to what has ever since been called the "Six Sermons," the special history of which we will here state.

Early in the spring of 1842, he determined to give one sermon that should embody all that might be desirable to present in relation to it. The appointment was made one week beforehand, and public notice given in the city papers. Monday previous to the time appointed he went to his study, and there spent the entire week in investigation, meditation, and prayer. Thus was the "First Discourse" prepared. Never had he a deeper and sweeter sense of the Divine presence and blessing, and of being engaged in a work well pleasing in His sight; and he could as well doubt any other part of his Christian experience as to doubt that.

He found before the first week in his study was ended, that two discourses at least would be necessary to present the subject in a proper light. The time came for the first discourse to be delivered; it was Sabbath evening, and the house, for the first time since his ministry there, was full.

He informed the congregation that as his subject was a peculiar one, and he was liable to be misrepresented in what was said, he had determined to do what he had never done before—i. e., read nearly all he had to say. At the close he gave out to preach another sermon on the same subject the next Lord's-day evening. His second week was spent in his study in the same manner that the first had been; and thus was the "Second Discourse" prepared; but found there must be a third; and so did the matter proceed till he had prepared and preached the "Sixth Discourse," and the history of the first week in his study is the history of the six weeks, each of which was spent in the same manner as the first. All this was without any reference to ever publishing. After the Discourses were ended, several who had listened to them desired their publication. Accordingly he spent several weeks more in revising, reviewing and preparing them for the press, and they came forth in May or June.

Such is the origin of his "Six Sermons," as they are now called. And he never doubted, from that day forward, but what it was of God.

A few weeks after the "Six Sermons" were first published, at Albany, Mr. Storrs was visited by a man who was preaching the views of Wm. Miller on the second advent. He gave him the use of the "House of Prayer" in which to present those views. As the attention was deep, and the subject one of so much importance, if true, it was consented that he might repeat this course of lectures in their place of worship, and Mr. Storrs became partially convinced of the correctness of the views advocated; so much so that he solicited the services of Charles Fitch, formerly a Congregational minister, who had embraced the views of Mr. Miller, to visit Albany and preach to the people on the subject. Accordingly a Tent meeting was appointed for that place, and thousands came out to hear that holy man of God, Mr. Fitch, who labored unceasingly and with great power in preaching the coming of the Lord. During his ministry there Mr. S. became settled that the doctrine he preached was true. Under this impression, he left his stated ministry in Albany to travel and preach; and for the next three months, in the fall of 1842, preached to thousands on thousands in relation to the coming of the Lord. Thus, without seeking it, the providence of God had given him an influence over a multitude of minds, both ministers and laymen. He did not, however, introduce his peculiar views directly into his ministrations in public. He had no desire to do so. But as it was known that he held these views he was constantly met with inquirers, both ministers and private Christians, to whom he frankly stated his belief that "all the wicked will God destroy." The Six Sermons were sought for and read, and the truth on that subject spread while he kept silent publicly.

At length the "organ" of Mr. Miller's views, The Signs of the Times, Boston, Mass., came out strong against a minister who felt it his duty to preach what the end of the wicked would be, as well as to preach the coming of the Lord. That paper several times published remarks censuring that minister; and Mr. S. felt that as he held the same sentiments he was bound not to keep silence and let him suffer alone. Accordingly, in December, 1842, under a deep conviction that God called him thereto, he revised the Six Sermons, and published an edition of five thousand in newspaper form, in the city of New York, where he was then preaching, and scattered them over the United States, at his own expense. A few weeks after that, he gave them another revision and published ten thousand more and scattered them in the same manner. Thus was the seed sown, and it sprung up in all directions.

In the spring of 1843, he was invited to Philadelphia to preach on the advent, and thousands came out to hear. It was well known what his sentiments on the end of the wicked were, and there was an evident desire to hear something on that subject. Instead, however, of preaching on the subject, he had the Six Sermons stereotyped in the quarto form, and printed two thousand copies; these were distributed among the congregation to which he was then preaching; and there is little doubt but that most who then read, were either convinced of the truth, or had their prejudices so far removed as to feel no opposition.

In the fall of 1843, he went to Cincinnati, Ohio, and spent several months. There also and in Indiana, some five or six thousands of the Sermons were scattered; and we know that the seed took root in that region.

It is proper and right that we should here state that Mr. Miller uniformly opposed Mr. Storrs' views on the immortality question.

The views maintained in the Six Sermons, in the winter of 1843 and 1844, had taken strong hold of many minds; and in Jan. 1844, Charles Fitch, of whom we have previously spoken, wrote Mr. Storrs a letter commencing as follows:—

CLEVELAND, Ohio, Jan. 25, 1844.

"Dear Br. Storrs :—As you have long been fighting the Lord's battles alone, on the subject of the state of the dead, and of the final doom of the wicked, I write this to say, that I am at last, after much thought and prayer, and a full conviction of duty to God, prepared to take my stand by your side."

He then went on to state his "thorough conversion" to the views in question. This letter was indeed a cordial to Mr. Storrs. Mr. Fitch was a pleasant and powerful preacher, and carried with him a mighty influence. This letter from him was a dreadful blow to the opposers of the doctrine of the Six Sermons among the advent believers.

In May of the same year he wrote Mr. S.

again, and commenced by saying—"I have received a long letter from Br. Litch, touching the state of the dead, the end of the wicked, etc. It would be exceeding pleasant to me to be able to please him, and the dear brethren who agree with him, for I love them all, and could rejoice to concede anything but truth, to be able to harmonize with them in my views. But there is a Friend who has bought me with his blood, and I take more pleasure in pleasing Him, than in pleasing all the world besides. I never preached my present views touching the state of the dead, and the destruction of the wicked, until fully convinced that I could no longer withhold them without displeasing my blessed Lord and Master."

He wrote another letter in July, 1844, giving a particular account of his "first impressions"—"the process of conviction," and his "conversion" to these views. In this faith Mr. Fitch lived and labored a few months; but his abundant labors brought on sickness, and in October, 1844, he fell asleep in Jesus, in the glorious hope of soon awaking at the voice of the Son of God.

About the same time as Charles Fitch, many other ministers in various parts of the country came into the same views, and their number has steadily continued to increase to the present time.

In 1843 the Six Sermons were republished in England and circulated in various parts of that country, and must have attracted some attention, as they are referred to by several writers on both sides of the question there. About this time Dr. Lees, of Leeds, broke ground in England against the endless-torture doctrine, and man's natural immortality. Near the same point of time, Mr. Dobney, a Baptist minister, published his excellent work on "Future Punishment," in England, which has been republished here, and has been the means of bringing many to the truth. Mr. White, a Congregationalist minister, also published his "Life in Christ," taking the same side with Mr. Dobney; and several other ministers in England are on the same ground.

For the sentiments contained in the Six Sermons Mr. Storrs alone was responsible, as he steadily refused to let any man, or any body of men, hold any responsibility for him or his views. It never was his object to establish a sect; as he steadily refused to be recognized as in, what is called, a church relation with any body of men. He did not, however, make his views of his independent responsibility a standard for the action of others; he desired all to act in harmony with their convictions of what truth and duty required of hem, as responsible to God.

It may be proper in this place to say that he labored steadily in the City of Philadelphia from November, 1844 to April, 1852, employing nearly all his time among that people, but never seeking for, or consenting to, an organization such as all sects labor to establish. He believed that love was the bond of union, and that, when that would not bind a people together, they had better separate. For the last two or three years of his residence in Philadelphia he was called more to visit different parts of the country, and finally concluded to remove to New York as a more central position for visiting abroad.

The BIBLE EXAMINER was started by him in 1843, as an occasional issue, at his own expense. It was continued in that way till 1847, when it was issued regularly each month, then in quarto form. With 1848 it was changed to a super-royal sheet of sixteen pages, and continued monthly till 1854, when it was issued semi-monthly. Its object was expressed by its motto—"No Immortality or Endless Life except through Jesus Christ Alone." In 1852 and 1853, in addition to issuing the EXAMINER, Mr. Storrs travelled thousands of miles, east and west, preaching to many people on the Life Theme. In the fall of 1863, its influence had been so extensive that its friends called for a weekly paper, and invited George Storrs to become its editor. To comply with this request he suspended the EXAMINER, and for eight years acted as editor of the weekly. At the end of that time, or in 1871, he had advanced doctrinally to his last position in regard to the purposes of God respecting the human race. He then revived the BIBLE EXAMINER, which has since been issued monthly. He had held the generally-received notion that the final destiny of all men would be fixed, unchangeably, at death, without regard to the unavoidable ignorance in which they had been placed in this life. That view he abandoned, fully satisfied that it was not, and could not be, sustained by the Bible. It is a human tradition, unsupported by a single text of the word of God, and a dishonor done to his perfections, and attributes to him a government outraging the moral sense he has implanted in the human breast, carrying the conviction to the reflecting mind that truth, mercy, love and justice, are all outraged by such an administration.

TRUTH is outraged, because the "Word of God" affirms that he "so loved the world that he gave his Son that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life;" and yet to an innumerable portion of the world he never gave an opportunity to know that Son, thus making it impossible for them to believe in him.

MERCY is outraged, because the Creator endowed every child of Adam with an intense love of life and longing for its continuance, and subjected them to a life of sorrow and pain, ending in a hopeless death, without allowing them to know that any provision had been made to remedy the evils they endure, nor that any means were in existence whereby these evils could be made to promote their ultimate good by putting them in circumstances of enjoyment to which they never could have attained by any other course of discipline.

Love is outraged, because the Creator foresaw, before he gave them life, that the vast majority of the race would live and die in unavoidable ignorance of any way of escape from those evils in which they would be involved, and yet determined not to make a remedy known to them in this life nor a future one. For the same reasons JUSTICE is outraged, so that, on the supposition that the Creator determined no ignorance, however unavoidable, should be an excuse for not believing on his Son, and that no opportunity to believe should be given beyond the present life, his administration would be chargeable with a monstrous lack of truth, mercy, love and justice: a charge which amounts to nothing less than blasphemy against our CREATOR.

Those who dare, may continue such a tremendous charge against the God who made us: the editor of the BIBLE EXAMINER could not consent to be of that number. "Let God be true," though it might prove "every man a liar." He "is LOVE:" that love embraces the entire race of men; and it led him to send his "only-begotten Son into the world to give life to the world" (John vi. 32); and that Son "gave himself a ransom for all to be testified in due time." (1 Tim. ii. 6.) To the vast majority of the race that "due time" never came in this life; and, as God "cannot lie," that time will certainly be found somewhere "in the ages to come." (Eph. ii. 7.)

Since 1863, he has issued many pamphlets; "The Essential Baptism," "Devil, Satan, Demon," etc. Among his later writings are many BIBLE EXAMINER tracts, as well as "The Promise and Oath of God to Abraham" and "The Divine Dispensations;" the latter are now out of print as pamphlets, but republished in Vol. 23 of the BIBLE EXAMINER.

HIS ILLNESS AND DEATH.

As early as March, 1879, he began to be troubled with the pain which the physicians suppose to have been the result of abscess in the kidneys. It gradually increased, till in the middle of May he was prostrated by it, and though everything that could be done by six or eight physicians was done, yet he could find no relief, till in the latter part of August the abscess broke and discharged. He then seemed easier, and through September we hoped he would be restored to comparative health, as he could go about the house; and on the 11th of that month I find the following memorandum in his diary: "Went down to breakfast for the first time in four months." The hope was illusory, for the pain returned with increased violence, and during eight long, weary months he suffered beyond the power of words to describe. From the first he had no appetite, could not take food of any kind.

The last three weeks of his life he was helpless, and Bro. Wm. Munger, of Springfield, Mass., kindly offered to assist us, and he nursed and cared for father as tenderly as a mother, watching him night and day, anticipating every want, thus alleviating much suffering; for which we cannot be sufficiently grateful. May the Lord reward him!

The physician said there was no old age about him, notwithstanding his advanced age; he had an iron constitution, and had not disease attacked him, would have lived years longer. He possessed remarkable tenacity of life, and fought with death for days; for a week previous his feet and lower limbs were numb, cold, and paralyzed. Friday night, Dec. 26th, he lost the power of speech; all day Saturday he was conscious, although unable to say anything, notwithstanding several efforts to do so. On Saturday morning, Dec. 28th, just as the sunlight entered the room, he fell asleep in Jesus, to rest till the resurrection morning.

His age was eighty-three years and fifteen days. His sufferings were intense until Friday night, but he bore them with great patience and submission, never murmuring nor complaining. When I said once, "Father, it is too bad that you must suffer so," he replied, with great sweetness, "No, my daughter, it is not too bad, but it is very bad; still I can bear it, the Lord helping me. The Captain of our salvation was made perfect through suffering, and shall I refuse to drink of the same cup?" Neither would he ask unconditionally that the cup might pass from him, for the Lord knew best, and would not afflict him except for his ultimate good. Toward the last he was aware that he could not recover and longed for rest, saying "he was so tired," and the dear Lord answered his prayer.

He made all the arrangements for his interment, desiring that everything should be as simple and inexpensive as possible; wishing no sermon to be delivered, nor any laudation of himself, as he felt that he had been but an instrument in the hands of the Lord for doing good to others. So, on the morning of December 30th, a few friends gathered at the house, short prayers were offered by Bros. Chas. Sutton and J. B. Cook, a few remarks by Bro. Butler Packard, of Brooklyn, and Bro. Grim, of Philadelphia, and he was laid away to rest for a little while in the beautiful cemetery of Woodlawn, in the lot of his cherished friend, Mr. H. F. Johnson, of New York, who had been unwearied in his attentions all through this long illness.

We miss a loving, devoted father and companion; our hearts ache with a sense of loneliness and desolation, that only those who have experienced the same can realize; yet we sorrow not as those who have no hope, for we know that his whole life was one of devotion to God and consecration to the cause of truth. For this he had given up friends, means, and now his life, and we feel that there is a crown and a glorious work awaiting him in the "ages to come;" which theme was a delightful one to his heart.

We know that all God's dealings with us are in love, and that he has some wise purpose in all that he permits; and though it seems mysterious to us why father should be called to endure such suffering just at the close of his long life, the reason may be to prepare him more fully to sympathize with the suffering ones to whom he shall hereafter be called to minister. Our prayer is, that we, with him, may be found worthy to stand before the Son of man. "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly." H. W. S.

NOTICES OF THE PRESS.

From the "Herald of Life," Springfield, Mass., Jan. 7th, 1880.

DEATH OF BRO. GEORGE STORRS.

Doubtless many of our readers have ere this been informed through the secular papers of the death of Bro. George Storrs. He died at his residence in Brooklyn, N. Y., Sunday morning, December 28, at the age of 83 years. His disease was an abscess of the kidney, and his sufferings were great during his last days. He leaves a wife and one daughter.

George Storrs was born in Lebanon, N. H., December 13, 1796. His early religious training was in the Congregational Church, but when 27 years old he joined the New Hampshire Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and preached in different places in that State for fifteen years. His views in regard to the nature and destiny of man then changed, and he became an earnest advocate of the doctrine of immortality through Christ alone, and the utter destruction of the wicked. This necessitated his withdrawal from the Methodist Church. He never afterward united with any denomination, but remained an Independent, preaching and publishing what he regarded as truth.

In 1842 he preached and published his famous "Six Sermons" against inherent immortality and eternal torment, in Albany, nearly, if not quite, 200,000 copies of which have been circulated. He was an earnest advocate of the Lord's coming in 1843-44, but ever afterward opposed the setting of any definite time for that event.

His first connection with any periodical was in 1841, when he began the issue of the BIBLE EXAMINER in Albany. It appeared occasionally for several years. In 1847 it began to be published monthly in Philadelphia, to which city its editor had removed. It was then issued regularly in quarto form until 1852, when Bro. Storrs removed to New York. From this time until the close of 1857 it was published part of the time as a monthly, and part of the time as a semi-monthly. During 1858 and most of 1859 it was suspended; but in the latter part of the latter year it was revived as a monthly, and continued, with an interruption of six months, until September, 1863.

By this time Bro. Storrs and many of the contributors and patrons of the EXAMINER had embraced the doctrine of no future life out of Christ, and a weekly publication was thought to be necessary, especially to meet the opposition which the new view had aroused. Therefore, at a meeting held under the "Old Chestnut Tree," near the Wilbraham camp ground, August 29, 1863, the Life and Advent Union was formed for this purpose. The new paper was named The Herald of Life and of the Coming Kingdom, and George Storrs was elected its editor.

The EXAMINER was now suspended, and the first number of the Herald appeared October 21, 1863. Bro. Storrs continued to edit this paper until August, 1871. He had for many years held the view that probation to the living nations at Christ's second coming would be extended beyond that event; and early in 1871 he published a series of editorials which led to the conclusion that those among the dead who had not heard the gospel and rejected it would arise and share in that probation. This view being thought by the managers of the Herald to be inconsistent with its purpose, Bro. Storrs declined a re-election, and our lamented Bro. L. C. Thorne took his place.

Bro. Storrs now began the issue of the BIBLE EXAMINER as a monthly, and continued it quite regularly, we believe, until his last illness.

Bro. Storrs was possessed of superior intellectual power. His large perceptive and retentive faculties, together with his ready command of language, made him a successful advocate and a formidable opponent. No one who knows his history will accuse him of being a self-seeker or a time-server. He followed his convictions regardless of the love of friends or the hate of foes. He took an active part in the early anti-slavery movement, lecturing frequently in behalf of the slave. This was one cause of his leaving the Methodist Church, which, to say the least, was rather lukewarm on that subject at that time.

His ability in discussion was fully proven and recognized in the Hartford Convention in 1853. The infidels had attacked the Bible and its God, and clergymen challenged to meet the charges had stood aloof, when he and Joseph Turner entered the convention, and ably defended them. He compelled the infidels to define the law by which the Bible was to be tried as that of "natural religion," and then discomfited them upon their own ground. The sense of the community at Hartford was expressed in the following resolution, passed, among others, at a large meeting held after the convention adjourned: "Resolved, That the sincere and hearty thanks of Christendom are due to the Rev. Messrs. Storrs, of New York, and Turner, of this city, for their able, manly, fearless, laborious and triumphant defence of the Holy Scriptures, during the recent convention."

Of Bro. Storrs' ability as a writer we need say but little, for he was editor of this paper eight years, and most of our readers, therefore, can judge for themselves. His pen was a power recognized by friends and foes. He was not an eloquent writer, but used good, plain English, that conveyed his meaning by the shortest route to the understanding. There was a point in every sentence, and frequently a very sharp one. It was not, however, the sharpness of bigotry, but that of earnestness and faith. But he could not only write sharply, but sweetly. The love of God was one of his favorite themes, and when upon it he wrote with a tenderness and pathos that showed that it dwelt richly in his heart. Besides his editorial writings, he was the author of several tracts and pamphlets, chief among which, and that which has had the widest influence, is his "Six Sermons."

Bro. Storrs was a man of spotless integrity and uprightness. All who knew him bear testimony to this fact. No matter how many opposed his religious opinions, none had ought to say against his life. He had early consecrated himself to Christ, and he remained faithful to the end. His long life-work is over, and he rests in peace, awaiting the coming of the Life-giver.

We bespeak for his bereaved wife and daughter the sympathies of all our readers, while we assure them of ours.

From the Restitution, Plymouth, Ind.

To the Editor Restitution:—How curiously wrought are the affairs of this life! Sometimes it has the appearance of unevenness, irregularity and question; we wonder why the loved and lovely are so soon removed from our midst, why hearts that seem cemented as with adamant are broken; why the aged and infirm linger beyond the allotted period of three score and ten; and why the sweet babe, so full of earthly promise, should be torn from the maternal embrace, and laid away in the cold and cheerless grave! These are questions that rise before us, and in our ignorance of the why and wherefore of much that is, we are often disposed to murmur and complain. We who have known the depths of sorrow, consequent on bereavement, are well prepared to weep with those who weep; and I need not call your attention to the circumstances recorded in a former issue of The Restitution, and again in issue of the 7th inst., where side by side are noticed the deaths of two, the one (sister Eshelman), related to me by marriage, and the other (George Storrs), to me well known, and very highly esteemed for his life and life's work. My personal acquaintance with George Storrs has a history of over twenty-five years, during which time I have been more or less intimate with him; for a long time he had office-room with my brother in Fulton Street, New York, during which time he was engaged in the discussion with Prof. Mattison on the "Life" question, and his masterly handling of that question then or since has rarely been excelled, if equalled. About twenty years ago he joined me to my first wife in the bonds of marriage; he was then about sixty-three years old, and was as hale and hearty a man as we would meet in many a long walk; I well remember his advice on that occasion to both of us—"Keep on courting"—and I have often thought since, if this was the rule of married life, there would be a greatly lessened list of divorces from causes which are patent to outside observers. It is well also to have the "bears" in the house, and out of it too: "Bear and Forbear!" I miss his familiar address to me whenever we met—"Well, Master George!" and his ever gentlemanly bearing, and thankfulness for any little attention shown him. His zeal for the truth as it presented itself to him was always coupled with a bearing of propriety toward those with whom he differed, but with a quickened conscience he never could do other than express his convictions. His more recent views concerning the future of the race led him to set aside somewhat his teachings in the Six Sermons, which I believe were the means of leading many hundreds, if not thousands of minds, into a deeper research for the truth of the glad tidings of the Kingdom of God.

Oh for the rarity of Christian charity, that is ready, or should be, to give honor to whom honor is due! George Storrs "rests from his labors, and his works do follow him," and it seemed wholly fitting the funeral of such an one, that none should pronounce his eulogy; as the life of the deceased can tell more than all others could say of him!

Like all who have dared to come to the front and advocate unpopular teachings, he had his enemies, who felt it their privilege to stab him, but who were never able to truthfully say one word against his moral character. He also had a host of friends as well as admirers, and many to-day, who while not endorsing all he taught, are full of kindly feelings toward the memory of one so just, so true.

In a recent conversation with him, while he patiently suffered, he said to me, "Oh if I recover from this sickness, how I will sound out the love of God in Christ Jesus!" and I believe this he would have done. In what I have said, I have had no desire to write a biographical sketch of George Storrs, only simply to note some things of pleasant and personal reminiscence.

GEO. W. YOUNG.

World's Crisis, Boston, Mass., Jan. 12th, 1880.

ELD. GEORGE STORRS.

A late Crisis brought the sad intelligence of the death of a brother—an old veteran and an able expounder of “the faith once delivered to the saints”—Eld. Geo. Storrs, Editor of the BIBLE EXAMINER, of New York.

The decease of such a man should have more than a passing notice. I have not the means before me except to give the outgushing of my heart at the loss of a dearly beloved brother, to whom in former years my heart was knit by a sacred tie, brought about by the spirit and power of God in defence of Bible truth; be it ever so unpopular.

Elder Storrs was no small pattern, but under God was a man of might and influence. When the anti-slavery reform was first agitated, and it was seen that evangelistic Christendom, north and south, stood in defence of, or apologized for, this God-dishonoring, damnable sin of slavery, turning men, women and children into goods and chattels, bought and sold like other merchandise, he was ready to leave all his denominational ties and associations and blow the abolition tocsin of alarm, at the loss of reputation. He was ready to take the cross, and the charge of heresy and infidelity could not deter him from taking a bold stand for God, humanity and the right. He was no halfway man; his convictions being secured, his whole soul was in the work, and his voice was heard thundering along the line of defence with scathing denunciations against the horrors of slavery and the wickedness of Northern apologists, from a Bible standpoint.

Being a Bible man, when the time had fully come, and the spirit of God in his great purpose began to open up in the fulfilment of prophecy, showing that the day of Christ was at hand; that we had passed the apostle's barrier—the “falling away” first, and the development of “the Man of Sin above all that is called God;” and that we had reached the generation which should hear “this gospel of the kingdom” by giving the signs of his soon coming to consummate the hope and give the kingdom to the saints of the Most High;—hearing and believing the “good news,” he took a giant grasp of this soul-cheering message. With boldness and unwearied exertion he gave himself to the work without moral reservation, and his defence of the soon-coming Jesus, with its results at times, were simply terrific and persuasive. His faith was so unwavering that he could take up the bridge as he passed over.

His Christianity was progressive. He soon saw from the origin of man and his destiny, that man was mortal, dying in his nature, and that immortality was only gained at the coming of Christ; and this led to the preaching and publishing of his Six Sermons in relation to the destruction of the unbelieving. These, with other developments of the same truth, let the light in upon us that has been progressing rapidly, till the theology of orthodox Christendom stands aghast to-day, wondering where to hold and what to hold to. Thus my love and memory take hold of and appreciate the labors of this brother in the Lord.

Again, I see an Anti-Bible Convention called together in Hartford, with a challenge for all or any ministers of the State to come and defend God's Bible against infidelity. None ventured but Elds. Storrs and Turner. They step in, and in the strength of the God of the Bible, against infidelity and its ablest supporters, their time was manfully improved by the thundering utterances of Bible truth, logic and philosophy, with their sharp, withering argument, showing the falsity of their natural religion; which gave a triumph for truth that was visibly felt by the Convention and vicinity of Hartford, and for which they received a resolution of applause from the Christian ministry of Hartford.

When such men pass away, more than a passing notice should be tabled; so I add my heartfelt condolence for and with the friends of the deceased. A good man has fallen. “Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord.”

L. BOUTELL.

A GOOD MAN GONE.

Rev. George Storrs died at his residence, 72 Hicks Street, Brooklyn, N. Y., Sunday morning last. He was born in Lebanon, Dec. 13, 1796, and was consequently 83 years of age. He was the last of a family of eight. His history is pretty well known to most of our readers. He began public life as a Methodist minister, but being very decided and outspoken in his anti-slavery views, when to be an abolitionist was to be almost an outcast, even in New Hampshire, and being rebuked for his persistent agitation of this subject in the pulpit and elsewhere, by the Methodist General Conference at Cincinnati, he severed his connection with that denomination, and never afterward would allow himself to be hampered by ecclesiastical ties, choosing to be free to read and think for himself, with none save his Master to call him to account. He became a very close Bible student, and as a result entertained peculiar views, chief among which was the idea that only the good are immortal; that sin in its very nature ends in death, and death is not life. He was highly esteemed by all who knew him, for the purity of his life. One admirer and intimate friend has said to us several times that he was the purest-minded man she ever knew. He began the publication of the BIBLE EXAMINER in 1852, and we think was editorially connected with it till the time of his death, excepting a few years during which he edited the Herald of Life. He was a great sufferer in his last months, from the effects of an abscess of the kidney. W. H. Spencer, an intimate friend and co-laborer, writes us under date of Dec. 29:

"His sufferings terminated about 10 A.M. yesterday, falling asleep in Jesus, as a child longing for rest, to await the Life-giver's return from heaven. The Lord truly 'giveth his beloved rest.' We shall bury him to-morrow with the simple service which he directed. We mourn the fall of a faithful standard-bearer, but 'not as those without hope.' He lived in holy peace, sustained by a blessed hope, assured that death's triumph will be short."

We had learned to have for Mr. Storrs a high personal regard. The story of his persecution for righteousness' sake made a deep impression upon our mind in boyhood, and we naturally sought a personal acquaintance after we became a resident of his native town. Sympathy to some extent with his theological views also led us into correspondence with him. Yet we never saw him but twice—once during his last visit to town and once at his home in Brooklyn. His wife, who survives him, an invalid, is a daughter of the late Thomas Waterman, the first male child born in Lebanon. He leaves also one daughter, Harriet, who in his later years has assisted him in his editorial labors. We presume some one who knew him better than we, will in due time, do something like justice to his memory in our columns.

THE DEATH OF GEORGE STORRS.

George Storrs, editor and publisher of the BIBLE EXAMINER, died at his home, No. 72 Hicks-st., Brooklyn, yesterday morning, at 8 o'clock, at the advanced age of eighty-three. Mr. Storrs was born at Lebanon, N. H., December 13, 1796. His early religious training was in the Congregational Church, but at the age of twenty-seven he joined the New Hampshire Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and for fifteen years he filled appointments in that State. His views in regard to salvation and endless punishment at this period changed, and he withdrew from the Methodist Church and ever after remained an independent preacher, devoting his labors largely to the enforcement of his views in his paper.

At the time of the early anti-slavery agitation, Mr. Storrs took an active part and lectured frequently. His prominence in this matter was one cause of his leaving the Methodist Church. After leaving New Hampshire he preached in an Independent church in Albany for two years, and in Philadelphia for nine years. In 1852 he removed to Brooklyn and devoted his whole time to the BIBLE EXAMINER, "a monthly newspaper for the unfolding of Bible truth." In May, 1879, he was taken sick and his newspaper was stopped, but in October another issue of it appeared—the last. He was the author of several books, among them "Six Sermons," and of numerous tracts. Mr. Storrs was a great sufferer in his later days and died from the effects of an abscess of the kidney. He leaves a wife and one daughter, the latter his assistant in his newspaper work. The funeral will be attended at the house to-morrow, and the interment will be in Woodlawn Cemetery.

GEORGE STORRS.

After an illness of nearly a year, George Storrs, editor and publisher of the BIBLE EXAMINER, died yesterday morning, in the 83d year of his age, at his residence, 72 Hicks Street. The cause of his death was abscess of the kidneys, which baffled the best medical treatment and caused him the most intense suffering. The deceased was born in Lebanon, N. H., and in early life entered upon the profession of a Methodist minister. Subsequently he renounced the views of his denomination in regard to endless punishment. He abandoned the ministry then and entered the lecture-field, confining himself mainly to the slavery question, and warmly espousing the views of the Abolitionists. In 1845 he established a monthly magazine, to which he continued to devote his attention up to the time of his death. He was a man of studious habits, and was a vigorous and forcible writer.

The funeral of the deceased will take place to-morrow morning, at his late residence, after which the remains will be conveyed to Woodlawn Cemetery for interment.

STORRS—On Sunday morning, December 28, 1879, George Storrs, editor of the BIBLE EXAMINER, who fell asleep in Jesus, waiting for a resurrection at his coming.

Friends wishing to call can do so prior to Tuesday, 30th inst., 10 A.M., when he will be taken to Woodlawn Cemetery.

IN MEMORIAM.

[On the death of Eld. Geo. Storrs.]

The news of Bro. Storrs' death (Dec. 28th, 1879) reached us too late for insertion in last issue. As then stated, our brother had just entered his 84th year and was quite ill. He was, we believe, a "faithful servant," and will soon "enter into the joy of our Lord." We mourn the loss of a friend and brother in Christ, yet "not as those who have no hope." The great Deliverer is at hand and assures us, "I have the keys of death and Hades."

The well-worn armor is laid by!
Thy faithful watchmen fall, O Lord!
They gather up their feet and die,
And wait their coming King's reward.

Herald of truth, thy last farewell
To earthly toils and scenes is given,
No stain upon thy mantle fell,
Thy record is laid up in heaven.

How little know the heedless crew
In church or state, that by their side
A witness, humble, faithful, true,
Has lived long years for truth and died.

In this dark world God's sons are veiled,
It knew not Christ nor knows his friends;
They watch and wait to be revealed,
When he, their Life, from heaven descends.

Rest, veteran, in thy tomb awhile,
'Twill not be long ere thou shalt rise
To greet thy heavenly Leader's smile,
And take from him the victor's prize.

Surely the night is almost gone,
And the millennial morn is near;
Sentinels are falling, one by one,
And leave the remnant weeping here.

Come, Jesus, is thy remnant's call
That first went up from Patmos' land;
Come, heal the wounds of Adam's fall
With the blest touches of thy hand.

JOHN LYLE.

IN MEMORIAM.

BY S. W. BISHOP.

Alas! the veteran pioneer has fallen, fallen; stricken down by the unrelenting hand of death. He who has during so many years marched forward in the great work of moral and religious reform, whose words of wisdom, power and truth, have burned on the hearts of truth-loving men and women in two continents; he who has gone forward in the way of increasing light, pushed on by the Word of God, a Scripture-enlightened conscience and an ardent love for principles of righteousness—gone forward at the sacrifice of every earthly consideration, until time after time he has seen victory perch on the banner of truth-lovers,—he now sleeps a dreamless sleep, awaiting the voice from heaven that shall rend aside the curtain of death, and the elected bride of Christ shall awake, a glorious army of immortalized kings and priests, to enter on the appointed work of the eternal ages. Among them, our most dearly loved brother, George Storrs, will hold no mean place in the carrying forward of the great work of subduing all things to Christ, by the mild sway and the eloquent pleadings of an imparted divine, immortal and all-powerful infinite Love.

He has laid his armor by to rest quietly a few days in the portals of the tomb, on a couch made soft even in the gathering mists of death, by faith, and trust, and hope; and then his years will be renewed in the prime of a matured immortal manhood, when again he will put the armor on, all polished, dazzling and bright as the choicest gems in the foundations of the city of God—put it on never to lay it off till from land to land, from sea to sea, over this entire planet the banner of the King of kings and Lord of lords shall float in triumph and the nations shall bow in willing subjection, and the knowledge of the glory of the Lord shall fill the earth as the waters fill the mighty deep.

Bro. Storrs sleeps, and oh, our hearts are so sad! He sleeps, and some of us feel that we are left alone. He sleeps, and on no man has, or can his mantle fall. He sleeps, and no one is left of all his brethren to be like him, a standard-bearer of the truth. Around no name in all our ranks cluster such holy memories; no name worn by any living man among us all is such a tower of strength as was the name of George Storrs. He was a giant among his peers. He was truly great in the outgoings of a noble, sanctified heart, on whose altar burned in perpetual incense that principle of divine love which is of God.

Those who knew him only in his public work, did not know the best points in the character of George Storrs. Such have known much of his stern integrity, of his moulding with a firmness of will, and with tenderness of conscience, all things that concerned him into perfect subjection to his honest convictions of truth and right; they have known him as firm as a mountain of rock in his unyielding advocacy of truth and righteousness; they have seen in his writings manifested the clear, strong and logical working of a great mind; but to know the loveliness of his Christian character, it was necessary to see him in his quiet home, to know him as I have known him in the family circle; to know him as a loving counsellor, a fatherly adviser, and an almost perfect example of Christian faith, patience and hope. In his last days he had ripened into such perfection of Christian character as few indeed have attained to among all the men that I have known. In the midst of our tears and heart-achings, God grant that his dear companion, and the daughter he so tenderly loved, his only living child—yea, all of us who so deeply mourn our great loss—may be enabled to copy his example, and like him be found ripe in the day when our great Life-giver shall come; that with him we may enter on the work and the full fruition of the life of the “endless ages.”

West Meriden, Conn.

BY BUTLER PACKARD.

It was my privilege for some time to be intimately acquainted with the late George Storrs, a man for whom I cherished the deepest love and the greatest veneration; one who was remarkable for his gentleness and nobility of character, as well as for the acuteness of his spiritual perception.

As husband and father he was faultless, and his own looked up to him with whole-hearted and reverential love.

His words were always full of cheer, imparting a new strength to those in trouble or doubt.

His manner was simple, but very impressive; and when speaking of the love of God for mankind—his great study and theme—his whole countenance would beam with divine love and his heart seemed overflowing with such a sense of the goodness and mercy of the Almighty, that he, too, loved every one.

No harsh word or expression of severe judgment escaped his lips against those with whom he differed, or those who had been condemnatory or unjust to him.

The gracious Father of all certainly gave to Bro. Storrs a wonderful insight into the true meaning of the Scriptures, revealing to him many previously-hidden truths, and enabling him to give to all who would receive, light and help beyond all price.

He was a most earnest and close student of the sacred word, giving months and, in some cases, years to a single thought, until he received great light upon the subject, and then his heart went out to all people with a strong desire that they should know the truth, receive the blessing and glorify the Lord for his great goodness to man.

And he would allow no one to give him credit for the truths imparted, but in perfect humility would say, “Not unto me, but to His name be all the glory and praise.”

As to his views in general or in particular, they are so fully given in the BIBLE EXAMINER, that no mention need be made in this place. The great and high faith he had in the love of God for all of his creation which should be ultimately shown, carried conviction with it; his own life of self-sacrifice and fearless advocacy of this teaching and Christ-like character attesting to his own deep convictions.

Even to the last and through all the terrible suffering with which in the wisdom of God he was tried, he was the same in faith and love. Having been made perfect through great affliction that the Master may say, “Come up higher,” he is now resting till the Lord shall call.

His memory will ever remain precious to me and to the many of his friends, and the light he has been enabled to give “shall shine more and more unto the perfect day.” May we all profit by it and be ready with him to meet our Lord, to remain with him forever and forever. Amen.

BY AUGUSTA A. STEADMAN.

A faithful servant of our Lord has “fallen asleep.” He will wake no more till the Master comes, but he has not lived in vain, he has done a good work, and many hearts go out in gratitude to God for the light that shone through him.

Turning away from the fearful doctrines concerning God and his dealing with the race that are found only in “the traditions of the elders;” refusing to accept the teachings of those who explained away the most glorious promises of the Word, and enlarged on all its threatenings, he searched the Scriptures carefully for himself before God.

Patiently, prayerfully he worked, believing in his heart that the fundamental truth of inspiration is this, "God is love." And he found it even so. This runs through the Word like a strain of music, making grand harmony with all other truths; shines through the Word like a glorious light, making "crooked places straight and rough places plain."

"He staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief, being fully persuaded that what he had promised he was able also to perform."

By his life was illustrated the sanctifying power of the truth: even his enemies spoke with admiration of his purity and uprightness. The praises of his Master were ever on his tongue, and when listening to him, one felt that here indeed was a man of God. He hoped to live till the Master came, and yet, he said, he knew not which he would prefer—to live till that blessed time, or to die and rise to meet his Lord.

To us who loved him, it seemed hard that so painful and lingering a disease should be laid on him, but through those weary months he made no complaint, he trusted the Master's love, and he knew that he would be called to bear no unnecessary pain. We could not see, but doubtless our Lord did, that this trial of his faith and patience was needful to fit him for his place in the temple of God. To prepare him for the work that he is to do as part of the "Bride of Christ," in that blessed day for which we long, "when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord, and he shall send Jesus Christ, which before was preached unto you, whom the heaven must receive until the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken of by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began."

"Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors, and their works do follow them."

LETTERS AND EXTRACTS.

FROM POLLY G. PITTS.

I have received a card announcing the death of your and our precious, loving kind friend, father, husband, brother, many kind names in one—George Storrs. Precious name! how much my God has made it to me, and how much I prize the gift; but how much it enhances the value of the gift when I contemplate the greatness of the Giver;

Yes, dear sister, our own dear sleeping one was given to this sinful, suffering world by a loving God who marked out his path, and gave him strength and moral courage to walk in it. I shall forever bless God for raising him up, and doing so much for me, and for thousands who will rise up and call him blessed. Yes, I hope to meet him in those blessed ages, where none shall say "I am sick or suffering"—where those that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars forever and ever. Take courage, dear sister, your hope for the dear one is big with immortality. He will not sleep long. The Master hasteth greatly and will soon be here. God grant we may all be ready.

I can say that the patience, long-suffering and gentleness of our departed brother, under every trial, persecution, pain and anguish, have given me new strength to suffer like patiently—all our God sees I need. And shall I wish the dear brother had suffered less? No, God forbid.

"For when we stand with Christ in glory, Looking o'er life's finished story," shall we wish that they that be wise shall shine less than the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness, less than the stars forever and ever? No, I hope to see our brother holding a sceptre on the throne of the Lamb, being a king or priest unto God and the Lamb. And, dear sorrowing friend, forgive me when I tell you, I could never feel to pray for him as many did, that God must raise him from his bed of sickness, that we could not do without him; and as I asked to know what I should pray for, the beautiful lines would invariably come to my mind, "Thou art weary, love, and needest rest and repose."

Sleep on, dear brother—blessed sleep! Soon Jesus will come and wake thee up to glory and honor everlasting! I pray God may give you and your dear daughter great consolation and good hope through Jesus Christ our Lord, and bring you with all the dear ones into his everlasting kingdom. My health is poor—severe pain has ruined one eye, and the other is affected. The dealings of our Heavenly Father with your dear husband have increased my faith, and I feel, more and more, that it is a loving God that chasteneth, and I will bear it without a murmur. I bless God that you had such a companion, that he lived in my day. Yes, I love to repeat it, George Storrs, and always rejoiced to see it. When an EXAMINER came, then I knew he lived, and was working for my good and the cause of our Father, and of Christ our Redeemer.

Fredericksburgh, Iowa.

FROM LUCRETIA B. LAMB.

MY DEAR BEREAVED SISTERS, the widow and orphan daughter of my precious brother, GEORGE STORRS, who was to me the dearest brother I had on earth. He was more than a brother, for he was my teacher in gospel truth, as no one ever was. His SIX SERMONS were the first writings that I read upon the immortal-soul question. I was so much afraid of imbibing error, that I would read nothing upon the subject, but went to my Bible and read that through carefully, but could find no "immortal soul." I wrote to my brother in Philadelphia for an explanation of some difficulties; he sent me the SIX SERMONS: the subject from that time has been clear to me.

The "Age to Come" also, he made so plain, and supports it by such an array of Bible truth, that it seemed to me impossible for a Bible student to reject it. "He being dead yet speaketh" through his writings. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord," as we are entering this time of trouble. "Yea, saith the Spirit, for they rest from their labor, and their works do follow them."

It has been deeply impressed on my mind that the truths your father labored so long and so faithfully to defend, will take root in the hearts of friends as never before, and thus his works will follow him. His sleep will be short; all things bear witness that redemption draws nigh, and therefore we should lift up our heads and rejoice. If the love of God dwells in us, we may be constrained to rejoice even in tribulation, for its result is glorious; leading us to be partakers of our Father's holiness, which is his design in affliction.

You express a desire that your father's friends may not forget you. I can assure you that I shall not; both of you seem dear to me as the widow and daughter of one so dear as brother STORRS, but above all, you are the children of him who is to me the "Chief among ten thousand" and to you, also, I trust. Our great High-Priest will soon come again, and we shall see him as he is. What a transporting consideration! May it cheer you day by day in this your loneliness, remembering that the morning of an eternal day approacheth when you are sure to meet the loved one to part no more.

St. Paul, Minn.

MY DEAR SISTERS: The sad, sad news of the death of our dear brother Storrs reached us last evening. Words of sympathy and condolence wholly fail to mitigate the great sorrow of your hearts. We can only acknowledge that the affliction is God's will. But if there is any consolation to you under the trying circumstances, it must be in the thought, that those who knew and loved him share in your sorrow for his loss. You know all I would say. May the Great Head of the Church sustain you. My husband joins me in every expression of sympathy and regret.

P. S.—I received your letter just after writing the above note. What can I say? Only that my heart goes out to you, in the tenderest sympathy. Your sorrow must be overwhelming; but I venture to say that the "Blessed Hope" was never so precious to you before. I know something of the desolation that death makes, and the aching sense of separation that you will carry in your hearts. Your letter has been read again and again with tears. O how I want to come to you; to sit down by you and mingle my tears with yours! "But the time is short." O how quickly it is passing! and in a little while from this, the tears and the pain will have ceased forever.

Yours in tribulation and in "waiting."

ALICE T. FORD.

Concord, N. H.

VERY DEAR SISTER STORRS: It's due that I drop a tear of sympathy in this your recent bereavement, for I regard it a mutual loss.

I look around to see who is able to receive the fallen cloak and stand in the way of God's calling; for the incumbency is a responsible one.

I have just been looking over the dear brother's last mental labors, printed while on his sick-bed, in which, like Moses, he stood and cast a wishful eye beyond the borders of the Holy Land and the presentation is truly beatific and glorious. I deem it as the keystone of the arch, a closing fulfilment of his embassy.

I still keep his works, and they speak the honesty of his heart, subject to errors as all do who explain the word of God, nevertheless, comprising a fund of knowledge not found in the teachings of the day.

I feel that we have grown in grace and knowledge, since we became readers of the EXAMINER, but my days of tuition are fast closing, having passed my 85th year. Now will sister Storrs and daughter be pleased to accept our grateful returns for fraternal kindness and brotherly love.

Truly yours,

R. WILLARD, SR.

Haddonfield, N. J.

MY DEAR SISTER STORRS AND DAUGHTER: Having myself but sipped, in prospect, of the bitter cup that you have now drained to the dregs, I feel very incompetent to speak words of comfort to you, but I can and do commend you to Him who is all tenderness and love to his dear suffering saints and who, as Redeemer, was made perfect through suffering that he might redeem a suffering people, and have a word in season, and a cordial for them in every vicissitude in their pilgrim way to that redemption. This is probably the darkest cloud that has ever overshadowed your way—the deepest waters and the hottest fire: but doubtless you can say, I am not forsaken; Jesus is with me in it all. For it is written, “I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee.”

Oh, the days and nights of sympathy, anxiety, care and labor through which you have just passed, None but God knows; and now as the object of all this is removed from you, you are left unspeakably desolate only as our God fills the vacant place with himself. May he in his unutterable tenderness soothe and comfort your hearts as he only can.

And now, sisters, I commend you to God, and to the word of his grace, which is able to build you up, and to give you an inheritance among all them which are sanctified. And when the Chief Shepherd shall appear to reward his faithful, may you, with him, receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away, is the prayer of your sympathizing sister in Christ,

E. S. WILLARD.

Haddonfield, N. J.

MY DEAR SISTER IN CHRIST:—I need not tell you how much I was shocked on receiving the postal from Bro. Spencer announcing your father's death. Anticipating it as I had been for months, and yet temporarily buoyed up with the hope of his seeming improvement that he might possibly again rally for awhile and be able to resume his former labors—I who had known him so long and so well; I, who had often sat and heard from his own lips the precious truth as declared by him from God's word, while a sojourner in New York,—I who am indebted to him under God, for much of the light I now enjoy—oh, I was filled with profoundest grief at the announcement of his death! I felt that not only had a great man in Israel fallen, but that I, too, had lost a spiritual father. I had learned to love him not only for his Christian manhood, but also for his boldness, his fortitude under the most discouraging circumstances, his ardent zeal, and his uncompromising fidelity in promulgating unpopular truths in his Master's cause.

Having passed the average age allotted to man and exceeded his four-score years, he has at last fallen—fallen in the harness. Cut down in the fulness of years, he has been gathered as a ripe shock of wheat. His work faithfully done, he sweetly sleeps in Jesus. “Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth. Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labor; and their works do follow them.”

I believe his sleep will be short. Our Forerunner has gone into the heavens, “from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body;” and then, O glorious thought! we shall see Jesus, and with the company of saints we expect to again see our beloved Father Storrs.

O that my life may be as blameless as was your excellent father's! “As for me and my house we will serve the Lord,” that we, too, may be accounted, together with your father, among the number of the Saviour's “precious jewels.”

My warmest Christian sympathies are with you in your great bereavement; but we mourn not as those without hope, and expect that death's triumph will indeed be short.

With Christian love to your aged mother, and we wish for your future,

I am very truly

Your brother in the Lord,

C. W. BUVINGER, M.D.

Pittsburgh.

DEAR SISTER STORRS:—The postal came last night bringing the sad intelligence that our venerable and much loved brother Storrs had passed from life and was numbered with the dead. Although we have felt that such an event was possible, yet lately and for years we have dreaded the coming of the grim messenger for his dear and much valued life, and we feel that a mighty one has fallen.

He is resting from his labors after a long and steady conflict for truth and the life of Christ. I envy him the close of a life of triumph. A clear prospect of a part in that first resurrection—having been faithful unto death—and a conqueror's glorious crown, await him, till the day of his Lord's appearing. Yet being dead, he will be spoken of, and his writings will live and work mightily to the overthrow of error and vindication of the loving character of our heavenly Father.

I sympathize with you in your bereavement and loneliness, and pray that peace and comfort may attend you to life's end.

Sister Hattie, I never met, but am thankful you have one so near you to administer to your needs.

Extend my kind greeting to her, and others who may be with you.

In hope of eternal life,

Your brother in Christ

DAVID J. ELLSWORTH.

Windsor, Ct.

DEAR SISTER STORRS:—I have just received a postal informing me of the death of your dear and loving husband. Oh, how bitter the cup! I have passed through the same trial—laid away a loving companion, a kind father and a worthy man, but he rests in hope. And when I think our dear and loving brother has passed away, no more shall we see his kind face, or hear his loving voice, or read his precious documents, my heart is sad; but he is at rest, nothing can disturb him now, his toils are over, his labors are ended, but his works will follow him.

You will miss him—no tongue can tell nor pen describe it; his chair is vacant; his seat at the family board unoccupied; his pen is idle; every thing tells that he is gone. But you have the blessed consolation that you will meet him again, that he will come "from the land of the enemy." It will be but a little while before the bars of death will be sundered and he will rise triumphant:

"O glorious hope of heavenly love,
It lifts me up to things above,
It bears on eagles' wings;
It gives my ravished soul a taste
And makes me for one moment feast
With Jesus, priests and kings."

May great grace and consolation be and abide with you and your dear, loving daughter, is the prayer of your friend and well-wisher.

MRS. I. G. MALTBY.

Bristol.

DEAR SISTER STORRS:—I have a desire to write something for your comfort in these days in which you will doubtless feel a loneliness you never felt before, as will also your dear mother in her weakness and declining years; after so many years living together the stronger one has gone to rest from his labors first. O, I know something of the thoughts and feelings that will come over you, at times seemingly like a wave of the ocean, which almost seems as if it would drown everything in its pathway; but there is a Mighty One that can control and say, Thus far shalt thou go and no farther. O to him you can go, into his tender loving heart pour your cares, for he careth for you. I am glad to know that your father fell asleep in hope of a glorious resurrection in God's own good time.

Almost every day since I received the last number of the EXAMINER I have thought of you and hoped faintly that it might be started with the new year, but I had my fears about your father ever recovering so far as to be of much assistance in furnishing expositions of Scripture for its columns. It would almost have been a miracle if he had been able to do so after such a painful sickness as he had passed through, and considering his age. I desire you all the consolations God is able in his wisdom to give you, and that I think is a good deal, for, "like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him," etc.; and again: "A father of the fatherless and a judge of the widow is God in his holy habitation." Precious words are these; take them as to you and for you is the desire of your friend.

MRS. L. H. WHITNEY.

Clinton, Mass.

MY DEAR MRS. AND MISS STORRS: In this morning's Tribune I saw the release of your dear husband and father. Instead of sorrowing with you, I rejoiced that his great and long suffering, so patiently endured, was ended. In saying this, dear friends, I do not forget how much is gone, nor the vacancy that can only be filled by an Invisible Presence, on whom perhaps you may learn to lean more trustingly now the earthly props are gone. What rich memories you have of his long life—of his marked fidelity to his convictions! How faithful he was when it cost persecution to be an anti-slavery man! I remember him with reverence and honor in those days, when he was dragged by wicked men from the pulpit for speaking the truth. Not many are earnest enough at present to be persecuted. A long and faithful life is ended. May you accept serenely and patiently as he has taught us to do.

"God knoweth,
I see not a step before me,
As I tread on another year;

But the past is still in God's keeping,
The future his mercy shall clear,
And what looks dark in the distance
May brighten as I draw near.

"So I go on not knowing;
I would not if I might;
I would rather walk in the dark with God,
Than go alone in the light.
I would rather walk with him by faith
Than walk alone by sight."

Yours in sincere sympathy.

It is thought best to republish the Editor's sermon "God is Love," prefaced by a memorandum that is found in his diary, on the occasion of his latest birthday.

"Great have been the mercies of God to me. I retrace his lead of me from my birth, and I see mercy and love at every step of my life. I give glory to God and the Lamb for all the loving-kindness which has attended me unto this hour. May my whole being be an unreserved free-will offering to the promotion of the knowledge of God and his Son Jesus Christ, my Lord and Redeemer. Forever and ever may I be employed in promulgating the truth concerning the LOVE of GOD in Christ to the human race and in leading them to be reconciled to God and the LAMB."

"GOD IS LOVE."

A SERMON BY GEO. STORRS.

In all our investigations of religious truth, or inquiries after it, it is essential that we have some central and undoubted truth to be our polar star, or a light that shall control all our movements in our investigations. Without this, our course will be clouded, and we can arrive at no certain conclusions on which to rest with an undoubting faith, feeling we are on that foundation which is immovable. Happy for us, revelation has given the needed solar light, which lights up the whole system of revealed religion, and is the polar star by which we may always determine with certainty our course. That light, that guiding star, is the grand truth —

"GOD IS LOVE." (1 John iv. 8, 16.)

Here is certainty; here there is no ground for doubt, and here there must be no doubt: to doubt is to peril all. If this grand truth is questioned, or held as if it were possible to be untrue, we are liable to wreck at every step in our investigations in relation to the government of God over the creatures he has made; nor can we be certain that any of our conclusions in these matters are correct.

The first great business, then, of all teachers of religion is to fix this truth in the minds of men so that it shall be undoubted and unquestioned. Till this is done, little or nothing can be accomplished in leading them "to serve the living and true God, and to wait for his Son from heaven." (1 Thess. i. 9, 10.)

The grand chart, then, by which we are to make our voyage in search of truth, and by which every other view claiming to be truth is to be tested, and its real character decided, is this solar truth, "GOD IS LOVE." Any system or theory that will not harmonize with this, and does not revolve around this as its controlling power, we may rest assured, is not of God. However plausible it may appear, even though it may resemble an angel of light; however much it claims to be a revelation from God, if it has not on it, in blazing brightness, "GOD IS LOVE," it is a deceitful light, an ignis fatuus—a false and bewildering phantom which has originated in some diseased human brain, which has yet to learn the true guide into all truth.

The beloved disciple, who leaned his head on his Master's bosom at the last supper, and who, of all others, drank deeply into his Master's spirit, understood this grand theme, and manifested its true spirit in all he said and wrote. Love was with him the all-absorbing thought. It was his sun, his guiding-star, to determine his own relation to God and that of all others. How clearly does he set forth the subject in the chapter before us: "Beloved, let us love one another, for love is of God [flows from him as its fountain]; and every one that loveth is born [begotten] of God [hath received of his spirit of love, verse 13], and knoweth God [is a partaker of the divine nature]. He that loveth not, knoweth not God, for God is love. . . . Hereby know we that we dwell in him, and he in us, because he hath given us of his Spirit [his Spirit of love: like as God is love, so we, in our measure, are love; and by this we know that we are of God]. And we have known and believed the love that God hath to us. God is love; and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him," etc.

In these statements of John the great chart is spread out before us which is to guide us in all things doctrinal, experimental and practical. Anything which fails of conformity with this grand theme, whether in doctrine, experience or practice, is not of God, and is to be rejected from our religious system.

But can this view be reconciled with God's government of the world? Not by the schemes generally held, and which are misnamed "orthodox," and to which we are called upon to do homage; but by the Bible, interpreted strictly in view of this solar truth, all in harmony, and God's whole administration is seen to be but the outgoing of love to all the subjects of his government. To make this statement plain to every unbiased mind, let us contemplate the dealings of God with men from the beginning of the world.

When God created man he fitted up for him a garden of delights—everything that was good for food and pleasant to the eye; nothing was lacking to constitute his state one of pleasure and joy. This was love's installation of man in life's joys. But man was only an animal being at present—though superior to all other animals—appointed as their lord, and designed by love for a higher sphere, or to have developed a spiritual nature, capable of more intimate union and communion with his CREATOR.

That this advancement into an endowment of a spiritual nature, which should constitute him undying, and thus God-like, should not become an evil, love was careful so to order that it could not possibly become a curse instead of a blessing; or, in other words, love guards against the possibility of endless suffering.

To settle this point, love tests the man as to whether he will develop a mind in harmony with the divine mind, or a mind in perfect subjection to the will of his CREATOR. Such a development was essential to man's safety and happiness, if he is to pass into a spiritual and immortal, or undying, state. For, to let him pass into such a state without a voluntary subjection to, or harmony with, the divine will, would be to make him an immortal sinner, and consequently eternally miserable, because eternally out of harmony with a superior power.

Hence, before endowing man with a spiritual and immortal nature, the love of God appointed a trial for him; and love decided that if the development should prove inharmonious with his CREATOR, the man should return to the dust from whence he was taken. Thus, not only the trial itself was an act of love, but the appointment of death in the case of a failure was also an act of love—it was the best thing that could be done for one whose will developed itself in opposition to the will of God, his Maker.

Death itself, then, is seen to be an administrative act, prompted by love as a preventive of continued sin and misery. Love could never allow a being to come into existence, or remain in existence, when his sorrows and sufferings, on the whole, would outweight his joys and pleasures. Love made such an event impossible. It could not be otherwise and God be love; but "God is Love," and that made it certain that whatever should be the final result of man's trial, his existence, while it continued, should have joys and pleasures far outweighing all his pains and woes. That such is the fact in this life, no sane mind will dispute: hence, all men love life, and wish to protract it as long as possible, notwithstanding its infelicities.

If such are the facts in the present state, it is not possible for love to appoint for sensitive beings a state of unmitigated or hopeless suffering; and the idea is an impeachment of the divine character and administration. Love, then, we see, at the outset, provided against a life, whether long or short, made up of hopeless sufferings. No attribute of the Divine Being, who is Love, could allow such a result; even justice, of which some religionists talk so much, could never override love to produce such a result. Hopeless torture in a future life, then, is an impossibility; it can no more take place than God can cease to be God.

I have said that death itself is the appointment of love. This is true in regard to all the finally incorrigibly wicked. After love has exhausted all the means consistent to be used with reasonable creatures and their freedom of will, if they continue to resist the efforts of love, and persist in hostility to the divine will, a continued life must be plunging them deeper and deeper in unhappiness till life itself would become a source of living torment, not unlike the fancied theological hell. Hence love appoints death to end their wretched existence before they reach that awful condition. How boundless the love that thus ends their mad career in sin and self-torment!

These remarks apply to all men to whom God has made known his love in providing a remedy for sin and death. If that remedy has been proclaimed to them, and they wilfully reject it, their wickedness obtains a maturity and their state a hopelessness which causes love itself to cut them off as the best possible disposal of them.

Love appoints death, also, for the righteous for a season, that they may rest awhile till the time appointed of the Father for their glorification. This life, while it has its joys for the righteous, the chief of which is the blessed hope of the future and eternal weight of glory, has continued trials also for them. Their own personal conflicts with evil in themselves, and the sufferings often experienced in this quarter, are one source of their affliction. The trial by the wickedness of others, either from persecutions in some form, or from the general disregard of God and his authority, and the oppression of the poor and needy, whose sighs come up into the ears of God like the sighs of the Israelites in Egypt, is another cause of sorrow and trial to the good, and often their righteous souls are vexed—distressed—by the unlawful deeds of those by whom they are surrounded, and among whom they are obliged to dwell. After enduring these things till they are fitted to reign on the earth with Christ in his glory, love appoints them to rest, or sleep in the dust of the earth till the fulness of time shall come for their glorification. It would not have been love to continue them in life's trials to the time appointed of the Father for the earth, their inheritance, to be renewed. Think of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and other ancient worthies, being continued in this trial state for thousands of years; then ask yourself if it was not an appointment of love that they rest in the sleep of death till the time for the consummation of their hopes should arrive, and thus the intervening space be, to them, annihilated; and the moment of their closing their eyes in death be to them the moment of their glorification, together with the whole family of the redeemed. A right conception of these things makes the great fact, "GOD IS LOVE," stand out in amazing glory, and should cause us to magnify his wisdom, power and love altogether.

But the most amazing development or manifestation of the grand truth, that "GOD IS LOVE," is found in the wonderful fact that he sent his Son into the world to rescue us from the death-state to which we all were hastening, and from which we were powerless to deliver ourselves. The statement of this great fact is thus announced by the Son of God himself: "God so loved the world, that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

Here, in one verse is summed up the state of man without divine intervention, viz., going out of life, perishing, returning to the dust, without power to survive in death, or revive from it; hopelessly lost to life, of himself. In this state God's love made its most wonderful manifestation. It put forward the highest loved One of the Infinite, and subjected him to humiliation such as earth never saw; to reproach, such as no mere human being could think of voluntarily submitting to; to sufferings, such as no man can fully estimate; and to death in the most dreadful and revolting form: all in love to dying men, and to open a way for their deliverance from sin, and "death, the wages of sin." Why this great and marvellous undertaking? Because "GOD IS LOVE," and he "so loved the world,"—the whole race of men; not a soul of the human family was left outside of this range of the love of God. But this love, in order to avail in rescuing men from death, from perishing, must be met by love in return, or faith in God's love, and a reliance upon the Son of God's love for the needed deliverance from death, wherever Christ is proclaimed. Without this return of love and confidence, or faith on man's part, man fails of a final redemption, or comes short of an endless life. He rejects the deliverance-love provided, and wilfully rejects the REDEEMER.

LOVE has provided for the redemption of the whole human race from sin and death. "There is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus; who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time." (1 Tim. ii. 5, 6.) Love and truth are pledged to see this testimony is made to all men in some period of their existence, here or hereafter. But "the times and seasons" for it to be done, "the Father hath put in his own power." (Acts i. 7.) Suffice us to know that God hath promised, and confirmed it with an oath, that it shall be done; that "in Abraham and his Seed all the families of the earth shall be blessed." That blessing includes the fact that "God will have all men come unto the knowledge of the truth." (1 Tim. ii. 4.) That truth embraces the fact that "God so loved the world (all the human race) that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." (John iii. 16.) That Son "gave himself a ransom for all;" and that fact is "to be testified" to all "in due time."

Did Love give that Son, and that Son give himself a ransom for all, and yet let any one of the race perish without ever having heard of Love's work in his behalf, and without having the opportunity and means to secure the everlasting life, by believing on the Son of God? To believe such an administration belongs to the government of God, is to believe that the apostle John was an impostor when he said "GOD IS LOVE." No soul of man will perish without first having had the true knowledge of God and of Jesus Christ, and an opportunity to accept the great salvation. Any other view strikes down and gives the lie to the grand leading truth of God's governmental administration, that he is love. Any other view shocks the reason God has endowed man with, and is a libel on God's government; and its natural tendency is to lead men to reject a revelation which they are taught revives dead men to hopeless sufferings, and another extinction of life (thus forced on them), or endless torture.

From such thoughts we turn to the fact, that God has provided for the perishing children of men an inheritance where no sorrow, no pain, no want, no death, can ever disturb their peace or interrupt their joy, or in the slightest degree invade or mar their pleasure. All this because "God is Love;" and all this is a free gift of his love to those who have sinned against him, but who, by the manifestation of his love, have been won from the ways of sin to give love for love; for "we love him because he first loved us;" and "herein is love, not that we [first] loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins." "In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent his only-begotten Son into the world that we might live through him." (See 1 John iv. 9, 10 and 19.)

This love gives eternal life—a life to run parallel, in the future, with the life of God himself; endlessly increasing in new joys and glories, as shoreless as eternity itself. Then will the redeemed ones be ever exploring the depth and breadth of the grand truth, "God is LOVE," and still be shouting, "O, the depth of the wisdom and love of God!" And as eternity rolls on, and they take new soundings on the shoreless sea of God's love, still they cry, "O, the depths!" And as wave after wave of love rolls over them and bathes their whole being with its comforting power, how will they exultingly cry out, "Unto him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us; unto him be glory by Christ Jesus throughout the endless succession of ages." (MacKnight's translation of Eph. iii. 21.)

When the bliss of that immortal state shall exceed all that thought can reach, the grand chorus will still, everywhere in God's vast universe, be echoing and re-echoing, "GOD IS LOVE." Yes, "every creature in heaven and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them," will join in the harmonious and triumphant song, "GOD IS LOVE." (See Rev. v. 11-14.)

"They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more, neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat; for the LAMB which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them to living fountains of waters; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes:" and all this because "GOD IS LOVE."

What can I say more? This love, O man! O woman, young or old! calls after thee from reason's dawn, saying, "Why will you die?" Will you not hear this voice of love? I know you have been born and educated under a human theology that has sought to arouse you by horrible representations of God's designs toward you, till your heart has become so hardened that, insensibly, you have come to regard God's service as only an awful necessity, and to be entered upon only to escape a horrible state of endless torture, which you have been taught God has prepared for his enemies. Such representations have so blinded your minds that, when approached with the grand message of this discourse, we seem to you "as one that mocketh!" Such a message begins to take hold of your heart, but the prejudice of your education makes you fear we are but deceiving you; and your old teachers cry out, "Infidelity!" so that, though you are almost disposed to yield to love's power, you start back with fear lest you should believe too much, and thus be wrecked.

Well, if love cannot win you, what will? The dread of a theological hell may sometimes alarm, but you know never kindled love in your heart. It has made many hypocrites, professing to love God so that they may escape the hell of torments, but it never did and never can produce the genuine principle of love. I do not say that none love God who believe the doctrine of future hopeless torture, or eternal torments; but I do say, those views never produced love in the heart of man, and never can. It is only when the mind turns away from such views to contemplate the love of God in Christ, that love arises in the sinner's heart.

I ask you, as a perishing creature, to turn your eyes at once to the grand truth of the text, "God is Love." Let no other thoughts intrude till this is so established in thy heart that sin will be hateful in thy sight and you find yourself cleaving to the fountain of love, and all thy sins will vanish away before the rising stream of that love which shall flow through thy entire being, and you will find yourself a new creature in Christ Jesus, whom God in his love gave unto thee, O sinner! to bear away thy sins, and to anoint you with the Holy Spirit of promise, which shall shed abroad the love of God in thy heart in such heavenly measure as shall make the yoke of Christ easy and his burden light. All this because "GOD IS LOVE."

Were the whole earth a parchment made,
And every man a scribe by trade;
Were the vast oceans turned to ink,
And every stick into a quill,
To write the love of God to man
Would drain the oceans dry;
Nor would the scroll contain it all,
Though spread from sky to sky.

THE BIBLE EXAMINER.

GEORGE STORRS, editor and proprietor of the above magazine, has lived, finished his work, and passed away; and all those who, like the writer, have been among its constant readers and supporters, may be allowed to record a few reflections in this its closing number.

A generation of our race has "gone the way of all the earth" since the issue of the first copy of this magazine; and it may be both proper and profitable to inquire if its publication has answered the purpose and design of its faithful and persevering editor? Its entire issue, its whole history, must answer the question. The great and important subjects which engrossed its whole attention, and in the discussion of which it desired to instruct and enlighten both the Church and the world, were the "mortal condition of man by nature, and his elevation to immortality only through Jesus Christ, the Redeemer of man; the unconscious condition and the literal resurrection of the dead, and the speedy, personal return of our Saviour to establish the kingdom of God, and put in motion a series of events which, in their fulfilment, should put an end to sin forever and destroy death itself from among the race, whose ruin and destruction seemed inevitable." That the EXAMINER wielded a very important and extensive influence among Christian believers on the above subjects cannot, for one moment, be called in question. In its earliest issues, it was forced to contend with the most determined and vigorous opposition, and its friends will not, and cannot, forget the terribly severe criticisms, the sharp reproofs, and the final charge of "infidelity" which assailed its courageous and Scriptural articles on the above and cognate subjects. Confident in the truth of its position, and fearless and determined in spreading abroad the constantly accumulating evidences of the Scriptural ground of its teachings, it persistently kept on its way, fearing only that its means might limit its extensive circulation among truth-lovers. So persistent, so effective, were its teachings and arguments, that it is simply impossible to avoid the conclusion that, at the present time, the larger number of Bible believers in this country silently accept or openly advocate the views presented in the pages of this magazine on the above subjects. At the period of its first issue, we may inquire, What religious magazine arrested the attention of its readers, or what pulpit declarations electrified its audience with the denial of man's natural immortality? Who, of the many thousands of theological teachers, announced the soul-cheering doctrines of the Church in the first century of our era, so ably argued and so successfully maintained by the EXAMINER, whose constant advocacy of these long-forgotten, but glorious doctrines, on which depends (according to the reasoning of St. Paul) the entire system of human redemption, viz.: the return to earth of Jesus Christ and the literal resurrection of the body? These inspiring doctrines, which imparted to the early Christians a courage in suffering, a heroism in martyrdom, so truly marvellous, that, to this day, the influence of their examples forms a stimulant to patient suffering almost as powerful as in their own age,—these doctrines had become nearly obsolete, passed almost into oblivion, the Church evidently preferring to worship an absent, rather than a soon-coming Lord; to believe in a mythical, or so-called spiritual, rather than a real, literal resurrection. The influence of the EXAMINER, with its generally well-written articles, struggled long and well in maintaining these important doctrines of the early Church; and, as before remarked, the present intelligent Christian community is greatly indebted to the EXAMINER for the revival of these long-forgotten, but very important, elements of early Christian faith. Indeed the conviction is forcing itself upon the minds of the larger number of Christian believers that there is no hope for the Church or the world but in the personal return of Christ to save a race who are rushing on to certain destruction, in the vain belief that they are saving themselves by a devotion to the subtle sophistries and pleasing delusions of modern ideas. In thus noting the progress of the views promulgated by the EXAMINER, its numerous friends and readers would award to its now deceased editor and proprietor the characteristics of a "pioneer" and one who has battled faithfully, manfully and well, in supporting and sustaining against much opposition the precious doctrines on which hang the hopes, not only of Christians, but of the world itself; for in these last days we are more impressed than ever with the truth of those significant words of early Christian writers. The world itself awaits, in an agony of suspense, the coming, not only of an age of peace, but also an age when, throughout the vast domain of the whole earth, it shall be proclaimed, "and there shall be no more death."

H. F. JOHNSON.

New York.

BRO. BLAIN, who is now 88 years of age, writes: Dear Sister Storrs, I take the time to write a few lines to express my deep sympathy with your great loss. Never have I lost a friend who was so much to me as Brother Storrs. I feel it most deeply. I trust God gives you faith to bear your irreparable loss with composure and trust in him. Let us all daily say, "Thy will be done." We shall soon rest with him in hope of a reunion.

JOHN FOORE, of Galesburg, writes: Your card of Dec. 29 is at hand, bearing the sad news of the death of our beloved Brother Storrs—our teacher to whom I, for one, am greatly indebted for the glorious truth of the blessing of all nations. Well, we need not mourn as those that have no hope. Brother Storrs will not sleep long—he will be wakened at the sound of the last trump—receive immortality and eternal life, and have a place among the kings and priests of God and the Lamb. May the good Lord bless and cheer his friends and enable them to stand up under this severe trial!

SISTER STORRS: You have my sympathies in your great bereavement. When I say we mourn his loss, I think I but express the feelings of most of his supporters in the cause of truth—perhaps it would have been better to say helpers. I pray that our heavenly Father who is love, will comfort you in this hour of affliction. Words are inadequate to express my sympathies, and words are of little avail in filling the void in your heart or stopping its aching. The blessed assurances of our God and Saviour can alone accomplish that—blessed be his holy name for them. May God's deep and abiding consolation be with you forever! Yours in the hope of the soon coming of the Master.

S. H. REEVE.

South Elliot.

WILLIS JONES, of Castleton, writes: It seems almost too late now to offer you my sympathy upon the death of your more than respected father, which occurred in a year now numbered with the past.

What solace can I offer you? I fear, none; and what shall I say then? Already you are not as those without hope for the future. But where is the sunshine for the present? If I say, I fear we shall not meet his like again this side of the tomb, there is no solace for sorrow there; or should I give you a word-picture expressive of how much I admired him for the manly simplicity and sterling honesty expressed in his life-long writings, I fear it would be no balm of Gilead. In my forty-seven years' experience, I have been surfeited with orthodoxy, heterodoxy, infidelity, popery, blasphemy, etc., but to my mind no exposition of the Hebrew Scriptures that I have been able to procure, can at all compare with the writings of your venerable father. In many ways he was one of the most remarkable men of this our day and age, and upon the first publication of the notice of his death, thousands of hearts, honest and true, sent yourself and family their sympathy, though you may not have received the same by post.

SISTER PIERCE, of Milwaukee, says: I have received the sad news of Brother Storrs' death. I cannot express my sorrow—I think, how can we do without him—but the Lord will provide and he will not suffer the truths our beloved and honored brother spent his life to promulgate and so dearly loved, to be lost. But no one can fill his place or write like him. How hard it must have been to see him suffer so terribly, and unable to do anything to relieve him! You can have the pleasing thought that many will call him blessed, and on whom will his mantle fall? On whom?

We have on hand all the volumes of the EXAMINER, from 18 to 23 inclusive, which we would be glad to dispose of. The bound volumes are $2 each; unbound, $1; postage paid. We have also many odd copies for distribution, which can be had for the postage, one cent a copy.
